to hear,⁹⁴ human existence is hard to obtain.⁹⁵ As the Lotus Sutra puts it so well, if human beings who are fortunate, and who worship Buddha, do not give alms in this life, from whence can they expect to receive glory and luxury, wealth and honor⁹⁶ in the life to come? As a man of yore has told us:

Ch'en Ching-chi Kowtows to His Light of Love

A dragon, upon hearing the Dharma, achieved enlightenment;
A python, upon hearing the litany, was reborn in Heaven.⁹⁷

How much the more should this be true for human beings." When Householder Chang returned home, he ordered a page boy to go into the interior of the house and invite his eight wives to come into his presence. Before long, they were all assembled in the hall, where the householder addressed them, saying, "Ladies, I am presently going to go to the Huang-mei Temple to embark upon the religious life. I will divide the family property into eight parts, and allow each of you to fend for yourselves. It seems to me that at the present time you and I are preoccupied with the pleasures of the moment, with no consideration for the life to come."⁹⁸ If we do not take up religious practice, in hope of escaping the fiery pit, we are sure to fall into the three evil paths and the five forms of suffering." One of his wives, upon hearing these words, said, "Sir, you possess the eight-treasured body of an arhat. What karmic impediment could you be encumbered by? Your situation is not to be compared to that of us womenfolk, who in the process of giving birth to boys and girls inevitably offend the purity of the gods. You can engage in your religious practices at home, and the eight of us will take the burden of your guilt upon ourselves. There is no need for you to leave.” Truly:

When his wife undertook to dissuade her husband;
The householder laughed sardonically several times.

The abbess having recited for a while, it was time for Nun Wang to continue with a gatha, and Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, as well as Yü-hsiao, all chimed in by reciting the Buddha's name in unison. Nun Wang then continued with a gatha in decasyllabic verse:

All eight of his, womenfolk, asked him to stay;
Saying to him, “Don't go away.
Practice at home.
Now if you, are so cruel,
as to leave us;
The little ones, will be distraught,
'twill break your heart.
We sisters here, will be forlorn, with nowhere to go;
How will we, one and all,
get through the day?
Since our youth, we've been mates,
partnered for life;
If on the way, we're left behind, who can we trust?”
Boy tugs at dad, girl tugs at mom, beat breast stamp feet;⁹⁹
The whole house, old and young, cry out in pain.

To the tune “Sutra in Letters of Gold”:

When his wives heard these words,
they wept unceasingly;
Urgently trying to deter their husband from entering the cloister.
“Think of your home;
Remain ever united with your children.
Don't go far away;
Practice at home, it all amounts to the same thing.”

Prose:

The householder then said, “I wish to thank all of you eight wives. In the future, when I am dead in the world of the shades, you can take the burden of my guilt upon yourselves. Today I will offer you a cup of wine, in the hope that tomorrow, when you appear before King Yama, you will undertake this responsibility, as promised.” As they drank wine together, the householder decided to play a trick, saying, “Wives, will one of you trim the wick of the lamp for me?” While the householder thereby fooled his wife into trimming the wick, he blew the lamp out, causing all eight of his wives to turn pale and call hastily to a maidservant, “Quickly, relight the lamp.”

The householder had pulled out a steel-bladed sword;
Which frightened all eight of his wives half to death.

Gatha in decasyllabic verse:

The old householder, called a maidservant, to relight the lamp;
With the steel blade, held in his hand,
he pointed at his wives.
“Which of you, took the bright lamp,
and blew it out;
Coveting my wealth, taking my life,
to marry someone else?
If you don’t confess, with a single stroke,
your head will fall”;
Each one of them, was sore afraid, falling to the ground.
All eight of his, elderly wives,
hastily knelt down;
“We beg you sir, temper your rage, spare our poor lives.
It’s clear you, with one breath,
blew out the lamp;
In your cups, flushed with wine,
waving your sword.
If you really, kill us all,
eight of your wives;
In Hell itself, we’ll tell King Yama, to seize your soul.”

Prose:

The householder laughed sardonically, and then said to his eight wives, “You’re fooling me. If you won’t even acknowledge that you blew out the lamp right in front of my eyes; when I am in the world of the shades, how could you take the burden of my guilt upon yourselves? You eight womenfolk are merely fooling me. It’s enough to give anyone possessed of age and virtue a laugh.” This speech reduced his wives to silence. The householder thought to himself, “Wealth and success in this life are all the results of religious practice in former lives.”¹⁰⁰ Then he called in a page boy and told him, “Quickly, go and load several carts with incense, lamp-oil, rice, and flour, together with every kind of vegetarian fare, cash, valuables, and such things. I am going to go to the Huang-mei Temple in order to commit myself to fasting on vegetarian fare and listening to the scriptures.”
To the tune “Sutra in Letters of Gold”:

“Ladies, listen to my explication of first things.
The Brahman prince, Sakyamuni, forsook his realm.
Ridding himself of desires,
He sought a means of salvation for all men.
For which he gave away everything, Attaining immortal fame for all time in the world of men.”

The householder departed that very day to take up the religious life;
All his relatives and neighbors assembled to see him off upon his way.

After Nun Wang had recited for a while, Wu Yüeh-niang said, “Our preceptors must be hungry. Pray set the scripture aside for the moment, and have something to eat.”

She then told Hsiao-yü to set out four vegetable dishes, two salty main courses, and four saucers containing sugar crisps, steamed-shortcake pastries, chrysanthemum-flavored cakes, and twisted crullers, of which she invited Wu K'ai's wife, Aunt Yang, and Old Mrs. P'an to partake, in company with the two nuns.

"We really shouldn't," said Wu K'ai's wife. "We've all just eaten our fill. Offer something to Aunt Yang though. She's been on a vegetarian diet."

Yüeh-niang hastened to take small lacquer dishes adorned with gold tracery and fill them with a sample of each of the delicacies.

Offering them first to the two nuns, she then offered one to Aunt Yang, saying, "Won't you have a little something to keep our two preceptors company?"

"My Lord Buddha!" the old lady said. "I really oughtn't to. I've had enough to eat already."

"And take this dish of pork ribs away," she went on to say. "I'm afraid I might get some into my mouth by mistake."

This provoked a hearty laugh from everyone present.

"My good lady," said Yüeh-niang, "This is counterfeit nonvegetarian fare sent over from the temple just now. Eat as much as you like. It won't do any harm."

"So long as it's really vegetarian fare," said Aunt Yang, "I'll have some of it. My eyes must really be deceiving me. I was sure it was meat."

As they were eating, Lai-hsing's wife, Hui-hsiu, came in.

"You lousy little stinker!" exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "What are you doing here?"

"I've come, like the rest of you, to hear the song singing," said Hui-hsiu.

"The ceremonial gate is closed," said Yüeh-niang. "How did you get in?"

"She was in the kitchen banking the fire," said Hsiao-yü.

"No wonder you're in such a state," exclaimed Yüeh-niang.

"Your nose is dingy,

Your mouth is sooty.

What would an:

Inveterate mischief-maker,¹⁰¹

like you want to listen to any scriptures for?"

Thereupon, the group of maidservants and womenfolk gathered around the two nuns as they consumed the assorted delicacies, after which the tea things were cleared away, and the lectern for the scripture recitation was wiped clean. Yüeh-niang trimmed the wicks of the lamps and candles anew and lit some incense, while the two nuns struck up their hand chimes and proceeded with the recitation in a loud voice.

They told how Householder Chang devoted himself to religious practice in the Huang-mei Temple; by day:

Kneeling upright to listen to the scriptures;

and, by night:

Engaging in meditation in the lotus position.¹⁰²

How the Fourth Ch'an Patriarch¹⁰³ recognized that:

This was no ordinary person,

but, surely:

A true monk born into this world.

How he enquired as to the location of his native place, and what his name might be. To which the householder responded by relating the preceding events, "Your disciple has abandoned his family property, his wives, and children; sincerely desiring to escape samsara by leaving his home." How the fourth patriarch accepted him as a disciple under his tutelage, instructing him to plant trees by day, and to pound rice by night. How after six years his regimen of austerities was complete, startling the celestial deva and protector of the Dharma, Wei-t'o, and awakening the attention of the Fourth Patriarch, who instructed him to seek a place to:

Achieve security and fulfill his destiny.¹⁰⁴

How he bestowed upon him three treasures, a hooded cloak, a rain cape, and a crooked date-wood staff, and sent him south to the banks of the Turbid River¹⁰⁵ in order to:

Enter the womb and take an abode,¹⁰⁶ thereby securing a new habitation for himself. "After three hundred sixty days:

The fruit of your practice will be complete.

You are now well advanced in years, and your habitation is too dilapidated to permit you to transmit the true wonderful Dharma, or accomplish the salvation of the multitude of living beings."

The recitation continued to the point where the Virgin Worth a Thousand Pieces of Gold was washing clothes by the bank of the Turbid River with her sister-in-law, when she encountered a monk who asked her if she could lend him a habitation. Though she ought not to have, she responded to him, whereupon the old man jumped into the river.

At this point, P'an Chin-lien, who was drowsy with boredom, went off to her room to sleep. In a little while, Hsiu-ch'un came from Li P'ing-erh's quarters to say that Kuan-ko was awake, and she too left, leaving only Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, Old Mrs. P'an, Sun Hsüeh-o, Aunt Yang, and Wu K'ai's wife, who elected to remain.

They heard how a large fresh peach came floating along in the river, and how the virgin, though she ought not to have, ate. it, returned home, and, finding herself pregnant:

Bore the fetus in her womb for ten months.¹⁰⁷
Nun Wang then sang a song to the tune “Playful Children”:

The numinous soul’s true nature¹⁰⁸ enters into her womb.
Who is there who is cognizant of these tidings?
No one grasps the meaning of the coming from the west.¹⁰⁹
With no more than a squeak¹¹⁰
she bears a child,
Who, acknowledging his mother, wears the iron-visage,
That, alone, enables him to see the glory of paradise.
From the summit of Mount K’un-lun
he makes chiliocosms spin;
Venerable Amitābha, who allocates the four directions.¹¹¹

The Virgin Worth a Thousand Pieces of Gold came into her sister-in-law’s room, and said, “It’s all because the two of us went to wash our clothes by the bank of the Turbid River that I encountered that old man who asked me if I would lend him a habitation. When he jumped into the river that way, he startled me so that my heart was in a state of trepidation. Then I ate an immortal peach. And now I suffer from a feeling of congestion, and am greatly disturbed. The state of my belly indicates that I have become pregnant.” Truly:

For ten months, within her belly,
the mother bore the fetus;
Tears wet the cheeks of the Virgin Worth a Thousand Pieces of Gold.

Gatha in decasyllabic verse:

The Virgin said, “In my boudoir,
I have become pregnant.
Ruefully I must, swallow my anger, and keep my own counsel.”
In one month, the fetus is, just like the dew.
In two months, the fetus is,
still without form.
In three months, the fetus is,
like a blood clot.
In four months, the fetus has,
just formed its joints.
In five months, the fetus is, sexually defined.
In six months, the fetus has,
all six sense organs.
In seven months, the fetus has,
all seven apertures.
In eight months, the fetus has,
the form of a human.
In nine months, the fetus is,
nearly complete.
In ten months, the fetus is ready to be born.

To an unnamed tune:

The Fifth Patriarch enters the womb¹¹²
in his mother's belly,
In order to save the multitude of living beings.
The men and women of this sahā world¹¹³ are loath to repent.
The Ancient Buddha descends to this world transformed into a mortal body.
Borrowing a womb and emerging from his integument,
In the future he will save his mother, conveying her to the celestial palace.
The Fifth Patriarch with his Buddha nature,
Enters the womb inside his mother's belly.
Residing there temporarily for ten months,
He becomes a mortal to save living beings.

When the recitation had continued to this point, Yüeh-niang noticed that Hsi-men Ta-chieh had gone off to bed, that her sister-in-law, Wu K'ai's wife, was sprawled out asleep on the bed in the inner room, that Aunt Yang also was yawning, and that the two wax candles on the table had burnt themselves out.

"What time has it gotten to be?" she asked Hsiao-yü.

"It's already the fourth watch," said Hsiao-yü. "The cock has crowed."

Only then did Yüeh-niang tell the two nuns to put their sacred texts away. Aunt Yang went off to sleep in Meng Yü-lou's quarters, and Big Sister Yü spent the night in Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters in the rear compound, leaving only the two nuns. Yüeh-niang arranged for the abbess to share a bed with Li Chiao-erh, and for Nun Wang to join her in sleeping on the k'ang in the master suite. The two of them waited for Hsiao-yü to heat up a cup of tea before going to bed. Wu K'ai's wife was sleeping on the bed in the inner room, together with Yü-hsiao.

Yüeh-niang took the occasion to ask Nun Wang, "Later on, when the Fifth Patriarch grows up, how does he reap the true fruit?"

"The girl's father and mother," said Nun Wang, "on seeing that she was pregnant, told her elder brother, Chu Hu, to drive their daughter, the Virgin Worth a Thousand Pieces of Gold, out of the house, with the intent of killing her. Fortunately, her second brother, Chu Lung, had a benevolent heart, and let her escape with her life. She found her way under a weeping willow tree, where she tried to hang herself, which attracted the attention of the god Li Chin-hsing of the Great White Planet Venus, who taught her how to:

Seek after tea and beg for rice,
Accept one's lot and live one's days.¹¹⁴

Before she knew it:

The ten months of her pregnancy were fulfilled,¹¹⁵ and she came upon a temple in the Village of the Immortals, where she gave birth to the Fifth Patriarch.

Purple mist and red light,¹¹⁶ filled the hall of the temple. The Virgin, on seeing that no sooner was her child born than he:

Folded his legs in the lotus position, was fearful at heart, realizing that this was:
Something out of the ordinary.¹¹⁷

Later, she made her way to T'ien-hsi village, where she was asleep on the threshing floor of a householder named Wang, when a fire broke out. When she was apprehended and brought to see the householder, he was so struck by her beauty that he offered to keep her as a concubine, at which both mother and son bowed down to him, which had the immediate effect of causing the householder and his wife to faint dead away.¹¹⁸ The household retainers and the gardener seized the mother and son, but when the householder later recovered consciousness, he said, 'I imagine they are innocent people,' and chose to keep them in his home. Only after he had been nurtured there for six years did the Fifth Patriarch start to talk, on which, without asking his mother's consent, he went straight to a hollow tree on the bank of the Turbid River, recovered his three treasures, and headed straight for the Huang-mei Temple, in order to hear the Fourth Patriarch expound the Dharma, as a result of which he reaped the true fruit. Later he also accomplished the salvation of his mother, so that she was reborn in Heaven."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she became an even firmer believer in the Buddhist Dharma. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Hearing the Dharma and heeding the scriptures,
she is afraid of death;
The red lotus-blossom tongue of the preacher
emits rays of light.¹¹⁹
Who is responsible for leaving us the empty words of Ch'an Buddhism;

Only to provide nuns and bonzes with an excuse to beg their bread?

Chapter 40

HOLDING HER BOY IN HER ARMS LI P'ING-ERH CURRIES FAVOR; DRESSING UP AS A MAIDSERVANT CHIN-LIEN COURTS AFFECTION

Good works must be done because you want to;
Without the intent they accomplish nothing.
Whatever merit accrues to good works you do;
Cannot be shared by anyone except yourself.
Though sacred texts pile up like mountains;
Without karmic affinity you won't read them.
Money and goods heaped higher than the walls;
When danger comes cannot be taken with you.
The dead to whom you tender devout offerings;
Are quite incapable of rising up to eat them.
Though sons and grandsons overflow your halls;
Once you are dead they cannot take your place.¹

THE STORY GOES that Yüeh-niang slept on the same k'ang with Nun Wang that night.

"Why is it," Nun Wang took the occasion to ask, "that you haven't thus far shown any indication of a happy event?"

"Now that you bring up the subject of a happy event," said Yüeh-niang, "in the eighth month last year, because we had bought the house of Mr. Ch'iao across the street, for no good reason, we all went over to take a look at it. While I was climbing the stairs over there, my foot slipped, and the wrench I suffered resulted in the miscarriage of a fetus I had been carrying for six or seven months. From that time until now, there haven't been any indications of another child."

"My dear lady," said Nun Wang, "in six or seven months it would already have assumed recognizable shape."

"In the middle of the night," said Yüeh-niang, "I evacuated the fetus into the commode, and when the maidservant and I examined it, it turned out to be a boy."

"My dear lady," said Nun Wang, "what a pity. How did you manage to wrench yourself, or was it just that the embryo was not properly seated in the womb?"

"All I was doing," said Yüeh-niang, "was climbing their stairs, which were narrow and steep, when, somehow or other, one of my feet slipped out from under me. Fortunately, Sister Meng the Third caught hold of me with one hand. Otherwise, I would have fallen all the way down."

"If you were to bear a son," said Nun Wang, "it would do you more good than it would anyone else. Just look at the case of the Sixth Lady in the front compound. She had hardly crossed the threshold any time at all when she gave birth to a son, and now she is treated with such favor."

"Whether any of us bear children or not is up to Heaven," said Yüeh-niang. "That's all there is to it."

"It doesn't matter," said Nun Wang. "A colleague of mine, Reverend Hsüeh, is adept at producing efficacious spells and potions. Year before last there was the case of the wife of Dr. Ch'en, who had reached middle age without any children, having suffered from a series of miscarriages that prevented her from carrying her pregnancies to term. But after taking a fertility potion provided by Reverend Hsüeh, she has given birth to a real armful of handsome baby boy, and the whole household is as happy as can be. The only thing is that the formula requires an ingredient that is hard to obtain."

"What ingredient is that?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"It requires the afterbirth of a firstborn child," said Nun Wang. "It must be washed in wine, burnt to ashes, and mixed with the potion. Then, selecting a jen-tzu day:²

Unbeknownst to humans,

Unperceived by ghosts,³

you must take it with some rice wine on an empty stomach. If you calculate the date correctly, you will be sure to conceive within the month."

"Is this person a monk or a nun," asked Yüeh-niang, "and where does the reverend reside?"

"She's a nun like myself," said Nun Wang, "and she's more than fifty years old. Originally she lived in the Ksitigarbha Nunnery, but recently she has moved to the Lotus Blossom Nunnery in the southern quarter, where she is currently the abbess. She is known for her exemplary conduct, and for her knowledge of any number of scriptures. In addition, she can explicate the Chin-kang k'o-i, or Liturgical Exposition of the Diamond Sutra, as well as every kind of 'precious scroll' relating tales of karmic cause and effect. She can go on for a month without exhausting her repertoire, and constantly frequents prominent households where they ask her to stay for ten days or a fortnight before letting her go."

"Why don't you ask her to come here for a visit sometime soon," said Yüeh-niang.

I'll take care of it," said Nun Wang, "at the same time that I solicit the potion that I spoke of, on your behalf. But that one ingredient is hard to obtain, and there's no place to look for it around here. Unless, thus and so, you were to take advantage of the occasion by digging up the afterbirth of that child from the front compound and using it for the purpose."⁴

"How could I bear to:
Harm someone else,
To benefit myself?"⁵ said Yüeh-niang. I'll give you some silver so you can seek one elsewhere at your leisure."

"This is something that one can only obtain from a midwife," said Nun Wang. "If I succeed in preparing this potion for you, and you take it in the prescribed manner, I guarantee that you will conceive a child. If you should be fortunate enough in the future to bear him another son, no matter how many rivals you may have:

Even ten twinkling stars,
Are no match for the moon."

"Don't tell anyone what you're about," Yüeh-niang admonished her.

"My dear lady," said Nun Wang, "I'm not so foolish as to say anything about it."

After they had talked for a while, they each fell asleep. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing came home from the temple. Yüeh-niang had just gotten up and was combing her hair. After Yü-hsiao had taken his outer garments, he sat down.

"Last night," Yüeh-niang took the occasion to say, "Sister Six was waiting up for you to help celebrate her birthday. Why didn't you come home?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing told her all about how the chiao ceremony was not over, how their kinsman Abbot Wu had gone to such trouble to lay on an elaborate feast that evening, how his brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, had left early, but how the abbot had kept him, along with Brother Hua the Elder, Brother Ying the Second, and Hsieh Hsi-ta, to be entertained by the playing and singing of the two boy actors.

"We continued drinking for half the night. This morning, I was the first to leave and come into the city. Brother Ying the Second and the other two are still at it. Yesterday our kinsman Abbot Wu really put himself out and spent a great deal of money."

Yü-hsiao brought him a cup of tea, and after drinking it, instead of going to the yamen, he went to his studio in the front compound, sprawled out on the bed there, and went to sleep.

Sometime later, after having combed their hair, P'an Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh, the latter holding her baby in her arms, made their way to the master suite to join Yüeh-niang in a cup of tea.

"Father has been back for some time," Yüeh-niang said to Li P'ing-erh. "He's gone to the front compound. I wanted him to have something to eat with his tea, but he wouldn't take anything. The maidservants have prepared a meal for him. Why don't you dress your little Taoist priest in his vestments and take him up front to show to his father."

"I'll go too," said Chin-lien. "Let me put the vestments on the Taoist priest for you."

Thereupon, she fitted the gold lamé Taoist cap onto his head, dressed him in his Taoist robe, hung the amulet on its cord around his neck, and pulled his tiny shoes and socks on for him.

Chin-lien was going to take the baby herself, but Yüeh-niang said, "You'd better let his mother carry him. Especially since that honey yellow drawnwork skirt of yours won't take dirt. If it should be soiled however slightly, it will be ruined."

Thereupon, Li P'ing-erh carried Kuan-ko in her arms, with P'an Chin-lien trailing behind her, as they made their way to Hsi-men Ch'ing's studio on the western side of the front courtyard. When Shu-t'ung saw the two women lifting aside the portiere to come in, he promptly got out of the way.

When Chin-lien saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was lying on the k'ang frame with his face to the wall, she pointed to the child and said, "What a slugabed you are, you old beggar! The little Taoist priest has come in person to summon you. A meal has already been laid out in the First Lady's room, ready for you to eat, but you refuse to get up promptly and continue to play possum."

Now Hsi-men Ch'ing was a person who had been drinking all night. No sooner did his head hit the pillow than he became oblivious to:

Heaven above and earth below,⁶ and was soon:

Snoring thunderously.

Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh sat down, one on each side of the bed, and placed the child right in front of his face. How could anyone have withstood such pestering? In no time at all they managed to awaken Hsi-men Ch'ing, who opened his eyes to see what was going on and observed Kuan-ko right in front of his face, wearing the gold lamé Taoist cap on his head, dressed in the tiny Taoist robe, with the amulet on its cord around his neck. He was so delighted:

His eyebrows arched and his eyes lighted up,⁷ as he hastily picked him up, sat him on his lap, and gave him a kiss.

"What a clean mouth to kiss a baby with!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "Little Taoist priest, Wu Ying-yüan, you ought to throw up in his face. Tell us, where were you yesterday:

Driving a water buffalo to plow the land,⁸ that you should be so exhausted today as to insist on going to sleep in broad daylight? Yesterday you kept your Fifth Lady waiting for you all day. You've got some nerve not to have come home to kowtow to your Fifth Lady on her birthday."

Holding Her Boy in Her Arms Li P'ing-erh Curries Favor

"Yesterday the chiao rites went on rather late," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and in the evening there was the ceremony of dismissing the generals. In addition, the abbot had prepared a banquet, and we ended up drinking all night long. Today, late as it is, I'm trying to catch a nap while I can, because I still have to go to Provincial Graduate Shang's place to attend a party."

"Why don't you skip it?" said Chin-lien.

"His household sent an invitation yesterday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If I don't show up, they'll be sure to take offense."

"If you go," said Chin-lien, "come home a bit earlier tonight. I'll be waiting for you."

"The First Lady has had a meal laid out for you," said Li P'ing-erh, "and prepared some broth with marinated bamboo shoots. She invites you to come and have something to eat."

"I don't feel particularly like eating anything," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but I'll go and have some broth."

Thereupon, he stood up and went off to the rear compound.

When P'an Chin-lien saw that he was gone, she plumped her posterior down in the middle of the bed, rested her feet on the rim of the recessed brazier below, and said, "So this is a bed frame with a k'ang underneath it."

Reaching out her hand to feel the bedding, she said, "The k'ang has certainly been heated until its boiling hot."

Noticing that on a table to one side there was a warmer, with a cover of brass wire, used for heating ink stones, she casually picked it up in one hand and said, "Sister Li, the ivory box on the incense stand over there contains pellets of sweet-smelling incense. Hand it to me, will you."

On the one hand, she opened the box and put some pellets into the warmer, while, on the other hand, she inserted it into her crotch and wrapped her skirt tightly about it, so that it would warm her body and fumigate her clothes at the same time.

After they had sat there for a while, Li P'ing-erh said, "Let's go back inside. I imagine Father has finished his meal and will be coming out again before long."

"What if he does?" said Chin-lien. "Are you afraid of him?"

Thereupon, the two of them, carrying Kuan-ko with them, went back to the rear compound.

After some time, when Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished eating, he instructed an orderly to prepare his horse and set off, sometime after noon, to attend the party at the home of Provincial Graduate Shang. Old Mrs. P'an had already departed before he did.

To resume our story, that night, when Nun Wang was about to return home, Yüeh-niang surreptitiously gave her a tael of silver and said to her, "Don't tell the abbess anything about it, but, whatever you do, contrive to go see Nun Hsüeh and bring a dose of that potion for me."

Nun Wang accepted the silver and said to Yüeh-niang, "After I leave now, I won't be able to come back before the sixteenth, but I'll endeavor to locate that ingredient for you."

"That's fine," said Yüeh-niang. "If you manage this affair successfully for me, I'll provide you with another expression of my gratitude."

Thereupon, the nun bade her farewell and departed.

Gentle reader take note: Generally speaking, the heads of prominent households should not patronize monks, or nuns, or go-betweens of this sort. In your:

Vast courtyards and secluded mansions, they establish intimacy with the womenfolk on the pretext of preaching about Heaven and Hell:

Expounding scriptures and explicating texts;
while, behind your back, they:

Name articles and cite clauses,⁹

On passion's heats and chills.

There is no telling what they will do. In nine cases out of ten, you will end up suffering calamity at their hands. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Black-robed Buddhist nuns are the most unspeakable of creatures;
In vast courtyards and secluded mansions they deceive beauties.
If persons of this ilk were really capable of attaining Buddhahood;¹⁰
The Western Paradise would remain forever a realm immersed in murk.¹¹

To resume our story, that evening when Chin-lien was getting ready to go to Yüeh-niang's room in order to visit with the rest of the company, she approached the mirror stand, took off the fret enclosing her chignon, and did up her hair in two curled knots on either side of her head. She then made up her face until it was snow white, painted her lips bright red, put on a pair of gold lantern earrings, applied three beauty patches, adorned herself with a purple gold lamé headband, and donned an outfit consisting of a jacket of scarlet brocade over a blue satin skirt. The idea was to present herself in the guise of a maidservant in order to have some fun with Yüeh-niang and the others.

When she asked Li P'ing-erh over to take a look, she:

Rocked backward and forward, with laughter, saying, "Sister, you're the spitting image of a maidservant. Let me go back ahead of you. I've got a red cotton kerchief in my room I can put over your head to serve as a veil. I'll give them a scare by announcing that Father has found himself another maidservant, and they'll be sure to fall for it."

As they set off for the rear compound, with Ch'un-mei carrying a lantern ahead of them, they ran into Ch'en Ching-chi, who said with a laugh, "I wonder who this can be? It can only be the Fifth Lady up to some trick or other."

"Son-in-law," exclaimed Li P'ing-erh, "come over here and let me explain. You go in first, and when you see them, do:

Thus and thus, and

So and so."

"I'll know what to do," said Ching-chi. "Leave it to me."

Thereupon, he proceeded into the master suite, where everyone was sitting on the k'ang, drinking tea.

"Mother," said Ching-chi, "take a look at this. Father, for no good reason, has engaged the services of Auntie Hsüeh to buy a twenty-four-year-old girl who knows how to play and sing from another household. She's just been delivered to our door by sedan chair."

"Really?" said Yüeh-niang. "Why didn't Auntie Hsüeh come and tell me about it beforehand?"

"She was afraid you'd give her a hard time," said Ching-chi, "so, no sooner did the sedan chair arrive than she took off, leaving the servants to bring her inside."

Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law, the wife of Wu K'ai, didn't say anything, but Aunt Yang said, "His Honor has all of you ladies at his disposal already. What does he need another one for?"

"My dear lady," said Yüeh-niang, "how can you stop him? If he's got the money to do it, he can buy a hundred and it wouldn't be too many for him. We're like:

Women serving in the army:

Merely taking up space, in these rooms here, that's all."

"Let me go take a look," said Yü-hsiao.

What should she see coming forward under the moonlight but a figure, wearing a veil over her head and dressed in red clothing, while Ch'un-mei, who had originally been carrying the lantern, had turned it over to the page boy Lai-an and was following in her wake, along with Li P'ing-erh. The situation created such a stir that Meng Yü-lou and Li Chiao-erh also came out to survey the scene.

In due course, they came into the room, where Yü-hsiao led her up to Yüeh-niang's side and said, "This is your mistress. Aren't you going to kowtow to her?"

So saying, she lifted the veil off her head, and Chin-lien proceeded to kowtow:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder, but couldn't help breaking into a titter of laughter as she did so.

"Some maidservant you are!" said Yü-lou. "First you forget to kowtow to your mistress, and then you break out laughing."

Yüeh-niang also laughed, saying, "This Sister Six is such an inveterate prankster that she managed to fool all of us."

"Elder Sister," said Yü-lou, "I was not deceived."

"Sister," said Aunt Yang, "how did you manage to see through it so as not to be deceived?"

"When Sister Six has kowtowed in the past," explained Yü-lou, "she has always done it that way; first touching her forehead to the floor, and then getting up and retreating two steps before making her bow."

"It took you to see through it," said Aunt Yang. "As for me, I would have fallen for it."

"I fell for it too," said Li Chiao-erh. "Just now, if she hadn't taken off her veil and then started to laugh, I wouldn't have recognized her."

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Ch'in-t'ung, who came in carrying Hsi-men Ch'ing's felt bag and reported, "Father has come home."

"You go stay out of sight in the parlor," Yü-lou said to Chin-lien. "When Father comes in, we'll have some fun with him."

It was not long before Hsi-men Ch'ing came in. Aunt Yang and Wu K'ai's wife had already gone elsewhere in anticipation of his coming. When he entered the room, he sat down on a chair.

Yüeh-niang, who was situated to one side, had nothing to say, but Yü-lou said to him, "Today Auntie Hsüeh brought a maidservant in her twenties from someone else's household over here by sedan chair, saying that you had told her to deliver her here because you wanted her. Old as you are, and with an official career in hand, it seems you remain as insatiable as ever."

"Since when did I tell her to buy any maidservant for me?" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "How could you believe that old whore? She was pulling your leg."

"Just ask Elder Sister," said Yü-lou, "if it isn't so. The maidservant in question is right here. I'm not fooling. If you don't believe me, I'll call her out for you to see for yourself."

Thereupon, she told Yü-hsiao, "Go drag that new maidservant in here to meet her master."

Yü-hsiao put her hand over her mouth and laughed, scarcely daring to do as she was told.

After venturing into the other room, she came back, saying, "She refuses to come."

"Let me go drag her in here," said Yü-lou. "What an impudent slave!"

Before being able to so much as shake her head, she's defying her master. She's the sort who will never take instruction from anybody."

After she had proceeded into the parlor, the rest of them heard a voice saying, "You crazy good-for-nothing! I'd just be wasting my breath on you! I'm not going in. All you seem to be able to do is drag me around. You're dragging me so fast:

My limbs can hardly touch the ground."

"A fine slave you are!" laughed Yü-lou. "Whoever taught you to be so unmannerly as to refuse to come in and kowtow to your master?"

And with that she dragged her into the other room. When Hsi-men Ch'ing opened his eyes wide and took a good look under the lamp light, he saw that it was P'an Chin-lien with her hair done up in two curled knots so as to look like a maidservant, which made him:

Laugh until the slits of his eyes disappeared.¹²

Chin-lien sat down on a chair next to him, and Yü-lou said, "What an impudent maidservant! For someone who's:

Newly come and just arrived,¹³
how can you be so:

Discourteous and ill-bred,¹⁴

as to sit down, as cool as you please, in front of your master, and splash muck on him to boot?"

Yüeh-niang laughed and said, "Take the occasion of your master's return home to kowtow to him."

Chin-lien made no move to comply but went into Yüeh-niang's inner room, took the pins out of her hair, put the fret back on her chignon, and came out again.

"What a wanton you are!" exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "Whoever gave you permission to affect a fret on your chignon?"

Everyone laughed at this sally for a while longer.

Yüeh-niang then addressed herself to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Today our kinsman Ch'iao Hung's family sent Ch'iao Tung over with six invitations, inviting us to a lantern-viewing party. Tomorrow we ought to send them some gifts in return."

She told Yü-hsiao to show the invitation card to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who saw that the text read as follows:

On the twelfth instant, our humble household has prepared a meager potation. If you deign to mount your elegant equipage and condescend to attend, our gratitude for your favor will know no bounds.

The above is addressed to the dressing table of the venerable consort of our eminent kinsman of great virtue and renown, Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Respectfully indited with straightened skirts by the lady, née Cheng, of your humble kinsman of the Ch'iao family.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished perusing the invitation, he said, "Tomorrow morning, tell Lai-hsing to buy four appropriate delicacies and a jug of southern wine to send over to them. That ought to suffice. At the same time, we should send out invitations of our own for the fourteenth. We can invite Ch'iao Hung's wife, Commandant Chou Hsiu's wife, Military Director-in-chief Ching Chung's wife, His Honor Hsia Yen-ling's wife, and our kinsman Chang Kuan's wife. Our sister-in-law, Wu K'ai's wife, will not have to return home in the interim. We'll get Pen the Fourth to hire a fireworks specialist to make several racks of fireworks for us, and engage the troupe of actors maintained by Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, to put on a performance of The Romance of the Western Chamber. While you're at home enjoying the lanterns and drinking wine, I'll invite Brother Ying the Second and Hsieh Hsi-ta to join me for a drink on the second floor of the house on Lion Street."

After he had finished speaking, it was not long before a table was set up and wine was served. P'an Chin-lien offered him a cup of wine and the other sisters followed suit, as they caroused for a while.

Now Hsi-men Ch'ing had been struck by the vision of Chin-lien disguised as a maidservant, and he observed under the lamplight that she was:

Alluringly dressed and heavily made up.

As a result, before he knew it, he was:

Carried away by lecherous desires, and winked at her so incessantly, that she had no trouble knowing what was on his mind. Consequently, she continued to drink with the company for a while and then went off to her quarters in the front compound, where she doffed her headgear, did her hair up into a casual chignon in the Hang-chou style, and proceeded to:

Retouch her powdered face, and Rerouge her ruby lips.

It so happens that she had long since set out a table for a drinking party, complete with fancy fruit and vegetable delicacies, in the expectation that Hsi-men Ch'ing would come to her room, so she could offer him a cup of wine.

Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing actually showed up. When he saw that her hair was still done up in a cloud-shaped chignon, his heart was filled with delight. He embraced her, and the two of them sat down on the same chair together and proceeded to laugh and talk with each other. It did not take long for Ch'un-mei to serve the wine and delicacies, and the woman once again offered him a cup of wine.

"Little oily mouth!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You already offered me one earlier, and now you're going to the trouble all over again."

"That drink amidst a crowd of people doesn't count," laughed Chin-lien. "This one represents my personal undertaking to offer you a cup of wine on my own behalf. Year after year I have put you to considerable expense. I hope you don't regret it."

This speech caused Hsi-men Ch'ing to:

Laugh until the slits of his eyes disappeared, and he promptly pulled her onto his lap and sat her on his knee, while Ch'un-mei poured the wine and Ch'iu-chü served the dishes.

"Let me ask you," said Chin-lien. "On the twelfth, did the Ch'iao family ask all of us to go, or only the First Lady?"

"Since they sent invitations to all of you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "why shouldn't you go? When the day comes, I'll have the wet nurse take the child along, so he won't cry after his mother if left at home."

"The First Lady and the others all have appropriate clothes to wear," said Chin-lien. "Old fogey that I am, all I've got is that limited number of outdated things. I don't have anything really worth looking at. Why don't you take some of those newly purchased fabrics from down south and distribute a few pieces of them to the members of your family so they can be made up into something to wear? Are you hoarding them in the expectation that they'll propagate themselves, or what? That way, when the day comes for us to entertain the wives of all those officials, we'll be fit to be seen, and not just a laughingstock. I'm always reminding you of this, but you act oblivious to the problem."

"If that's the way it is," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "tomorrow I'll call in Tailor Chao to make up some new clothes for all of you."

"There are only two days left," said Chin-lien. "If you wait until tomorrow to set the tailor to work, by the time he finishes the job, it will be too late.”

“I’ll tell Tailor Chao to bring some additional helpers along with him,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “As long as they can make up a few items for each of you in a hurry, it will suffice. Whatever work is left over, they can do at their leisure, and it won’t be too late.”

“As I’ve urged you before,” said Chin-lien, “whatever you do, see that they make two first-class outfits for me. I’m not to be compared to the others, who all have wardrobes of their own. You haven’t had any formal clothes made especially for me.”

“You lousy little oily mouth!” laughed Hsi-men Ch’ing. “You’ve got to have your finger in every pie.”

The two of them continued to talk and drink together until the first watch before going to bed. The pair of them were like:

Mandarin ducks beneath the quilt;¹⁵
Phoenix mates within the curtains.¹⁶
The swallows twittered in the boudoir;
As their cloudy passions intermingled.

It was some time before they were willing to call a halt, as they kept at it for fully half the night.

The next day, when Hsi-men Ch’ing returned from the yamen, he had the chests opened up and took out a bolt of block printed tussore fabric from the Imperial Silk Manufactory in the south. He then dispatched a page boy to call in Tailor Chao to make up full-sleeved robes of figured material for each of his womenfolk: one outfit of brocade, and one of figured fabric for each of them. Only Yüeh-niang was to get two scarlet full-sleeved brocade robes, and four outfits of figured material.

Hsi-men Ch’ing was in the summerhouse when he dispatched Ch’in-t’ung to fetch Tailor Chao. The tailor was at home, eating his dinner. When he heard that he was being summoned to Hsi-men Ch’ing’s residence, he hastily dropped his rice bowl, picked up his scissors and rule, and set forth. A contemporary composed several lines of verse to commemorate the strong points of this tailor:

I’m a tailor whose surname is Chao,
On call to my patrons each month.
Thread and needle I’m never without,
Rule and scissors are stuck in my boot.
Pleats and folds I find time to produce,
Faulty cuts I can fix in a trice.
Who cares if my clothes do not fit,
The lapels and the collars too tight?
Each day I eat meat at three meals,
And insist on two servings of wine.
Fabric samples I sell at my door,
Temple fairs I attend thrice a month.
When I’ve money my wife’s mouth is sleek,
When I’ve nothing the children all cry.
No matter whose clothes they may be,
In the pawn shop I put them to rest.
Though you pester me for them all day,
I’ve a ready excuse in my mouth.
If you claim you must have them at once,
I’ll put others in pawn in their stead.
If you ask what it is I do best,
I remain once for all on the take.

Before long the tailor arrived, found Hsi-men Ch’ing sitting at the upper end of the room, and made haste to kowtow to him, after which he spread out a strip of felt on the table, took out his scissors and rule, and set to work.

To start off with, he made Yüeh-niang a full-sleeved scarlet jacket of variegated figured brocade, a satin robe emblazoned with a mandarin square that featured an embroidered ch’i-lin being worshiped by the other animals, a robe of jet variegated silk with an edging of gold brocade featuring a pattern of phoenix mates traversing flowers inside a gourd-shaped border, an outfit consisting of a full-sleeved jacket of scarlet satin brocade emblazoned with a mandarin square that featured an embroidered ch’i-lin, over a wide trailing skirt of kingfisher-blue brocade, and an outfit consisting of an aloeswood-colored jacket of figured silk brocade emblazoned with a mandarin square, over a trailing scarlet skirt sprigged with gold-stemmed and green-leaved flowers.

For the others, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P’an Chin-lien, and Li P’ing-erh, he made a full-sleeved robe of scarlet variegated satin with a figured pheasant motif, and two outfits of figured tussore fabric for each of the four of them. For Sun Hsüeh-o he only made the two outfits but did not make a robe.

In no time at all he had cut out the patterns for some thirty articles of clothing. Hsi-men Ch’ing paid him five taels of silver for his services and engaged ten or more other tailors to make up the garments as fast as possible in his own home. But no more of this. Truly:

Golden bells and jade earrings disguise
the sheltered virgin;
Brocaded silks and pearl headgear adorn the beauteous maiden.

Chapter 41

HSI-MEN CH'ING FORMS A MARRIAGE

ALLIANCE WITH CH'IAO HUNG;

P'AN CHIN-LIEN ENGAGES IN A QUARREL

WITH LI P'ING-ERH

Equally endowed with wealth and distinction,¹ his inheritance is ample;
Streams of officials, in crimson and purple, congregate at his door.
His office is high and his position important, like those of Wang Tao;²
His family is prominent and his estate affluent, like those of Shih Ch'ung.³
Amid painted candles and brocade curtains, he whiles away the moonlit night;
Surrounded by silk clothing, rouge, and powder,
he is drunk in the spring breeze.
As indulgence in pleasure, by day and by night,⁴ continues year after year;
How can he ever make the effort to remain constant from beginning to end?

THE STORY GOES that the clothes for his womenfolk that Hsi-men Ch'ing had engaged the tailor to come to his home to make were all finished before two days were over.

On the twelfth, the Ch'iao family sent someone to remind them of the invitation to their lantern viewing party. That morning Hsi-men Ch'ing had already sent appropriate presents over to their place. That day Wu Yüeh-niang and her sister-wives, along with her sister-in-law, the wife of her eldest brother Wu K'ai, set out together in six sedan chairs, leaving Sun Hsüeh-o behind to look after the house. They were accompanied in two smaller sedan chairs by the wet nurse, Ju-i, carrying the infant Kuan-ko, and Lai-hsing's wife, Huihsiu, whose job it was to wait on them and fold their clothes.

Hsi-men Ch'ing remained at home, where he looked on as the fireworks specialist hired by Pen the Fourth prepared the racks of fireworks, and lanterns were hung in the main reception hall and the summerhouse. He also sent a page boy with a calling card to the mansion of Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, to engage the services of his troupe of actors, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

That afternoon he paid a visit to P'an Chin-lien's quarters. Chin-lien was not at home, but Ch'un-mei waited upon him, serving him with tea and something to eat, and setting up a table at which he could have some wine.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then said to Ch'un-mei, "On the fourteenth, when we are entertaining the wives of the various officials, it would be a good idea if the four of you senior maidservants would all get dressed up and assist your mistress in serving wine to the guests."

When Ch'un-mei heard this, she leaned nonchalantly on the table and said, "If you call on anyone to do that, call on the other three. As for me, I'm not going to do it."

"Why won't you do it?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"The ladies of the household have all had new clothes provided for the occasion," said Ch'un-mei, "so they will look good when entertaining the wives from the official families. As for us, each and every one looks just like a scorched pastry roll. Why should we have to put in an appearance for no good reason, only to make laughingstocks of ourselves?"

"Each of you have clothing and jewelry for yourselves," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You can come out in full dress, with your cloud-shaped chignons sporting ornamental flowers bedecked with pearls and kingfisher feathers."

"I guess I can make do with my head ornaments," said Ch'un-mei, "but how can I wear that couple of old rags of mine, the only ones that amount to anything? I'd be ashamed to be seen in them."

"I understand you, little oily mouth," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The ladies of the household have had new clothes made for them, which has put you all in a huff. It doesn't matter. I'll get Tailor Chao to come and make up three articles of clothing for each of the four of you, and my daughter, Hsi-men Tachieh, into the bargain. Each of you shall have an outfit consisting of a satin jacket and skirt and a brocade vest."

"I'm not to be compared to them," said Ch'un-mei. "I demand a white satin skirt to wear, along with a vest of scarlet brocade."

"If that's what you want," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it doesn't matter. But I'll have to provide one for Hsi-men Ta-chieh as well."

"The young lady already has one, but I don't," said Ch'un-mei. "She's got nothing to complain about."

Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon procured the key, opened the door to the second floor room, and selected five outfits of satin clothing, two brocade vests, and a bolt of white satin, out of which two white satin jackets that opened down the middle were to be made. Only

Hsi-men Ta-chieh and Ch'un-mei were to have vests of scarlet brocade, while those of Ying-ch'un, Yü-hsiao, and Lan-hsiang were all of blue, their outfits consisting of scarlet satin gold lamé jackets that opened down the middle, to be worn over trailing skirts with kingfisher-blue borders. It added up to seventeen items of clothing in all.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sent for Tailor Chao and had them all duly made to order. Ch'un-mei also demanded that a bolt of yellow silk be used to make the linings for the skirt waists, all of which were to be of Hang-chou silk. Only then did Ch'un-mei profess satisfaction and agree to spend the rest of the day drinking wine with Hsi-men Ch'ing. But let us put the situation at home aside for the moment and say no more about it.

To resume our story, Wu Yüeh-niang and her sister-wives duly proceeded on their way to the home of Ch'iao Hung. It so happens that on that day Ch'iao Hung's wife had invited the wife of Provincial Graduate Shang Hsiao'ang, the wife of her next-door neighbor Censor Chu, her husband's elder sister Mrs. Ts'ui, her nephew Ts'ui Pen's wife Big Sister Tuan, and her niece Third Sister Cheng, the wife of Wu Shun-ch'en, and had also engaged two singing girls to entertain the gathering.

When she heard that Wu Yüeh-niang and her sister-wives, along with Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law, the wife of her elder brother Wu K'ai, had arrived, she hastened out to the ceremonial gate that led into the second courtyard and ushered them into the reception hall in the rear compound, where the usual amenities were observed. She addressed Yüeh-niang as Aunt, and Li Chiao'erh and the others as Second Aunt, Third Aunt, and so forth, adopting the terms of address she had heard employed in the home of Wu K'ai's wife. When the newcomers had finished exchanging greetings with the wives of Provincial Graduate Shang and Censor Chu, Big Sister Tuan and Third Sister Cheng came forward to pay their respects, and everyone sat down in order of precedence.

When the maidservants had finished serving everyone with tea, Ch'iao Hung himself came out to greet them, and to thank them for their presents, after which his wife invited her guests into the master suite where they could loosen their formal clothing and relax. A table was set up for tea, at which the fare consisted of fancy steamed and deep-fried appetizers, stuffed pastry treats, preserved fruits, sweetmeats, and every kind of delicacy, all set out in a most elegant fashion. The guests were invited to sit down and partake of the repast, while the wet nurse, Ju-i, and Hui-hsiu looked after Kuan-ko in another room, where they were separately entertained.

In a little while, after the guests had finished their tea, they moved into the reception hall, where:

Screens display their peacocks' tails, and Cushions conceal their hibiscus blossoms.

There were four tables arranged along the upper end of the hall. Yüeh-niang was seated in the place of honor, followed in order of precedence by the wife of Provincial Graduate Shang, Wu K'ai's wife, the wife of Censor Chu, Li Chiao'erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li P'ing'erh, while Ch'iao Hung's wife assumed the role of hostess. Another table was set up to one side to accommodate Big Sister Tuan and Third Sister Cheng, making a party of eleven in all.

The two singing girls, situated to one side, played and sang for their entertainment. After soup and rice had been served, the chef came out to present the first course, which was jellied goose, and Yüeh-niang rewarded him with a tip of two mace of silver. The second course was slow-boiled pig's trotters, for which Yüeh-niang rewarded him with a tip of another mace of silver. The third course that he presented was roast duck, for which Yüeh-niang rewarded him with yet another mace of silver. Ch'iao Hung's wife then left her place in order to serve wine to her guests. After serving Yüeh-niang first, she went on to serve Provincial Graduate Shang's wife.

At this point, Yüeh-niang got up and retired to the inner room to change her clothes and redo her makeup. Meng Yü-lou also followed suit. When they arrived in their hostess's bedroom, what should they see but the wet nurse Jui who was looking after Kuan-ko. She had put him down on a little sleeping mat that was spread out on the k'ang frame, where he was lying right next to Chang-chieh, the newborn daughter of their host. The two of them were playing happily at:

You hit me a blow and I'll hit you one back, which tickled Yüeh-niang and Yü-lou no end.

"The two of them are just like a couple," they exclaimed.

On seeing Wu K'ai's wife come in after them, they said to her, "Come and take a look. The two of them are really like a little couple."

"That's true," said Wu K'ai's wife with a smile. "The way the children on the k'ang are:

Reaching out their hands and kicking their feet, playing at:

You hit me and I'll hit you, makes them look like a predestined little couple."

When Ch'iao Hung's wife and the other female guests came into the room, Wu K'ai's wife repeated what she had said, thus and so.

"Distinguished kindred, listen to me," responded Ch'iao Hung's wife. "Such mean folk as ourselves would hardly dare aspire to a marriage alliance with the household of such a one as our aunt."

"My dear kinswoman, how can you say such a thing!" Yüeh-niang protested. "What sort of person do you take my elder brother's wife to be? What sort of person is Third Sister Cheng? It is wholly appropriate that you and I should:

The Interplay of Two Infants Leads to a Marriage Alliance

Cement the bonds of affection with the bonds of marriage.

After all, the little boy from my household is unlikely to disgrace the daughter of your house. How can you say such a thing?"

Meng Yü-lou nudged Li P'ing-erh, saying, "Sister Li, what have you got to say?" But Li P'ing-erh only smiled.

"If my kinswoman, Mrs. Ch'iao, does not consent," said Wu K'ai's wife, "I'll be upset."

The wife of Provincial Graduate Shang and the wife of Censor Chu chimed in, saying, "Mrs. Ch'iao, in response to the generous sentiments of your kins-woman, Mrs. Wu, you really ought not to decline."

They then went on to ask, "Your girl Chang-chieh was born in the eleventh month of last year, wasn't she?"

"Our little boy was born on the twenty-third day of the sixth month," said Yüeh-niang, "so he is the older by five months. They truly would make a couple."

Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation, the whole group insisted on dragging Ch'iao Hung's wife, Wu Yüeh-niang, and Li P'ing-erh to the front reception hall, where the matrons of the two households formalized the betrothal of the children by exchanging cuttings from the lapels of their blouses,⁵ while the two singing girls played and sang to entertain them.

Once the situation had been explained to Ch'iao Hung, he brought out boxes of candied fruit, along with the customary three strips of red bunting, and proceeded to serve his guests with wine. Yüeh-niang, for her part, ordered Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung to return home immediately in order to let Hsi-men Ch'ing know about it, and they subsequently returned bearing two jugs of wine, three bolts of satin, artificial flowers made of stiff velvet and gold thread, with red petals and green leaves, and four boxes, inlaid with mother-of-pearl, containing candied fruit.

The members of the two families then proceeded to hang up the red bunting and celebrate the occasion with a drinking party.
Within the reception hall:

Painted candles are elevated on high,
Decorated lanterns flare resplendently,⁶
The fragrance of musk is luxuriant,
The sound of joyous laughter resounds.

In front of the gathering, the two singing girls:

Opened their ruby lips,
Exposed their white teeth,
Lightly plucked their jade mandolas, and Casually grasped their balloon guitars, as they sang the song suite that begins with the tune “Fighting Quails.”⁷

Inside kingfisher-hued window gauze,
Underneath mandarin duck azure tiles,
Hidden by peacock-adorned silver screens,⁸
Amid hibiscus-decked embroidered couches,
Curtains of gossamer silk are rolled up,
Incense smolders in duck-shaped censers,⁹ Lamps are suspended above,
Blinds are lowered below.
This is the residence of a Minister of the Department of State Affairs,
The son-in-law of the reigning emperor.

To the tune “Prelude to Purple Blossoms”

The soldiers in his entourage are clad in red, bearing painted halberds;
The officers of his command wear “Hooks of Wu” hanging from brocade belts;¹⁰
The guest at his feast sports an embroidered cap adorned with palace flowers.¹¹
The entertainment accords with that of the Music Office,
The extravagance compares with that of the Palace Garden.
The tempo is provided by clappers of red ivory,¹²
The strains of a classic melody are about to be performed.
Two rows of beauties as pretty as pictures stand to either side.
Powdered faces about silver psalteries,
Jade fingers pluck at balloon guitars.¹³

To the tune “Golden Plantain Leaves”

All I can see is crimson candles burning brightly in silver candlesticks,
As slender fingers raise aloft jade goblets.
Noting that his demeanor is both dignified and elegant,
I go over under the lamplight so I can take a good look at him.

To the tune “Flirtatious Laughter”

This gentleman is surely someone I have seen somewhere before.
Can it be that my eyes are deceiving me?
Ah! Putting my hand to my teeth,¹⁴ I try to remember.
Once having set eyes on him, I can't help being disturbed at heart.
Could he turn out to be my adversary in delight¹⁵ from five hundred years ago?¹⁶
Before whose house has he tethered his horse to the green willows?¹⁷
It must have been no more than a dream vision of clouds and rain in Witch's Gorge.¹⁸

To the tune “Impatiens Blossoms”

Having played through the melody on the jade flute¹⁹ under the verdant peach trees,
A single moment was worth a thousand pieces of gold.²⁰
Under the lamplight he is looking me over out of the corners of his eyes,
In such a way that my face is suffused with the glow of sunset clouds.
My master is afraid I am remiss in letting your wine cup remain empty.
I am just seventeen, and have not been betrothed,
A budding peony, delicately nurtured²¹ by my master.

To the tune “The Spectral Triad”

He has uttered but a handful of disconsolate words,
Which cause my tears to fall in incessant cascades.
I cannot control the monkey of my mind and the horse of my will.²²
I am no more than a delicate Lo-yang flower,
In danger of becoming a target of romantic gossip.²³
These words may sound like a joke, but they're not a joke;
This allegation may seem to be false, but it isn't false.
That one is trying to pull up the trees to investigate the roots,
While this one is pointing to a deer and calling it a horse.²⁴

To the tune “Shaven-Pated Rascal”

My efforts to admonish him are as futile as trying to immerse a melon in water;²⁵
His staring at me is about as effective as gazing at flowers in a mirror.
It is said that young scholars have always been frivolous in their affections;
And here he is flirting with a dainty maiden from a good family.

To the tune “Sacred Bhairava-Rāja”

How am I to rescue the situation?
My master is difficult to placate.
As in the receptions of Kung-sun Hung, there is a hubbub in the Eastern Vestibule.²⁶
The feast on tortoiseshell mats is disrupted.
The parrot-beak-shaped conch goblets are discarded.
The silver candlesticks and crimson silk lamp shades have been kicked over.
He has drawn his three-foot sword from its scabbard.

CODA

It has always been true that scholars possess lustful daring as big as the sky,²⁷
Which frightens this fainthearted Cho Wen-chün half to death.²⁸
It's a case of a too hot-tempered Cho Wang-sun,
And an overly ardent Ssu-ma Hsiang-ju of the Han.²⁹

Thereupon, the assembled guests saw to it that Wu Yüeh-niang, Ch'iao Hung's wife, and Li P'ing-erh stuck the artificial flowers in their hair, while red bunting was hung up, drinks were offered to them, and they formally saluted each other. When this ceremony was completed, the feasting was resumed, and everyone sat down to continue drinking together.

The chef first presented a course consisting of little molded cakes of glutinous rice flour, with a sweet stuffing, and the character for long life embossed on their surfaces, along with a lotus pod soup filled with auspicious ingredients, such as double-headed lotus blossoms, that suggest the beauty of a summer pond, after which he proceeded to carve a dish of roast marbled pork.

Yüeh-niang, who was seated in the place of honor, was utterly delighted by all this and, calling Tai-an over, instructed him to award the chef with a bolt of crimson fabric, and to give one to each of the two singing girls as well, for which gratuities they all kowtowed in gratitude.

Ch'iao Hung's wife was still unwilling to let her guests go, but invited them back to the rear hall to sit down a while longer. A profusion of serving dishes, along with partitioned boxes of assorted delicacies, were laid out for them there. The party continued until the first watch before Yüeh-niang finally said her farewells and prepared to go home.

“Kinswoman,” she said to her hostess, “tomorrow, whatever you do:

Deign to drop in on our humble abode, and visit with us for a while.”

“Kinswoman,” replied Ch'iao Hung's wife, “I appreciate your generous hospitality. But my husband has said that it might not be appropriate for me to join you on this occasion. I'll come and visit you another day.”

“My dear kinswoman,” protested Yüeh-niang, “it's not as though there will be anyone else there. You're just being standoffish.”

She then suggested that her sister-in-law, Wu K'ai's wife, should remain overnight, saying, “If you don't go home today, you can accompany Kins-woman Ch'iao to our place tomorrow.”

“Kinswoman Ch'iao,” said Wu K'ai's wife, “it doesn't matter if you don't go on any other day, but you surely mustn't fail to pay a visit on the fifteenth, which is your new kinswoman's birthday.”

“If the fifteenth is my kinswoman's birthday,” said Ch'iao Hung's wife, “how could I presume not to go?”

“If my kinswoman fails to come,” said Yüeh-niang, “I've turned the responsibility over to you, Sister-in-law, and I'll hold you accountable.”

Thereupon, after insisting that Wu K'ai's wife remain behind, Yüeh-niang and her entourage said goodbye and got into their sedan chairs. Two orderlies preceded them, holding large red lanterns, and shouting to clear the way, while two page boys, also holding lanterns, brought up the rear. Wu Yüeh-niang's sedan chair went first, followed by those of Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yülou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li P'ing-erh, in single file, while the chairs of Ju-i and Hui-hsiu followed in their wake. Inside her sedan chair, the wet nurse saw to it that Kuan-ko was tightly wrapped in a little red satin coverlet, to protect him from the cold, while she propped her feet on a brass warmer below. With the two page boys following behind, they arrived in due course at the front gate and dismounted from their sedan chairs.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was drinking wine in the master suite when Yüeh-niang and the others came in, exchanged salutations, and sat down, after which the maidservants came in and kowtowed to them. Yüeh-niang wasted no time in telling him all about the betrothal that had been arranged at the feast that day.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had heard her out, he asked, “Who were the other female guests at the party today?”

“There were the wife of Provincial Graduate Shang,” said Yüeh-niang, “along with the wife of Censor Chu, our host's elder sister, Mrs. Ts'ui, as well as her two nieces.”

“If you've made a betrothal,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “I guess that's that. But it's not an entirely appropriate match.”

“The fact is, it was all my sister-in-law's doing,” said Yüeh-niang. “When she saw their newborn baby daughter and our child reclining on the k'ang frame together, under the same coverlet, and playing at:

You hit me a blow and I'll hit you one back, she thought they looked just like a little couple and called us over to see. She brought the possibility up, and right at the party:

Without premeditation or forethought,³⁰

we agreed to this marriage alliance. It was only then that I sent the page boys over to tell you about it, and to arrange for the delivery of the artificial flowers, red bunting, and boxes of candied fruit."

"Since you've made this betrothal, I guess that's that," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. But it's not an entirely appropriate match. Although the Ch'iao family is wealthy enough at present, he is no more than a well-to-do householder in the district, of commoner status. Whereas, in our case, I currently occupy this official position and manage affairs in the yamen. In the future, at the betrothal celebrations, he will only be entitled to wear the informal skullcap of a commoner. How will he be comfortable associating with an official family such as ours? It really won't look right.

"Just the other day, Military Director-in-chief Ching Chung sought the aid of our relative Chang Kuan of the local garrison, in repeatedly suggesting to me a marriage alliance with his family. He said that their daughter was just five months old, so that she would be the same age as our child. But I was concerned that she didn't have a proper mother, having been born to a concubine, so I refused the offer. I scarcely anticipated that we would end up making such a marriage alliance after all."

P'an Chin-lien, who was standing to one side, picked up on this, saying, "If you object to someone's having been born to a concubine, who among the parties involved was not born to a concubine? This child of the Ch'iao family was also born to a concubine. Truly:

When the Spirit of the Perilous Paths runs into the God of Longevity;³¹
If you refrain from commenting about my height,
I'll not complain about that shortness of yours."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard these words, he was enraged and cursed at her, saying, "You lousy whore! Mind your own business. While we're talking here, for you to:

Stick your beak in and wag your tongue, is completely out of place."

Chin-lien's face turned crimson with embarrassment, and she beat a hasty retreat, muttering as she went, "Whoever said I had the right to speak? It's obvious I haven't the standing to say anything."

Gentle reader take note: When Chin-lien observed the way in which Yüeh-niang and Ch'iao Hung's wife agreed to the betrothal at the party that day, with the result that Li P'ing-erh was draped in red fabric and had artificial flowers stuck in her hair, while wine was presented to her, she became very sore at heart. The fact that Hsi-men Ch'ing saw fit to curse at her this way on her return home only made matters worse, and she withdrew to Yüeh-niang's inner chamber to cry.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked, "How come your sister-in-law didn't come back with you?"

"Kinswoman Ch'iao," explained Yüeh-niang, "on learning that so many wives of officials would be at our place tomorrow, declined my invitation, and I suggested that my sister-in-law stay on at their place, so she could bring her along with her on the morrow."

"Just as I said," remarked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the seating plan at the party tomorrow is going to be awkward to arrange. I don't know how we're going to handle it when we get together in the future."

They talked for a while longer, after which Meng Yü-lou came into the inner room and found Chin-lien crying there.

"What are you so upset about?" she asked. "Let him have his say, and forget about it."

"Fortunately you were there to hear it with your own ears," said Chin-lien. "What did I say that was disparaging of him? But I had a point to be made. He said that the other family's child was born to a concubine. I said, 'Was the Ch'iao family's child not born to a concubine? She was also born to a concubine.' Does he think that:

By wrapping it in a paper bag,
He can fool anyone?

You'll come to a bad end, you lousy ruffian! Then he opened his eyes wide and started cursing at me in a way that was so:

Unfeeling and unjustifiable.

Why shouldn't I have the right to say what I think? He's had a change of heart, and, in the days to come, he'll:

Suffer the consequences before my very eyes.³²

What I didn't say was that that infant relative of the Ch'iao family's at least came into this world with something of Old Man Ch'iao's spunk in her, whereas that child of your's:

Has strayed out of familiar territory.

Who knows whose seed he was sired by? If people want to play the game of seeking marriage alliances in order to enhance their social standing, what right does that give you to take out your annoyance on me? What's my cunt got to do with it that you should start in cursing me? How old is your son, anyway? He's nothing but a puny armload of a bladder's spawn. And you're already putting him on the marriage market for no good reason.

You've got so much money you don't know what to do with it.

If you tug on the sheet until it's torn, you'll have no cover.

The dog who bites the inflated bladder, will find his excitement deflated.

Right now the relationship may be wet enough, given the age of the parties involved, but, in the future, if you don't watch out, it may turn out to be no more than an arid pseudo relationship.

If you blow out the lamp and close your eyes,

You can hardly expect to see what is to come.

People may feel well disposed toward each other at the time they make such alliances, but, more often than not, they end up feeling differently three or five years later."

"As disingenuous as people may be nowadays," said Meng Yü-lou, "they seldom go in for this sort of thing. If you stop to consider it, it's early days yet. For children who are hardly out of the womb, what's the point of exchanging cuttings from your lapels? It's no more than playing the game of seeking marriage alliances in order to enhance one's social standing, that's all."

"Even if that wife of yours is so wantonly anxious to play the marriage alliance game," said Chin-lien, "what right does that give the lousy refractory ruffian to start cursing at me for no good reason? It seems that:

All you get for raising toads is dropsy.
What's the point of it all?"

"Whoever told you to blurt out your thoughts in such an imprudent way?" said Yü-lou.

"If he doesn't curse you, Should he curse the dog instead?"

"It would have been awkward for me to say it right out," said Chin-lien. "Was I supposed to pretend that the child was not born to a concubine, but to the principal wife? Even though the Ch'iao family's child was born to a concubine, at least it came into the world with something of Old Man Ch'iao's spunk in her, whereas that child of your's:

Has strayed out of familiar territory.

Who knows whose seed he was sired by?"

When Yü-lou heard this, she sat for a while without saying another word, until Chin-lien went back to her quarters.

On noticing that Hsi-men Ch'ing had gone outside, Li P'ing-erh, once again:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze, kowtowed to Yüeh-niang, saying, "Elder Sister, in this matter of the child today, I thank you for all the trouble you went to."

Yüeh-niang, with a smile, knelt down and returned her salutation, saying, "Congratulations to you."

"And to you, too, Elder Sister," said Li P'ing-erh.

When they had finished kowtowing to each other, Li P'ing-erh got up and sat down to chat with Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh.

What should they see at this juncture but Sun Hsüeh-o and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, who came in to kowtow to Yüeh-niang and greeted Li Chiao-erh and Li P'ing-erh in turn. Hsiao-yü served them with tea.

As they were drinking their tea, what should they see but Hsiu-ch'un, the maidservant from Li P'ing-erh's quarters, who came to fetch her mistress, saying, "The little fellow is looking for you in your room, and Father has sent me to ask you to return there."

"The wet nurse hurried off without anyone's knowing it," said Li P'ing-erh, "and carried him back to the room. It would have done just as well for us to go back together. As it is, there was probably no lantern for the child."

"When we came in the gate just now," said Yüeh-niang, "I told her to take him back to your room. I feared it was getting late."

"Ju-i took him back just a while ago," said Hsiao-yü. "Lai-an carried a lantern and escorted them on the way."

"That's all right then," said Li P'ing-erh, who, thereupon, took her leave of Yüeh-niang and returned to her quarters, where she found Hsi-men Ch'ing and Kuan-ko, who was asleep in the arms of the wet nurse.

"So there you are," she said. "Why didn't you speak to me before carrying him off that way?"

"The First Lady saw that Lai-an was there with a lantern," said Ju-i, "so I took advantage of that fact to bring him home. The little fellow cried for a while, and I only now managed to pat him back to sleep."

"He clamored after you for some time," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "before finally going to sleep."

When Li P'ing-erh had finished asking about the baby, she turned to him with a simpering smile and said, "Today the child has been betrothed, for which I'd like to express my gratitude to you with a kowtow."

Thereupon:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder, she knelt down and made him a kowtow. This pleased Hsi-men Ch'ing so much that his face became wreathed in smiles, and, hastening to help her to her feet, they sat down together, and she told Ying-ch'un to serve them with wine. The two of them then proceeded to drink wine together in her room.

To resume our story, P'an Chin-lien returned to her quarters in a huff and was not in the best of moods, knowing perfectly well that Hsi-men Ch'ing was at Li P'ing-erh's place.

As a consequence, when Ch'iu-chü was slow about opening the gate, no sooner was she inside than she boxed her ears twice and cursed her in a loud voice, saying, "You lousy slave of a whore! How is it that I've had to call all day long before you opened the gate? What have you been up to? I'll not have anything more to say to you today."

Thereupon, she went into her room and sat down.

When Ch'un-mei came in to kowtow to her and serve her with tea, the woman asked her, "That lousy slave! What was she doing in here?"

"She was just sitting in the courtyard," said Ch'un-mei. "When you called for her I urged her to get a move on, but she didn't pay any attention."

"I'm perfectly aware," said Chin-lien, "that when he and I have a falling out, it's just like the way:

Defender-in-chief Tang Chin learned to eat steamed dumplings,

By imitating the way other people did it.³³

She thinks she, too, can take advantage of me."

Chin-lien wanted to give her a beating there and then but was afraid that Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was in the adjacent quarters, would hear her, so she kept her anger to herself. Meanwhile, she took off her fancy attire, had Ch'unmei lay out her bedding, got into bed, and went to sleep.

The next day, when Hsi-men Ch'ing had gone off to the yamen, the woman made Ch'iu-chü balance a flagstone on her head and kneel down in the courtyard until she had finished combing her hair. She then told Ch'unmei to pull down her trousers and bring her a heavy bamboo cane with which to flog her.

"What a filthy slave!" complained Ch'un-mei. "If you have me pull down her pants, it will only dirty my hands."

She then went up front and called for the page boy Hua-t'ung to come and pull down Ch'iu-chü's drawers for her.

The woman then proceeded to cane her, cursing as she did so, "You lousy slave of a whore! Since when did you become so uppity? Other people may see fit to favor you, but I'll never favor you. Sister:

You know it and I know it.

You'd do better to slack off a bit. What need is there for you to stick your neck out and put on airs for no good reason? Sister, you'd better give up any such presumptions. From now on, I'm going to keep my eyes peeled where you're concerned."

As she vilified her, she continued to beat her, and as the beating continued, she gave vent to further vilification. The caning continued until Ch'iu-chü:

Howled like a stuck pig.

P'an Chin-lien Punishes Ch'iu-chü to Get at Li P'ing-erh

Li P'ing-erh, in her adjacent quarters, had just gotten up and looked on as the wet nurse suckled Kuan-ko and then put him back to sleep. He was startled back awake, however, by the commotion next door. She overheard perfectly clearly everything that Chin-lien had to say while caning her maidservant, as she blurted things out:

Without any consideration for the consequences.

Rendered quite speechless, in her consternation, she merely covered Kuanko's ears and told Hsiu-ch'un, "Go over and say to the Fifth Lady, 'Don't beat Ch'iu-chü any more. The baby has just had some milk and has gone back to sleep.'"

When Chin-lien heard this, she beat Ch'iu-chü all the harder, cursing as she did so, "You lousy slave! You'd think someone were sticking ten thousand knives into you, the way you scream for mercy. Well, it's just my temperament, but the more you scream, the harder I'll beat you. You've already succeeded in arresting the attention of a passerby, who's come to contemplate the sight of a maidservant being beaten. Well, my good Sister, you can always tell your husband about it, and get him to give me a hard time."

Li P'ing-erh, from her vantage point next door, understood perfectly well that Chin-lien's abuse was really directed at her. She was so upset by it that her two hands turned cold, but she chose to:

Swallow her anger and keep her own counsel.

Though she dared to be angry,
She dared not speak.

That morning she didn't even have a drop of tea but clasped Kuan-ko in her arms and went back to sleep on the k'ang.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing returned home from the yamen, he came into her room to see Kuan-ko and found that Li P'ing-erh was lying on the k'ang, and that her eyes were red with weeping.

"How come you still haven't combed your hair or straightened yourself up?" he asked. "The lady in the master suite would like to have a word with you. What have you been rubbing your eyes for, until they're so red?"

Li P'ing-erh made no reference to the way in which Chin-lien had vilified her, but simply said, "I'm not feeling very well."

"Our kinfolk of the Ch'iao family have sent birthday presents for you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "A bolt of fabric, two jars of southern wine, a tray of sweet-meats in the shape of birthday peaches, a tray of birthday noodles, and four kinds of savories. They've also sent some holiday gifts for Kuan-ko, consisting of two trays of Lantern Festival dumplings, four trays of candied fruit, four trays of premium grade nuts, two beaded hanging lanterns, two folding-screen-shaped lanterns spangled with gold, two bolts of crimson government-grade satin, a black satin cap with gold pins representing the eight auspicious symbols³⁴ attached to it, two pairs of boy's shoes, and six pairs of women's shoes. Before we have even paid them a formal visit, they have sent these holiday gifts for our child.

"Right now, the lady in the master suite would like you to go and discuss the situation with her. They have sent the go-between, Auntie K'ung, to represent them, along with their servant, Ch'iao T'ung, who is in charge of delivering the gifts, and our sister-in-law, the wife of Wu K'ai, has come ahead to say that Kinswoman Ch'iao will not be able to come tomorrow but will pay a visit the following day.

"Their family also has a relation, Madame Ch'iao, who is the widow of that distaff relative of the imperial family, Ch'iao the Fifth. When she heard that they were forming a marriage alliance with us, she was pleased as could be, and she would also like to visit us on the fifteenth. We'll have to send her an invitation."

When Li P'ing-erh had heard all this, she finally got up, reluctantly, to comb her hair and set off for the rear compound to pay her respects to Sister-in-law Wu and Auntie K'ung. She found that tea was being served to them in Yüeh-niang's room, and that the presents were on display in the parlor. After looking them all over, she arranged to send back the boxes in which they had come, gave gratuities of two handkerchiefs and five mace of silver apiece to Auntie K'ung and Ch'iao T'ung, wrote a thank-you note, and also sent someone to deliver an invitation to Madame Ch'iao. Truly:

Only inclined to entertain their favorites with bells and drums,

Would they have herded with dogs and sheep for the nation's sake?³⁵

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Hsi-men Ch'ing, enjoying his singular wealth, is altogether too complacent;
Agreeing to a marriage alliance for his son, while he is still in diapers.
Not only does he squander his property as though it were mere muck;
But he ought to pay more attention to the fate of his posterity.

Chapter 42

A POWERFUL FAMILY BLOCKS ITS GATE

IN ORDER TO ENJOY FIREWORKS;

DISTINGUISHED GUESTS IN A HIGH CHAMBER

APPRECIATE THE LANTERNS

The moon and stars dominate the void as a myriad candles blaze;
In the human realm, and in Heaven above,¹ there are two Lantern Festivals.
When music is performed in the spring
it sounds especially good;
As people return from the revels by night even their horses are smart.
Do not waste the fullness of your youth, so quickly does it pass;²
With total impartiality, white hair does not let anyone escape.³
Since even a thousand pieces of gold buys such a little time;
Let the watchman take his time striking the watches of the night.

THE STORY GOES that when Hsi-men Ch'ing had seen off the representatives of the Ch'iao family, he came back to the master suite to talk things over with Yüeh-niang, Sister-in-law Wu, and Li P'ing-erh.

"Since their family has anticipated us by sending over holiday gifts for our child," said Yüeh-niang, "we can hardly avoid buying holiday presents of our own to send to their daughter, Chang-chieh. They can be regarded as being temporary equivalents of betrothal gifts. That way we won't be remiss in our social obligations."

"Our side of the family ought to select a go-between," said Sister-in-law Wu. "It would make the negotiations back and forth more convenient."

"They have chosen Auntie K'ung," said Yüeh-niang. "Who should we select for the job?"

"One guest does not trouble two hosts," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "We might as well give the job to Old Mother Feng."

Thereupon, eight invitation cards were hastily written out, and Old Mother Feng was sent for. She was instructed to take a letter box containing the invitations and deliver them, along with Tai-an, inviting Kinswoman Ch'iao, Madame Ch'iao, the widow of Ch'iao the Fifth, the wife of Provincial Graduate Shang, the wife of Censor Chu, Kinswoman Ts'ui, Big Sister Tuan, and Third Sister Cheng, along with Sister-in-law Wu, to a lantern viewing party on the fifteenth in celebration of Li P'ing-erh's birthday.

At the same time, Lai-hsing was sent off to the confectioner's with the necessary silver to place an order for steamed-shortcake pastries, which were to be served on large square trays. He ordered four trays of steamed pastries: two of stuffed moon cakes, and two of rose-flavored Lantern Festival dumplings. He also bought four trays of fresh fruit: one of prunes, one of walnuts, one of longans, and one of litchis; and four trays of casseroles: one of roast goose, one of roast chicken, one of pigeon, and one of dried whitebait. In addition there were two outfits of brocaded tussore clothing, one little crimson robe, a miniature fret of crepe and gold filigree, two translucent ramshorn lanterns from Yunnan, as well as a box of trinkets containing a pair of little gold bangles, and four gold rings set with precious stones.

Ying Po-chüeh happened to show up at this juncture in order to speak to Hsi-men Ch'ing about the question of when the merchant contractors Li Chih and Huang the Fourth would receive payment for the consignment of goods they had undertaken to purvey for the use of the imperial household. When he saw the flurry of activity, he asked what it was all about.

Hsi-men Ch'ing told him about the marriage alliance he had made with the household of Ch'iao Hung and went on to say, "On the fifteenth, whatever happens, I hope that your wife will be able to come and keep company with our new kinsfolk."

"If my sister-in-law so wishes," said Ying Po-chüeh, "my wife will be sure to come."

"Today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "my wife is entertaining the wives of the various officials, so we can convene at the house on Lion Street."

That day, the fourteenth, when the presents had been packed, he had his son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, accompanied by Pen the Fourth, dressed in his black livery, deliver the gifts. They were duly entertained by the Ch'iao household, who lavishly returned the compliment by sending the gift boxes back filled with numerous examples of needlework and footwear, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

To resume our story, that day Wu Yin-erh in the licensed quarter also brought gifts ahead of time in honor of Li P'ing-erh's birthday.

She had purchased a tray of sweetmeats in the shape of birthday peaches, a tray of birthday noodles, two roast ducks, a set of pig's trotters, two gold lamé handkerchiefs, and a pair of women's shoes for the occasion, in order to pay obeisance to Li P'ing-erh as her godmother and get herself acknowledged as an adopted daughter. Yüeh-niang accepted the gifts on her behalf and sent the sedan chair back home.

Li Kuei-chieh did not arrive until the following day, and when she saw that Wu Yin-erh was already there, she surreptitiously asked Yüeh-niang, "How long has she been here?"

Yüeh-niang told her, thus and so, "Yesterday she brought gifts and paid obeisance to the Sixth Lady in order to be acknowledged as her adopted daughter."

When Li Kuei-chieh heard this, she hadn't a word to say, but she was huffy with Wu Yin-erh all day long, the two of them refusing to speak to each other.

To resume our story, the troupe of twenty actors that Hsi-men Ch'ing had borrowed from Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, arrived in the front reception hall, carrying their trunks. They were under the supervision of two instructors and kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing on their arrival. Hsi-men Ch'ing gave orders that they should use an anteroom on the western side of the front compound as their green room, that they were to be provided with food and drink, and that when the female guests arrived they should welcome them in with a flourish of wind and percussion instruments.

In the main reception hall:

Tortoiseshell mats look spruce

Brocade carpets cover the floor.

The first guests to arrive were the wife of Commandant Chou Hsiu, Director-in-chief Ching Chung's mother, Madame Ching, and the wife of Militia Commander Chang Kuan, all of whom were in large sedan chairs, escorted by orderlies who shouted to clear the way, and attended by the wives of their household retainers. Yüeh-niang and her sister-wives, all dressed in formal gowns, came out from inside to greet them and ushered them into the rear reception hall, where, after the appropriate salutations had been exchanged, they were invited to sit down and have some tea.

They were waiting for the arrival of the wife of Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling before tea was to be served, but who could have anticipated that although they waited until noon, she had not yet come. Page boys were dispatched to urge her on her way two or three times, but it was not until early afternoon that she finally arrived, with escorts shouting to clear the way, bearers carrying her dressing cases, attended by the wives of her household retainers, and surrounded by a retinue of servants. After she had been escorted to the rear reception hall to the strains of martial music and exchanged amenities with the other female guests, they all sat down in order of precedence.

First tea was served to them in the summerhouse, after which they were invited to take their seats in the main reception hall. Refreshments were served and wine was poured by Ch'un-mei, Yü-hsiao, Ying-ch'un, and Lan-hsiang, all of whom were adorned with cloud-shaped chignons, pearl necklaces, gold lantern earrings, brocade vests, scarlet satin jackets, and kingfisher-blue gold lamé skirts, with the exception of Ch'un-mei, who sported pendant earrings set with precious stones and a scarlet brocade vest.

That day the private troupe of Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, performed Hsi-hsiang chi, or The Romance of the Western Chamber. We will say no more for the moment about how the party progressed:

Deeply secluded within the decorated hall:⁴

Amid clustering pearls and kingfisher ornaments,⁵

Song and dance and wind and string instruments, but return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

That day, after he had seen that the female guests in his home were offered tea, he mounted his horse and proceeded to the house on Lion Street, where he had arranged to meet with Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta. He directed that one of the four racks of fireworks that he had ordered should be taken there, and that two of them should be set up for the entertainment of the female guests that night. On the second floor of the house on Lion Street standing screens and a table of refreshments were set up, lanterns were hung, a chef was engaged to relight the fire in the stove, two food boxes containing meat and vegetable dishes and two jars of Chin-hua wine were dispatched from home, and two singing girls, Tung Chiao-erh and Han Yü-ch'uan, were engaged for the occasion.

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing had previously sent Tai-an to hire a sedan chair and invite Wang Liu-erh to join him at the house on Lion Street.

On seeing her, he said, "Auntie Han, Father has invited you to the house over there to enjoy the fireworks this evening."

"I'd be too embarrassed," the woman laughed. "How could I do that? Wouldn't your uncle Han be upset if he found out about it?"

"Father has already spoken to Uncle Han about it," said Tai-an. He wants you to get yourself ready as quickly as possible. He would have sent Old Mother Feng for you, but they are entertaining the wives of the various officials today, and the Sixth Lady has told her to help tend Kuan-ko, so she's over there looking out for herself. Father insisted on sending me instead. He has engaged two singing girls, and there is no one to keep them company."

When the woman had heard him out, she was still unwilling to make a move, but before long, who should turn up but Han Tao-kuo himself.

"Well, if it isn't Uncle Han," said Tai-an. "Auntie Han here won't believe what I tell her."

The woman turned to her husband and said, "Do you really want me to go?"

"The master has repeatedly remarked that there is no one to keep the two singing girls company," said Han Tao-kuo. "He has invited you over there to enjoy the fireworks tonight. He's waiting for you. Haven't you gotten yourself ready yet? He also told me, just now, to close up the shop and come visit with him myself this evening. Lai-pao has also gone home for the time being. It's his turn to spend the night at the shop this evening."

"Who knows how late it will be before the party breaks up," the woman said. "When you go over there, stay a little while and then come home. There's no one to look after the place, and you don't have to spend the night at the shop."

When they had finished speaking, she dressed up for the occasion and, accompanied by Tai-an, went straight to the house on Lion Street. Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," had previously straightened up the bedroom and its k'ang frame, put out the ready-made curtains and bedding, lit some benzoin and aloeswood incense which exuded a pungent fragrance, hung up two gauze lanterns in the room, and ignited the charcoal in the brazier on the floor. The woman walked in and sat down on the k'ang. After a while, Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," came in, bowed to her, saying, "Many felicitations," and served her with tea.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ying Po-ch'üeh, after having looked at the lanterns for a while, finally arrived at the house, where they sat down on the second floor to play backgammon together. There were six windows with suspended blinds on the second floor overlooking the Lantern Market below, where:

The merrymaking was at its height.

After they had played backgammon for a while, they put the game away and had something to eat. The two of them then proceeded to look down on the Lantern Market from inside the blinds. Behold:

The people from ten thousand households are attired in brocade;
Their perfumed carriages and fine steeds rumble like thunder.
Hills of lanterns soar into the heavens above the azure clouds;
From whence do revellers not congregate to take in the sights?⁶

Ying Po-ch'üeh happened to ask, "How many people from the Ch'iao household are coming to your place tomorrow?"

"Their relative Madame Ch'iao, the widow of Ch'iao the Fifth, the distaff relative of the imperial family, is coming; but I won't be home tomorrow. In the morning I've got to go to the temple to attend the chiao rites of cosmic renewal in celebration of the Festival of the First Prime, and after that, Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command has invited me to a party."

As he was speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed that, amid the throng of people below, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Chu Jih-nien, and a man wearing a square-cut scholar's cap were standing beneath a lantern stall, looking at the lanterns.

Pointing them out to Ying Po-ch'üeh, he went on to ask, "Do you happen to recognize that man wearing the square-cut scholar's cap? What is he doing tagging along with them?"

"He has a familiar look about him," replied Ying Po-ch'üeh, "but I don't recognize him."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then instructed Tai-an, "You go down there and surreptitiously invite Hsieh Hsi-ta to come up here. But don't let Pockmarked Chu, or that other fellow, catch on."

Now the page boy Tai-an was the sort of knave of whom it could be said:

He doesn't miss a wink.

He went straight downstairs and insinuated himself into the midst of the crowd. Waiting until Chu Jih-nien and the other person had moved along, he stepped out from one side and gave Hsieh Hsi-ta a tug with his hand, which startled him into turning around to see who it was who had accosted him.

Tai-an said to him, "Father and Master Ying the Second are on the upper floor here and would like to have a word with you."

"You go ahead," said Hsieh Hsi-ta. "I understand. Wait until I've accompanied the two of them as far as the place where they're making artificial plum blossoms. I'll come to see your master after that."

Tai-an then disappeared in a puff of smoke.

Who would have thought that, no sooner did they arrive at the place where they were making artificial plum blossoms, than Hsieh Hsi-ta ducked into the crowd, leaving Chu Jih-nien and the other person to look for him in vain, and made his way upstairs to see Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ying Po-ch'üeh.

Upon seeing the two of them, he said, "Brother, if you were coming here to see the lanterns, why didn't you say something about it this morning to let me know your plans?"

"I didn't feel like mentioning it in front of everyone this morning," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I did send Brother Ying the Second to your place to invite you, but you were not at home. By the way, did Pockmarked Chu see that you were coming here just now?"

"And who was that fellow wearing the square-cut scholar's cap?" he went on to ask.

"The person wearing the square-cut scholar's cap," said Hsieh Hsi-ta, "is Wang the Third, the son of Imperial Commissioner Wang. Today he came to my place with Pockmarked Chu to ask for my assistance in arranging a loan of three hundred taels of silver from the moneylender Hsü Pu-yü, or Reneger Hsü. He has asked me, along with Blabbermouth Sun and Pockmarked Chu, to be guarantors for the loan. He wants to pursue a career by purchasing a position in the Military School, but I can't be bothered to take an interest in his private affairs. Just now I was accompanying him for a stroll in the Lantern Market, when your esteemed servant summoned me, so I simply saw them as far as the place where they're making artificial plum blossoms and then, taking advantage of the crowded situation, gave them the slip and came to join you."

Turning to Ying Po-ch'üeh, he then went on to ask, "How long have you been here?"

"Brother initially sent me to your place, but you weren't at home," said Ying Po-ch'üeh. "So I came here and have been playing backgammon with him for a while."

"Have you eaten yet?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll have the page boy bring you something to eat."

"You must know," said Hsieh Hsi-ta, "that after leaving your place this morning, I've spent the whole day with those two, so how could I have had anything to eat?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Tai-an, "Go down to the kitchen and prepare something for Master Hsieh to eat."

Before long, the table was wiped clean, and a platter of assorted cold hors d'oeuvres, two bowls of different kinds of soft-boiled fricassee, a bowl of blanched pork and vermicelli soup, and two bowls of white rice were placed before him. Hsieh Hsi-ta set to and polished it off all by himself, leaving the utensils spick-and-span, within and without; after which he poured the remaining gravy over his rice and gobbled it all up. When Tai-an had cleared the dishes away, Hsieh Hsi-ta sat to one side and looked on as the other two played backgammon.

What should they see at this juncture but the two singing girls who got out of their sedan chairs at the door and came in smiling, while the sedan chair bearers brought in their bundles of clothes.

Ying Po-chüeh, who had already spotted them through the window, said, "So, the two little whores are only now arriving." He then instructed Tai-an, saying, "Don't let them go into the rear of the house. Have them come upstairs to see me first."

"Which two have been engaged for today?" Hsieh Hsi-ta asked.

"It's Tung Chiao-erh and Han Yü-ch'uan," replied Tai-an.

Then, hastening downstairs, he said to them, "Master Ying the Second wants to have a word with you."

The two of them refused to comply but proceeded straight back to the rear, where they were greeted by "The Beanpole" and ushered into a room where they encountered Wang Liu-erh.

On her head she sported a fashionable fret with a twisted center and a gold-spangled sheepskin headband; on her torso she wore a purple jacket of Lu-chou silk, a jet cloak with a stiff-standing, tilelike collar, over a white drawnwork silk skirt; beneath which appeared the upturned tips of her two golden lotuses, enclosed in black satin, flat-heeled shoes that were chain stitched with sand-green thread. Her temples were adorned with two long spit curls, she had a rosewood complexion, and she did not use much face powder, attempting to emulate the style of a person of middling status. From her ears dangled a pair of clove-shaped pendant earrings.⁷

On coming in the door, they made her an obeisance and then sat down on the edge of the k'ang. Little Iron Rod served them with tea, and Wang Liu-erh joined them in drinking it. The two singing girls could not take their eyes off her, looking her over from top to toe. After staring for a while, the two of them laughed awkwardly, not knowing who they were in the presence of.

Later on, when Tai-an came in, they surreptitiously asked him, "Who is that person in the room?"

Tai-an didn't know what to reply, merely saying, "She's the master's aunt, who's been invited here to see the lanterns."

When the two of them heard this, they returned to the room and began anew, saying, "We didn't realize, just now, that you were an aunt in the family, so we failed to show you proper respect. Please don't take it amiss."

Thereupon, as though inserting a taper in its holder, they kowtowed to her twice, which flustered Wang Liu-erh into hastily returning half a kowtow to them. Later on, refreshments were served, and they ate them together. The two of them then got out their instruments and sang for Wang Liu-erh's entertainment.

When Ying Po-chüeh had finished a game of backgammon, he came downstairs to relieve himself. Hearing the singing in the interior of the house, he beckoned to Tai-an and asked him, "Tell me. Just who are the two singing girls performing for back there?"

Tai-an merely smiled, without making a sound, and said, "You're like:

The intendant of the Ts'ao-chou Military Defense Circuit:

The area of your jurisdiction is broad.⁸

What's it to you whether they sing or not?"

"Why you lousy little oily-mouth!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "If you refuse to tell me, you needn't fear that I won't find out."

Tai-an laughed and said, "If you can find out, so be it. What are you asking me for?" After saying which, he headed straight into the rear of the house.

Ying Po-chüeh went back upstairs, where Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to play three more games of backgammon with Hsieh Hsi-ta.

Whom should they see at this juncture but Li Ming and Wu Hui, the two of whom suddenly came upstairs and kowtowed to them.

"Wonderful!" exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. "The two of you have arrived in the nick of time. Where have you been, and how did you know we were here?"

Li Ming knelt down, deferentially covered his mouth with his hand, and said, "Wu Hui and I initially dropped by His Honor's residence, but the people there said that he was having a party with all of you at the house over here, so we came over to offer our services."

"That's fine," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You can stand up and wait in attendance."

Then, turning to Tai-an, he said, "Go quickly across the street and invite your uncle Han to come join us."

Before long, Han Tao-kuo arrived, made a bow, and sat down. A table was then set up, a platter of assorted cold hors d'oeuvres suitable to accompany a drinking party was brought up from the kitchen, and Ch'in-t'ung stood at their side, decanting the wine from a brass warming pan equipped with a wire-mesh strainer. Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta occupied the positions of honor, Hsi-men Ch'ing played the role of host, and Han Tao-kuo took a seat to one side. As soon as they were seated, wine was poured, and Tai-an was dispatched to the rear of the house to invite the singing girls to join them.

After a brief interval, Han Yü-ch'uan and Tung Chiao-erh, the two of them:

Just as slow and easy as you please,
came up the stairs, and:

Neither correctly nor precisely,
kowtowed to the company.

Ying Po-chüeh took them to task, saying, "I wondered who they were, and it turns out to be these two little whores. Just now, you knew I was here, and that I was calling for you, so why didn't you come to pay your respects to me first? What a nerve! In the future, if I don't give you both something to remember me by, you'll get completely out of hand."

"Brother here," said Tung Chiao-erh with a laugh, "has been reduced to:

Making faces at me over the wall;

He's scaring me to death!"

"As we all know," chimed in Han Yü-ch'uan:

"The little darling, in flashing his animal mask over the ramparts;

Is just a child, displaying his ugliness."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "there's a downright redundancy around here today. Since we already have Li Ming and Wu Hui to sing for us, what do we need these two little whores for? You'd better send them packing as soon as possible. On the evening of a major festival like this, they can still pick up a few coins for themselves. If you wait until it's too late, there will be no one around to want them."

"Brother," protested Han Yü-ch'uan, "how shameless can you get? It's His Honor who called for our services. We're not here to cater to you. Brother, how can you bring yourself to vent your spleen so aimlessly?"

"Why you silly little splay-legged whore!" exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. "You're here right now, and if you don't cater to me, to whom are you going to cater?"

Han Yü-ch'uan responded:

"When Fatty T'ang fell into the vinegar vat, Enough got splashed on you to turn you sour."

"Why you lousy little whore!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "It's turned me sour, has it? Just you wait. When we break up and you're ready to go home, I'll have something to say to you. One way or the other, there are two different things I can do, so you needn't expect to escape."

"And what two things are those?" demanded Tung Chiao-erh. "Tell me about them."

"The first thing I can do," said Ying Po-chüeh, "is to report you to the police and have you arrested for violating the curfew. Then the next day I could send a card to Commandant Chou and have you subjected to a good finger-squeezing. Or, if you were really recalcitrant, it would only require three candareens worth of distilled spirits to get your chair bearers drunk enough to take advantage of you. Then, when you got home late, with no money to show for it, the madam would be sure to give you a beating for your pains, which would be no skin off my back."

"If it gets too late," said Han Yü-ch'uan, "we won't go home, but spend the night in His Honor's house here. Or else, we can get His Honor to send someone to escort us home."

Whether Dame Wang gets her hundred cash or not,

It's not up to you.⁹

What a rot-talking sl/imy kn/ave¹⁰ you are!"

"If I'm a slave," said Ying Po-chüeh, "the world, nowadays, must be topsy-turvy. The time has come to:

Call a spade a spade."

When they had talked and laughed together for a while, the two singing girls stood to one side and sang a song celebrating the beauties of spring. Only after that did the company proceed to devour the refreshments that had been provided for them.

At this juncture, who should appear but Tai-an, who came in to say that Master Chu had shown up; which news failed to elicit any response from the company.

Before long, Chu Jih-nien came up the stairs and, on seeing that Ying Pochüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta were there, said, "So, the pair of you are feasting away, are you? What sort of conduct is that?"

"And as for you, Tagalong Hsieh," he went on to say. "If Brother invited you up here, you might have given me the word, instead of slipping off that way without anyone's knowing it, and leaving me to look for you in vain around the area where they make the artificial plum blossoms."

"I just happened to stray out of the way," explained Hsieh Hsi-ta, "and chanced to see Brother up here playing backgammon with Brother Ying the Second. When I came upstairs and saluted them, Brother asked me to stay."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then instructed Tai-an, "Go get a chair for Brother Chu, and give him a seat at the other end of the table."

Thereupon, Tai-an provided a place setting for him at the lower end of the table, and he sat down. Soup and rice were brought up for him from the kitchen, and he joined the others in consuming the refreshments.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had eaten only a single steamed bun, and swallowed a mouthful of soup, he noticed that Li Ming was standing beside him and gave the remainder of his food to him, to take off and eat by himself. Meanwhile, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Chu Jih-nien, and Han Tao-kuo consumed a soup of eight ingredients served in a large, deep porcelain bowl decorated with a blue and white pattern and ate three large steamed buns apiece, as well as four steamed open-topped dumplings, the tops of which were adorned with peach blossoms. Only a single steamed bun was left to anchor the plate. After the servants had cleared away the soup bowls, wine was decanted and they proceeded to drink.

Hsieh Hsi-ta then asked Chu Jih-nien, "How far did you go with him before you managed to get away, and how did you know that I was here?"

Chu Jih-nien, thereupon, told him about it, thus and so, saying, "After looking around for you a while without success, I accompanied Wang the Third to Sun T'ien-hua's house, where we had agreed to meet, and then proceeded to Hsü Pu-yü's place to arrange a loan of three hundred taels of silver. But Blabbermouth Sun, the old oily-mouth, had composed a defective loan contract."

"Leave my name out of the contract," said Hsieh Hsi-ta. "I don't want any part of it. One way or the other, you and Old Sun can act as guarantors, and dun him for a guarantor's fee to spend on yourselves."

"What did he get wrong on the contract, anyway?" he went on to ask.

"I had told him," replied Chu Jih-nien, "to word the contract in somewhat slippery terms, stipulating three preconditions for the repayment of the loan; but he did not follow my suggestion, so I had to rewrite the document from scratch."

"So how did you word the contract?" asked Hsieh Hsi-ta. "Read it aloud for our benefit."

"This is the way I worded it," said Chu Jih-nien.

The contracting party, Wang Ts'ai, scion of the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang, (instead of "because he wants money to spend," amended to) wanting money to spend, has arranged, through the good offices of Sun T'ien-hua and Chu Jih-nien, to borrow the sum of three hundred taels of (instead of "silver," amended to) soft currency, and agrees to remit (instead of "interest," amended to) a "plum" of five hundred cash per month, and commits himself to repay the principal (instead of "next year," amended to) when three preconditions are met. These three preconditions are: firstly:

When the windblown axle of a windlass knocks a goose out of the sky;

secondly:

When the fish underneath the surface leap onto the shore;

and thirdly:

When the rocks submerged underwater dissolve into powder.

Only when these three preconditions are met will repayment of the loan become due. (He had written "In the year when the boundary stones nod their heads repayment of the loan will become due." But I pointed out that the precondition "when the boundary stones nod their heads" might be met if there should be an earthquake some year. Where would that leave you? So I amended it to read) If the borrower should lack the funds to repay the loan, the guarantors will make themselves scarce. Lest questions should arise in the future, this written contract as set down is hereby declared invalid. (At the end I also had him append the words "null and void.")

"If you word it that way," said Hsieh Hsi-ta, "it could hardly be said not to be slippery enough. By the time the rocks submerged underwater have been reduced to powder:

Who knows whether the monk will still be around or not?"¹¹

"That's to put too good a construction on it," said Chu Jih-nien. "If someday there should be a drought and water levels are low, the court would order the dredging of the waterways, and the submerged rocks might be hacked to powder with two or three blows from a workman's mattock. Where would that leave you? In such a case you'd be unable to avoid paying back the loan."

As the group of them talked and laughed together for a while, it gradually became evening, and Hsi-men Ch'ing directed that the lanterns should be lighted. Two translucent ramshorn lanterns of extraordinary intricacy were suspended under the eaves, one on either side.

Who could have anticipated that at this juncture Yüeh-niang, back at home, should have sent Ch'i-t'ung and an orderly to deliver four partitioned boxes of mouth-watering sweetmeats and fancy fruits for their delectation. There were:

Blazing yellow kumquats,
Fragrant red pomegranates,
Delectable bittersweet olives,
Verdant green apples, and Redolently fragrant pears.

And there were also:

Honeysweet candied persimmons,
Sugar-soaked giant dates,
Butterfat pine nut pastries,
Elephant-eye-shaped sesame candy,
Domino-like deep-fried sweetmeats, and Honey-basted chain-shaped crullers.

In addition there were:

Willow-leaf candy, and Ox-hide taffy.

Truly, they were things:

Rarely found in this world,
Seldom seen in the universe.

Hsi-men Ch'ing called for Ch'i-t'ung to come forward and asked him, "Has the conclave of ladies at home broken up yet, or not? Are they still there drinking wine? And who sent you to deliver these treats here?"

"The First Lady sent me to deliver them," replied Ch'i-t'ung, "for you to enjoy here with your wine. The party has not broken up completely yet. After four scenes of the hsi-wen drama had been performed, the First Lady kept them for another round of drinks at the front gate, so they could enjoy the fireworks."

"Are there onlookers there?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"The people who came to watch filled the street," replied Ch'i-t'ung.

"I told P'ing-an," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "to retain four black-clad orderlies and station them at the gate, with staves in hand, to hold back the crowd if necessary, and not let any riffraff press too close."

"P'ing-an and I, along with the orderlies, were all there to oversee the fireworks display," said Ch'i-t'ung. "It was only after most of the company had left that the First Lady sent me here. There weren't any riffraff causing trouble."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he ordered that the leftovers remaining on the table be cleared away and replaced with the boxes of treats that had just arrived. A serving of stuffed Lantern Festival dumplings was brought up from the kitchen, and the two singing girls poured the wine.

On the one hand, Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ch'i-t'ung to go home and look after things there, while, on the other hand:

More vintage wine was poured, and Another feast of delicacies was spread.

Li Ming and Wu Hui were then asked to entertain the company with a song suite in celebration of the Lantern Festival, to the tune "Fresh Water Song" in the shuang-tiao mode:

On this festive day in the metropolis we enjoy the Lantern Festival.¹² Encompassing the hills of lanterns, auspicious clouds gather.
One gazes at the pure luster of the stars of the milky way,
And observes the moon's orb, high over the celestial moat.
The strains of a classic melody are struck up.
Tortoiseshell mats are spread,
In order to enjoy the revels.

To the tune "River-bobbed Oars":

A Powerful Family Blocks Its Gate in Order to Enjoy Fireworks

Decorated lanterns are suspended on either side,
 On top of which, a skyful of moon and stars¹³ shine bright.
 Everywhere we look, the pendants of embroidered sashes are flying in the wind,
 Jeweled canopies sway gently,
 On hills of lanterns, the lamplight is scintillating,
 Paper cutouts of spring moths quiver atop chignons.

To the tune “Seven Brothers”:

On the one hand, there is dancing,
 There is singing,
 And there is instrumental music.
 The astonishing vaudeville acts are truly marvelous;
 The terrifying aerial performances are utterly inimitable;
 The comical yūan-pen farces are truly comical.

To the tune “Plum Blossom Wine”:

Ah! On one hand, they do the dance of the old crone.
 The wellborn young ladies are dolled up to look their best,
 Displaying their seductiveness in a myriad ways,¹⁴
 With a hundred allurements and a thousand coquetties.¹⁵
 On the one hand, hoofers parade to the drum,

On the other hand, mummers parade on stilts.
It is truly a comical sight.
The fine haze is redolent of orchid and musk.
With broad smiles we drink the fragrant wine.

To the tune "Enjoying the South":

Ah! Today, in joyous abandon, we feast in order to celebrate the Lantern Festival.
Slender jade fingers gently strum the rosewood instruments.
The light of the lanterns and the bright moon illuminate each other,
Shining on towers and terraces, halls and chambers.

Distinguished Guests in a High Chamber Appreciate the Lanterns

Today is a time to relax, become intoxicated, and devote ourselves to pleasure.¹⁶

When the singing was over, they ate the Lantern Festival dumplings, and then Han Tao-kuo was the first to go home. Shortly thereafter, Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Lai-chao to open up the twelve-foot-wide lower room, hang up the blinds, and carry the rack of fireworks outside. Hsi-men Ch'ing and his guests looked on from the second-story, while Wang Liu-erh, along with the two singing girls and Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," were able to watch the show from the floor below.

Tai-an and Lai-chao set up the rack of fireworks in the middle of the street and, moments later, proceeded to set them off. The bystanders on either side who crowded around to see the show:

Rubbing shoulders and nudging elbows,

Were incalculable in number.¹⁷

They all said, "When His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing chooses to put on a fireworks display here, who wouldn't come to see it. Truly, they have been set up just right. What fine fireworks!" Behold:

The rack of fireworks soars up fifteen feet high;
On all sides hill-shaped booths bustle with activity.
On the highest point there stands an immortal's crane,
Holding a vermilion edict suspended from its mouth,
Which turns out to be a "high-rising rocket."¹⁸
When it first takes off,
With a sudden rush, it creates a trail of cold light,¹⁹
Boring its way right up beside the Herd Boy and the Dipper.
Only after that,
In the middle distance, a "watermelon bomb" explodes into sight,
Showering sparks on the spectators in all four directions,
Pi po-po, a myriad thunderclaps all resound at once.
"Lotus-gathering boats" and "brighter than moonlights,"²⁰
One chasing after the other,
Are just like "golden lanterns"²¹ dispersing the "stars in the azure sky."
"Purple grapes,"²² by the thousands and ten thousands, Resemble a cascade of "black dragon pearls," a "portiere of beaded crystal."
The "whips of the Hegemon-King"²³ crack everywhere;
The "earthbound rats"²⁴ scurry about under peoples' clothes.
"Alabaster cups" and "jade saucers,"
Whirl about in a way that is truly spectacular;
"Silver moths" and "golden cicadas,"
Display ingenuity that could scarcely be improved upon.
The "Eight Immortals bearing birthday gifts," Severally display their magic powers;²⁵
The "Seven Sages subduing demons,"²⁶
Appear completely shrouded in flames.
"Yellow sparklers"²⁷ and "green sparklers," Produce enveloping mists resembling a "myriad sunset clouds;"
"Quick- and slow-blooming lotus blossoms,"²⁸
Flare resplendently, vying to display a "montage of brocades."²⁹
"Ten-foot chrysanthemums"³⁰ and "smoky orchids"³¹ confront each other;
"Big pear blossoms"³² and "fallen peach blossoms" contest the spring.
"Towers and terraces," "halls and chambers,"
In but a trice cease to exhibit their lofty eminence;
The drumming of the "parading village mummers,"
Seems to subside, its joyful hubbub no longer heard.
The "peddler's basket,"
Above and below, shines crystal clear;
The "old crone's cart,"
Both head and tail, explodes to bits.
The "Five Devils plaguing the Assessor,"³³
With scorched heads and singed scalps³⁴ manifest their bellicosity;
As a result of the "tenfold ambushade,"³⁵
Horses collapse, men gallop away, and the outcome remains in doubt.
Despite the fact that infinite ingenuity may have been expended
In the end:
The fire burns out and the smoke dissolves,³⁶ leaving nothing but ashes.

The jade clepsydra with its bronze tanks should not hurry one along;³⁷

The starry bridges and trees of lanterns³⁸ will scintillate until dawn.³⁹

The ten thousand varieties of puppetry are nothing but illusions;
Providing an excuse for the revellers to return home with a smile.

Ying Po-chüeh saw that Hsi-men Ching was drunk, and when he went downstairs to relieve himself immediately after the fireworks were over, he noticed that Wang Liu-erh was there, so he took Hsieh Hsi-ta and Chu Jihnien by the hand and left without bidding his host farewell.

"Where are you off to?" asked Tai-an.

"My clever child," Ying Po-chüeh whispered into his ear, "it's that matter I asked you about before. If I were not to go, those others would stick around indefinitely, which would look as though I didn't know the score. When your master asks, just tell him that we've all left."

Later on, when Hsi-men Ch'ing realized that the fireworks were over and asked where Ying Po-ch'ieh and the others had gotten to, Tai-an said, "Master Ying the Second and Master Hsieh all went off together. I wasn't able to hold them back. They told me to convey their thanks."

Hsi-men Ch'ing did not inquire any further but summoned Li Ming and Wu Hui, rewarded each of them with a large bumper of wine, and said, "I won't pay you the fee for your performance right now, because I'd like the two of you to come and help out again, early on the sixteenth. I'll be entertaining those three, Master Ying the Second and the others, along with my managers and employees, for a drinking party at the front gate that evening."

Li Ming knelt down, and said, "I'm bound to report to Your Honor that on the sixteenth, I, along with the other three, Wu Hui, Tso Shun, and Cheng Feng, all have to report for duty at the installation ceremony for the newly promoted prefect of Tung-p'ing prefecture, His Honor Hu Shih-wen, so we couldn't show up before some time in the afternoon."

"In any case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we won't begin drinking until evening. Just be sure you don't fail to appear, that's all."

"We would never dare let you down," the two of them said.

Thereupon, they knelt down to consume the wine that was offered them and then prepared to go out the door and make their farewells.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then said to the two singing girls, "Tomorrow, I'm entertaining some female guests at home. Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh will also be there. Be sure that the two of you come along as well."

The two boy actors and the two singing girls then went out the gate together. But no more of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, after ordering Lai-chao, Tai-an, and Ch'in-t'ung to see that everything was properly cleared away, and to put out the lamps and candles, retired to the bedroom in the rear of the house.

To resume our story, Lai-chao's son, Little Iron Rod, had been outside watching the fireworks display when he saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had withdrawn to the interior. Thereupon, he went upstairs, where he found his old man putting together a platter of leftover meat and other fare, along with a goblet of wine, and a few Lantern Festival dumplings, to take into their room. When he asked his mother, "The Beanpole," for some of it, she saw that he was still holding a singed firecracker in his hand and gave him a couple of slaps for his pains, but she did not prevent him from going into the rear courtyard to play.

Upon hearing the sound of laughter coming from the main room on the courtyard, he thought, "It must be the singing girls who haven't left yet." Noticing that the door was closed, he thereupon proceeded to peer inside through a crack and saw that the interior was brightly lit by lamps and candles. It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing and Wang Liu-erh were engaged in intercourse on the edge of the bed. Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was already the worse for wear, had bent the woman over the edge of the bed where, by the light of the lamp, he had stripped off her drawers, fastened the clasp on his organ, and was busy plucking the flower in her rear courtyard. Once he got started, he slammed away at her, back and forth, being good for no less than several hundred thrusts at a time. As he slammed away:

The reiterated sounds reverberated loudly.

The noise of their panting, and their back and forth movements, sounded, for all the world, as though they were engaged in breaking up the bed and could be heard everywhere. The little boy was too preoccupied by staring at this sight to notice when his mother, "The Beanpole," happened to come into the rear courtyard.

When she saw what her child was up to, she grabbed him by the tuft of hair on top of his head, dragged him back to the front of the house, gave him a couple of sharp raps on the head with her knuckles, and scolded him, saying, "You lousy mischief-making little slave! All you need is to risk your life a second time by going and eavesdropping on him once again!"

Thereupon, she gave him several Lantern Festival dumplings to eat, refused to let him out of the room, and threatened him into getting onto the k'ang and going to sleep.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman kept at it for about the time it would take to eat two meals before finally calling it quits. Tai-an, who had taken care of providing food and wine for the chair bearers, then escorted her back to her home and returned to join Ch'in-t'ung in carrying lanterns as they accompanied Hsi-men Ch'ing back to his residence. Truly:

Do not fear lest the bright moon should set,

It will be succeeded by a subtle fragrance.⁴⁰

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Enjoying the view from the Southern Tower, he forgets to go back;
However romantic the occasion may be, how long can it last?⁴¹
By his return, the bright moon will be down at the third watch;
Obsessed with pleasure, before he knows it, he is utterly sloshed.

Chapter 43

BECAUSE OF THE MISSING GOLD

HSI-MEN CH'ING CURSES CHIN-LIEN;

AS A RESULT OF THE BETROTHAL

YÜEH-NIANG MEETS MADAME CH'IAO

Scrutiny of the events of past and present can only induce sorrow;
The exalted and the humble alike return to a mere mound of earth.
Where are the occupants of the Jade Hall of Emperor Wu of the Han?¹
Within the Golden Valley of Shih Ch'ung² the river flows aimlessly on.
Light and darkness continue to alternate as dawn turns into dusk;
The luxurious foliage of spring inexorably gives way to that of autumn.
Since mundane affairs, like time itself, will never come to an end;
One might as well become a sojourner in the Land of Drunkenness.³

THE STORY GOES that it was already the third watch by the time Hsimen Ch'ing returned home. When he went back to the rear compound, he found that Wu Yüeh-niang had not yet gone to bed, but was sitting up with her sister-in-law, Wu K'ai's wife, and the others, having a chat. He also noticed that Li P'ing-erh was still in attendance, helping to serve the wine. As soon as Sister-in-law Wu saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come home, she moved into another room. Yüeh-niang, observing that he was inebriated, helped him off with his outer clothes and merely had Li P'ing-erh kowtow to him, after which they sat down together, and he asked a few questions about how things had gone at the party that day. After Yü-hsiao had served him with tea, because Sister-in-law Wu was there, he went to Meng Yü-lou's room to spend the night.

The next day, the chef arrived early in order to take care of the arrangements for the catered banquet. It was a day on which Hsi-men Ch'ing had to go to the yamen to perform the ceremonies of bowing before the imperial tablet and presiding over the general disposition of pending cases. When Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling saw him, he expressed his thanks for the pains he had expended for the entertainment of his wife the previous day.

"I fear the fare was extremely meager," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Forgive me. Forgive me."

When he arrived home, he found that Ch'iao Hung's household had sent Auntie K'ung to escort a servant from Madame Ch'iao the Fifth's establishment, who delivered gifts of a jug of southern wine and four kinds of delicacies for the occasion. Hsi-men Ch'ing accepted the gifts and saw that the servant was provided with food and wine. Auntie K'ung made her way to the rear compound where she was given a seat in Yüeh-niang's room. The sedan chair of Wu Shun-ch'en's wife, Third Sister Cheng, was the first to arrive, and after she had paid her respects to Yüeh-niang, she joined the others in keeping Auntie K'ung company while tea was served.

Just at this juncture, Li Chih and Huang the Fourth showed up with the sum of a thousand taels of silver that they had received in payment for the consignment of incense and wax that they had purveyed for the use of the imperial household and had arranged with Pen the Fourth to convey to Hsimen Ch'ing's residence from Tung-p'ing prefecture. When Ying Po-chüeh got wind of this, he also hurried over to assist in seeing it duly transferred to Hsi-men Ch'ing. Ch'en Ching-chi was ordered to weigh it out with a steelyard in the reception hall, and when this process was completed, it was put away for safekeeping. They still owed Hsi-men Ch'ing five hundred taels of capital and a hundred and fifty taels of interest. On this occasion, Huang the Fourth brought out four gold bracelets, weighing thirty ounces altogether, as payment of the hundred and fifty taels of interest and proposed that they renegotiate the contract for the remainder of the debt.

"Wait until after the Lantern Festival is over," Hsi-men Ch'ing told the two of them. "You can come back and discuss it then. I'm tied up at home for the next few days."

At this, Li Chih and Huang the Fourth, reiterating, "Your Honor this, and Your Honor that," went out the gate with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand expressions of gratitude.

Ying Po-chüeh, preoccupied with the thought that since they had promised him something in the way of a karmic encumbrance, this would be a good opportunity to ask them about it, wanted to follow after them, but Hsi-men Ch'ing called him to a halt in order to have a word with him.

"Yesterday," he proceeded to ask, "how come the three of you ran off that way, before anyone was aware of it, without telling me what you were doing? I sent a page boy after you, but he fell behind and was unable to catch up with you."

"Yesterday," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I fear we imposed upon you egregiously and consumed more than enough wine. When I saw that you were in your cups and recalled that your wife was entertaining today and must be waiting up to discuss things with you, I realized that if we didn't take ourselves off, there was no telling how late we would keep at it. As it is, my guess would be that you haven't made it to the yamen today. You've been wearing yourself out for days on end."⁴

"By the time I got home yesterday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it was already the third watch. Today I had to go to the yamen early to participate in the ceremony of bowing before the imperial tablet, take my place in court, and preside over the general disposition of pending cases, as well as spending some time on other public business. At the moment I'm preoccupied with the preparations for the party for the womenfolk here at home. And later today, after coming back from offering incense at the temple in connection with the chiao rites in celebration of the Festival of the First Prime, I've got to go to a party at the home of Commandant Chou Hsiu. Who knows what time it will be before I get home."

"It's a good thing you've got the temperament for it," said Ying Po-chüeh. Such great good fortune as yours, and I'm not just flattering you to your face, is something that nobody else could hope to handle."

The two of them talked for a while, and Hsi-men Ch'ing wanted to keep him there to share a meal with him, but Ying Po-chüeh said, "I won't have anything to eat. I'm on my way."

"Why hasn't your wife shown up for the party?" Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to ask.

"The sedan chair for my wife has already been ordered," Ying Po-chüeh said. "She'll be here any minute now."

Whereupon, raising his hand in salute and saying goodbye, he went out the gate and hastened after Li Chih and Huang the Fourth. Truly:

Even if you command the art of driving the fog and mounting the clouds;⁵

You cannot hope to obtain fire by drilling ice⁶ without the aid of money.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had seen off Ying Po-chüeh, he fondled the four blazing yellow gold bracelets in his hand, which he found to be very worthy of admiration.

From his mouth no word was uttered, but

In his heart he thought to himself,

"This baby boy that Sister Li has borne is certainly starting out on a firm footing. No sooner was he born than I had this official position unexpectedly conferred upon me, and now I have formed a marriage alliance with the Ch'iao family, and made all this money to boot."

Thereupon, he secreted the four gold bracelets in his sleeve and, instead of going back to the rear compound, went straight into the garden, headed for Li P'ing-erh's quarters.

Just as he passed by the postern gate of P'an Chin-lien's quarters, Chin-lien happened to come out and, catching sight of him, called him to a halt, saying, "What's that you've got in hand there? Come over and let me have a look."

"Wait until I come back," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll let you see what it is then."

Whereupon, carrying his burden as before, he continued on his way to Li P'ing-erh's quarters.

The woman, on seeing that she had failed to call him back, was more than a little mortified and said, "What sort of rare object could it be that he should be in such a frightful hurry over, refusing to let me see it? May he break his leg, the lousy three-inch good-for-nothing of a ruffian! When he sets foot on her threshold, may he come a cropper, fracture both his legs, and thereby:

Suffer the consequences before my very eyes."

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing, carrying the gold bracelets in hand, went into Li P'ing-erh's quarters and saw that she had just finished combing her hair, and that the wet nurse was holding the baby and playing with him. He went straight over to them and, putting the four gold bracelets into the baby's hands, encouraged him to play with them.

"Where did those come from?" Li P'ing-erh asked. "I'm afraid they may be too cold for his hands."

Hsi-men Ch'ing told her all about how Li Chih and Huang the Fourth had shown up that day in order to repay the silver they had borrowed from him, and that he had agreed to accept these gold bracelets in lieu of interest. Li P'ing-erh, fearful lest the baby's hands should be chilled, insisted on chafing the bracelets with a figured handkerchief before letting him continue to play with them.

Whom should they see at this juncture but Tai-an, who came in and reported, "Manager Yün Li-shou has ridden over with two horses and is waiting outside. He'd like Father to go out and take a look at them."

"Where did Manager Yün come by these horses?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"He says that his elder brother, Assistant Regional Commander Yün, sent the horses from his post on the frontier," replied Tai-an. "He claims that they can really step along pretty well."

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Li Chiao-erh, and Meng Yü-lou, accompanying Sister-in-law Wu, and her daughter-in-law, Third Sister Cheng, who had all come from the rear compound to Li P'ing-erh's quarters to see Kuan-ko.

Hsi-men Ch'ing left the four gold bracelets behind and went out to the main gate to see the horses.

On observing that a crowd of visitors had arrived, Li P'ing-erh was so preoccupied by the need to greet them and offer them seats that she forgot what the baby was doing. He continued to play with the gold bracelets, pulling them about this way and that, until one of them got lost in the process.

At this juncture, the wet nurse, Ju-i, said to Li P'ing-erh, "Mother, did you happen to pick up one of the gold bracelets the baby was playing with? There are only three of them left, so one of them is missing."

"I haven't picked any of them up," said Li P'ing-erh, "but I wrapped them in a handkerchief for him."

"The handkerchief has also fallen on the floor," said Ju-i. "I've shaken it out, but the gold bracelet is nowhere to be found."

At this, consternation broke out in the room. The wet nurse interrogated Ying-ch'un, and Ying-ch'un, in turn, interrogated Old Mother Feng.

"Ai-ya! Ai-ya!" Old Mother Feng exclaimed. "I'm not so blind as to be unable to see anything. In all the years I've been here, I've never presumed to pick up so much as a broken needle. As Mother knows perfectly well, even if it were made of gold, it wouldn't be anything I'm enamored of. It's you two who are in charge of looking after the baby. You'd better not try to pin any unjust accusations on me.”

“Just listen to the nonsense this old crone talks,” laughed Li P’ing-erh. “If the missing object weren’t gold, what would all the fuss be about?”

She also took Ying-ch’un to task, saying, “You lousy little stinker! Why are you making such a to-do about it for no good reason? When your father comes in, I’ll ask him about it. I imagine he may have picked it up, but I don’t know why he only picked up one of them.”

“Where did this gold object come from?” asked Meng Yü-lou.

“Father brought it in and gave it to the baby to play with,” replied Li P’ingerh. “Who knows where it came from?”

Who could have anticipated that Hsi-men Ch’ing would spend some time looking over the horses in front of the main gate. His managers and servants were all gathered there. He had page boys ride the horses back and forth and put them through their paces for two trial runs.

“Although these two horses may come from the Eastern Circuit,” opined Hsi-men Ch’ing, “their manes and tails are not much to look at, and they can’t really step along as well as they should. When it comes to trotting, they do all right, but that’s all.”

Turning to Manager Yün, he asked, “How much does your elder brother want for these horses?”

“He’s only asking seventy taels of silver for the two of them,” replied Yün Li-shou.

“That’s not a lot to ask,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “but they don’t seem able to really step along. You’d better take them back with you. If you happen to come up with any better horses in the future, ride them over. I won’t haggle about the price.”

When he had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch’ing came inside.

Whom should he see at this juncture but Ch’in-t’ung, who had come looking for him, saying, “The Sixth Lady would like to see you in her quarters.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing thereupon went into Li P’ing-erh’s quarters, where she asked him, “Did you, by any chance, take one of those gold bracelets with you? There are only three of them here now.”

“I left them behind when I went outside to look at the horses,” said Hsimen Ch’ing. “Who could have taken it?”

“If you didn’t take it,” said Li P’ing-erh. “Where could it have gotten to? We’ve been looking for it all this time, and it’s nowhere to be found. The wet nurse tried to blame it on Old Mother Feng, who is so upset that:

Swearing by the gods and uttering oaths,
all she can do is cry.”

“Who could actually have taken it?” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “Let it be for now. You can search for it at your leisure.”

“I was going to start looking for it just now,” said Li P’ing-erh, “but because I was interrupted when the people from the rear compound, along with Sister-in-law Wu and her daughter-in-law, dropped in, I forgot all about it. I imagined that you must have taken it when you went out. Who could have known that you didn’t take it after all, so the matter has been doubly delayed. When I did start to search for it, it frightened everyone off.”

Thereupon, she returned the three remaining bracelets to Hsi-men Ch’ing for safe keeping.

Just at this juncture, Pen the Fourth arrived with a hundred taels of newly minted silver to turn over to Hsi-men Ch’ing, who went to the rear compound to see to weighing it out and putting it away.

To resume our story, when P’an Chin-lien heard that there had been a ruckus in Li P’ing-erh’s quarters over the disappearance of a gold bracelet that the baby was playing with:

Before she even got wind of anything,

She was ready for the rain, and headed straight for the master suite to tell Yüeh-niang about it, saying, “Elder Sister, just see what that three-inch good-for-nothing has been up to! No matter how rich you may be, you ought not to give gold objects to children to play with.”

“Someone just told me about it,” said Yüeh-niang. “They say that her quarters have been turned upside down, and that they can’t find a gold bracelet. I really don’t know where this gold bracelet came from.”

“Who knows where it came from?” said Chin-lien. “You didn’t see it, but, a little while ago, he brought it in from outside, concealing it in the sleeve of his jacket, for all the world as if it were a case of:

The Eight Tribes coming to offer their tribute.

I asked him what it was and said, ‘Bring it over here so I can have a look at it.’ But, without even turning his head, he took off straight for her quarters as though his life depended on it. A little while later, pandemonium broke out, and it was claimed that a gold bracelet had disappeared. The way she explained it to that three-inch good-for-nothing, all he had to say was, ‘Let it be for now. You can search for it at your leisure.’

Even if you were as rich as Moneybags Wang,

That wouldn’t do.

A gold object like that must weigh some ten ounces at the least, and be worth fifty or sixty taels of silver. And you’d let it go at that, for no good reason!

If a pet turtle should escape from the jar,

It could only be with the connivance of someone at hand.

Who else would have had access to her quarters?”

As she was speaking, whom should they see but Hsi-men Ch’ing, who came in after weighing and putting away the newly minted silver that Pen the Fourth had brought.

Turning over the three remaining gold bracelets to Yüeh-niang to be put away, he explained to her, “These are four gold bracelets that Li Chih and Huang the Fourth paid me in lieu of interest on a loan I made to them. I gave them to the baby to play with, but one of them has disappeared.”

Then he instructed Yüeh-niang, “I want you to call out the maidservants from each person’s quarters and subject them to an interrogation. I’ve sent a page boy out on the street to buy a wolf’s sinew.² If the missing object is promptly produced, I’ll leave it at that. But if it is not, I'll start applying the wolf's sinew."

"If you consider the matter," said Yüeh-niang, "gold objects like these should not be handed over to a baby. They're heavy and might give him a chill. And what would you do if it should ever happen that his hands or feet should be crushed?"

P'an Chin-lien, from her vantage point to one side, picked up where Yüeh-niang had left off, saying, "You ought not to have given them to the baby to play with, indeed! Your only regret was that you couldn't get them into her quarters fast enough. When I called to you a while ago, you wouldn't so much as turn your head, but acted just like a red-eyed soldier protecting his loot, not wanting anyone to know what you were up to. And now that one of the gold bracelets has disappeared, it's a wonder you have the face to come and complain to Elder Sister, instructing her to interrogate the maidservants from each of our quarters. As for the maidservants from our quarters:

If they don't laugh at you with their mouths,
They'll certainly laugh through their cunts."

These few words upset Hsi-men Ch'ing so much that he strode forward, bent Chin-lien over Yüeh-niang's k'ang, and, brandishing his fist, cursed her, saying, "How hateful can you get! If I didn't care for the opinion of the world, you little splay-legged whore, I'd finish you off with a few blows of my fist. You're never anything but:

Bad-mouthed and sharp-tongued.⁸

sticking your foot in where it's none of your business."

P'an Chin-lien, putting on quite a scene, began to cry, saying, "I'm well aware that:

Relying on your office to flaunt your power, and Depending on your wealth to play the master, you have hardened your heart against me. I seem to be the only person you take advantage of. No doubt the idea of taking a person's, or even half a person's, life doesn't carry any weight with you. Well, what's holding you back? Go ahead and beat me. I'm right here, at your disposal. No matter how badly you beat me, chances are I'll still retain a breath of life. But if I should die, never fear but that my frail old mother will demand that you pay the penalty. No matter how much money and influence your household may have, she'll lodge a complaint against you. You may think yourself immune as a judicial commissioner in the yamen, but what will that avail you? You're no more than an impoverished functionary, hiding under an empty shell of debt and the battered silk hat of an official. How many charges of murder do you think you can sustain? For that matter, even the emperor would hardly dare to murder his subordinates with impunity."

These few words, contrary to expectation, produced a guffaw of laughter from Hsi-men Ch'ing, who sputtered out, "Why you! This actually. You little splay-legged whore! What a wicked mouth you've got! You say I'm an impoverished functionary hiding under the battered silk hat of an official. Have a maidservant bring out that silk hat of mine. Just where does it show any signs of wear? You may ask around here in this district of Ch'ing-ho whether I'm indebted to anyone or not, though you say that I'm an empty shell of debt."

"How can you call me splay-legged?" Chin-lien demanded to know, lifting one of her legs into the air. "Just take a look at my leg here and tell me what's crooked about it. You may abuse me for being splay-legged, but there's nothing wrong with these legs of mine."

Yüeh-niang, from her vantage point to one side, laughed, saying, "The two of you are like:

A brass basin meeting up with a steel brush.⁹

As the saying goes:

One wicked person will be ground down upon encountering another;¹⁰

Upon encountering such another person he will be utterly undone.¹¹

It has always been true that:

P'an Chin-lien Exchanges Caustic Taunts with Hsi-men Ch'ing

It is the strongmouthed who get ahead.
 Luckily for you, Sixth Sister, you've got that mouth of yours. Otherwise, if you were slow of speech, you'd never make it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, realizing that he could not get the better of her, put on his outside clothes and started to leave, when he encountered Tai-an, who said, "Commandant Chou's household has sent someone to urge you on your way. The horse is ready for you. Let me ask, are you planning to go participate in the chiao ceremonies first, or are you going straight to Commandant Chou's place?"

"As for the chiao ceremonies," Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed him, "have my son-in-law go in my stead and then come right home after burning some incense. You can look to my horse. I might as well go straight to the party at Commandant Chou's place."

Turning to Shu-t'ung, he said, "Fetch my official cap and girdle."

As he was putting these on and fastening his girdle, what should he see but the two instructors from the dramatic troupe belonging to Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, leading the whole troupe in to kowtow to him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Shu-t'ung to see that they were fed, and said to them, "All of you do your best to entertain the ladies today, and I will see that you are properly rewarded. There's no need for you to go before them and pass the collection box around."¹²

The two instructors knelt down and said, "If we don't do our best to entertain them, how could we expect a reward?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing then instructed Shu-t'ung, "They will have been performing for two days. Including the gratuity, set aside five taels of silver as their remuneration."

"I understand," Shu-t'ung assented.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded to mount his horse and set off to attend the party at Commandant Chou Hsiu's place.

Let us return to the story of P'an Chin-lien, who continued to sit in the master suite, keeping company with Sister-in-law Wu.

Wu Yüeh-niang then said to her, "You'd better go back to your quarters and redo your makeup, hadn't you? You've rubbed your eyes until they're all red. In a little while the guests will arrive, and you'll only make a spectacle of yourself. Whoever taught you to cross him that way? I actually broke into a sweat on your behalf. If I hadn't been there to dissuade him, even without any other funny business, you'd have suffered a few blows on your body for sure."

The male of the species has dog's hair growing on his face.¹³
But, just as though you:

Didn't know any better,¹⁴
you adamantly insisted on picking a quarrel with him. If a gold bracelet has disappeared, let it go at that. Whether to look for it or not is not up to you. After all, it wasn't in your quarters that it disappeared. Why should you stick your neck out and try to tough it out with him, for no good reason? You're just wasting your breath."

With these few words, she succeeded in reducing Chin-lien to silence, and she returned to her quarters to redo her makeup.

A little while later, Li P'ing-erh, along with Wu Yin-erh, both of them in formal dress, came into Yüeh-niang's room, and she asked them, "How did that gold bracelet come to disappear? Just now, it was the occasion for a real altercation between Father and Sister Six, in which they became so upset with each other they almost came to blows. I had to intervene between them, after which Father went off to attend a party at someone's place. He has ordered a page boy to buy a wolf's sinew, and when he gets home this evening, he's going to apply it to the maidservants from each of our quarters. What were the maidservants and Old Mother Feng in your quarters doing? If they were watching the baby play, how could a gold bracelet disappear just like that? After all, it's not as though it were a mere bauble, worth a candareen, or half a candareen, or anything like that"

"Father just happened, out of the blue, to come in carrying four gold bracelets," said Li P'ing-erh, "and gave them to the baby to play with. I was busy talking to Sister-in-law Wu and Third Sister Cheng, who had come for a visit along with the Second Lady. Who knows how one of the bracelets happened to disappear? Right now, the maidservants are blaming the wet nurse, and the wet nurse is blaming Old Mother Feng, who is so upset by it all that, weeping and wailing, she is threatening to commit suicide. It is one of those things that is:

Difficult to clear up without eyewitnesses.¹⁵
As things stand, whom would it be appropriate to blame?"

"My Heavens!" exclaimed Wu Yin-erh. I have played with the baby often enough. It's a good thing that today I was in another room of Mother's combing my hair and hadn't come over yet. Otherwise, I'd be implicated too. Even if Father and Mother were not to say anything about it, how could we help being ill at ease with each other? After all:

Who is there who doesn't care about money?
We denizens of the licensed quarter are particularly sensitive about such things. If such an imputation were to be noised abroad, it wouldn't bear listening to."

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Han Yü-ch'uan and Tung Chiao-erh, who came in carrying their costume bags with them.

With ingratiating smiles, they kowtowed first to Yüeh-niang, Sister-in-law Wu, and Li P'ing-erh, after which they stood up and made a bow to Wu Yin-erh, saying, "Sister Wu, you must have come yesterday, without returning home."

"How did the two of you come to know that?" asked Wu Yin-erh.

"Yesterday," said Tung Chiao-erh, "the two of us were singing in the house on the Lantern Market, and His Honor mentioned it. He told us to come and sing today, in order to entertain the ladies."

Yüeh-niang then invited the two of them to take a seat. In a little while, Hsiao-yü brought in two cups of tea, at which Han Yü-ch'uan and Tung Chiao-erh hastily stood up to accept the tea and responded to Hsiao-yü with a bow.

Wu Yin-erh then asked, "How late did the two of you sing yesterday before the party broke up?"

"It was already past the second watch by the time we got home," said Han Yü-ch'uan. "We came back to the quarter along with your brother and Li Ming."

After they had chatted for a bit, Yüeh-niang instructed Yü-hsiao, "See to it that the tea is served as soon as possible. In a little while, I fear that we will have our hands full when the guests arrive."

A table was then set up, and two square containers, each holding four boxes of delicacies, were placed upon it.

Yüeh-niang then directed Hsiao-yü, "Go to the Second Lady's quarters and invite Li Kuei-chieh to come and have tea with us."

Before long, she appeared, accompanied by her aunt, and the two of them saluted the company, sat down, and joined them for tea, after which the tea things were cleared away.

Who should suddenly appear at this point but Ying-ch'un, all dressed up and carrying Kuan-ko, whose head was adorned with a gilt-ridged satin cap decorated with the eight auspicious symbols, whose body was clad in a loosely cut crimson robe, and whose lower limbs were dressed in white damask socks and satin shoes. On his chest an amulet on its cord was displayed, and on his hands he was wearing little gold bracelets.

When Li P'ing-erh saw him, she said, "Little gentleman, no one invited you. What are you doing here?"

Then, taking him from the maidservant, she placed him on her knee, from which vantage point he surveyed the roomful of people, looking uninterruptedly, first at one of them and then at another.

Li Kuei-chieh, who was sitting on Yüeh-niang's k'ang, smiled and, playfully teasing the baby for the fun of it, said, "The child keeps looking over here. It must be that he wants me to hold him."

Thereupon, she reached out to him with her hands, and the baby fell into her arms and allowed her to hold him.

Sister-in-law Wu laughed at this, saying, "Such a wee bit of a child, but he already knows how to demonstrate his affections."

Yüeh-niang, picking up on this, said, "Who is his father, after all? In the future, when he grows up, he's sure to be a little lady-killer."

"If he turns into a little lady-killer," said Meng Yü-lou, "his First Mother will have to give him a real spanking."

"My child," said Li P'ing-erh, "while your elder sister is holding you, see that you don't go wee-wee on her clothes, or you'll get the spanking of your life, quick enough.”

“Ai-ya!” exclaimed Li Kuei-chieh. “What is there to worry about? If he goes wee-wee, what of it? It doesn't matter. I just love holding Little Brother and playing with him.”

Whereupon, she continued to play with him, nuzzling him mouth to mouth.

Who should appear at this juncture but P'an Chin-lien,¹⁶ who came in to join the group.

Tung Chiao-erh and Han Yü-ch'uan got up from their seats to greet her and then sat down, saying, “The two of us have been here some time already, but we haven't sung a single song to entertain the ladies, as yet.”

Then, turning to the maidservant, they said, “Sister Hsiao-yü, if you fetch our musical instruments, we can perform a song.”

Hsiao-yü then fetched a psaltery and a p'i-p'a and handed them over to the two of them. Thereupon, with Han Yü-ch'uan¹⁷ playing the p'i-p'a, Tung Chiao-erh playing the psaltery, and Wu Yin-erh chiming in from the side, they proceeded to sing the song suite, the second song of which begins with the words:

Luxuriant blossoms spread before my eyes.¹⁸ to the tune “A Golden Chain Hangs from the Phoenix Tree.” The very first line that they sang, truly possessed:

A timbre that causes dust to fall and lingers around the rafters:

A sound that causes rocks to split and sets the clouds in motion.

Kuan-ko was so frightened by the noise that he hid his face in Li Kuei-chieh's bosom:

Not daring to raise his head,¹⁹ or take another breath.

When Yüeh-niang saw what was happening, she called out, “Sister Li, you'd better take the child, and have Ying-ch'un take him back to your room. What a hopeless little rascal. Just see how frightened his face looks.”

Li P'ing-erh promptly took the child and said to Ying-ch'un, “Cover up his ears and take him into another room.”

Thereupon, the four entertainers, singing in ensemble, proceeded with the performance of the song suite on which they had embarked.

Luxuriant blossoms spread before my eyes;

My embroidered quilt pointlessly remains.

That wretched lover of mine has treated me altogether too cruelly.

In my last incarnation I must have owed him a love debt due in this life.²⁰

Neglecting to sleep, forgetting to eat;²¹

Lingering at the door I wait for him.²²

The bedchamber is silent;²³ how am I ever to endure it?

To the tune “Cursing One's Lover”:

Coldly deserted, the bedchamber is silent; how am I ever to endure it?

All by myself I lean against the screen.

Who knows what his feelings may be.

I recall how originally, we walked together, sat together,²⁴ and rejoiced together.

But now, left all alone, how am I to cope with the situation?

In my desolation, I am too listless to pour wine;

In my discomfiture, I am too lazy to wear flowers.

To the tune “Wen-chou Song”:

I am too lazy to wear flowers;

I am too listless to pour wine.

Now, though we make a swallow's tryst or oriole's assignation, he fails to come.

It must be that he is somewhere else, somewhere else, seeking gratification.

His keepsakes are here, but where is he?²⁵

In vain do I task my dreaming soul²⁶ to transport me to the Radiant Terrace.

All I can do is let the tears cover my cheeks.

To the tune “Moved by Imperial Favor”:

Ah! All I can do is let two streams of tears cover my cheeks.²⁷

It must be that it is something determined by fate.²⁸

No doubt your destiny is meager, and my allotment is shallow.

It must be that our fortunes are askew and the times out of joint.²⁹

How can we avoid the trouble caused by the gossip of idle folk;

Who employ artful schemes to frustrate us;

Tearing to shreds our girdle of communion;³⁰

Insistently separating the phoenix hairpins;

And inundating the Radiant Terrace of Ch'u?

To the tune “Needlework Box”:

The strings of my musical instruments are covered with dust.

The twin peaks of my eyebrows remain knitted.

My fragrant flesh is emaciated,³¹ due to this hopeless sorrow.

Too listless for embroidery,

I sit by my dressing mirror.

Beset by old resentment and new sorrow;³²
How am I ever to endure it?
My only fear is lest the butterfly ambassadors and bee go-betweens³³ not return.
Confronting the phoenix mirror, I ask, "If my pink cheeks were unaltered,³⁴
Would he already have had a change of heart?"

To the tune "Tea-picking Song":

My pink cheeks have been altered, my body has become emaciated.
Coldly deserted, how am I ever to endure it?
My only fear is that Liang Shan-po is no longer enamored of his Chu Ying-t'ai.³⁵
If he should perfidiously break faith and forget favor,³⁶ seeking a pretext to criticize me,
I'll bring up the oaths we swore by the hills and seas,³⁷ reiterating them in clear-cut terms.

To the tune "Relieving Three Hangovers":

He has utterly forgotten the oaths we swore by the hills and seas.
He has utterly forgotten the promised letters which he has not sent.
He has utterly forgotten the kindness and love shared at my pillow side.
He has utterly forgotten the intimate contact of our unclothed bodies.
He has utterly forgotten the thousands of times we bowed before the gods.
He has utterly forgotten my keepsake, a fragrant silk red embroidered shoe.
If I were to mention it, even bystanders would find their cheeks flooded with pearly tears.³⁸

To the tune "Crows Cry at Night":

Right now, having been disunited for three months, it feels like a separation of years.
If we are to meet again, on what day of what year³⁹ will it ever take place?
As for me, I am so utterly emaciated my body is like a stick of kindling.⁴⁰
When will I ever pay back completely the love debt I owe from my last life?
I fail to see any blue bird conveying his love letter.⁴¹
The dog Yellow Ear has brought no news.⁴²
Every day I am sick with depression, too lazy to sit by my dressing mirror.
But if we are ever reunited, we will sacrifice a consecrated lamb.
Our affinities will be fulfilled;
Our hearts be mutually inclined.
We will soon become as inseparable as male and female phoenix mates;⁴³
And thereby avoid derisive butterflies and suspicious honeybees.⁴⁴

CODA:

The scene is assuredly set.
My lover, sooner or later,
will surely return;
And as loving husband and wife⁴⁵ we will live happily ever after.⁴⁶

While the four singing girls were still performing, whom should they see come in but Tai-an.

Yüeh-niang asked him, "Why is it that the group of ladies you went to invite still haven't shown up?"

"When I went to Kinswoman Ch'iao's place for that purpose," said Tai-an, "the wives of Censor Chu and Provincial Graduate Shang had already forgathered there and were only awaiting the arrival of Madame Ch'iao, the widow of Ch'iao the Fifth, before setting out to come here."

Yüeh-niang instructed him, "Tell the page boy P'ing-an to keep a lookout at the main gate and come in to give us advance notice as soon as the sedan chairs of the ladies arrive."

"Drum music will be struck up to welcome them, both at the front gate and in the main reception hall," said Tai-an, "so you will have ample time to prepare to receive them."

Yüeh-niang further instructed Tai-an, "See to it that brocade carpets are laid down in the parlor of the rear reception hall, that the seats are properly arranged, and that the blinds are rolled up."

Golden curtain hooks are hung in pairs;⁴⁷

The fragrance of orchid and musk swirls.⁴⁸

Ch'un-mei, Ying-ch'un, Yü-hsiao, and Lan-hsiang were all dressed up for the occasion. The wives of the servants were all:

Studded with gold and decked with silver;

Sporting red and trailing green;

as they prepared to receive their new relatives by marriage.

Who should appear at this juncture but Ying Po-chüeh's wife, whose sedan chair was the first to arrive, escorted by Ying Pao. Yüeh-niang and the others welcomed her in, and, after the customary amenities had been exchanged, she took a seat in the parlor.

Bowing repeatedly to Yüeh-niang, she said, "My husband is constantly imposing upon you, I fear. We are grateful for your patronage."

"How can you say such a thing?" Yüeh-niang responded. "We are much indebted to the help of Master Ying the Second."

After some time, what should they hear but the approach of an escort shouting to clear the way, and as:

Drums and music began to sound, in the front reception hall, P'ing-an came in to report that Madame Ch'iao's sedan chair had arrived. In no time at all, the whole area was rendered black by the number of servitors accompanying the five large sedan chairs as they came to rest at the front gate. The sedan chair of Madame Ch'iao, the widow of Ch'iao the Fifth, was in the van. It had a silver finial on top, from which pearls were suspended; was invested in an ultramarine, double-fringed, gold lamé, waterproof canopy; and was accompanied by an escort of retainers, armed with rattan canes, who shouted to clear the way. Behind it came the wives of her servants, ensconced in smaller sedan chairs; four commandants, bearing her dressing case and brazier; and two black-clad servants, riding on ponies. The remainder of the procession consisted of the wife of Ch'iao Hung, Censor Chu's wife, the wife of Provincial Graduate Shang, Ts'ui Pen's wife, Big Sister Tuan, and the wife of Ch'iao T'ung, the head servant in Ch'iao Hung's household, who accompanied her mistress in a smaller sedan chair, in order to look after her clothes.

Wu Yüeh-niang was attired in a full-sleeved robe of scarlet variegated satin, decorated with a motif of the four animals representing the cardinal directions⁴⁹ paying homage to the ch'i-lin.⁵⁰ Around her waist she wore a girdle of gold inlaid with assorted jewels. On her head:

Her chignon was of an imposing height;
Phoenix pins protruded to either side;
And pearls and trinkets rose in piles.

On her breast:

Gold pendants hung on embroidered cords;
And a profusion of amulets scintillated.

Beside her skirt were suspended:

Decorative pendants of lustrous pearls.

Along with Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, and Sun Hsüeh-o, all of whom were dressed up to look as though they were:

Modeled in plaster, carved of jade,
Producing brocade effects that dazzle the eye,

Wu Yüeh-niang came out as far as the gate that led into the second courtyard to greet their guests.

What should they see but the crowd of female guests, gathered around Madame Ch'iao the Fifth as she made her entrance. She was petite in stature, more than seventy years old, wore a head-dress bedecked with kingfisher feathers, jewels, and pearls, and a scarlet robe decorated with palace-style embroidery. When looked at close up, it was apparent that her hair was all white. Truly:

Her eyebrows are two streaks of snow,
Her chignon is tied into a bag of silk;
Her eyes resemble autumn waters, somewhat disturbed,
Her hair is like the hills of Ch'u, veiled in clouds.⁵¹

Once she had been ushered into the rear reception hall, she first exchanged salutations with Sister-in-law Wu and after that proceeded to do the same with Yüeh-niang and the others.

Yüeh-niang reiterated, "Madame, pray accept my salutation," but her guest refused to accede, and it was only after they had dickered politely for a while that she agreed to accept a half kowtow from her.

After that, Yüeh-niang proceeded to exchange the courtesies appropriate between new relatives by marriage with Ch'iao Hung's wife, each of them in turn expressing her satisfaction with their new relationship and thanking the other for the lavish gifts they had received.

As a Result of the Betrothal Yüeh-niang Meets Madame Ch'iao

When these amenities were concluded, Madame Ch'iao the Fifth was ushered to the place of honor, where she was invited to take her seat upon a chair covered with a brocade cushion in front of a standing brocade screen.

Ch'iao Hung's wife was invited to take the seat next to hers, but she repeatedly demurred, saying, "As the wife of Madame's nephew, I could scarcely presume to take such a liberty."

She deferred to the wives of Censor Chu and Provincial Graduate Shang, but the two of them also declined, and it was only after they had dickered politely for some time that Madame Ch'iao the Fifth consented to take her place in the seat of honor, and the rest of the company sat down in two rows, with the guests on the east and the hosts on the west.

In the center of the room was a large square box stove in which a fire was blazing, so that:

The atmosphere was as genial as that of spring.⁵²

The four maidservants, Ch'un-mei, Ying-ch'un, Yü-hsiao, and Lan-hsiang, all of whom were dressed in jackets of scarlet figured satin, blue gold lamé skirts, and green brocaded vests, waited upon the company and served them with tea.

After some time, Madame Ch'iao the Fifth said to Yüeh-niang, "Why not invite His Honor Hsi-men to come out and meet us, so we can exchange the courtesies appropriate to relatives by marriage."

"My poor husband has had to go to the yamen to conduct public business today," explained Yüeh-niang, "and he hasn't come home yet."

"What office does His Honor hold?" asked Madame Ch'iao the Fifth.

"Though nothing but:
A humble villager," said Yüeh-niang, “thanks to our sovereign’s grace, he has been granted a substantive appointment as battalion commander, and currently occupies a post in the legal system. For our humble household to aspire to a marriage alliance with these relatives of yours is truly presumptuous.”

“How can you talk that way?” responded Madame Ch’iao the Fifth. “Such an exalted position as His Honor has achieved is more than sufficient. The other day when I heard that the daughter of my nephew had been betrothed to the scion of your household, my heart was filled with delight. Today I have come in order to get acquainted, so that we will be comfortable addressing each other on social occasions in the future.”

“My only fear is,” said Yüeh-niang, “that such an alliance can only detract from your reputation.”

“What kind of talk is that?” replied Madame Ch’iao the Fifth. “Do you suppose that the sovereign himself never deigns to form marriage alliances with commoners?”

It’s a long story,⁵³

but the honored consort, née Cheng, of the present emperor, who resides in the Eastern Palace, happens to be a niece of mine.⁵⁴ Her father and mother are both dead, so I am the only relative she has left. When my old man was still alive he held the hereditary title of commander, but, unfortunately, he died without issue at the age of forty-nine, so the title passed to a nephew of his from another branch of the family. As for this nephew of mine, although he didn’t have any money to start with, he has now become a well-to-do householder. Although he may have started out as a corvée laborer, he now has enough to live on quite comfortably, so he would not detract in any way from the reputation of your family.”

After they had talked for some time, Sister-in-law Wu said to Yüeh-niang, “Why don’t you have the baby brought out so our venerable visitor can have a look at him and he can solicit a share of her longevity?”

Li P’ing-erh hastily went back to her room and told the wet nurse, “Bring Kuan-ko out so he can pay his respects to Madame Ch’iao.”

When Madame Ch’iao saw him, she exclaimed hyperbolically, “What a perfectly formed little fellow!”

Then, calling over one of her attendants, she opened her felt bag and took out a length of purple brocade material, shot with yellow, of the kind purveyed for use in the palace, and a pair of gilded bracelets for the child to wear.

Yüeh-niang hastily got up from her place to thank her, and then invited her to retire to her boudoir in order to change her clothes.

Before long, four tables were set up in the summerhouse in the front garden, where tea was to be served. Upon each table were arrayed forty saucers of every kind of condiment and sweetmeat, mouth-watering appetizers, steamed-shortcake pastries, and the finest deep-fried patisserie, while to either side maidservants and the wives of household retainers stood by to wait upon the company. But no more of this.

After they were finished with tea, Yüeh-niang opened the gate which led into the garden behind them, with its artificial hill, and they all went in for a tour of the premises. By that time Ch’en Ching-chi had come back from the chiao rites of cosmic renewal, where he had stayed only for the noon vegetarian repast, and, along with Shu-t’ung and Tai-an, had made all the necessary preparations for the feast in the front reception hall, where the ladies were now invited to partake of wine and inaugurate the festivities. Truly it was a fine feast. Behold:

Screens display their peacocks’ tails,
Cushions conceal their hibiscus blossoms.
Platters are piled with exotic fruits and rare viands,
Vases are studded with gold flowers and emerald leaves.⁵⁵
Braziers burn animal-shaped briquettes,
Incense diffuses the odor of ambergris.⁵⁶
The table service is an array of exotic antiques from Hsiang-chou;⁵⁷
The hanging blinds are adorned with shining pearls from Ho-p’u.⁵⁸
White jade saucers are piled high with preserved ch’i-lin meat;⁵⁹
Golden flagons are filled to the brim with carnelian-hued nectar.
There are stewed chimpanzee lips,
And baked leopard embryos;
Truly, one has but to use one’s chopsticks to exhaust ten thousand cash.
There are deep-fried dragon livers,
And roast phoenix marrow;
Indeed, when they are all displayed, seasonal delicacies abound.
The denizens of the Pear Garden,⁶⁰
Crowd around with their phoenix pipes and phoenix flutes.⁶¹
The courtesans from the inner palace,
Urgently tune their silver psalteries and ivory clappers.⁶²
The beauties proffering wine are duplicates of the Goddess of the Lo River;⁶³
The incense-burning serving girls are replicas of Ch’ang-o, the Goddess of the Moon.⁶⁴

Truly:

Two ranks of pearls and trinkets⁶⁵ are arrayed beneath the steps;
The tones of pipes and voices⁶⁶ hover about the banquet hall.⁶⁷

In due course, Wu Yüeh-niang offered Li P’ing-erh a goblet of wine, and after the players beneath the steps had concluded a flourish of the drums, Madame Ch’iao and the rest of the assembled relatives toasted Li P’ing-erh and wished her a long life in honor of her birthday. The four singing girls, Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, Han Yü-ch’uan, and Tung Chiao-erh, took their places before the company, struck up their instruments:

Patterned cithara, silver psaltery,
Jade-surfaced p'i-p'a, and Clappers inlaid with red ivory,⁶⁸
and sang the song suite that begins with the words:

May you live as long as the Southern Hills.⁶⁹

After which, from beneath the steps:

Drums and music began to sound, and the players presented the accordion-bound album listing the names of the dramas they were prepared to perform. Madame Ch'iao the Fifth instructed them to put on the play entitled Wang Yüeh-ying Leaves her Shoe Behind on the Lantern Festival.⁷⁰ The chef then came out and presented the minor entrée of roast goose, for which Madame Ch'iao rewarded him with five mace of silver.

By the time:

Five carved entrées had been consumed,
Three courses of soup had been served, and the four scenes of the drama were concluded, it began to grow late.
Painted candles dispersed their light, from mountainous banks of sconces; every variety of decorative taper was lit up.
Brocade sashes fluttered,⁷¹
Gaudy ropes hung pendulously.
The wheel of the bright moon,⁷²
Arose out of the east, and Illuminated the chamber,
Under the flickering lamplight.

Lai-hsing's wife Hui-hsiu and Lai-pao's wife Hui-hsiang attended upon the company, each of them bearing a square platter of stuffed Lantern Festival dumplings. The tea that was served in cups inlaid with silver, provided with gold teaspoons in the shape of apricot leaves, was flavored with rose hips and crystallized sugar and exuded a mouth-watering fragrance. The four senior maidservants, Ch'un-mei, Ying-ch'un, Yü-hsiao, and Lan-hsiang, divided the task of waiting upon the company between them:

Observing the demands of propriety,
Dignified and stately in demeanor.

Meanwhile, beneath the steps, the music started up again. Playing a p'i-p'a, a psaltery, and a mandola, accompanied by pipes and flutes, the musicians performed a song suite in celebration of the Lantern Festival, beginning with the tune "Prelude to Painted Eyebrows," the first line of which is:

Blossoms and moonlight pervade the spring metropolis.⁷³

When the performance was over, Madame Ch'iao the Fifth and Ch'iao Hung's wife called the players before them and rewarded them with two packages, each of which contained a tael of silver. The four singing girls were also awarded two mace of silver apiece.

Yüeh-niang had also set up many saucers full of delicacies in the parlor of the master suite in the rear compound, where the guests were invited to retire after the formal entertainment was over. The four tables were loaded with refreshments.

The singers performed,
The musicians played,
and another round of wine was served.

Madame Ch'iao the Fifth repeatedly remarked that it was getting late, and that she should be on her way. Yüeh-niang and the others were unable to persuade her to stay any longer and accompanied her to the main gate, where she was detained for a parting cup of wine and invited to view the fireworks. The onlookers on either side of the street were as closely arrayed as:

Fish scales or swarming bees.

P'ing-an, together with a contingent of orderlies with sticks in hand, tried to hold back the crowds, but they surged forward repeatedly. After a little while, when a rack of fireworks had been set off, the onlookers to either side scattered. Only then did Madame Ch'iao the Fifth and the other ladies bid farewell to Yüeh-niang, mount their sedan chairs, and make their departure. By that time, it was already the third watch. Subsequently they also had to see Ying Pochüeh's wife on her way.

When Yüeh-niang and her sister wives returned to the rear compound, they instructed Ch'en Ching-chi, Lai-hsing, Shu-t'ung, and Tai-an to put away the tableware from the reception hall, see that the players and their two instructors were provided with food and wine, pay them five taels of silver for their services, and send them on their way.

Yüeh-niang gave instructions that the remaining table's worth of leftovers and half a jug of wine, should be set aside for the delectation of Manager Fu, Pen the Fourth, and Ch'en Ching-chi.

"They must be worn out," she said. "Let them all have a drink together. Set up a table for them in the main reception hall. Who knows how late it will be before your father returns home."

Thereupon, there still remaining some lamps that had not burnt out, Manager Fu, Pen the Fourth, Ch'en Ching-chi, and Lai-pao took the positions of honor, while Lai-hsing, Shu-t'ung, Tai-an, and P'ing-an ranged themselves to either side, and the wine was poured.

Lai-pao called out, "P'ing-an, you ought to depute someone to cover the main gate, lest Father should return and find no one tending the door."

"I've told Hua-t'ung to take care of it," replied P'ing-an. "That's not a problem."

Thereupon the eight of them fell to playing at guess-fingers while drinking their wine.

“Let's not play at guess-fingers,” said Ch'en Ching-chi. “If we:

Create such a commotion, we'll only disturb the people in the rear compound. Let's quietly play a game of forfeits instead. Each player must come up with a line of poetry. Those who are able to do so will escape paying a forfeit, but those who fail to do so will have to drink a large cup of wine.

Manager Fu started off with the line:

How comical are the trappings of the Lantern Festival,

Pen the Fourth continued:

The occasions for pleasure in man's life are numbered.

Ch'en Ching-chi said:

Availing ourselves of this moonshine and lantern light, to which Lai-pao responded:

We must, on no account, allow them to go unappreciated.

Lai-hsing said:

Our trysts with our girls may have failed to come off,

To which Shu-t'ung responded:

But we have complied with the wishes of the First Lady.

Tai-an said:

Though we have only leftover wine and waning lamplight, and P'ing-an concluded:

It may still constitute “a fling in the spring breeze.”

When the group of them had finished their joint composition, they broke into loud laughter. Truly:

After finishing their drinking, when the wine is exhausted and the party is over;⁷⁴
There is no one to notice that the moonlight is illuminating the plum branches.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Chapter 44

WU YÜEH-NIANG DETAINS

LI KUEI-CHIEH OVERNIGHT;

HSI-MEN CH'ING DRUNKENLY

INTERROGATES HSIA-HUA

In straitened circumstances, I continue to be mired in the muck day by day;
While the resplendence of the imperial park is perennially renewed.
Brambles do not encroach on the carriageways and riding paths;
Pipes and strings forever enhance the homes of the silk-clad.
Patrician youths roam the greensward like fluttering butterflies;
Budding damsels disport in the breeze like proliferating blossoms.
But I am reluctant to go out, let the vagrant youths scoff as they will;
For, once back inside the gate, the old life will go on just as before.¹

THE STORY GOES that while Ch'en Ching-chi, Manager Fu, and the others were drinking in the front compound, Sister-in-law Wu's sedan chair arrived, and she prepared to return home.

Wu Yüeh-niang did her best to detain her, saying repeatedly, "Stay another night, Sister-in-law, and go home tomorrow."

"Including the time I spent at Kinsman Ch'iao Hung's place," Sister-in-law Wu replied, "I've been away for three or four days already. There's no one to look after the place at home, and your brother is tied up at the yamen, so he's not there either. I'd better go home. Tomorrow all of you ladies are invited, whatever you do, to come to our place for a holiday visit. In the evening, you can walk off the hundred ailments on your way home."

"Tomorrow," said Yüeh-niang, "we won't be able to make it before evening."

"You really ought to come by sedan chair a little earlier," said Sister-in-law Wu. "That will give you time to walk back together later in the evening."

When they had finished speaking, Yüeh-niang had two gift boxes made up for her, one of Lantern Festival dumplings, and one of steamed dumplings, and ordered Lai-an to escort her sister-in-law on her way home.

The four singing girls, Li Kuei-chieh and company, then kowtowed to Yüeh-niang and bade her farewell as they also prepared to return home.

"What's the hurry?" said Yüeh-niang. "Are you that anxious to be off? Wait till your father gets home and dismisses you. On his way out he told me to keep you here. I expect he has something else to say to you. I wouldn't presume to let you go."

"Father has gone out to a drinking party," said Li Kuei-chieh. "Who knows when he'll get home? We've been waiting for some time already. Mother, why don't you let me and Wu Yin-erh leave before the others. The two of them only came today, while we've been here for two days already. Who knows how anxious my mother back at home is to see me?"

"Is your mother really so anxious to see you," said Yüeh-niang, "that she can't bear to wait another night?"

"That's a fine thing to say," protested Li Kuei-chieh. "There's no one to look after the place at home, and moreover my elder sister's services have been engaged elsewhere. Mother, if we get out our instruments and sing another song for you, surely you'll let us go home."

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Ch'en Ching-chi, who came in to turn over the unused gratuities to Yüeh-niang.

"The one-candareen gratuities for the chair carriers of the Ch'iao family and the others came to ten packets in all, amounting to three taels," he reported. "There are still ten packets left over."

As Yüeh-niang was putting these away, Li Kuei-chieh took the opportunity to ask, "Son-in-law, when you were outside just now, did you notice whether our sedan chairs had come for us or not?"

"Only the sedan chairs for the other two are here," replied Ch'en Ching-chi. "Those for you and Wu Yin-erh have not arrived. It seems that a while ago someone sent them away."

"Son-in-law," exclaimed Li Kuei-chieh, "did you really send them away? You're fooling me."

"If you don't believe me, go see for yourself," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "As though I would try to fool you."

Before he had finished speaking, whom should they see but Ch'in-t'ung, who came in carrying his master's felt bag and announced, "Father has come home."

"It's a good thing the two of you haven't left," said Yüeh-niang. "It turns out your father has shown up after all."

Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing came in, still wearing his official hat on his head, and 70 or 80 percent inebriated. Striding into the room, he assumed his place in the seat of honor.

"Tung Chiao-erh and Han Yü-ch'uan are still here," Yüeh-niang reported, and the two of them proceeded to step forward and kowtow.

"Everyone has left," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and it is already late at night. Do you still want me to have them sing for us?"

"They've been asking me to let them go home," said Yüeh-niang.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing turned to Li Kuei-chieh and said, "You and Yin-erh might as well wait until the festival is over before going home. It's all right to let the other two go."

"You see," said Yüeh-niang. "I told you so, but you wouldn't believe me and acted as though I were fooling you, or something."

Li Kuei-chieh merely lowered her head with a disgruntled expression and had nothing further to say.

Hsi-men Ch'ing asked Tai-an, "Are the sedan chairs for those two here or not?"

"Only the two sedan chairs for Tung Chiao-erh and Han Yü-ch'uan are waiting for them," Tai-an responded.

"I'll not have anything more to drink," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You can each get out your instruments and sing the medley called 'Ten Strips of Brocade' for us, after which I'll let those two go home before the others."

Thereupon, with Li Kuei-chieh playing the p'i-p'a, Wu Yin-erh playing the psaltery, Han Yü-ch'uan strumming the mandola, and Tung Chiao-erh beating a quick tempo on the drum, the four singing girls, performing in relay, sang the twenty halves of the ten songs that made up "Ten Strips of Brocade." Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li P'ingerh all sat down in the room to listen to the performance.

Li Kuei-chieh started off with the first half of a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope":

My handsome lover naturally stands out among his kind,²
But my halcyon-hued coverlet is cold and I am desolate and alone.
Since we parted, I think of him by day and yearn for him at night,³
I yearn for him, wondering when we will ever meet again.
When I do meet with my lover, it will be just as before,
Just as before.

It was then Wu Yin-erh's turn to sing the first half of a song to the tune "Sutra in Letters of Gold":

Where has the flower-lover gone?
The red petals have fallen, spring is over.
I have already climbed the lofty tower and leaned over all twelve balustrades,
All twelve balustrades.⁴

Han Yü-ch'uan then sang the first half of a song to the tune "Stopping the Clouds in Flight":

Depressed, I lean over the balustrade,⁵
The swallows and orioles, I am reluctant to watch.
Who has broken the commandment against adultery?
Who has grown accustomed to spectral visitations?⁶

Tung Chiao-erh continued with the first half of a song to the tune "River Water, with Two Variations":

My flowerlike countenance and moonlike allure⁷ have faded completely away.
The double gates are always closed.
It is just the time when the east wind is chilly,⁸ Fine rain sprinkles continuously,⁹ and Fallen red petals by the thousands dot the ground.¹⁰

Li Kuei-chieh continued with the first half of a song to the tune "Prelude to Painted Eyebrows":

Since the last time I met my handsome lover,
My silver psaltery is covered with dust and I am reluctant to touch it.
Although we are only separated by a matter of feet,
It feels as though we are at opposite ends of the sky.
I remember a hundred instances of his kindness,
And cannot recall the slightest case of deceptive conduct on his part.

Wu Yin-erh continued with the first half of a song to the tune "Red Embroidered Slippers":

On the surface of the water there was a pair of mandarin ducks,
Beside the bank of the river, following each other in close formation.¹¹
How could they have foreseen that a fishing boat would separate them, Making them fly off in different directions?

Han Yü-ch'uan continued with the first half of a song to the tune "Playful Children":

Ever since he left, I have become haggard and emaciated.
I have never before been sick for so long.
When my talented lover went away,¹² it had just become spring;
But before I know it, the geese have flown, and it is already midautumn.¹³

Tung Chiao-erh continued with the first half of a song to the tune "Confronting the Dressing Mirror":

At the present time,
The strings on the jasper-inlaid zither are broken,¹⁴ there is no one to listen to them.
When the blossoms are most beautiful,
Who is there with whom to enjoy them?

Li Kuei-chieh continued with the first half of a song to the tune “Shrouding the Southern Branch”:

Outside my gauze window,
The moon is setting.
I am always yearning for that man of mine,
Unable to get him out of my mind.
On my behalf, you utterly exhaust your strength and heart;
On your behalf, I secretly wipe away the pearly tears.

Wu Yin-erh continued with the first half of a song to the tune “The Cassia Sprig Is Fragrant”:

His heart is like a willow catkin,¹⁵
Flying wherever the wind takes it.
It turns out that his intentions are false and his reputation undeserved;
But he has induced me to cater to him with sincere devotion.¹⁶

Han Yü-ch'uan then resumed by singing the second half of the song to the tune “Sheep on the Mountain Slope”:

He is solicitous of jade and considerate of fragrance.¹⁷
He and I lay face to face underneath the hibiscus bed curtains,¹⁸
Where we revealed every detail of our innermost feelings to each other.
Speaking of our emotions at separation, how could you have abandoned me?
It makes me so mad I'm half drunk and half crazy.
How could you have had such a change of heart as to pick up with another soul mate?
When will we ever be able to arrange another assignation, another assignation?
If we really meet again, it will be just like a dream.

Tung Chiao-erh then sang the second half of the song to the tune “Sutra in Letters of Gold”:

Though I wipe them away,
Tears have stained my silk handkerchief.
On the southern bank of the river,
The setting sun reveals hills beyond the hills.¹⁹

Li Kuei-chieh then sang the second half of the song to the tune “Stopping the Clouds in Flight”:

Ch'a!
I have sent him letters two or three times,
But it has been difficult to see him.
I'd better take up my frosty brush,
And write out another dubious indictment;
But the ink is not dry on the page of loving feelings I have already expressed.²⁰

Wu Yin-erh then sang the second half of the song to the tune “River Water, with Two Variations”:

I am too indolent to burn another coil of incense,
And reluctant to pick up my needle.
My emaciated body is cadaverous,
Beset as it is by spectral visitations.²¹
When I reexamine the old feelings that we had for each other,
Sorrow weighs down the turquoise peaks of my painted eyebrows;
Which only serves to arouse the distaste of my young lover,
So that, for some time, despite the orioles and the flowers, I have not bothered to roll up my curtain.

Han Yü-ch'uan then sang the second half of the song to the tune “Prelude to Painted Eyebrows”:

When I think of the affectionate words he uttered when we shared the same pillow,
I can't help feeling a shuddering of the flesh and benumbing of the body.

Tung Chiao-erh then sang the second half of the song to the tune “Red Embroidered Slippers”:

One of us headed for the east,
The other flew toward the west;
Which left me languishing in the south,
While he set off for the north.

Li Kuei-chieh then sang the second half of the song to the tune “Playful Children”:

While you're there within the bed-curtains of gold lamé cuddling the red and hugging the turquoise,²²
I'm here clandestinely letting the tears flow as I keep solitary vigil in my fragrant boudoir.²³
I remember the vows of fidelity that you swore,
But they have faded from your fickle mind as quickly as the lantern gutters out.
The evidence against you is still on record in the Temple of the God of the Sea.²⁴

Wu Yin-erh then sang the second half of the song to the tune “Confronting the Dressing Mirror”:

Who is there with whom to pour the vintage wine?
Our feelings have come to naught, like a pitcher that has fallen down a well.

We are as unlikely to see each other as Orion and Antares ²⁵
Since we became separated years and months have gone by.
I have calculated the date of your return so often I have worn away the golden tip of my comb.

Han Yü-ch'uan then sang the second half of the song to the tune "Shrouding the Southern Branch":

On either side we have been disturbed at heart.
How could we have known that the wind would sweep the clouds away,
So that tonight the full moon would shine forth once more,
Permitting my lover once again to unfasten my fragrant silk raiment?
In discussing our feelings, the question of who was unfaithful to whom,
Is something I will have to demand a clarification of from you.

Tung Chiao-erh then sang the second half of the song to the tune "The Cassia Sprig Is Fragrant":

How could he ever have forgotten that time in the past when he swore to be as faithful as the hills?
He has buried me alive,
That lover of mine.
Since he has abandoned me here,
When will we be able to make love again?

Li Kuei-chieh then concluded by singing the Coda:

Embroidered silk slippers, but half a span in length;
When his eyes catch sight of them, his amorous feelings are aroused.
My delectable and talented lover, let's forgo any further recriminations.
Hurry up and embrace this shapely body of mine.

When they had finished singing, Hsi-men Ch'ing paid Han Yü-ch'uan and Tung Chiao-erh for their services, and the two of them said their farewells and departed, but he instructed Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh to stay overnight.

All of a sudden, a commotion became audible in the front compound and, before they knew it, Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung came in, dragging Hsia-hua, the maidservant from Li Chiao-erh's quarters, along with them, and reported to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "After escorting the two singing girls to the gate just now, we took a lantern into the stable to prepare the fodder for the horses, when what should we see but Hsia-hua hiding under the manger, which gave us quite a start. We don't know what she was doing there, and when we asked her, she refused to answer."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he said, "Where is that slave? Bring her over here."

Thereupon, he strode into the corridor outside the parlor and sat down in a chair, while the maidservant was hustled into his presence and forced to kneel down in front of him.

Hsia-hua Is Found under the Manger with the Stolen Gold

When Hsi-men Ch'ing demanded to know why she had gone out to the front compound, she refused to answer.

Li Chiao-erh chimed in from the sidelines, saying, "I didn't send you on any errand. Whatever were you up to, going out to the stable, for no good reason?"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw what a state of panic the girl was in, he assumed that she had been trying to run away and ordered the servants to search her person, but she resisted being searched. Thereupon, Ch'in-t'ung dragged her down with a tug, when what should they hear but a tinkling sound as an object that had been concealed in her waist fell to the ground. Hsi-men Ch'ing asked what it was, and when Tai-an handed it to him:

Strange as it may seem,
it turned out to be a gold bracelet.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had examined it by lamplight, he said, "It's that gold bracelet that disappeared a while ago and couldn't be found anywhere. So it turns out that this slave had stolen it."

Hsia-hua protested that she had only picked it up, but when Hsi-men Ch'ing demanded to know where she had picked it up, she remained silent. This enraged Hsi-men Ch'ing, and he forthwith ordered Ch'in-t'ung to go to the front compound and fetch the finger squeezers. In no time at all, the maidservant's fingers were put in the squeezers and squeezed until she:

Howled like a stuck pig.

After she had been squeezed for a while, he ordered that the squeezers should be struck twenty times. Yüeh-niang saw that her husband was drunk and did not dare to interfere.

Unable to bear the pain any longer, the maidservant finally said, "I picked it up off the floor in the Sixth Lady's quarters."

Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing order the squeezers removed, after which he instructed Li Chiao-erh, "Take her back to your room and, tomorrow, call in a go-between to take her away and sell her. What would we want to keep a slave like this around for anyway?"

Li Chiao-erh was initially at a loss for words, after which she finally said, "You lousy slave! Whoever told you to go out to the front compound? As long as I'm maintaining you, you should ask my permission before doing anything, instead of sneaking out there without anyone knowing about it. If you picked up that gold bracelet in her room, you should have told me about it."

When Hsia-hua merely continued to cry, Li Chiao-erh said to her, "Slave that you are, you might just as well have been squeezed to death, for all I care. Still crying are you?"

"That's enough of that," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, after which he turned the gold bracelet over to Yüeh-niang to put away and went out to Li P'ing-erh's quarters in the front compound.

When the page boys had all left, Yüeh-niang ordered Hsiao-yü to close the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds and then turned to Yü-hsiao and asked, "Did that maidservant actually go out to the front compound on that occasion?"

"When the Second Lady and the Third Lady," reported Yü-hsiao, "accompanied Sister-in-law Wu and her daughter-in-law, Third Sister Cheng, to the Sixth Lady's place, she went along with them. Who could have anticipated that she would steal this gold bracelet without anyone's knowing it? A while ago, when she overheard Mother saying that Father had sent a page boy out to buy a wolf's sinew, she was frightened to death. She asked me in the kitchen what a wolf's sinew was, which gave all of us a laugh, and we told her, 'A wolf's sinew, no doubt, is a sinew from the body of a wolf. If anyone has stolen something, and the wolf's sinew is applied to him, it will wrap itself around the guilty person's body and bind his hands and feet together.' I imagine that, when she heard what we said, she panicked, and took advantage of the departure of the singing girls tonight, to sneak out there in the endeavor to run away. When she saw that there were people at the front gate, she must have ducked into the stable and tried to hide under the manger, but ended up being spotted by the page boys and dragged out into the open."

Yüeh-niang said:

"How is one to judge what people are really like?²⁶

Who would have thought that such a young maidservant would turn out to be:

Like a furtive thieving rat, and not a proper person at all?"

To resume our story, Li Chiao-erh led Hsia-hua back to her quarters, and, that evening, Li Kuei-chieh took her severely to task, saying, "It turns out that you're nothing but an uncouth youngster. For someone who is fourteen or fifteen years old, and knows something about human behavior, how could you be so stupid? Even in the licensed quarter where I work, that sort of thing would never be countenanced. There's no one else here, so I can speak frankly. If you pick up something, you should bring it back to your room and turn it over inconspicuously to your mistress. Then, if the matter should come to light, she would be able to intervene on your behalf. How could you fail to say so much as a word to her about it? What did it feel like to be put in the squeezers and beaten like that just now? A fine maidservant you are! As the saying goes:

If you don the black livery of a servant,

You must cling to even the blackest post.

If you weren't assigned to her quarters, it wouldn't matter, but when you are subjected to the third degree the way you just were, how do you suppose it reflects on your mistress's standing in the household?"

She then went on to take her aunt to task, saying, "You're really hopeless! If it had been me, I would never have let him subject a maidservant of mine to the squeezers in front of everybody that way. If she were at fault, I would drag her back to my own room and give her a caning myself. How is it that none of the maidservants from the front compound were put in the squeezers, and it was only a maidservant from your quarters that was subjected to the third degree? You allow yourself to be taken advantage of, as though:

You haven't any breath in your own nostrils.²⁷

If you wait until tomorrow, are you really going to let him get rid of your maidservant that way, without saying a word about it? If you won't say anything about it, I will. Anything would be better than letting her be taken off that way, and making yourself a laughingstock to the others. Just take a look at the one named Meng and the one named P'an. The two of them are just like a pair of vixens. You're not very likely to get the better of them."

She then called Hsia-hua over and asked her, "Do you want to leave, or not to leave?"

"I don't want to leave," the maidservant replied.

"If you don't leave," said Li Kuei-chieh, "in the future, you'll have to pay closer attention to your mistress's interests. In all matters, you must strive to be:

Of one heart and one mind, with her. No matter what you might pick up, turn it over to her, so that she will treat you with the same favor that she does Yüan-hsiao."

"Your instructions are duly noted," said Hsia-hua.

Let us put the chiding addressed to Hsia-hua aside for a moment and say no more about it.

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing went out to Li P'ing-erh's quarters in the front compound, what should he find but Li P'ing-erh and Wu Yin-erh sitting together on the k'ang.

All he wanted to do was to get undressed and go to bed, but Li P'ing-erh said, "Since Wu Yin-erh is here, there's no place to put you. You'd better go next door."

"What do you mean there's no place to put me?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The two of you, mother and daughter, can lie down on either side, and I'll go to sleep between you."

Li P'ing-erh gave him a look, saying, "Now you're getting vulgar."

"Well, where am I to sleep then?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"You can go next door to Sister Six's place to sleep tonight," said Li P'ing-erh.

After sitting with them for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing got up to go, saying, "All right. All right. At least that will prevent me from disturbing the two of you any further. I might as well go over there to sleep then."

Thereupon, he went straight over to Chin-lien's quarters. When Chin-lien realized that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come in, she felt:

Just as though he had fallen from Heaven.

She came forward to help him off with his outer garments and girdle, provided a clean set of bedding:

Spread out the mermaid silk covers, and Deftly positioned the coral pillow.

After a serving of tea, the two of them went to bed for the night. But no more of this.

Meanwhile, at Li P'ing-erh's place, after she had seen Hsi-men Ch'ing on his way, she and Wu Yin-erh sat down, face to face, at a k'ang table, set out the black and white pieces on the board, and proceeded to play a game of elephant chess by lamplight.

"Prepare two cups of tea," she instructed Ying-ch'un, "bring a box of assorted delicacies, and decant a flagon of that sweet Chin-hua wine for me to share with Sister Yin-erh."

"Would you like some rice, Sister Yin-erh?" she went on to ask. "I can have her bring some rice for you to eat."

"Mother, I'm not hungry," Wu Yin-erh replied. "Don't have her bring anything for me."

"All right," said Li P'ing-erh. "Since Sister Yin-erh doesn't want any rice, get four of those stuffed pastries out of my cabinet, and bring them here in a box lid for Yin-erh to eat."

In a little while, Ying-ch'un brought in four saucers of side dishes, one of the fermented brawn from a set of pig's trotters, one of salted chicken, one of poached eggs, and one of sautéed bean sprouts and jellyfish, in addition to which there were also a box of assorted fancy nuts, and a box of stuffed pastries, which were all put down beside them.

It did not take long for Li P'ing-erh and Wu Yin-erh to finish three games of elephant chess, after which the wine was poured, and the two of them proceeded to drink together from silver cups.

At this point, Wu Yin-erh said, "Sister Ying-ch'un, if you would hand me my p'i-p'a, I'll sing a song for your mistress's entertainment."

"Sister, I'd rather you didn't sing," said Li P'ing-erh. "The little gentleman is asleep, and if his father should happen to hear the singing from next door, he'd scold me for it. We can play at dice instead."

Thereupon, she told Ying-ch'un to fetch the dice box, and the two of them proceeded to enjoy themselves casting dice, with the loser having to down a cup of wine as a forfeit.

After they had played with the dice for a while, Wu Yin-erh said, "Sister Ying-ch'un, why don't you step into the other room and invite the wet nurse to come over here and have a cup of wine."

Two Beauties Enjoy a Game of Elephant Chess by Lamplight

"She's lying on the k'ang in there with the baby in her arms," said Yingch'un.

"Tell her to stay where she is with the baby in her arms," said Li P'ing-erh, "but take a cup of wine over there for her. That ought to do. You don't know about it, but this little gentleman is rather hypersensitive. If you try to leave him, he's sure to wake up. One day, when he was asleep on my side of the k'ang, and his father presumed to start something with me, he opened his eyes wide and woke up, just as if he was aware of what was going on. I had the wet nurse take him into the other room, but all he would do was cry, and insist on my holding him."

"Now that you've got this baby boy," Wu Yin-erh laughed, "it seems that Father and you can't even spend a satisfactory night together any more. How often does Father pay a visit to your room?"

"There's no telling," said Li P'ing-erh. "He doesn't always stop at one, or even two visits, but drops in to see him all the time. It ought not to matter that he comes to see the child this way, but the fact that he comes here so often has had the effect of filling certain persons to bursting with rage, and induced them to utter the direst imprecations against the child and his father behind their backs. As for me, it goes without saying that I am nothing but an object of obloquy. It's not as though he and I are up to anything in particular. I'd really rather he didn't come here so often. Whenever he does, the next day people indicate by looks and grimaces that they think I'm monopolizing their husband. Why do you suppose, when he came in here just now, I urged him to go somewhere else?"

"Sister Yin-erh, you may not know it, but in this household:

When people are many, tongues are many.²⁸

Take today, for instance. When that gold bracelet disappeared, fortunately you were here to see it yourself, a certain person, out of spite, went to the rear compound and did her best to incite the First Lady against me, raising suspicions about the fact that the gold was brought into my quarters, and it was in my room that the bracelet disappeared. Later on, it was only after it was disclosed that the maidservant from the Second Lady's quarters had stolen it, that the:

Blue or red, black or white, of the situation finally became clear. Had that not been the case, even without any other funny business, things looked bad enough for the maidservants in my room and the wet nurse. And Old Mother Feng was so upset she started to cry, threatening to commit suicide, and saying, 'If the gold bracelet is not found, I'm not going to go anywhere.' And, in fact, it was not until the bracelet turned up, later on, that she consented to leave the premises, and, taking a lantern, set off for home."

"Mother," said Wu Yin-erh, "if that's the way it is, out of consideration for Father, all you can do is look after the child as best you can, and let things take their course. Whatever happens, you'll just have to:

Deal with matters as they occur.²⁹

As for the First Lady in the rear compound, so long as she doesn't have anything to say against you, that's that. The problem is that the others, on seeing that you have given birth to a son, can't help being somewhat put out. As long as Father takes charge of the situation, things ought to be all right."

"If it weren't for the consideration shown by Father and the First Lady," said Li P'ing-erh, "the child would not have lived to this day."

As they were talking together, what with:

First a cup for you,

Then a cup for me,

without their realizing it, it was the third watch of the night before they went to bed. Truly:

When a favored guest arrives, one's feelings can never be satiated;

When a real confidante shows up, conversation is mutually agreeable.³⁰

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Within the painted boudoir a bright moon traverses the shutters;
As beauties, keeping each other company, spend the night together.
Who could be anything but enamored of their jade bones and icy flesh?
A sprig of plum blossoms projects its shadow through the unending night.

Chapter 45

LI KUEI-CHIEH REQUESTS

THE RETENTION OF HSIA-HUA;

WU YÜEH-NIANG IN A FIT OF ANGER

CURSES AT TAI-AN

As a fancy name, it has been designated the king of all the flowers;¹
The miraculous appearance of its icy flesh sets it apart from its rivals.
Its seductiveness enhanced by the sunlight,
it displays its pure allure;
Its cool limpidity transported by the wind diffuses a chaste fragrance.
Its jade countenance need not envy the ladies who affect teary complexions;²
Its snowy visage cannot help but remind one of the powder-faced gentleman.³
With sandalwood clappers and golden goblets⁴ its qualities are celebrated;
What need is there to boast of Mr. Wei's Purples and Mr. Yao's Yellows?⁵

THE STORY GOES that because Hsi-men Ch'ing was on holiday he did not go to the yamen that day. When he got up in the morning, he went to the front reception hall to look on as Tai-an prepared two table settings of food for the Ch'iao family, one of them to be delivered to Madame Ch'iao the Fifth, and the other to the wife of Ch'iao Hung. Both of them were replete with:

High-stacked pyramids of square-shaped confectionery, assortments of the giblets of domestic fowl, seasonal fruits, and the like. Madame Ch'iao the Fifth rewarded Tai-an with two handkerchiefs and three candareens of silver, and Ch'iao Hung's wife gave him a bolt of black silk, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

It so happens that Ying Po-chüeh, upon taking leave of Hsi-men Ch'ing the day before, had gone straight to the home of Huang the Fourth. Huang the Fourth, for his part, had already arranged with his associates to seal up the sum of ten taels of silver to thank Ying Po-chüeh for his services.

"His Honor told us to come back after the Lantern Festival is over," said Huang the Fourth. "From what he said, it sounded as though he might be willing to renegotiate the contract for the remaining five hundred taels that we owe him. We can hardly manage without the use of that sum of money."

"How much more do you need right now?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"Brother Li the Third doesn't know any better," said Huang the Fourth, "and wants to try to borrow it from some eunuch or other. But it would still cost us 5 percent interest per month. It seems to me that it would be better if we could borrow it here, and thereby take advantage of the prestige of his yamen. Even if we have to expend something, both high and low, it would still end up costing us less. Right now, if he can be induced to put up another fifty ingots of silver, it would make it a contract for an even thousand taels, and simplify the calculation of the monthly interest payments."

When Ying Po-chüeh had heard him out, he nodded his head and said, "That's no problem. But if I succeed in persuading him to do this on your behalf, how will you and your associates, the six of you, reward me for my efforts?"

"I will take it up with Li the Third," said Huang the Fourth, "and persuade our associates to give you an additional five taels of silver."

"You can forget about any five taels," said Ying Po-chüeh. "With the skills that I possess, those five taels of yours mean nothing to me. But if you rely on my ingenuity to persuade him with a single word, I'll have to be included in the deal. Today, my wife has gone to his place to attend a party, but I won't be going there myself. Tomorrow evening, however, I've been invited to a lantern-viewing party there. The two of you, first thing tomorrow morning, should supply yourselves with four kinds of delicacies, and also a jug of Chin-hua wine. Don't bother to engage the services of any singing girls, because Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh are already there and haven't gone home yet. You can hire six players of wind and percussion instruments from the licensed quarter. If I escort you over there, he's sure to invite you to sit down for a visit. Then, by putting in no more than:

A single word or half a sentence,⁶ from the sidelines, I guarantee that I will persuade him to do as you wish. If he agrees to come up with another five hundred taels of silver and renegotiate the contract for an even thousand taels, at the very most you'll owe him fifty taels of silver per month. What does that amount to after all? It would cost you that much to keep a mistress for a month. As the saying goes:

An undissembling scholar may well exist, but there is no such thing as unadulterated varnish.⁷

When you turn over the consignment of goods you have contracted to purvey, you can mix some sawdust in with the incense and adulterate the wax with juniper oil. Who will know the difference? After all:

You're not out to catch fish,

But only to muddy the waters.⁸

The best way to proceed is to avail yourself of his reputation."

Thereupon, their plan having been decided upon, the next day, Li the Third and Huang the Fourth actually purchased the wine and gifts and turned them over to Ying Po-chüeh, who escorted their two servants on the way to deliver them to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was still in the front reception hall taking care of the dispatch of the complimentary table settings, when Ying Po-chüeh showed up and said, "My wife put you to a lot of trouble yesterday and was late returning home."

"I went to a party at Commandant Chou Hsiu's place yesterday," said Hsimen Ch'ing, "and it was already the first watch of the night before I got home. So I didn't even have a chance to see my new relatives, who, I was told, had departed some time earlier. This morning, being on holiday, I did not have to go to the yamen, but, rather than going to see them, I have sent two table settings to the houses of my Ch'iao relatives."

When he had finished speaking, he sat down.

Ying Po-chüeh then called for Li Chin, the servant from Li the Third's household who had accompanied him, and said, "Bring in the gifts."

The two servants then carried in the gifts and put them down just inside the ceremonial gate leading into the second courtyard.

"Brothers Li the Third and Huang the Fourth," said Ying Po-chüeh, "have repeatedly told me of their sense of obligation for the great favor they have received from you. On this festive occasion, not having anything else to offer, they have purchased some insignificant gifts as a humble offering for you to give away to someone if you like."

What should they see at this juncture, but the two servants, who proceeded to come forward, prostrate themselves on the ground, and kowtow.

"What did you have to bring these gifts for?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It would not be right for me to accept them. Tell them to carry them back where they came from."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "for you to refuse to accept these gifts of theirs, and insist on having them returned to the donors, would be a very ugly gesture. They also wanted to engage the services of some singing girls to come and wait on you, but I put a stop to that. They have, however, hired six players of wind and percussion instruments, who are waiting outside at this moment."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered, "Have them called inside for me."

In no time at all, the six musicians were summoned into their presence and knelt down in front of him.

"Since their services have already been engaged," said Hsi-men Ch'ing to Ying Po-chüeh, "I can hardly send them back where they came from. The appropriate thing to do would be to invite the two of them over for a visit."

This was just the signal Ying Po-chüeh had been waiting for, and he promptly called Li Chin over and instructed him, "When you get home, tell your master that His Honor has accepted his gifts and is not going to send anyone with a formal invitation, but that he would like your master and Master Huang the Fourth to come over as soon as possible for a visit."

Li Chin assented to these instructions and withdrew. Before long, the gifts were duly put away, Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Tai-an to reward the two servants with a candareen of silver apiece, and they kowtowed and departed. The six players of wind and percussion instruments stood in attendance in the courtyard below.

In a little while, Ch'i-t'ung brought in a serving of tea, and Hsi-men Ch'ing kept Ying Po-chüeh company as they drank it.

Ch'i-t'ung then said, "The food is ready. Where would you like to eat it?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by ushering Ying Po-chüeh over to the ante-room on the west side of the courtyard, where they took their seats.

He then went on to ask Ying Po-chüeh, "You didn't happen to run into Hsieh Hsi-ta today, did you?"

"I had no sooner gotten up this morning," said Ying Po-chüeh, "than Li the Third showed up at my place and arranged with me to take care of having the gifts delivered here. How could I have had the spare time to meet with him?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing then directed Ch'i-t'ung, "Quickly go and invite Master Hsieh to come join us."

In no time at all, Shu-t'ung set up a table and prepared it for their repast, while Hua-t'ung brought in four portions of appetizers in a square box coated with translucent lacquer. These were served in dainty diminutive picnic saucers, decorated with patterns both inside and out. There was one saucer of delectably tasty squash and eggplant julienne marinated with ten spices, one saucer of a sweet-flavored assortment of pickled beans, one saucer of redo-lently fragrant orange conserve, and one saucer of fragrant bamboo shoots preserved in fermented red mash. There were also four large serving bowls containing main dishes. One bowl of stewed singed sheep's head, one bowl of marinated broiled duck, one bowl of blanched celery cabbage, egg, and wonton soup, and one bowl of yams with red-cooked minced-pork meatballs. At either end of the table there were set out ivory chopsticks inlaid with gold. In front of Ying Po-chüeh there was a bowl of fresh polished white rice, and in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing there was a cup of fragrant congee made from nonglutinous rice.

After the two of them had consumed their repast, the utensils were cleared away, and the table was wiped clean, Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ying Po-chüeh continued to sit where they were, playing at backgammon, with the loser having to down a cup of wine as a forfeit.

Taking advantage of the fact that Hsieh Hsi-ta had not showed up yet, Ying Po-chüeh seized the occasion to ask, "Brother, how much silver do you propose to advance to Li Chih and Huang the Fourth tomorrow?"

"I plan to retrieve the old contract and renegotiate a new one for the five hundred taels of silver they still owe me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "That ought to do it."

"That would be all right, I guess," opined Ying Po-chüeh, "but it would really be better if you could see your way to advance them enough additional capital to make a round thousand taels. It would make it easier to calculate the interest in the future. And I also have another suggestion. Since you really have no use for those gold bracelets they gave you, if you were to throw them in at a valuation of a hundred and fifty taels, you wouldn't have to come up with much in the way of additional cash."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had heard him out, he said, "What you say makes a lot of sense. I'll advance them another three hundred and fifty taels tomorrow, then, and renegotiate the contract for an even thousand taels. That way I won't be so improvident as to let the gold sit idly at home."

As the two of them were playing backgammon together, Tai-an suddenly came in and announced, "Pen the Fourth has brought in a large marble standing screen, inlaid with mother-of-pearl, together with a bronze gong, and a bronze drum, complete with their stands and knockers. He says that they belong to the household of that distaff relative of the imperial family, Hsiang the Fifth, who wants to pawn them for thirty taels of silver. Is Father willing to agree to that or not?"

"Tell Pen the Fourth to bring them in for me to see," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Before long, Pen the Fourth, with the aid of two assistants, carried them in and set them down in the reception hall. Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ying Pochüeh gave up their game of backgammon and came over to look at them. It so happens that the principal object was a three-foot-wide, five-foot-tall, marble standing screen, suitable for being displayed upon a table, inlaid with mother-of-pearl and decorated with gold tracery, the pattern in the marble being such that:

The black and white were distinctly defined.⁹

After Ying Po-chüeh had contemplated the objects for a while, he said deliberately to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Brother, just take a good look at these things. The pattern in the marble resembles a lion couchant, protector of the house, and the two stands for the bronze gong and the bronze drum are sumptuously decorated with varicolored designs and cloud patterns carved in relief, the workmanship of which is truly outstanding."

Doing his best to expedite things from the sidelines, he continued, "Brother, you really ought to accept these objects that he is offering to pawn with you. Even leaving out of account the bronze gong and drum with their two stands, this screen alone is something you could hardly hope to buy for fifty taels of silver."

Hsi-men Ch'ing Accepts the Pawning of a Bronze Gong and Drum

"There is no way of knowing whether or not he is likely to redeem them in the future," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Needless to say," opined Ying Po-chüeh, "he is hardly likely to redeem them. His affairs are like a cart on the downward slope. And if he waits as long as three years, the accumulated interest would probably be equal to the capital."

"All right then," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Have my son-in-law in the shop up front weigh out thirty taels of silver for him."

As soon as he had sent Pen the Fourth on his way, Hsi-men Ch'ing had the standing screen wiped clean, positioned it at the upper end of the large reception hall, and proceeded to examine it from left and right. Indeed, he found, the golds and greens of the varicolored clouds blended their hues harmoniously.

"Have those musicians had something to eat yet?" he then went on to ask.

"They're being fed down below right now," said Ch'in-t'ung.

"Tell them, when they're finished eating," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "to come and let us hear them play."

Thereupon, a great drum was carried into the reception hall, the bronze gong and bronze drum were set up in the corridor, and the musicians commenced to play. Truly:

The sound shakes the cloudy empyrean;

The tones startle both fish and birds.¹⁰

As they were playing, who should appear but Ch'i-t'ung, with Hsieh Hsi-ta in his wake, who came in and bowed to the two of them.

"Hsieh Hsi-ta," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "come over here and see what you think this standing screen is worth."

Hsieh Hsi-ta stepped up and proceeded to examine it for some time, uttering no end of exaggerated praise as he did so, saying, "Brother, even if you were able to strike a bargain, you must have paid at least a hundred taels of silver for this standing screen. If you had offered any less, they would have refused to sell it."

"Would you believe it?" said Ying Po-chüeh. "Even with that bronze gong and bronze drum out there thrown in, complete with their two stands and knockers, he paid only thirty taels of silver for them altogether."

Clapping his hands together, Hsieh Hsi-ta exclaimed, "Amitü-bha be praised! Where could one ever find such a bargain? Including capital and interest, even if you leave the standing screen out of account, thirty taels of silver would hardly suffice to purchase this bronze gong and bronze drum, together with their stands. Just look at the workmanship of these stands. The cinnabar-red painted lacquer is all done in accord with official specifications, and the instruments themselves must contain, at the very least, some forty catties of resounding bronze, which must be worth a pretty penny. No wonder they say:

Every object has its rightful owner.¹¹

Who else could hope to have such great good fortune as yours, that a bargain like this should just happen to come your way?"

After they had chatted for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing invited them to have a seat in his studio, and, before long, Li Chih and Huang the Fourth also showed up.

"Why did the two of you go to the trouble of sending me gifts?" said Hsimen Ch'ing. "It would hardly be right for me to accept them."

This threw Li Chih and Huang the Fourth into such a state of consternation that they kowtowed, saying, "Pray don't embarrass us. These insignificant things are only indiscriminate tokens for you to give away to someone if you like. We could hardly presume not to respond to Your Honor's summons."

Thereupon, seats were provided for them, and they sat down to one side. Shortly thereafter, the page boy Hua-t'ung brought in five cups of tea, and, after they had drunk them, he took the cups and their raised saucers away.

A little later, Tai-an came up and asked, "Father, where would you like me to set up the table?"

"Bring the table in here," directed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "We might as well remain where we are."

Thereupon, Tai-an and Hua-t'ung between them managed to carry in an Eight Immortals table finished with agateware lacquer and set it down on the floor over a charcoal brazier. Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta took the seats of honor at the head of the table, Hsi-men Ch'ing occupied the host's position opposite them, and Li Chih and Huang the Fourth sat down at either side. Shortly thereafter, a plate of assorted cold hors d'oeuvres suitable to accompany a drinking party was brought in, along with soup, rice, and other delicacies, served in:

Large platters and large bowls, consisting of goose, duck, chicken feet, and every other kind of side dish.

The finest of Yang-kao vintages is decanted;

The soup appears afloat with peach blossoms.

The musicians continued to play outside the windows, and Hsi-men Ch'ing asked Wu Yin-erh to serve the wine. But we will say no more, for the time being, about this drinking party in the front compound.

To continue our story, the male servant from Li Kuei-chieh's establishment and the maidservant, La-mei, from Wu Yin-erh's place, having engaged sedan chairs for the purpose, came to take their mistresses back home. When Li Kuei-chieh heard that the servant had arrived, she hurried out to the front gate and engaged him in a surreptitious conversation for some time, after which she returned to the master suite to say goodbye and explain that she needed to go home.

Wu Yüeh-niang repeatedly urged her to stay, saying, "We're all about to go to the home of my sister-in-law and are prepared to take both of you with us. If it gets too late, you can set off from their place, without any need for sedan chairs, and make your way home by joining the rest of us in 'walking off the hundred ailments.'"

"Mother, you don't understand," said Li Kuei-chieh. "There's no one to be relied upon at home. My elder sister is not there, and moreover, my fifth maternal aunt has invited a lot of people for a 'hamper party.'¹² My mother is really anxious to have me there and was expecting me all day yesterday. If she weren't so concerned, she wouldn't have sent the servant to fetch me. Under ordinary circumstances, if you invited me to stay several days, I'd be happy to do so."

When Yüeh-niang realized that she would not stay, she told Yü-hsiao to take the two trays from the gift box she had originally brought with her, fill one of them with Lantern Festival dumplings, and the other with sugar crisps, and then give it to the servant from her establishment to carry. She also gave Li Kuei-chieh a tael of silver and allowed her to make an early departure. After Kuei-chieh had said goodbye to Yüeh-niang and the others, her aunt accompanied her to the front compound and told Hua-t'ung to carry her felt bag for her. When she came by the door to the studio in the front courtyard, she told Tai-an to ask Hsi-men Ch'ing to come out and speak to her.

Cautiously lifting aside the portiere, Tai-an went inside the studio and extended the invitation to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Kuei-chieh is about to go home and would like to have a word with you."

"Do you mean to say that little whore Li Kuei-chieh hasn't left yet?" said Ying Po-chüeh.

"She's not going home until today," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He then stepped outside, where he saw that Li Kuei-chieh was wearing a jacket that opened down the middle, made of lilac-colored Lu-chou silk with purpled edging, over a skirt of white glazed damask with a wide varicolored drawnwork border, and had a white satin kerchief shot with turquoise wrapped around her head.

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze;

Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying,

she knelt down in front of him and kowtowed four times, saying, "I've put Father and Mother to a lot of trouble."

"Why don't you go home tomorrow?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"There's no one to look after things at home," said Kuei-chieh. "My mother has sent the servant with a sedan chair to fetch me."

"There is also another matter that I'd like to take up with you," she went on to say. "With regard to that child in my aunt's quarters, you really oughtn't to have her taken away. My aunt has already punished her last night with a few strokes of the cane. If you consider the situation, she's still young and doesn't really understand how to behave. I gave her a real talking to, and from now on her conduct will be reformed. She won't dare do anything like that again. It's not so much that I object to your getting rid of her, but if my aunt is left with no one to wait on her during a major festival like this, wouldn't you be troubled by it? It's always been the case that:

Though the wooden ladle or the fire tongs may be short,

They're still better than having to use your hands.¹³

Father, whatever you do, for my sake, allow this maidservant to remain in your household."

"Since you have spoken up for her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll keep the slave after all."

Turning to Tai-an, he said, "Go to the rear compound and tell the First Lady not to send for a go-between."

Noticing that Hua-t'ung was standing by with Kuei-chieh's felt bag, Tai-an said, "Have him give me Kuei-chieh's felt bag to hold, and send him back to the rear compound to deliver the message."

Hua-t'ung assented and headed straight back to the rear compound.

When Kuei-chieh had finished speaking to Hsi-men Ch'ing, she raised her voice outside the east window and called out, "Beggar Ying, I won't bother to pay my respects to you. Your mother is on her way home."

"Drag that lousy little whore back in here," exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. "Don't let her go. Have her sing a song suite for my delectation."

"You'll have to wait until your mother has the leisure to sing for you," said Kuei-chieh.

"What kind of chaste schemes are the two of you hatching," asked Ying Pochüeh, "that you insist on carrying on a private conversation without letting me in on it? If you let her go home in broad daylight like this, you'll only be benefiting the lousy little whore. She'll have time to take on any number of customers before it gets dark."

"You're delirious, you beggar!" said Kuei-chieh, as she made her exit with a laugh.

Tai-an accompanied her on the way out and saw her into her sedan chair. When he had finished speaking with Kuei-chieh, Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to the rear compound to adjust his toilet.

During his absence, Ying Po-chüeh said to Hsieh Hsi-ta, "This little whore, Li Kuei-chieh, is carrying on just like an escaped convict. Her meretriciousness is more beguiling than ever. As though on a major festival like this she would ever consent to remain at one place if she could help it. She has arranged for the procuress of her establishment to send for her. I wonder who it might be that is waiting for her there."

"Take a guess," said Hsieh Hsi-ta, as he surreptitiously whispered no more than a few sentences:

Thus and thus, and

So and so,

into Ying Po-chüeh's ear.

"Keep your voice down," said Ying Po-chüeh. "Our brother doesn't know anything about it."

In no time at all, they heard the sound of Hsi-men Ch'ing's footsteps, and the two of them ceased speaking.

Taking Wu Yin-erh onto his lap, Ying Po-chüeh then proceeded to pass the same cup of wine back and forth between them, saying as he did so, "This adopted daughter of mine is both gentle and soft, a hundred times better than that little whore from the Li Family Establishment, that not even a dog would want to mess around with."

"What a thing to say, Master Two!" laughed Wu Yin-erh.

Every single person is a unique individual,

A hundred persons are a hundred individuals.

In the space of any particular quarter,

There are both the wise and the foolish.¹⁴

Why insist on comparing one with another? What has Kuei-chieh ever done to annoy you?"

"There's no point in interrogating that lousy dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All he utters is the same old:

Ridiculous blatherskite."

"Don't you worry yourself about anyone else," said Ying Po-chüeh. "Just let me live out my days with this adopted daughter of mine. Daughter, come over here, take up your p'i-p'a, and sing me a song."

Thereupon, Wu Yin-erh:

Neither hastily nor hurriedly,

Deftly extended her jade fingers,

Gently strummed the silken strings, placed the p'i-p'a on her knees, and sang in a low voice a song to the tune "The Willows Dangle Their Gold":

In my heart I am preoccupied,

Unable to eat food or drink tea.¹⁵

It is not easy to relinquish my handsome lover.

I am desolate because I can't get him out of my mind.

I don't even know whose establishment you are visiting now.

If you want to part company with me, at least you could give me a clear statement.

You have utterly abandoned me;

You have utterly deceived me;

But you'd better not think you've heard the last of me.

After Ying Po-chüeh had downed a cup of wine, Wu Yin-erh proffered another to Hsieh Hsi-ta and then proceeded to sing, to the same tune as before:

I am constantly depressed. When will I ever achieve my heart's desire?

I am preoccupied with the thought of my tender-hearted lover.

My sisters do their best to keep me under tight control;

My old mother will not let up on me;

Which makes it look as if I am unable to keep my word.

I don't love you for your jewels or your gold.

The thing that I love, the thing that I love, is just your handsome face.
If we could only be man and wife,
I could die happy,
Because then you and I could satisfy each other's desires.

But we will say no more, for the moment, about how Wu Yin-erh served wine, played her instrument, and sang in the front compound.

To resume our story, Hua-t'ung went back to the rear compound on his errand, where he found that Wu Yüeh-niang was sitting in the master suite together with Meng Yü-lou, Li P'ing-erh, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, Sun Hsüeh-o, and the abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery.

On seeing Hua-t'ung come in, Yüeh-niang was just about to send him after Old Mother Feng in order to take Hsia-hua away, when Hua-t'ung said, "Father has sent me to tell you that he doesn't want you to have her taken away."

"Your father told me to sell her off," said Yüeh-niang. "Why should he not want to sell her now? Tell me the truth. Who was it who suggested to your father that she not be taken away?"

"Just now," said Hua-t'ung, "I was standing by, holding Kuei-chieh's felt bag for her. But when she was just about to leave, she spoke to Father, begging him to let Hsia-hua stay, to deal with her leniently, and not to allow her to be taken away. Father told Tai-an to come back and tell you about it, but Tai-an refused to come inside and, right in front of Father, sent me to come in his stead, took her felt bag away from me, and then proceeded to see Kuei-chieh on her way himself."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she was more than a little annoyed and cursed Tai-an, saying, "Why that double-dealing, ingratiating, treacherous slave! No wonder, when I was originally told to send for a go-between, he said it was Father who had ordered that she be taken away, when all along he was just up to his tricks. And now he's contrived to be the one who sees Kuei-chieh on her way. When he comes back here, I'll have something to say to him."

As she was speaking, whom should she see but Wu Yin-erh, who came in after she had finished singing in the front compound.

"La-mei, the maidservant from your place, has come to fetch you," Yüeh-niang said to her. "Li Kuei-chieh has already gone home. No doubt, you're planning to go home yourself."

"Since you have urged me to stay," said Wu Yin-erh, "if I were to go home, it would only show that:

I wouldn't know a favor if I saw one."

Then, turning to La-mei, she went on to ask, "What did you come for?"

"Mother sent me to see how you were doing," said La-mei.

"There isn't anything going on at home, is there?" Wu Yin-erh asked.

"Nothing at all," La-mei replied.

"Since there's nothing going on," said Wu Yin-erh, "what did you come to fetch me for? You might as well return home. Mother here has urged me to stay, and to join her and the other ladies this evening in visiting her sister-inlaw's place and then 'walking off the hundred ailments' together. I won't come home until getting back from that excursion."

When she had finished speaking, La-mei was about to depart, but Yüeh-niang said, "Call her back so I can see that she has something to eat."

"The First Lady is offering you something to eat," said Wu Yin-erh. If you wait a little, you can take my clothes bag home with you. Tell Mother not to send a sedan chair for me. This evening I'll make my way home on foot."

"Why didn't Wu Hui come?" she went on to ask.

"He's at home suffering from an eye ailment," La-mei said.

"Take La-mei back to the rear compound," Yüeh-niang instructed Yü-hsiao, "and see that she gets provided with two dishes of pork, a plate of steamed dumplings, and a cup of wine. And also take the gift box that she brought with her and replenish it with a tray of Lantern Festival dumplings, and a tray of tea cakes, to take back with her."

It so happens that Wu Yin-erh had left her clothes bag in Li P'ing-erh's quarters, and Li P'ing-erh had already sought out a set of first-class silk brocade clothing, two gold lamé handkerchiefs, and a tael of silver and put them in her felt bag as a gift.

But Wu Yin-erh blithely declined them, saying, "Mother, I don't want these clothes."

"The truth of the matter is, Mother," she continued with an ingratiating smile, "that I don't have a white jacket to wear. If you would take back these silk clothes, could you possibly seek out any kind of old white satin jacket and give it to me instead?"

"My white jackets are all too big for you," said Li P'ing-erh. "You could scarcely wear any of them."

Thereupon, she said to Ying-ch'un, "Take the keys and get a whole bolt of white satin out of my large trunk to give to Yin-erh."

"Tell your mother," she said, "to have a tailor make up two dress jackets for you."

"By the way," she went on to ask, "did you want figured satin or plain?"

"Mother, I'd prefer the plain," replied Wu Yin-erh. "I want something that will go well with a vest."

Then, turning to Ying-ch'un, she said with an ingratiating smile, "I'm putting you to the trouble of going upstairs again on my behalf. In the future, though I have nothing else to offer, I can always entertain you with a song."

In a little while, Ying-ch'un brought down from upstairs a bolt of fine plain white satin, manufactured on a wide loom in Sung-chiang, the label attached to the end of which indicated that it weighed thirty-eight ounces, and handed it to Wu Yin-erh. Yin-erh hastily:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze;
Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying;
Just as though inserting a taper in its holder;

kowtowed to Li P'ing-erh four times. After which, she got to her feet and also bowed deeply to Ying-ch'un eight times.

"Yin-erh," said Li P'ing-erh, "Wrap up this silk clothing and take it along with you too. Sooner or later you may have occasion to wear it to a party."

Wu Yin-erh said, "Mother has not only bestowed this white satin on me to make a jacket out of, but also persuaded me to take this other clothing as well."

Thereupon, she kowtowed to her again to express her gratitude. In no time at all, when La-mei had finished her meal, the gift box and felt bag were entrusted to her, and she set off for home.

Yüeh-niang took the occasion to say, "Yin-erh, this conduct of yours is just the kind I like. See that you don't imitate those meretricious tricks of Li Kueichieh. Yesterday, and again this morning, she carried on just like:

A recalcitrant tiger that refuses to lie down, declining our invitation to stay, and insisting on going home. What's happening at her place that requires her to be there so urgently? She didn't even want to put herself out to sing. When she saw that the servant from her place had come for her, she didn't even have anything to eat before running off, without even waiting to say goodbye to you. See that you don't imitate that conduct of hers."

"Dear Mother!" exclaimed Wu Yin-erh. "What sort of a place is this after all, the residence of Father and Mother? If she had any excess wind in her colon, she should have saved it for somewhere else, rather than presuming to let it off here. But Kuei-chieh is still young, and doesn't know what's what. Mother shouldn't allow herself to be bothered by her."

Li P'ing-erh Contributes a Gift of White Satin to Wu Yin-erh

As they were talking, who should appear but the page boy Lai-ting, who had been sent by Sister-in-law Wu to urge them on their way, saying, "My mistress respectfully requests that Sister-in-law Three, and the other ladies, including Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh, should come over as soon as possible, and that Sun Hsüeh-o should also come along for a visit."

"When you get home," said Yüeh-niang, "say to your mistress, 'We're in the process of getting ready right now. The Second Lady is suffering from pain in her legs, and will not be coming, but stay behind to look after the house. Your brother-in-law is entertaining some guests in the front compound today, leaving hardly anyone in the residential part of the house. The lady from the rear compound will not be coming, and Li Kuei-chieh has already gone home, so that, including Hsi-men Ta-chieh and Wu Yin-erh, there will be six of us in all. You oughtn't to go to any trouble on our behalf. After visiting together a while longer, we'll come over at nightfall.”

“Who have your master and mistress engaged to sing for us?” she went on to ask Lai-ting.

“Big Sister Yü,” Lai-ting replied and, when he had finished speaking, set off ahead of them.

Wu Yüeh-niang then, along with Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ingerh, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and Wu Yin-erh, having spoken to Hsi-men Ch'ing about their arrangements, and instructed the wet nurse to stay at home and look after Kuan-ko, all dressed themselves up to befit the occasion and set off in six sedan chairs. Escorted by Tai-an, Ch'in-t'ung,¹⁶ and Lai-an, along with four orderlies, they proceeded on their way to the home of Sister-in-law Wu. Truly:

In myriads of courtyards the spring prospects are conspicuous;

In thousands of households the lantern lights¹⁷ blaze all night.

In this life nights such as this are seldom to be seen;

Next year where will we see the bright moon on this night?¹⁸

RAIN AND SNOW INTERRUPT A WALK

DURING THE LANTERN FESTIVAL;

WIFE AND CONCUBINES LAUGHINGLY

CONSULT THE TORTOISE ORACLE

In the imperial precincts the prospects are fine
during the Lantern Festival,
Surpassing those in the immortal Isles of the Blest.
Jade dust is stirred into flight,
Escorts clamor around decorated chariot hubs,
Moonlight illuminates the towers and terraces.

In the three palaces¹ this night is a time for rejoicing.
A myriad golden lotus lanterns,
Are scattered about the streets of the capital.
Hoofers parade to the drum all night.
Citizens compete to put up decorated lanterns,
Which are displayed for five consecutive nights.²

THIS LYRIC was composed by a poet of former times in order to celebrate the sights of the Lantern Festival and the prosperity of the people.³

To resume our story, on that day Hsi-men Ch'ing saw Wu Yüeh-niang and the others off on their way to the party at Sister-in-law Wu's place, while asking Li Chih and Huang the Fourth to keep their seats.

Ying Po-chüeh took advantage of his host's absence while he was seeing off the ladies to address them, thus and so, saying, "I have already spoken to him on behalf of you two gentlemen, and he has positively agreed to advance you another five hundred taels of silver tomorrow."

Li Chih and Huang the Fourth bowed in gratitude to Ying Po-chüeh again and again, and, when it became dusk, said goodbye and departed. Ying Pochüeh, for his part, along with Hsieh Hsi-ta, continued to drink with Hsi-men Ch'ing in the antechamber where his studio was located. Whom should they see at this juncture but Li Ming, who lifted aside the portiere and came in.

When Ying Po-chüeh saw him, he said, "So Li Ming has come."

Li Ming knelt down on the floor and kowtowed to the company, after which Hsi-men Ch'ing asked him, "Why has Wu Hui not come with you?"

"Today," said Li Ming, "Wu Hui was not even able to report for duty at the installation ceremony for the new prefect of Tung-p'ing prefecture. He's at home suffering from an eye ailment. I've engaged Wang Chu to come in his stead."

He then called out to Wang Chu, "Come in and kowtow to His Honor."

Wang Chu then proceeded to lift aside the portiere and come into the room, where he kowtowed to the company and then stood to one side with Li Ming.

Addressing himself to the latter, Ying Po-chüeh then said, "Li Kuei-chieh from your establishment has just left to return home. Did you not know about it?"

"When I got home from my duty assignment in Tung-p'ing," said Li Ming, "I only had time to wash my face before coming over here. I don't know anything about it."

Turning to Hsi-men Ch'ing, Ying Po-chüeh said, "I fear the two of them have probably not had a chance to eat yet. Brother, why don't you direct that the two of them be given something to eat?"

"Master Two," said Shu-t'ung, who was standing in attendance, "let them wait a little, and they can eat together with the other musicians. That will obviate the need to fetch food for them a second time."

Ying Po-chüeh told Shu-t'ung to provide him with a tray, to which he transferred two saucers of hors d'oeuvres and a plate of roast lamb from the table top and gave it to Li Ming, saying, "If you wait until they come with the rice, the two of you can take a couple of bowls worth and eat in the parlor here."

Then, turning his attention to Shu-t'ung, he said, "My good nephew! As the saying goes:

Affairs come together according to their tendencies;

Things are differentiated according to their classes.⁴

You don't understand the fact that this category of people, even though they may only be boy actors from the licensed quarter, are not the same as musicians. Although one may treat them alike, it will only serve to show that you and I do not know the score."

This disquisition caused Hsi-men Ch'ing to give Ying Po-chüeh a rap on the head as he admonished him with a laugh, saying, "Dog that you are, since:

People in that line of trade,
Always stand up for each other, it's no wonder that you know all about the pains and pleasures of those who are subject to performance on demand.”

“My good child!” said Ying Po-chüeh. “What do you know about it? You've been a devotee of the licensed quarters for nothing if you don't even understand the four characters that mean:

Sollicitous of jade and considerate of fragrance.
How should they be explicated? Girls with painted faces and boy actors are just like fresh flowers. If you are solicitous and considerate of them, they will respond by being more vivacious. But if you mistreat them, it will be a case of ‘Eight Beats of a Kan-chou Song’:

Listlessly, listlessly withering away,⁵ and they will be hard to keep alive.”

“I yield to my son,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing with a laugh, “in his understanding of principle.”

In a short time, Li Ming and Wang Chu finished eating, and Ying Po-chüeh called them over to ask, “Do the two of you know the song suite that begins with the line:

Together we used to descant upon the snow and moon, the breeze and flowers, or not?”

“That's a suite in the Huang-chung mode,”⁶ said Li Ming. “We do know it.”

Thereupon, he picked up his psaltery, after which, with Wang Chu playing the p'i-p'a and Li Ming playing the psaltery:

Commencing to sing in full voice,
they sang the song suite that begins with the tune “Drunk in the Flowers’ Shade” in the Huang-chung mode:

Together we used to descant upon the snow and moon, the breeze and flowers;⁷
In our dreams of clouds and rain, the fragrance was alluring, the jade soft.⁸
Though the blossoms are now splendid, the moon just full;
They are weighed down with snow and tossed by the wind;
While my lover is as out of reach as the horizon.
For some time I have wanted to send him a broken-hearted message,
But I find that this boundless longing of mine,
Is nearly impossible to communicate.

To the tune “Rejoicing at the Oriole's Ascent”:

Choosing the blue sea as an inkwell,
And a rabbit-haired brush,⁹ sturdy as a beam;
For pine soot ink,
I will grind down Mount T'ai itself;
And use the infinite expanse of azure Heaven¹⁰ as brocade notepaper,
In order to display the art of the sage of cursive calligraphy.¹¹
Though I write for a while,
I cannot write out the feelings in my heart;
Though I explain for a while,
I cannot explain the extent of my suffering.

To the tune “Dancers’ Ensemble”:

I remember the first time we met,
When I first caught sight of my romantic young karmic encumbrance.
In our two hearts we mutually acknowledged a life and death affinity;
For a whole year our relationship was as close as glue and lacquer.
Who could have anticipated that you would have a change of heart along the way,
Turning our case into a Heaven of Frustrated Separation?¹²

To the same tune:

When I haven't seen him for two or three days,
It feels just as though we have been separated for more than ten years.
Not a meal goes by without my feeling preoccupied with him;
Not a quarter of an hour passes without my calling him to mind;
Not a watch of the night transpires without my dreaming of him.

To the tune “Four Gates Students”:¹³

There is not a traveler from whom I do not ask for news of him.
This lovesickness is really driving me crazy.
My acquaintances on seeing the state I am in urge me to desist;
But I can't help being preoccupied with him in my heart.
I long for him until he appears vividly before my eyes;¹⁴
I yearn for him so hard the saliva in my mouth dries up.
The fronts of my lapels,
The sides of my sleeves,
Are completely covered with tearstains.
I think of that time in the past when he and I exchanged vows.
In those days he was attractively young while I was in my prime;
As for his intelligence, who had ever seen the like?
And he seemed to exhibit an abundance of genuine sincerity.

To the tune “Ground Scouring Wind”:

For my part, my feelings for him have never diminished.
My tears flow in rivers, I love him so much.
We used to sit knee to knee,
And chat shoulder to shoulder.
Amid the fragrance of the callrops and lotuses we used to entwine our necks like mandarin ducks.
We used to walk hand in hand,
And sleep on the same pillow.
Heavens! It seems that my destiny is meager, and my allotment shallow.¹⁵

To the tune “The Water Nymphs”:

It's not a case of my being capricious,
And merely seeking “phoenix glue with which to mend the broken string.”¹⁶
I recall the oaths we swore upon our pillow;¹⁷
I think of the vows we made before the gods.
One whose heart is firm can wear through stone.¹⁸
Surreptitiously, I importune azure Heaven.¹⁹
If I am guilty of failing his expectations in a former incarnation,
So that my handsome lover cannot fulfill his desires in this life,
May we be able to be reunited in the life to come.

CODA

I enjoin you not to let your innermost feelings change.
If we are to meet again, it will not be until ages have passed and years gone by.
Though you may be distant in the flesh,
Do not allow your heart to be distant.²⁰

The story goes that, when they had finished singing it was gradually growing dark. Truly:

The gold raven slowly sinks behind the western hills;
The jade rabbit gradually climbs above the painted balustrade.²¹
A beautiful lady comes gently in to report the fact that:
“The moon has moved the flower shadows²² onto the gauze window.”²³

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered that the utensils be cleared away and then sent someone to invite Manager Fu Ming, Han Tao-kuo, Manager Yün Li-shou, Pen the Fourth, and Ch'en Ching-chi to join them at the front gate, where a standing screen had been erected, two tables had been set up, a pair of rams-horn lanterns were suspended, and a party spread had been laid out, replete with a plate of assorted cold hors d'oeuvres and boxes containing every kind of delicacy. Hsi-men Ch'ing, along with Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta, occupied the positions of honor at the head of the seating arrangement, while the employees and managers sat down to either side. Outside the front gate there were twelve golden lotus lanterns arrayed on either side, in addition to which there was a small stand of fireworks, which Hsi-men Ch'ing had ordered should not be set off until the womenfolk arrived home.

Before this, the six musicians had carried the bronze gong and bronze drum to the front gate, where they now started to play. After performing for a while on the bronze gong and bronze drum, they followed up with an interlude of more refined music on their wind instruments. The boy actors, Li Ming and Wang Chu, then came forward with their psaltery and p'i-p'a and sang a song suite in celebration of the Lantern Festival, beginning with the tune “Prelude to Painted Eyebrows,” the first line of which is:

Blossoms and moonlight pervade the spring metropolis,²⁴

etc. etc.

The passersby in the street, who crowded around to see the show:

Scarcely dared to gaze upon them.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was wearing a “loyal and tranquil hat,”²⁵ a velvet robe decorated with a crane motif, and a white satin jacket. Tai-an and P'ing-an took turns setting off sparklers one at a time. A pair of orderlies, holding staves in their hands, used them to fend off the crowd and prevent any idlers from getting too close for comfort.

In no time at all, when it was observed that:

The clouds were tranquil in the azure heavens,

As the wheel of a bright moon²⁶ rose in the east, crowds of sightseers congregated in the street, and:

The merrymaking was at its height.

Behold:

At every doorway, the beating of gongs and drums;²⁷

In every house, the airs of woodwinds and strings.

Troupe after troupe, the sightseers tread to the sound of singing;

All of a flutter, the wellborn young ladies trail undulating sleeves.

Hills of lanterns decorated with bunting,²⁸

Soar majestically to a hundred feet, piercing the clear sky;

Aromatic incense from phoenix censers,

Drifts hazily in a thousand layers, investing the silken throngs.

Empty courtyards, both inside and out,
Are awash in the brilliance of the precious moon;
Painted bowers, both above and below,
Are iridescent in the glow of decorated lanterns.²⁹
In the three markets and six streets³⁰ the people are making merry;
On this festive day in the metropolis we enjoy the Lantern Festival.³¹

To resume our story, in the rear compound Ch'un-mei, Ying-ch'un, Yü-hsiao, Lan-hsiang, Hsiao-yü, and company, on observing that Yüeh-niang was not at home, and hearing the sound of the bronze drum and other forms of musical performance at the front gate, as well as the fact that there were to be fireworks, all got dressed up and concealed themselves behind the standing screen to see what was going on. Shu-t'ung and Hua-t'ung were also behind the standing screen, heating wine over the brazier.

It so happens that Yü-hsiao and Shu-t'ung had been carrying on an affair for some time and were constantly flirting with each other. The two of them, on finding themselves together on this occasion, helped themselves to some melon seeds to crack, and in the process of doing so managed to knock over a pewter flagon of wine that was resting on the brazier. The fire in the brazier flared up conspicuously, scattering ashes all over the area, but Yü-hsiao merely continued to laugh about it.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he sent Tai-an to ask who was laughing, and why the ashes had been scattered in such a way.

That day Ch'un-mei was wearing a new white satin jacket with a brocaded scarlet vest and was sitting sedately in a chair. When she saw the two of them knock over the wine, she immediately raised her voice and berated Yü-hsiao, saying, "What a wondrously wanton whore you are! No sooner do you catch sight of a man than you start carrying on with him in an unheard of way. It's enough that the two of you knocked over the wine, but how can you continue to guffaw over it? What are you laughing at? You've not only managed to put out the fire, but covered us all with ashes to boot."

When Yü-hsiao realized that she was being taken to task, she was too frightened to say anything and headed back toward the rear compound.

Shu-t'ung was thrown into consternation and came forward to explain, saying, "I was heating some wine on the brazier and happened to knock over the pewter flagon of wine."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this explanation, he didn't pursue the matter any further and let it drop.

Before this happened, on that particular day, Pen the Fourth's wife, on learning that Yüeh-niang would not be at home, and having been aware for some time that Ch'un-mei, Yü-hsiao, Ying-ch'un, and Lan-hsiang were favorite body servants of Hsi-men Ch'ing, had laid in all kinds of holiday dishes and delicacies and sent her daughter Chang-chieh to invite the four of them to her house to relax and visit together.

They took her to see Li Chiao-erh, but she said, "I'm only:

A walking stick made of rush:

Not to be relied upon.³²

You'd better ask Father's permission."

They also went to ask Sun Hsüeh-o, but she was even less willing to take responsibility for the decision. They procrastinated until after lamplighting time, when Pen the Fourth's wife again sent Chang-chieh to invite the four of them. Lan-hsiang pressed Yü-hsiao, Yü-hsiao pressed Ying-ch'un, and Yingch'un pressed Ch'un-mei to go back to Li Chiao-erh as a group and ask her, in her turn, to go to Hsi-men Ch'ing and request permission for them to go.

But Ch'un-mei just sat there:

Without turning a hair, and upbraided Yü-hsiao and the others, saying, "The lot of you are like a bunch of good-for-nothings who:

Have never even attended a banquet.

Though you've never been to a feast,

You can't wait to get a sniff of one.

Even if it means I don't get to go, I won't go begging someone else for the privilege. Each and every one of you is carrying on as though you were ghost-driven. What's the big hurry, anyway? I can't bring myself to countenance such things with even half an eye."

Ying-ch'un, Yü-hsiao, and Lan-hsiang had all dressed themselves up to befit the occasion, and come out to the front compound, but did not dare to depart, while Ch'un-mei refused to budge from her seat.

Shu-t'ung, on seeing that Pen the Fourth's wife had again sent Chang-chieh to invite them, said, "Even if Father takes me to task, so be it. Let me go out and petition him on your behalf."

Going straight out to Hsi-men Ch'ing's side, he covered his mouth and whispered into his ear, "Pen the Fourth's wife, on this festival occasion, has invited my sister maidservants over for a visit, and they have asked me to inquire whether they may go or not."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he instructed him, "Tell your sister maid-servants to get themselves ready and go, but to come home early. There isn't anyone to be relied on at home."

Shu-t'ung promptly went inside and said, "Thanks to my initiative in approaching him, he has consented to your request. He says that you should get yourselves ready and go, but to come home early."

Only then did Ch'un-mei nonchalantly betake herself to her room, make herself up, and prepare to depart.

Before long, the four of them passed through the gate together, after Shu-t'ung had adjusted the placement of the standing screen so as to partially conceal their exit, and proceeded on their way to the house of Pen the Fourth.

When Pen the Fourth's wife caught sight of them, she felt:

Just as though they had fallen from Heaven, and invited them into an inner room, from the ceiling of which hung lighted hydrangea-shaped gauze lanterns, and which featured a table replete with a meticulously laid out and sumptuous display of comestibles, as well as platters of cold hors d'oeuvres.

Pen the Fourth's wife addressed Ch'un-mei as Elder Sister, Ying-ch'un as Second Sister, Yü-hsiao as Third Sister, and Lan-hsiang as Fourth Sister. When they had all exchanged salutations, she also invited Auntie Han, the wife of Mohammedan Han, to come over and help keep her guests company, having directed that she be provided with a separate selection of foodstuffs that would not violate her dietary restrictions.

Ch'un-mei and Ying-ch'un were seated in the positions of honor, with Yühsiao and Lan-hsiang facing them, while Pen the Fourth's wife and Auntie Han sat to either side, and Chang-chieh went back and forth to heat the wine and wait upon them. But let us put this aside for a moment and say no more about it.

Hsi-men Ch'ing meanwhile proceeded to call over the musicians and instructed them, saying, "Sing that song suite for us, the first words to the prelude of which are:

The east wind is chilly,³³

beginning with the tune "A Happy Event Is Imminent."

Just at this juncture, individual servings of rose-flavored Lantern Festival dumplings, provided with silver spoons in the shape of apricot leaves, were brought out from the rear compound, and the company proceeded to pick them up and enjoy them together. Truly, they were:

Fragrant, sweet, and delectable,
And melted on entering the mouth;
Most appropriate for the occasion.

In front of the gathering, Li Ming and Wang Chu took up their instruments and accompanied themselves as they sang the words of this song suite. Truly:

The rhythm was slow and lingering,
The beat melodious and harmonious.

They sang to the tune "A Happy Event Is Imminent":

In the eastern fields the blue mist has dissipated.
We delight in this clear morning of a fragrant day.
Our disposition to love flowers,³⁴
Has caused us to get up, this spring, earlier than usual.
Our curiosity aroused,
We inquire of the Lord of the East, "How much spring are you going to allow us?"
To which our maidservant responds with a smile,
"Last night the flowering crab apples have bloomed."

To the tune "May You Live a Thousand Years":

Amid sprigs of apricot blossoms,
Interspersed with snowy pear blossoms,
Tiny green plums may be seen sparsely scattered.
Beside the bridge over flowing water,³⁵
Beside the bridge over flowing water,
All one can hear is the reiterated calls of the flower sellers.
Beyond the swing, along the road,
All we can hear from within the walls,
Is the happy laughter of beautiful maidens,
Joyously exclaiming, "What a wonderful spring."
Eagerly we strive to fill up our flower baskets,
While bearing our picnic hampers on high.

To the tune "Better than Ever":

Where the flowers are at their thickest,³⁶
A wine flag flutters to attract our attention.
Beside the Peony Pavilion,
We seek female companions to compare botanical specimens.
From amid the lofty green willow branches,
With a flicker of wings³⁷ the morning oriole flies over the treetops.
The cascading red blossoms, and fluttering butterflies,
Fly over the painted bridge.
Out of the whole year,
With its four seasons,
Spring alone is the most wonderful.
Amid the flowers we drink lustily;
Beneath the moon we laugh joyously.³⁸

To the tune "Red Embroidered Slippers":

Listening to the strains of phoenix pipes and phoenix flutes;
We ogle the sight of kingfisher ornaments and clustering pearls.
Raising our jade goblets,
We stumble in drunkenness,
Singing "Golden Threads,"³⁹
We do the "Liu-yao" dance.⁴⁰
Let the bright moon climb the flowering branches;⁴¹
The moon climb the flowering branches.⁴²

CODA:

Completely inebriated, let us recline amid the fragrant verdure,
Suspending our silver lanterns on high underneath the flowers.
The fullness of youth turns all too easily to age.⁴³
Let us not permit the wonders of spring to escape us unappreciated.⁴⁴

But let us say no more for the moment about the playing and singing as the party continued.

To resume our story, Tai-an and Ch'en Ching-chi, with lots of firecrackers in their sleeves, called for a pair of orderlies to carry lanterns for them and set out for Sister-in-law Wu's house to escort Wu Yüeh-niang and the others on their way home. They found them in the parlor, together with Yüeh-niang's elder sister, the wife of Mr. Shen, the wife of Yüeh-niang's second brother, Wu the Second, and Wu Shun-ch'en's wife, Third Sister Cheng, where they were drinking wine and being entertained by the playing and singing of Big Sister Yü.

When their hostess saw that Ch'en Ching-chi had arrived, she arranged for him to be seated together with Wu the Second and her son, Wu Shun-ch'en, and said, "My husband is not at home today. He's at battalion headquarters supervising the compilation of the guard registers."

She also had a table set up for them and provided with a platter of cold hors d'oeuvres, an assortment of other dishes, and wine, so they could keep Ching-chi company.

Tai-an then came forward and said to Yüeh-niang, "Father sent me to escort you ladies on your way, and to ask you to come home early. He is worried that the crowds may get rowdy later in the evening. I came together with your son-in-law."

Because she had been annoyed with him earlier, Yüeh-niang had not a word to say to him in response.

Sister-in-law Wu then said to her page boy Lai-ting, "Get something for Tai-an to eat."

"Wine and meat, soup and rice, are all laid out up front," said Lai-ting. "He can eat with us there."

"What's the need," said Yüeh-niang, "for someone who's:

Newly come and just arrived, to be fed right away? Tell him to go stand out front. We're about to get started."

"What's the hurry, kinswoman?" said Sister-in-law Wu. "How can you bring yourself to start:

Waxing supercilious before you enter the door, as it were? At present, with all you ladies here, and on this festival occasion, we sisters ought to be able to have a relaxed visit together. In any case, you left the Second Lady and the other lady at home; so what is there to worry about, that you should want to set off so early? If it were someone else's place, that would be another story."

She then turned to Big Sister Yü and said, "Sing a good song to entertain us. The ladies here have been critical of you."

"The Sixth Lady has really been upset with her," said Meng Yü-lou, "for not showing up to celebrate her birthday."

Big Sister Yü promptly got up from her place and kowtowed to Li P'ing-erh four times, saying, "Ever since I got home after celebrating the Fifth Lady's birthday, I haven't been feeling well. It was only yesterday, when your sister-in-law sent someone to summon me, that I've been able to pull myself together sufficiently to come out. If I'd been feeling better, how could I have failed to come pay my respects to you?"

"Big Sister Yü," said Chin-lien, "The Sixth Lady has been out of sorts. Sing a good song for her, and she won't be upset with you anymore."

Li P'ing-erh merely sat where she was and smiled, without making a sound.

"That's no problem," said Big Sister Yü. "Bring my p'i-p'a over here, and I'll sing something for you."

Sister-in-law Wu turned to Third Sister Cheng, the wife of Wu Shun-ch'en, saying, "Pour out some more wine for your two aunts and the other ladies. It's been a long time since their cups have been refilled."

Big Sister Yü then took her p'i-p'a in hand and proceeded to sing a set of songs to the tune "The Windswept River":

Midnight has come.
How is this feeling of desolation to be borne?
Within silk screens and brocaded curtains⁴⁵ I lie down in my clothes.
My naughty lover,
You promised me that you'd show up between twelve and two,
But it's already past four.
I can only await him with a painful heart, but what can I do?
He has abandoned me.
I hope the gods will see fit to visit him with an appropriate disaster.

It is already six.
I idly do up my raven locks in a chignon.
Ashamed to gaze into the caltrop-patterned mirror,⁴⁶
I think of him.
I am unable to put on my brocade clothes;
Reluctant to don my kingfisher ornaments and pearls;
Unable to dispel my melancholy. eight o'clock has already past;
There is no sign of him at ten.
All on your account, my sorrow is making me sick.

It is noon.
I am really afflicted with lovesickness,
So afflicted that my soul has taken leave of me.
I think of my talented lover.
Do you remember how, under the moon, beneath the stars,
We swore oaths of fidelity by the hills and seas?
Who has ever taken you for granted?
If he should show up by two,
It would relieve my sorrowing breast.
If he makes it by four, I'll purchase a pig's head to sacrifice.

It's already six o'clock.
I can't help being disturbed at heart.

Who is there to share a few understanding words?
My equivocating lover,
You're probably in the houses of pleasure,⁴⁷
Hugging the turquoise and cuddling the red;
Your lust as big as the sky.
At eight o'clock I light my candles,
But there is no sign of him, early or late.
At ten o'clock I must resign myself to consulting the tortoise oracle.⁴⁸

As she was singing, Yüeh-niang remarked, "How is it that just now it's begun to get so chilly in here?"

Lai-an, who was standing in attendance at one side, reported, "The weather has turned cold outside, and it's started to snow."

"Sister," said Meng Yü-lou, "the clothes you're wearing are too thin. I've brought a padded cloak with me. After all, by this time of night, it's bound to be cold."

"Since it's snowing," said Yüeh-niang, "we'd better call for a page boy to go home and bring us our fur coats to wear."

Lai-an promptly left the room and said to Tai-an, "Mother has directed that someone go home and fetch the fur coats of the ladies."

Tai-an, in turn, called for Ch'in-t'ung and said, "You go get them, and let me stay here to attend upon them."

Ch'in-t'ung, without inquiring any further, headed straight off for home.

In a little while, Yüeh-niang remembered the problem about a fur coat for Chin-lien and asked Lai-an, "Who went to fetch the fur coats?"

"Ch'in-t'ung went to get them," replied Lai-an.

"He just went off without inquiring any further, did he?" said Yüeh-niang.

"Something was forgotten in his instructions, just now," said Meng Yü-lou, "when he was told to fetch our fur coats. The Fifth Lady doesn't have a fur coat. It would have sufficed if he had been told just to fetch yours, Sister."

"It isn't really the case that there aren't any at home," said Yüeh-niang. "There's a fur coat that somebody pawned, which could have been brought for Sister Six to wear."

Yüeh-niang then asked, "Why didn't that slave Tai-an go on this errand himself, rather than sending that other slave in his stead? Tell him to come here."

Tai-an was duly called into her presence, where Yüeh-niang took him severely to task, saying, "A fine slave you are! When you're told to do something, you refuse to bestir yourself, but depute another officer to act in your stead. You sent that slave off without so much as mentioning it to me, so that he was gone before anyone knew it. All you do is presume to:

Sit at the altar dispatching your generals,⁴⁹ like a Taoist priest. No wonder that:

Having assumed the position of a high official,

You were reluctant to set the fins on your silk hat aflutter,⁵⁰ but dispatched him on the errand instead."

"Mother is mistaken in her criticism of me," protested Tai-an. "If you had originally directed me to go, would I have dared not to go? But when you sent Lai-an out with the message, all he said was that someone should be dispatched to go home on this errand."

"How would that lowly slave Lai-an dare to order the likes of you around?" said Yüeh-niang sarcastically. "Even legitimate wives such as myself hardly dare tell you what to do. Right now all you slaves have been indulged to the point that you seem to have lost all sense of decorum. I suppose, where your masters are concerned:

If a smoke-stained Buddhist effigy,

Is displayed on your wall:

When you have such a benefactor,

You'll get a monk to match.⁵¹

Do you suppose that I'm unaware of the tricks you've been up to, what with your double-dealing, ingratiating, officious, two-faced, meretricious, lazy, gluttonous, and mercenary conduct:

Duping your superiors while engaging in malfeasance,⁵² behind their backs? Just a while ago, your master did not send you to escort Li Kuei-chieh on her way home, so how did you come to escort her? Someone was already there, holding her felt bag, when you unceremoniously grabbed it out of his hands. Whether to retain the maidservant, or not to retain the maidservant, was not up to you. When you were told to come in and tell me about it, why did you refuse to come in, but set off that way to escort Kueichieh to the licensed quarter, no doubt in hopes of getting something to eat for your pains, and send someone else to come inside in your stead? You must have anticipated that if I were upset about it, I would take it out on the other person instead of you. And you still deny that:

You're a practiced old hand."

"It couldn't have been anyone else," protested Tai-an. "That must have been Hua-t'ung's story. Father saw him holding her felt bag and ordered me, 'You escort your sister Kuei-chieh on her way home.' It was he who sent him inside. As Mother said, whether to retain the maidservant, or not to retain the maidservant, was not up to me; so what have I got to do with it?"

Yüeh-niang became very angry and cursed him, saying, "You lousy slave! Still shooting off your mouth, are you? I don't have the leisure to bandy words with you here. Slave that you are, you've gone altogether too far with your stiff-necked, recalcitrant ways. When I tell you to do something, you refuse to move and have the nerve to talk back to me. Believe you me, if I don't tell him about it tomorrow, so that he takes you, deceitful slave that you are, and:

Pounds you into a bloody sheep's head,
I might as well quit."

"Tai-an," interposed Sister-in-law Wu, "Why don't you get a move on, and fetch the ladies' fur coats for them. Can't you see she's upset?"

"Sister," she went on to say, "tell him where to find that other fur coat for the Fifth Lady to wear."

P'an Chin-lien picked up where she left off, saying, "Sister, don't bother to have him fetch it for me. I don't have to wear a fur coat. Just tell him to bring that cloak of mine from home for me to wear. If it's something that's been pawned, who knows what kind of shape it's in? If it looks like a yellow dog's pelt⁵³ and I put it on, it will only make me a laughingstock. Besides it's not propitious, since sooner or later it will be redeemed."

"The fur coat I have in mind was not really pawned," said Yüeh-niang. "It was actually given to us in lieu of payment for a debt of sixteen taels of silver by that man Li Chih. The fur coat that was pawned with us by the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang has already been given to Li Chiao-erh to wear."

She then went on to instruct Tai-an, "The fur coat in question is in the large cabinet. Have Yü-hsiao find it for you. And bring Mistress Ch'en's cloak while you're at it."

Pouting with his lips, Tai-an went outside, where Ch'en Ching-chi asked him, "Where are you off to?"

"What a purely provoking business!" complained Tai-an.

"A single errand has to be performed twice.

At this hour of the night I've got to turn home again."

He went straight home, where he found Hsi-men Ch'ing still partying at the front gate. Manager Fu Ming and Manager Yün Li-shou had already left, but Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Han Tao-kuo, and Pen the Fourth were still drinking and had not yet gone home.

They asked Tai-an, "Are the ladies coming?" and he replied, "No, they haven't started out yet. They've sent me to fetch their fur coats."

He then headed for the rear compound.

Before this, when Ch'in-t'ung had arrived home, he looked for Yü-hsiao in the master suite, to find the fur coats for him.

There he found Hsiao-yü sitting on the k'ang, not in the best of moods, who said, "Today those four whores have all gone off to Pen the Fourth's wife's place to have a party. I don't know where the fur coats are kept. You'll have to go to her place and ask them to find them for you."

Ch'in-t'ung went straight to Pen the Fourth's house, where, rather than announcing himself, he surreptitiously eavesdropped outside the windows.

What should he hear but Pen the Fourth's wife, saying, "Elder Sister and Second Sister, how is it that it's been such a long time since you've had a drink? And you haven't even been using your chopsticks to help yourselves to the dishes. Is it that you turn up your noses at the fare provided by such mean folk as ourselves, or what?"

"Sister-in-law Four," said Ch'un-mei, "we've had enough to drink."

"Ai-ya!" exclaimed Pen the Fourth's wife. "It scarcely needs saying, but how can you start:

Waxing supercilious before you enter the door, that way?"

Then, turning to the wife of Mohammedan Han, she said, "As my next-door neighbor, you're just like an assistant host. Urge Third Sister and Fourth Sister to avail themselves of the wine in front of them on my behalf. How can you be so wooden?"

Instructing her daughter Chang-chieh to serve the wine, she went on to say, "Pour some more for Third Sister, but go a little easy in refilling Fourth Sister's cup."

"I've never been able to drink much," said Lan-hsiang.

"I fear you sisters will end up being famished today, since we've failed to provide any tasty dishes for your entertainment. Please don't make fun of us. We were going to engage a minstrel to come and sing for you ladies as you drank your wine, but we were afraid that the noise might be overheard at Father's place. Our lodgings are so inadequate. The inconveniences such mean folk as ourselves have to put up with can scarcely be described."

As she was speaking, Ch'in-t'ung gave a knock on the door, and everyone fell silent.

After a considerable pause, Chang-chieh was heard asking, "Who is it?"

"It's me," said Ch'in-t'ung. "I need to have a word with my sisters."

The door was duly opened, and Ch'in-t'ung came in, at which Yü-hsiao asked, "Have the ladies come home?"

Ch'in-t'ung looked at them and nearly burst out laughing but refrained from speaking for some time.

"What are you showing your teeth in such a crazy grin for?" demanded Yü-hsiao.

"When I ask you a question," she went on to say, "what are you grinning like that for, without deigning to reply?"

"The ladies are still at Sister-in-law Wu's place drinking wine," responded Ch'in-t'ung. "When they saw that the sky had become overcast and it had started to snow, they sent me home to fetch their fur coats. I was instructed to wrap them all up and take them back with me."

"Mother's fur coat," said Yü-hsiao, "is in that cabinet with the gold tracery in the outer room, isn't it. You can get Hsiao-yü to give it to you."

"Hsiao-yü told me I should come ask you for it," said Ch'in-t'ung.

"How could you believe that little whore?" said Yü-hsiao. "As though she didn't know where it was."

"Those of you whose mistresses have fur coats can get them for him," said Ch'un-mei. "Since my mistress doesn't have a fur coat, I'm the only one who doesn't have to bestir herself."

Lan-hsiang said to Ch'in-t'ung, "You can ask Hsiao-luan for the Third Lady's fur coat."

Ying-ch'un then reached for the keys she carried at her waist and gave them to Ch'in-t'ung, saying, "Get Hsiao-ch'un to open the door to the inner room and get her coat for you."

Ch'in-t'ung went back to the rear compound, where Hsiao-yü in the master suite, and Hsiao-luan in Meng Yü-lou's quarters, wrapped up the fur coats in question and turned them over to him.

Just as he was carrying them out to the front compound, he ran into Tai-an and asked him, "What have you come back home for?"

"You might well ask!" said Tai-an. "All on account of the fact that I sent you on this errand, I've been subjected to a real dressing down by the First Lady. On top of which, she's sent me back to fetch a fur coat for the Fifth Lady."

"Right now, I'm on my way to fetch the Sixth Lady's fur coat," said Ch'in-t'ung.

"When you've fetched it, wait for me here," said Tai-an, "so we can go back together. It shouldn't really matter if you get there ahead of me, but I don't want to give the First Lady any excuse for cursing me out again."

When he had finished speaking, he proceeded to the master suite, where he found Hsiao-yü sitting on the k'ang, warming herself over the frame of the brazier, and cracking melon seeds with her teeth.

When she caught sight of Tai-an, she asked, "So you've come too, have you?"

"You might well ask!" said Tai-an. "I'm suffering from:

A bellyful of anger."

Thereupon, he related the whole episode of how Yüeh-niang had cursed him out, from first to last, saying, "I told Ch'in-t'ung to come fetch the fur coats, and she got angry with me for not coming myself, claiming that I was deputing officers to act in my stead. Then, because the Fifth Lady doesn't have a fur coat of her own, she sent me to come after one. She said that in the large cabinet there was a fur coat that had been left in lieu of a debt by Li the Third, and that I should ask you for it to take back with me."

"Yü-hsiao has the key to the inner room with her," said Hsiao-yü, "and they're all having a party at Pen the Fourth's place. You'll have to have her come and get it for you."

"Ch'in-t'ung has gone to the Sixth Lady's quarters to fetch her fur coat but will be back directly," said Tai-an. "We can get him to go after her. That will give me a chance to give my legs a rest and warm myself at the brazier."

Hsiao-yü then made a place for him at the head of the k'ang, and they sat down next to each other, shoulder to shoulder, and warmed themselves at the brazier.

"There's some wine in the flagon," said Hsiao-yü. "Let me pour a cup for you."

"That's the spirit," said Tai-an. "I accept your largess."

Hsiao-yü got down off the k'ang, put the flagon to heat on the brazier, pulled open a drawer from which she extracted a bowl of preserved goose meat, and poured out some wine for him. There being no one else present, the two of them fell to kissing and sucking each other's tongues.

As they were drinking, Ch'in-t'ung came in, and Tai-an offered him a drink, after which, he told him, "Go fetch Sister Yü-hsiao, so she can locate the fur coat for the Fifth Lady to wear."

Ch'in-t'ung put down the felt bag and went to Pen the Fourth's place to get Yü-hsiao.

Yü-hsiao cursed him, saying, "You lousy jailbird! What have you come back for?"

She refused to come herself but gave him a key and told him to get Hsiao-yü to open the door. Hsiao-yü opened the door to the inner room with it and tried the key in the lock of the cabinet, but, though she tried for some time, she was unable to get the lock to open, and Ch'in-t'ung had to go back to Pen the Fourth's place again.

"That's not the key," said Yü-hsiao. "The key to Mother's cabinet is kept under the mattress on her bed."

When Hsiao-yü heard this, she cursed Yü-hsiao, saying, "That whore! It's just as though her bottom were nailed in place over there. She refuses to budge herself and, after two trips back and forth, still continues to order me around instead."

When she finally succeeded in getting the cabinet open, it turned out not to contain any fur coats, so Ch'in-t'ung had to make yet another trip to Pen the Fourth's place to ask about it.

This constant running back and forth had aroused Ch'in-t'ung's resentment, and he muttered, "Even if I were to die, I ought to have three days and three nights without this kind of provocation. It's just my luck to run into these pestilential ghosts of small-time ladies, on the lookout for someone to plague."

Turning to Tai-an, he said, "What do you say? When we go back this time, we'll only provoke another tongue-lashing from Mother, who won't take into consideration the fact that the room was locked, but just blame us for the delay."

Returning to Pen the Fourth's place, he said to Yü-hsiao, "We looked in the cabinet in Mother's room, but it didn't contain any fur coats."

Yü-hsiao thought to herself for a while and then laughed, saying, "I forgot. It must be in the large cabinet in the outer room."

When he made his way back to the rear compound, Hsiao-yü started cursing again, saying, "That whore must have been fucked silly by her lover! So the fur coat was here all the time, while we've been looking everywhere for it."

She then proceeded to get it out and wrap it up in a package, together with Hsi-men Ta-chieh's cloak, and handed it over to Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung to take back to Sister-in-law Wu's house.

When they got there, Yüeh-niang started cursing again, saying, "You lousy slaves! You've been in cahoots so that neither of you came back without the other. That's all there is to it."

Tai-an was too perturbed to answer, but Ch'in-t'ung spoke up, saying, "The fur coats for the other ladies were all there, but we had to wait while sister looked for this fur coat with the black fabric facing."

Thereupon, they opened up the package and took it out.

Sister-in-law Wu examined it under the lamp light and said, "This is also a good fur coat. Fifth Lady, why did you run it down that way, describing it as a yellow dog's pelt? Where would you find a yellow dog's pelt like that? I'd be happy to wear a coat like this myself."

"It's practically a new fur coat," said Yüeh-niang. "The only thing is that the lapels in front are a little worn. In the future if you replace them with two new brocaded panels, it will look just fine."

Meng Yü-lou picked it up and joked with Chin-lien, saying, "My child, come over here and try on this yellow dog's pelt so your mother can see how well it looks on you."

"If I'm up to snuff," said Chin-lien, "make no mistake about it, I ought to be able to ask my husband to give me one of my own in the future. Who wants to pick up someone else's used fur coat to wear, for no good reason?"

Meng Yü-lou continued to joke with her, saying, "How can you hope to repudiate your karma that way? Since this fur coat of somebody's is available, you ought to be grateful enough to put it on and recite the Buddha's name."

Thereupon, she proceeded to help her on with the coat, and when Chin-lien realized that it had an ample and substantial look to it, she had nothing more to say.

At this point, Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Li P'ing-erh all donned their sable fur coats and prepared to bid farewell to Sister-in-law Wu and the wife of Wu the Second and set out for home. Yüeh-niang gave Big Sister Yü a package containing two candareens of silver.

"I, too, will bid farewell to the sisters-in-law and you other ladies," said Wu Yin-erh, and she proceeded to kowtow to them in turn.

At this point, Sister-in-law Wu presented her with a pair of silver flower ornaments, and Yüeh-niang and Li P'ing-erh each pulled a tael of silver out of their sleeves and gave them to her, for which she kowtowed to them in thanks.

Sister-in-law Wu, Wu the Second's wife, and Third Sister Cheng all expressed a desire to see Yüeh-niang and company on their way, but when they saw that it was snowing, Yüeh-niang insisted that they go back inside.

"It was still snow that was falling a little while ago," reported Ch'in-t'ung, "but now it's turned to drops of water that moisten the body. I'm afraid the clothing of you ladies may get wet. You'd better see if you can borrow an umbrella from Sister-in-law Wu's place, to give you some protection on the way home."

Wu the Second promptly fetched an umbrella, and Ch'in-t'ung put it up. The two orderlies that had accompanied them on their way there held lanterns, and the cluster of men and women set out in their wake. After traversing several narrow lanes, they came out on Main Street.

At this point, Ch'en Ching-chi, who had been setting off numerous fire-crackers along the way, said, "Sister Yin-erh, your place is not far from here. We might as well escort you to your home."

"Just where is her place located?" Yüeh-niang then asked.

"If you go straight down this alley here," said Ching-chi, "that establishment with the imposing gateway halfway down is her place."

"I'll say goodbye to you ladies here," said Wu Yin-erh, "and go on home."

"The ground is wet," said Yüeh-niang. "Go on home. You have already performed your kowtows. I'll send a page boy to escort you the rest of the way."

She then called for Tai-an and said, "You escort Sister Yin-erh on her way home."

"Mother," said Ching-chi, "let me and Tai-an, the two of us, go with her."

"All right," said Yüeh-niang, "Sister, you can go on home with the two of them to escort you."

This was just the signal Ch'en Ching-chi had been waiting for, and he set off with Tai-an to see her to her place, while Wu Yüeh-niang and the others continued on their way home.

Along the way, P'an Chin-lien said, "Elder Sister, originally you said something about our seeing her home. How is it that we didn't end up doing it?"

"You're just like a child," Yüeh-niang laughed. "When someone jokes with you, you take it seriously. What sort of a place is the Verdant Spring Bordello,⁵⁴ that the likes of you and me should accompany her there?"

"It seems to me unlikely," said Pan Chin-lien, "if someone's husband were out whoring in the licensed quarter, that his wife would never come looking for him, or never endeavor to:

Beat him into a pot of porridge."

"There you go again!" said Yüeh-niang. "If our husband goes into the quarter some time in the future, just you go looking for him and give it a try. You might well end up being mistaken for a painted face yourself, and dragged off by someone else's husband, if he deigned to give you so much as a second look."

As they were speaking, they gradually approached the entrance to East Street, not far from the gateway of Ch'iao Hung's house, where they saw that Ch'iao Hung's wife and Big Sister Tuan, the wife of her nephew Ts'ui Pen, were standing in the doorway. When the latter two persons observed from a distance that Yüeh-niang and the cluster of men and women accompanying her were approaching, they insisted upon inviting them to come in.

Yüeh-niang declined repeatedly, saying, "Although we very much appreciate our kinswoman's lavish hospitality, it is already late, and we'd better not come in."

But Ch'iao Hung's wife refused to let them go, saying, "My good kins-woman, how can you start:

Waxing supercilious before you enter the door?"

She insisted on dragging them inside, where, in the parlor, they found lanterns suspended, an array of wine and delicacies set out, and two female entertainers to play and sing for them as they enjoyed the wine. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing was still drinking with Ying Po-chüeh and company at his front gate, but the party was about to break up. Before this, Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta, who had been stuffing themselves all day, had long since reached the point where they couldn't have swallowed another bite. But when they noticed that Hsi-men Ch'ing had fallen asleep in his chair, they took advantage of the fact that he wasn't looking to dump whatever remained on the saucers and serving dishes into their sleeves, clearing them off completely, and then decamped, along with Han Tao-kuo, leaving only Pen the Fourth behind, who was afraid to return home on his own initiative. He remained to keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company until he finally arranged for the musicians to have something to drink, paid them for their services, and sent them on their way, saw that the things were put away, and the lanterns and candles extinguished, and made his way back to the rear compound.

Meanwhile, at Pen the Fourth's house, P'ing-an came in and said, "Sisters, haven't you gotten a move on yet? Father's already gone inside."

When Ch'un-mei heard this, along with Ying-ch'un, Yü-hsiao, and company, they were in such a hurry to return that they didn't even pay their proper respects to Pen the Fourth's wife, but took their leave and ran off in a cloud of dust.

Lan-hsiang, who had gotten one of her feet twisted in her shoe, was unable to keep up with them and cursed, saying, "The way the lot of you have taken off, as though you were:

Picking up your coffins and fleeing for your lives, has made me twist my foot in its shoe, so I can't seem to get it on right."

When they arrived in the rear compound, they heard that Hsi-men Ch'ing had gone to Li Chiao-erh's quarters, and all trooped in to kowtow to him. The abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery, on seeing that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come to retire in Li Chiao-erh's quarters, had retreated to the master suite and the company of Hsiao-yü.

When Yü-hsiao came in and saluted her, Hsiao-yü took her to task, saying, "Yü-hsiao, when Mother sent the page boy back from over there to fetch that fur coat, you refused to come take care of it yourself but directed that I should do it. But I didn't know which key it was that opened the door of the cabinet. And then, when we finally got it open, the coat wasn't there. Later on, it turned out to be in the large cabinet in the outer room. You were the one who put it there in the first place, but it seems you were so confused you didn't know what was going on. The lot of you must have had more than enough to eat and drink over there. Each and every one of you looks as though she's put on an additional bulge or two."

Yü-hsiao was so affected by this tirade that the blood flew to her cheeks, and she responded, "Why you crazy little whore! Has the dog scratched your face, or what? Just because you weren't invited, are you going to take it out on those of us who were?"

"As though I cared anything about an invitation from that whore!" exclaimed Hsiao-yü.

The abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery, from her position on the sidelines, remarked, "You two sisters ought to be more accommodating in the way you talk to each other, or your master in the other room will overhear you. The ladies are likely to return any minute now. You would do better to prepare some tea for them."

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Ch'in-t'ung, who came in carrying a felt bag.

"Has Mother come home?" Yü-hsiao asked.

"The ladies were almost here," reported Ch'in-t'ung, "but the wife of Kinsman Ch'iao was standing in her doorway and invited them in for a drink. They should be getting up to go by now.”

Only then did the two maidservants stop bandying words.

Before long, Yüeh-niang and the others took their leave of Ch'iao Hung's wife and arrived at the front gate, where Pen the Fourth's wife came out to greet them. Ch'en Ching-chi and Pen the Fourth then got out a rack of miniature fireworks, and they all stopped to watch them being set off before coming inside. When they had bowed in salutation to Li Chiao-erh and the abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery, Sun Hsüeh-o came out to kowtow to Yüeh-niang and exchange greetings with Meng Yü-lou and her two companions.

“Where is Father?” Yüeh-niang went on to ask.

“He came into my room just now,” said Li Chiao-erh, “where I've already tucked him in for the night.”

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she hadn't a word to say.

Whom should they see at this juncture but Ch'un-mei, Ying-ch'un, Yühsiao, and Lan-hsiang, who came in to kowtow.

Li Chiao-erh then explained, “Today Pen the Fourth's wife from up front invited the four of them to come visit for a while, and they've just gotten back.”

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she remained silent for some time and then took them to task, saying, “The preternatural bitches! What did they go out there for, for no good reason? Who said they could go?”

“They got permission from Father before they went,” replied Li Chiao-erh.

“So they asked him, did they?” said Yüeh-niang. “A fine good-for-nothing to take charge of anything he is! Your household is getting to be like:

The temple that opens its gates early on the first and fifteenth;

Only to let a bunch of insignificant ghosts expose themselves.”

“Dear Lady!” exclaimed the abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery. “Each of these four sisters is as pretty as a picture. How can you refer to them as insignificant ghosts?”

“If they're as pretty as pictures,” said Yüeh-niang, “they must be only half-length portraits. What need is there to let them out for no good reason, only to allow outsiders to feast their eyes on them?”

Meng Yü-lou, realizing that Yüeh-niang was not in a good mood, was the first to make her departure. After that, Chin-lien, on seeing her get up to go, also went off, together with Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, leaving only the abbess to spend the night with Yüeh-niang. The snow and sleet continued to fall until the fourth watch of the night before stopping. Truly:

It is night in the storied bowers, the incense has dissipated, the candles are cold;

It is a time for cutting vegetables by lantern light, and sweeping away the snow.

Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the yamen. Around lunch time, Yüeh-niang, along with Meng Yü-lou and Li P'ing-erh, saw the abbess off on her way to the nunnery.

As they were standing inside the front gate, they caught sight of an old country woman who made her living telling fortunes by means of the tortoise oracle. She was wearing a patchwork jacket and a blue cotton skirt, her forehead was enclosed in a black headband, and she was carrying a pouch on her back as she came along the street.

Yüeh-niang sent a page boy to invite her to come inside the second gate, where, after she had laid out her fortune-telling diagrams and put her consecrated tortoise in place, she said to her, “How about telling our fortunes?”

The old woman knelt down on the ground and kowtowed to her four times, after which she said, “May I ask how old you are, madame?”

“Tell the fortune of a woman who was born in the year of the dragon,” said Yüeh-niang.

“If it's the greater dragon, you'd be forty-one,” said the woman. “If it's the lesser dragon, you'd be twenty-nine.”

“I'm twenty-nine,” said Yüeh-niang. “I was born at midnight on the fifteenth day of the eighth month.”

The old woman gave the consecrated tortoise a nudge, and after it had made a circuit of the diagrams, it came to rest on one, which, when it was picked up, turned out to depict an official and a lady formally seated and surrounded by servitors, some of them seated and some of them standing, guarding a hoard of gold and silver and other valuables.⁵⁵

“This lady,” said the old woman, “is the mistress of the household and was born in the year wu-ch'en.

Those born in wu-ch'en or chi-ssu are like trees from a great forest;

Throughout her life she will be characterized by humanity and righteousness.

Wife and Concubines Laughingly Consult the Tortoise Oracle

She is magnanimous by nature;
 Benevolent and given to good works;⁵⁶
 Recites scripture and bestows alms;
 And distributes her favors widely.
 Throughout her life she will labor to maintain the household;
 Even at the cost of taking the blame for the faults of others.⁵⁷
 But it may not be said that,
 Her joy and anger are constant, and She is inept in managing her servants.

Truly:

When she is happy, she is all ingratiating smiles;
 When she is angry, she is all reverberating wrath.
 Others may sleep till the sun is high in the sky before getting out of bed;
 But you are up betimes, superintending the maids as they do the pots and pans.
 Though your temper may occasionally flare up like windblown fire;⁵⁸
 In the twinkling of an eye, you'll be talking and laughing once more.
 The only problem is the presence of adverse signs in your 'palace of illness and adversity,'⁵⁹
 Indicating that you are ever beset with bickering,

Though your goodness of heart will enable you to overcome it.

In the end, you will live to the ripe old age of sixty-nine."

"Can you tell whether this lady is fated to have any sons?" asked Meng Yü-lou.

"Pray don't take it amiss," said the old woman, "but there's something indistinct about her 'palace of sons and daughters.'⁶⁰ In the end she will have to depend on a son who has taken the tonsure to support her in her old age. This is not something she can do anything about, but chances are she will not be able to keep him."

Meng Yü-lou smiled at Li P'ing-erh, saying, "That must refer to your son Wu Ying-yüan who has had a religious name bestowed upon him as a Taoist priest."

Yüeh-niang then pointed to Meng Yü-lou and said, "You, too, ought to get her to tell your fortune."

"Tell the fortune," said Yü-lou, "of a thirty-three-year-old woman who was born at 4:00 AM on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month."

The old woman once again laid out her fortune-telling diagrams and put the consecrated tortoise in place, where, after making a circuit, it came to rest on a diagram designated "palace of fate."⁶¹ When the old woman picked up this second diagram, it turned out to depict a woman, accompanied by three men, one of whom was dressed like a travelling merchant in his skullcap, the second was an official dressed in red, and the third was a scholar, who was also guarding a hoard of gold and silver. They were surrounded by servitors to wait upon them.

The old woman said, "This lady was born in the year chia-tzu.

Those born in chia-tzu or i-ch'ou are like gold in the sea;

But her fate is crossed by the 'three penalties' and 'six banes.'⁶²

Only by gaining ascendancy over her husband will she be all right."

"I already have," said Meng Yü-lou.

The old woman continued:

"You are gentle and congenial by nature,⁶³

And possess a good disposition.

When you are annoyed at anyone, they don't know it;

When you are pleased by anyone, they don't know it;

You do not display your feelings.

Throughout your life you will please your superiors, be respected by your inferiors,

And gain the love and favor of your husband.

But there is one problem.

No matter how many good turns you may do for others,

You will often fail to win their hearts.

Throughout your life you are fated to take the blame for the faults of others;

No matter how much trouble petty persons may make for you,

You will not be praised for your forbearance.

But since your heart is in the right place,

Even though petty persons should annoy you,

They will not succeed in making you give way."

"Just now," said Yü-lou with a smile, "when I took the heat for that ruckus with Father over the page boy's demand for money,⁶⁴ I guess that was an example of my:

Taking the blame for the faults of others."

"Can you tell whether or not this lady will have any sons in the future?" asked Wu Yüeh-niang.

"If she navigates her vicissitudes safely," the old woman said, "she may have a daughter, though it does not appear that she will have a son. As for longevity, that she will have."

"Now tell the fortune of this lady," said Yüeh-niang. "Sister Li, tell her the eight characters of your horoscope."

"I was born in the year of the sheep," said Li P'ing-erh with a smile.

"If it's the lesser sheep," said the old woman, "you would be twenty-six, and have been born in the year hsin-wei. What month were you born in?"

"I was born at noon on the fifteenth day of the first month," Li P'ing-erh replied.

The old woman started the tortoise on its circuit, and it came to an abrupt halt on another diagram designated "palace of fate." When the old woman picked up this diagram, it turned out to depict a woman accompanied by three officials, the first of whom was dressed in red, the second of whom was dressed in green, and the third of whom was dressed in blue. She was holding a child in her arms and was guarding a hoard of gold and silver and other valuables. Beside her there stood a demon with a blue face, protruding fangs, and red hair.⁶⁵

The old woman said, "As for this lady:

Those born in keng-wu or hsin-wei are like earth beside the road;

Throughout her life she will enjoy glory and luxury, wealth and honor.

She will have all she wants to eat, and all she needs to wear;

The husbands whom she attracts will be persons of distinction.

Her heart will be characterized by humanity and righteousness.

Gold and silver, riches and silk⁶⁶ will not be a matter of concern.

She is content to let herself be taken advantage of or exploited;

Indeed, she is disappointed if they do not take advantage of her.

But she will suffer from the 'matched shoulders' in her horoscope,
And find that, in everything, others will requite kindness with enmity.

Truly:

'Matched shoulders,' 'penalties,' and 'banes,' will make difficulties for her;
In the twinkling of an eye, they will exhibit a heartless knack for knavery.
It is preferable to encounter a tiger blocking the road to your 'three births';⁶⁷
Than to meet someone, before your very eyes, with two faces and three knives.

Pray don't take what I say amiss, lady, but you're just like a bolt of fine red silk that is, unfortunately, a little shorter than it ought to be. You should try not to let yourself get so upset over things. And, as for the prospects of your son, it's hard to say."

"He has already had a religious name bestowed upon him as a Taoist priest," said Li P'ing-erh.

"If he has already left lay life," said the old woman, "he should be safe. But there is another problem. This year the planet Ketu⁶⁸ impinges on your fate,⁶⁹ meaning that you may suffer a bloody catastrophe.⁷⁰ Only if you can avoid hearing the sound of weeping in the seventh and eighth months, will you be all right."

When she had finished speaking, Li P'ing-erh fished a five-candareen lump of silver out of her sleeve, and Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou each gave her fifty cash.

Just after they had sent the old woman who told fortunes by means of the tortoise oracle on her way, whom should they see but P'an Chin-lien, who came out from the rear compound with Hsi-men Ta-chieh and said with a laugh, "I was just saying that you were not to be found in the back, and it turns out that you have all come out to the front here."

"We came out just now to see off the abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery," explained Yüeh-niang. "Since then, all this while, we've been having our fortunes told by the tortoise oracle. If you had come a step earlier, we could have had her tell your fortune as well."

"Fortune-telling is not for me," said Chin-lien, with a shake of her head. "As the saying goes:

You may calculate a person's fate,

But you can't predict his conduct.

I remember that previous occasion when the Taoist practitioner was physiognomizing us and said that I would suffer a premature death. Who needs it? It only serves to make one depressed. What will be, will be.

If I die in the street, bury me in the street;

If I die on the highroad, bury me on the road;

And if I should fall into an open drain,

It will just have to serve as my coffin."

When she had finished speaking, she returned to the rear compound with Yüeh-niang and the others. Truly:

The myriad affairs are things that one cannot argue with;

One's whole life is entirely determined by one's destiny.⁷¹

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Kan Lo's⁷² success came early, while Chiang Tzu-ya's⁷³ came late;
P'eng-tsu⁷⁴ and Yen Hui⁷⁵ attained longevities of differing length.
Fan Jan⁷⁶ was impoverished, while Shih Ch'ung⁷⁷ was a rich man;
However calculated, the differences were only in the timing.⁷⁸

Chapter 47

WANG LIU-ERH PEDDLES INFLUENCE

IN PURSUIT OF PROFIT;

HSI-MEN CH'ING ACCEPTS A BRIBE

AND SUBVERTS THE LAW

The wind agitates unruly waves, making the breakers turbulent;
Aboard a lonely craft, obliquely moored, one's sleep is anxious.
The cry of the isolated bird is shrill beyond the cold clouds;
The drum of the relay station interrupts
the traveller's dreams.
Poetic fancy only enhances the greenness of the poolside grass;
The river boats, without prearrangement, rise on the evening tide.
Gazing into the void, I enumerate those who truly understand me;
But there is only my old friend the moon up there in the sky.

THIS POEM merely reiterates the fact that on the northern frontier carts and horses are the norm, whereas in the Chiang-nan region boats and oars are more convenient. Hence, it is certainly true that:

Southerners ride boats, and Northerners ride horses.¹

The story goes that in the ancient city of Kuang-ling, or Yang-chou, in the Chiang-nan region, there dwelt a well-to-do commoner named Miao T'ienhsiu, who possessed property worth ten thousand strings of cash and was devoted to poetry and ritual.² He was thirty-nine years old and had no sons, but an only daughter, who had not yet been married. His wife, née Li, was bedridden with an intractable disease, so the affairs of the household had been entrusted to his favorite concubine, née Tiao, who was known as Tiao the Seventh. She was formerly a singing girl from a brothel on the main Yang-chou dock, whom Miao T'ien-hsiu had purchased for three hundred taels of silver and installed as a secondary wife in his household, where she reigned supreme in his affections.

Suddenly one day, an old Buddhist monk appeared at his door, claiming to be from the Pao-en Temple, or Temple of Kindness Required, in the Eastern Capital, who stated that because his temple hall lacked a gilded bronze effigy of an arhat, he had arrived here in the course of his peregrinations, in the hope of calling on the faithful and raising a subscription. Miao T'ien-hsiu was not stingy but promptly agreed to donate fifty taels of silver to the monk for this purpose.

"It scarcely requires so much," the monk said. "Half of that amount would suffice to finish the image in question."

"Master, pray don't take offense at the meagerness of my donation," said Miao T'ien-hsiu. "If there is anything left over after the completion of the Buddhist effigy, you can expend it on the customary oblations."

The monk folded his hands in front of his chest and made him a bow in the Buddhist manner to thank him for his gift.

Before taking his leave, he said to Miao T'ien-hsiu, "Under the socket of your left eye there is a white emanation, which is a fatal sign and indicates that before this year is out you will suffer a great calamity. Because you have shown such a generous affinity for me, how could I refrain from warning you of this impending event? From now on, no matter what may come up, you should on no account venture outside of this locality. Take heed! Take heed!"³

Having finished speaking, he took his leave of Miao T'ien-hsiu and departed.

Less than half a month later, Miao T'ien-hsiu happened to wander into his back garden, where he caught sight of his servant Miao Ch'ing,⁴ who had always been a dissolute scamp, embracing and whispering to his concubine, née Tiao, beside a pavilion. Not having anticipated Miao T'ien-hsiu's abrupt arrival, they did not have time to conceal themselves. Having caught sight of them:

Without permitting any further explanation,

Miao T'ien-hsiu proceeded to give Miao Ch'ing a severe beating and swore to expel him from the household. Miao Ch'ing was intimidated by this threat and begged the neighbors to intercede on his behalf, which they had to do more than once before he was finally allowed to remain. But he continued to harbor acute resentment in his heart.

Unexpectedly, a certain maternal cousin of Miao T'ien-hsiu's named Huang Mei, a native of Yang-chou, who had obtained office as a provincial graduate, who currently served as assistant prefect of K'ai-feng, the Eastern Capital, and who was a man possessed of:

Broad erudition and extensive knowledge, sent a man to Yang-chou one day to deliver a letter to his cousin, inviting him to come to the Eastern Capital for a visit. On the one hand, he could enjoy the sights; and on the other, something might be done to improve his future prospects.

When Miao T'ien-hsiu received this letter, he was:

Unable to contain his delight, and addressed his wife and concubine, saying, "The Eastern Capital is:

The purlieu of the imperial equipage, a place where splendor and luxury are concentrated. I have long harbored the wish to see it but have lacked an opportunity. Now that my maternal cousin has sent me this invitation, it will truly serve to fulfill the wish of a lifetime."⁵

To this his wife, née Li, responded, "The other day, when that monk examined your features, he detected a portent of calamity and enjoined you not to leave the premises. Moreover, the capital is a long way from here, your property is a weighty responsibility, and if you leave your young child and sick wife at home, there is no telling whether this trip will actually improve your prospects. It would be better not to go."

Miao T'ien-hsiu did not accept her argument but instead angrily rebuked her, saying, "For a:

Man of mettle, inhabiting the space between Heaven and Earth,⁶

Whose will is symbolized by a mulberry bow and rubus arrows,⁷ to be unable to:

Journey at will about the empire, and Appreciate the sights of the capital, but be content merely to:

Grow old and die beneath his own windows,⁸ is to have lived in vain. Moreover, for someone like myself, who:

Harbors talent in his breast,⁹ and whose:

Purse is abundantly supplied,¹⁰

what reason is there to worry that success will not come my way? If I pay this visit, my maternal cousin is sure to have something good in store for me. Don't say another word about it."

Thereupon, he ordered his servant Miao Ch'ing to get together his baggage and accoutrements, provided himself with two trunks of silver, loaded a boat with merchandise, and prepared to embark for the Eastern Capital, taking a page boy and Miao Ch'ing with him. Thinking that:

Achieving success and fame would be like picking up a mustard stalk;¹¹

Obtaining a desirable post would be like spitting into one's hand, he admonished his wife and concubine to take care of the household and set off on the appointed day.

It was at the end of autumn and the beginning of winter that he boarded his boat and departed from the dock in Yang-chou. After travelling for several days, they arrived at the Hsü-chou Rapids. Behold:

The stretch of white water,

Looked extremely menacing.

For a myriad li the water of the long rapids seems to be cascading;

As it strikes the islands on its way east they resound like thunder.¹²

The endless billowing of the snowy whitecaps¹³ causes people to fear;

When travelling merchants encounter it who is not affrighted?¹⁴

When they had proceeded to a place called Shan-wan, Miao T'ien-hsiu saw that it was getting late and ordered the boatmen to lay to for the night. It was one of those occasions on which:

His fated lot was running out;

Something was destined to happen.

Unbeknownst to him, the boat he had hired was a pirate boat, and the two boatmen were both evildoers, one of whom was named Ch'en the Third and the other Weng the Eighth. As the saying goes:

Without the help of an insider,

A household cannot be broached.¹⁵

Now this Miao Ch'ing held a deep grudge against his master, Miao T'ienhsiu, for the beating he had previously received at his hands. He had wanted to get revenge for some time but had not had an opportunity to do so.

From his mouth no word was uttered, but

In his heart he thought to himself,

"Why don't I:

Thus and thus, and

So and so,

collaborate with these two boatmen in seizing my master, killing him, shoving his body into the water, and then dividing his property between us? If I return home and manage to plot the death of his invalid wife, his whole estate, together with his concubine, née Tiao, will all be mine."

Truly:

Flowering branches, beneath their leaves, conceal their thorns;

How can one know for sure the human heart contains no poison?¹⁶

This Miao Ch'ing, thereupon, proceeded to consult secretly with the two boatmen, saying, "In my master's leather trunks, in addition to a thousand taels of silver, there are two thousand taels worth of satin piece goods, and an ample quantity of clothing and so forth. If the two of you are willing to conspire with me against him, I am willing to agree to an equitable division of the spoils."

Ch'en the Third and Weng the Eighth laughed, saying, "Since you have spoken, we need not deceive you, but we have had the same idea for some time."

That night, the sky was overcast and dark. Miao T'ien-hsiu and the page boy, An-t'ung, were asleep in the middle cabin, and Miao Ch'ing was in the stern sheets behind the scull. When it was nearly the third watch, around midnight, Miao Ch'ing deliberately started calling out, "Thief! Thief!"

Miao T'ien-hsiu, upon being startled out of his dreams, stuck his head out of the cabin door to see what was up, and Ch'en the Third, who was holding a sharp knife in his hand, stabbed him in the throat with a single thrust, and then shoved the body into the turbulent waves of the shallow. An-t'ung tried to escape, but Weng the Eighth struck him a blow from behind, which knocked him into the water.

The three conspirators then went into the cabin, where they extracted all the victim's property and money, satin goods and clothing, and proceeded to sort things out before dividing them up among themselves.

The two boatmen then said, "Brother, if we were to keep these piece goods, we would surely be caught. But, because you are a servant in his employ, if you transport these goods to market and offer to sell them, no one will suspect anything."

On this account, the two boatmen, after dividing the thousand ounces of silver in the leather trunk, and Miao T'ien-hsiu's clothing, etc., between them, proceeded to punt their boat back in the direction they had come from. Miao Ch'ing, on the other hand, engaged another boat, on which he conveyed his booty as far as the dock at Lin-ch'ing,¹⁷ where he saw it through the customs station, and then had it transported by land to Ch'ing-ho district, and stored in a licensed warehouse outside the city wall. When he encountered merchants from Yang-chou with whom he was familiar, he merely explained that his master was on another boat, behind him, and would soon arrive. But we will say no more for the moment about how Miao Ch'ing endeavored to dispose of his merchandise.

As the saying goes:

Though men may plan to do thus and so:

Heaven's principles may yet deny them.¹⁸

Alas for Miao T'ien-hsiu! Although:

He had always been a good man, one fine day, he was done in by his own servant, and:

Failed to achieve a good death.¹⁹

Though it is true that he had:

Miao Ch'ing Connives in the Murder of His Master

Disregarded a well-meant admonishment, it is also the case that:

One's allotted years are hard to evade.²⁰

Who could have anticipated that, although An-t'ung was knocked unconscious by the boatman and fell into the water, he fortunately escaped death. After bobbing up and down for a while among the reeds in the cove, he was able to climb ashore, where he proceeded to loudly lament his fate on the embankment.

Gradually:

The dawn began to glimmer,²¹ and there suddenly appeared a fishing boat, coming downstream from the upper reaches of the river, with an old man sitting on it, dressed in a hat of woven bamboo and a short coir rain cape. Upon hearing the sound of lamentation coming from deep among the reeds along the bank, he moved his boat closer to investigate and found that it was a sixteen- or seventeen-year-old boy, whose body was completely soaked with water. When he enquired into the story behind this, from first to last, he learned that his interlocutor was a page boy from Miao T'ien-hsiu's household who had suffered a criminal assault on the rapids. The old fisherman took him aboard his boat, poled it back to his home, provided him with a change of clothing, and gave him something to eat and drink.

He then went on to ask him, "Would you prefer to go back where you came from, or would you like to stay here and live with me?"

An-t'ung wept, saying, "My master has met with a calamity, and I don't know what has become of him.²² What home have I got to return to? I would prefer to stay here with you, sir."

"That's all right," said the old fisherman. "You can stay here with me for the time being. I'll gradually make inquiries into who your assailants might be, and we can decide what to do then.”²³

An-t'ung bowed in gratitude to the old man and resigned himself to trying to make a go of it with him henceforth.

One day, it was one of those occasions on which:

Something was destined to happen.

On the last day of the year, the old fisherman, taking An-t'ung with him, had just come out to the port on the New Canal to sell his catch, when Ch'en the Third and Weng the Eighth, who had been drinking aboard their boat, happened to come ashore, dressed in Miao T'ien-hsiu's clothes, in order to buy fish.

An-t'ung recognized them and surreptitiously communicated this to the old fisherman, saying, “My master's wrong is about to be righted.”

The old fisherman said, “Why don't you prepare a deposition and lodge a complaint against them with the proper authorities? That ought to settle the case.”

An-t'ung then proceeded to prepare a deposition and presented it to the office of the Regional Military Command, which was responsible for security along that section of the Grand Canal, but Commandant Chou Hsiu rejected the complaint for lack of material evidence. He then presented his complaint to the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, and when Hsia Yenling saw that it involved accusations of armed robbery and murder on the part of criminal elements, he agreed to hear the case.

On the fourteenth day of the first month, he sent detectives, taking An-t'ung with them, to arrest the suspects. When they arrived at the port on the New Canal, they took Ch'en the Third and Weng the Eighth into custody and brought them before the bench. Upon interrogation, the two boatmen saw that An-t'ung was standing by to give evidence against them and, without even being subjected to torture, admitted to every particular of the charges. Their deposition stated that at the time of the crime, the victim's servant, Miao Ch'ing, was also present and had conspired with them to murder his master, after which, he had taken his share of the booty and departed. All three persons, both accused and accuser, were incarcerated pending the arrest of Miao Ch'ing, at which time the sentencing of the guilty parties would take place.

Because of the New Year's holiday, the officials and staff of the Provincial Surveillance Commission did not report to the yamen for the next two days in a row. Well before this time was up, however, a hanger-on at the gate of the yamen who specialized in leaking news had covertly tipped Miao Ch'ing off. Miao Ch'ing was panic-stricken by this news, locked the door of his room, and surreptitiously hid out in the home of the proprietor of the warehouse, a broker named Yüeh the Third.

Now this Yüeh the Third lived in a house, with a six-foot-wide frontage and three interior courtyards, receding along a vertical axis, that was located right next door to that of Han Tao-kuo on the east²⁴ side of the stone bridge on Lion Street, and his wife was on very good terms with Wang Liu-erh. She constantly came over to Wang Liu-erh's place to visit, and when Wang Liu-erh had nothing else to do, she would visit her in return, so that the two of them had become quite intimate with each other.

When Yüeh the Third took a look at Miao Ch'ing and saw that:

His face exhibited a worried hue, he asked what the trouble was and then said, “It's no big deal. The wife of the house next door is the mistress of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, and her husband is the manager of one of his business enterprises. The wife is on such good terms with my spouse that, in all things, she is:

Obedient to her every whim.

If you want to ensure that nothing will come of this trouble of yours, as long as you're willing to spend what it takes, you should get my wife to go over and negotiate things with her counterpart next door.”

When Miao Ch'ing heard this, he promptly got down on his knees and said, “If there is any way you can enable me to escape this predicament I am in:

Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

I will never dare to forget it.”

Thereupon, he proceeded to write out an explanatory note and sealed up a packet of fifty taels of silver, along with two outfits of figured satin clothing, while Yüeh the Third directed his wife to go next door and explain the matter, thus and so, to Wang Liu-erh. The latter was as pleased as could be and took possession of the clothing, the silver, and the explanatory note, in order to await Hsi-men Ch'ing's next visit, but he failed to turn up.

On the seventeenth, when the sun began to set in the west, who should appear but Tai-an, riding along the middle of the street on horseback, with his master's felt bag under his arm.

Wang Liu-erh, who was standing at her front door, called him to a halt and asked, “Where are you headed?”

“I've been accompanying Father on a long trip to deliver some presents in Tung-p'ing prefecture,” replied Tai-an.

“Where's your master right now?” asked Wang Liu-erh. “Has he come back already, or not?”

“Father and Pen the Fourth,” said Tai-an, “have gone home ahead of me.”

Wang Liu-erh then invited him inside, explained the matter to him, thus and so, and showed him the explanatory note.

“Auntie Han,” said Tai-an, “don't underestimate the gravity of this case you are proposing to meddle with. Right now, the two boatmen who are in custody at the yamen have confessed, and he is the only other party implicated. If you come up with only these few taels of silver, they will not even suffice to take care of the servants in the case. Even if I were to do nothing else but broach the subject to him, Auntie Han, I would demand twenty taels of silver from you. Then, if I should manage to get Father to come over here, you can take the matter up with him however you like.”

“You crazy oily mouth!” laughed Wang Liu-erh.

“If you want something to eat,

You shouldn't offend the cook.”²⁵

If the endeavor succeeds, taking care of you will not be a problem. Even if we were not to get anything out of it ourselves, we would see to it that you were not shortchanged.”

“Auntie Han,” said Tai-an, “that's not it at all. As the saying goes:

The superior man is not ashamed to speak face to face.²⁶

Once the prior conditions are determined,

There may be room for further discussion."

Wang Liu-erh, thereupon, provided a selection of delicacies and invited Tai-an to have a drink.

"If I drink until my head and face are red," said Tai-an, and Father asks me about it, what am I to say?"

"What is there to be afraid of?" said Wang Liu-erh. "Just say that this is where you were."

Thereupon, Tai-an, after drinking only a single goblet of wine, prepared to depart.

"Whatever you do, I'm much indebted to you for speaking on my behalf," said Wang Liu-erh. "I'll be waiting here for the result."

Tai-an then proceeded to mount his horse and go straight home, where he handed over the felt bag he had been carrying and stood in attendance in the rear compound until Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had been taking a nap in his room, came out and sat down in an anteroom.

Tai-an casually approached him and, having nothing else to report, said, "As I was on my way home, Auntie Han called me to a halt and wanted me to ask you to go over there as soon as possible, because she has something important to say to you."

"What could that be?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll do as she suggests."

No sooner had he finished speaking than a certain school official named Liu came by to negotiate a loan for some silver. After he had taken care of this School Official Liu, Hsi-men Ch'ing mounted his horse, put on his eye shades and an informal skullcap, directed Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung to accompany him, and made his way to Wang Liu-erh's house. Once there, he dismounted, went inside, and sat down in the parlor, and Wang Liu-erh came out to greet him.

That day, because it was his turn to spend the night in the shop across the street, Han Tao-kuo had not come home, but his wife had bought a lot of provisions and arranged for Old Mother Feng to prepare them in the kitchen, in anticipation of Hsi-men Ch'ing's arrival. The maidservant, Chin-erh, brought in the tea, and the woman served it to him. Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered Ch'in-t'ung to take his horse to the house across the street, and close the front door after him.

The woman, who was circumspect about plunging right into the matter at hand, merely started out by saying, "Father, you must be exhausted by the successive days of entertaining at your place. I've heard that your son has been betrothed. Congratulations."

"It all started with the proposal of my Sister-in-law Wu," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "as a result of which we have arranged his betrothal with the Ch'iao family. Their household also has only this single daughter. If you stop to consider it, it's not an entirely appropriate match, but we decided, for better or for worse, to:

Add another tie to the existing ties,²⁷ between our families, that's all."

"It's fine enough that you should form a marriage alliance with them," said Wang Liu-erh, "the only thing is that since you now occupy such a high office, when you get together socially it could be embarrassing."

"What a suggestion!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After they had chatted for a while, the woman said, "I'm afraid you might be getting cold here. Why don't we go into my room."

On the one hand, she ushered him into her room, while on the other, she set out a chair next to the brazier for him, and Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down.

In due course, the woman took out Miao Ch'ing's explanatory note and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "He asked the wife of the broker Yüeh the Third, next door, to come over and speak to me about it. This Miao Ch'ing has been putting up at his warehouse and has been implicated, thus and so, by the two boatmen. His only hope is that his name may be eradicated from the case, so that he will not have to appear in court. He has presented me with some gifts in return for my good offices. For better or for worse, I hope that you will see fit to do what you can for him."

Hsi-men Ch'ing perused the explanatory note and then asked, "What were the gifts he offered you?"

Wang Liu-erh got the fifty taels of silver out of her trunk and showed them to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "In the future, if his overture should prove successful, he has also promised me two outfits of clothing."

Hsi-men Ch'ing looked at the silver and laughed, saying, "Is that all? What can you hope to do with such a paltry sum? You may not know it, but this Miao Ch'ing is the servant of a wealthy commoner from Yang-chou named Miao T'ien-hsiu, who conspired with the two boatmen on their boat to murder his master and dump him in the river, a case of conspiracy to commit murder with larcenous intent. Right now they are trying to dredge up the body but have not yet recovered it. Moreover, the evidence provided by the two boatmen before the bench has led to the finding of the page boy, Ant'ung, who had originally accompanied him, who has also given testimony, so that there are three witnesses against him. If he is brought before the court, he is sure to be judged guilty of a crime for which the penalty is death by slow slicing,²⁸ while the other two offenders will only be subject to decapitation.²⁹ At present, the two boatmen have also testified that he has two thousand taels worth of merchandise in his possession. What does he expect to accomplish with this paltry amount of silver? You might just as well return it to him immediately."

Wang Liu-erh thereupon went into the kitchen and sent the maidservant, Chin-erh, to call over Yüeh the Third's wife, to whom she returned the original gifts and explained the situation, thus and so.

If Miao Ch'ing had not heard about this nothing might have happened, but having heard about it, he felt as though he had been:

Doused with a bucket of water,

All the way from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet.

Truly:

The shock affected all six of his vital organs, including liver and gall;

The fright damaged the three ethereal and seven material souls in his heart.

Without more ado, he invited Yüeh the Third to a conference and said, "Even if I have to give up this two thousand taels worth of merchandise, I am willing to do that, if I can only manage to save my life and get home safely."

"If that's what His Honor has to say from his exalted vantage point," opined Yüeh the Third, "it would seem that halfway measures will simply not suffice to influence the two officials involved. You'll have to set aside a thousand taels worth of merchandise for them, and at least half of what is left over will be needed to take care of the adjutants, and the detectives who originally arrested the culprits.”

“On top of everything else,” said Miao Ch’ing, “I haven’t yet arranged the sale of the merchandise. How am I going to come up with the requisite silver?”

He then sent Yüeh the Third’s wife over to speak to Wang Liu-erh, saying, “If His Honor is willing to accept merchandise, I can deliver a thousand taels worth to him. If that does not suit him, I respectfully hope that he will allow me two or three days of grace, which will enable me to sell off the merchandise at a reduced price, after which I will come in person and present the proceeds at His Honor’s residence.”

Wang Liu-erh took the note containing this proposal back into her room and showed it to Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“If that’s the way it is,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “I’ll order the original detectives involved in the case to put off arresting him for a few days. But tell him to present the list of his proposed gifts immediately.”

Thereupon, the wife of Yüeh the Third, on receiving this oral instruction, went back to report to Miao Ch’ing, who was delighted by the news.

Hsi-men Ch’ing realized that there were people right next door, and thought it prudent not to extend his visit. After drinking a few goblets of wine and engaging in intercourse with the woman for a while, on seeing that his servant had come back to fetch him with his horse, he got up and returned home.

The next day, upon going to the yamen, at the early session of the court he did not bring up this case for a hearing, but instead ordered the detectives not to make any further arrests. Miao Ch’ing, on his part, sought the assistance of the broker, Yüeh the Third, in making contact with buyers that very night, in order to unload his merchandise. In less than three days he managed to dispose of it all and realized the sum of one thousand seven hundred taels of silver. Without touching his original gift to Wang Liu-erh, he augmented it with another fifty taels of silver and, in addition, presented her with four outfits of first-class clothing.

To resume our story, on the nineteenth, Miao Ch’ing counted out a thousand taels of silver, which he concealed in four wine jars, purchased a freshly butchered pig, and, waiting until after the lamps were lighted, had them carried to the gate of Hsi-men Ch’ing’s residence. The servants were all in on it, so Tai-an, P’ing-an, Shu-t’ung, Ch’in-t’ung, and the four prison guards who made the delivery were paid off with ten taels of silver. Tai-an also demanded another ten taels of silver for himself from Wang Liu-erh.

In a little while, Hsi-men Ch’ing came out and took a seat in the summer-house. No lamps were lit, and:

The light of the moon was dusky,³⁰ for it had just arisen.

The gifts were carried into his presence, and Miao Ch’ing, wearing black clothing, proceeded to kowtow to Hsi-men Ch’ing, saying, “Your humble servant has been the recipient of your life-saving grace. Though:

My body should be pulverized and my bones shattered,³¹

I can hardly hope to repay you either dead or alive.”³²

“As for this case in which you are involved,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “I haven’t even properly looked into it yet. Those two boatmen are adamant in implicating you. If you should appear in court, you would be charged with a very serious crime. But since people have intervened on your behalf, I’m allowing you to escape with your life. If I were not to accept this gift of yours, you would not be reassured. I intend to give half of it to Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, so the two of us will both participate in doing you this favor. You cannot afford to stick around any longer, but should set out for home this very night.”

“Where do you live in Yang-chou?” he went on to ask.

Miao Ch’ing kowtowed in reply, saying, “Your humble servant lives inside the city walls of Yang-chou.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing ordered that tea should be brought from the rear compound, and Miao Ch’ing stood underneath the pine trees as he drank it and then kowtowed once again, took his leave, and departed.

But Hsi-men Ch’ing called him back, saying, “Have you spoken to the detectives involved in the original arrest, or not?”

“I have already settled things satisfactorily with all the other people involved,” said Miao Ch’ing.

“In that case,” Hsi-men Ch’ing directed him, “you had better set out for home immediately.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing Takes a Bribe and Subverts the Law

Miao Ch'ing accordingly went out the gate, returned to Yüeh the Third's house, and proceeded to get his baggage ready for the journey. He found that he still had a hundred and fifty taels of silver on hand, of which he took fifty taels, together with a few remaining bolts of satin, and gave them to Yüeh the Third and his wife out of gratitude for their help. At the fifth watch, around 4:00 AM, they hired a long-distance pack animal for him, and he set out on his way to Yang-chou. Truly, he was:

As flustered as a dog who has lost his way home;³³

As flurried as a fish who has escaped the net.³⁴

We will say no more for the moment about how Miao Ch'ing escaped with his life, but return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He and Hsia Yen-ling came out of the yamen together when the court session was over and rode along with their horses side by side until they arrived at the entrance to Main Street, where Hsia Yen-ling was about to take his leave as they parted company.

But Hsi-men Ch'ing, without dismounting, raised his whip and said, "If my colleague has no objections, would you condescend to drop by my place for a chat?"

Having succeeded in inviting Judicial Commissioner Hsia to his home, Hsi-men Ch'ing dismounted with him outside the gate and proceeded into the reception hall, where, after they had exchanged the appropriate amenities, Hsi-men Ch'ing conducted him to the summerhouse, and they loosened their clothing as the attendants served them with tea. Shu-t'ung and Tai-an then came in and set up a table for their entertainment.

"I really ought not to barge in this way and put my colleague to such trouble," said Hsia Yen-ling.

"Whoever heard of such a thing," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Before long, the two page boys brought in an assortment of refreshments in square boxes and set them down to one side. They consisted of chicken feet, goose, duck, fresh fish, and other appetizers, making a total of sixteen bowls in all. After they had consumed this repast, and the utensils had been cleared away, another selection of savories suitable to accompany wine drinking was brought out, as well as little gold goblets with handles, on silver saucers, and gold-inlaid ivory chopsticks.

As they were drinking wine together, Hsi-men Ch'ing casually brought up the subject of Miao Ch'ing's case, saying, "This rascal yesterday impertuned a member of the gentry to come and intercede with me insistently on his behalf, and also presented me with something in the way of an inducement. Your pupil would certainly:

Not presume to take matters into his own hands,³⁵ and that is why I have invited my colleague here today, in order to consult with him about it."

Thereupon, he handed the gift card to Hsia Yen-ling, who read it and then said, "My colleague should feel free to decide the matter as he sees fit."

"As I see it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "tomorrow we might as well continue proceedings against those two culprits on the basis of the actual booty in their possession. There is no need to proceed any further against this Miao Ch'ing. As for the original plaintiff, that page boy, An-t'ung, we can release him on bond until such time as the corpse of Miao T'ien-hsiu comes to light. It will not be too late to settle the case at that time. The gifts I propose to send over to your place."

"This last proposal of my colleague's is not right," said Judicial Commissioner Hsia. "Your view of the case is quite appropriate, and it is you who have taken the trouble to deal with it. Why should you have to share anything with me? That will never do."

They dickered about it, back and forth, for some time before Hsi-men Ch'ing, seeing no alternative, agreed to split the gratuity evenly between them and arranged to have five hundred taels put into food boxes.

Judicial Commissioner Hsia got up from his seat and bowed in thanks, saying, "Since my colleague has chosen to favor me in this way, to refuse yet again would be to display a fastidious response to your lavish generosity.

I will never be able to thank you enough.
It is really quite embarrassing."

Only after accepting a few more cups of wine did he say goodbye and leave. For his part, Hsi-men Ch'ing forthwith ordered Tai-an to take charge of the boxes, which still appeared to contain wine, and have them carried to Hsia Yen-ling's home. When they arrived there, Judicial Commissioner Hsia came out to the door in person to receive them, produced a return note, and presented Tai-an with two taels of silver, and the two orderlies with four mace apiece. But no more of this. Truly:

When heat reaches the proper level, the pig's head is dissolved;

When money reaches the right hands, the case is resolved.³⁶

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing and Hsia Yen-ling had already colluded on a plan of action, and, the next day, when they went to the yamen and took their places on the bench, the clerks, adjutants, detectives, and inspectors, high and low, had all been taken care of by Yüeh the Third on Miao Ch'ing's behalf. The instruments of torture were conspicuously displayed, and Ch'en the Third and Weng the Eighth were brought out of the lockup and subjected to interrogation.

When their depositions reiterated that they had conspired with the servant of the deceased, Miao Ch'ing, Hsi-men Ch'ing became enraged, and shouted to the attendants, "Put them to the question. You two bandits have been active on the rivers and waterways for years, pretending to be engaged in riverine transportation, while actually devoting yourselves to plundering the property of your passengers, holding up merchants, and committing murder with larcenous intent."³⁷ Right now there is this page boy who testifies that you stabbed Miao T'ien-hsiu to death with a knife and threw him overboard, after which you wounded him by a blow with a stick that knocked him into the water as well. There is also the evidence provided by the fact that you are wearing items of his master's clothing. How can you have the nerve to try to implicate anyone else?"

He then had An-t'ung brought forward and asked him, "Who was it who stabbed your master to death and pushed him overboard?"

An-t'ung testified, "On the day in question, at the third watch of the night, Miao Ch'ing started calling out, 'Thief!' At which, when my master came out of the cabin to investigate, he was stabbed to death with one thrust of a knife by Ch'en the Third, and pushed overboard. I was then struck a blow with a stick by Weng the Eighth, which knocked me into the water, and barely escaped with my life. I do not know anything about the whereabouts of Miao Ch'ing."

"The testimony of this page boy has the ring of truth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "How can the two of you get around it?"

Thereupon, he had a pair of ankle-squeezers put on each of them and had them struck thirty blows with a cudgel, with the result that their shinbones were crushed, and they:

Howled and writhed like stuck pigs.

More than half of their thousand taels worth of booty had been recovered, and the remainder had all been spent.

That very day, the judicial commissioners saw to the drafting of the necessary documents, sequestered the recovered booty, and forwarded the records of the case to Tung-p'ing prefecture. The prefect of Tung-p'ing prefecture, Hu Shih-wen,³⁸ who was also on good terms with Hsi-men Ch'ing, made out the formal indictment according to the terms of the documents he had received and provisionally sentenced Ch'en the Third and Weng the Eighth to decapitation for the crimes of armed robbery and murder, while releasing An-t'ung on bond pending further developments.

One day, An-t'ung made his way to the Eastern Capital, where he sought out the yamen of the assistant prefect, Huang Mei, and lodged a complaint accusing Miao Ch'ing of having stolen his master's property and then bribed the judicial commissioners to remove his name from the case, and asking when this miscarriage of justice at his master's expense could be righted.

When the assistant prefect, Huang Mei, had heard him out, he wrote a letter on his behalf that very night, sealed it up with his written complaint, provided him with travelling expenses, and told him to deliver it to the office of the regional investigating censor of Shantung.

As a direct result of this act, the wrongdoing of Miao Ch'ing would be reinvestigated from the beginning, and:

Though Hsi-men Ch'ing's deeds were done in the past,

Today the chickens would come home to roost.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Good and evil, in the end, always turn out to have their causes;
Good luck and bad, misfortune and fortune, travel hand in hand.^{39}
If, all your life, you have done nothing to be ashamed of;
The midnight sound of knocking at the door will not disturb you.^{40}

Chapter 48

INVESTIGATING CENSOR TSENG IMPEACHES

THE JUDICIAL COMMISSIONERS;

GRAND PRECEPTOR TS'AI SUBMITS

A MEMORIAL REGARDING SEVEN MATTERS

Some words of admonition:

Be alert to danger and recognize peril,
And you will finally avoid the meshes of the law.
Praise the good and recommend the worthy,
And you will attain a secure place for yourself.
Bestow kindness and practice virtue,¹
And you will ensure the success of your posterity.
Harbor venom and conceal treachery,
And your whole life will be subject to catastrophe.
To injure others for your own advantage,²
Is not, in the final analysis, a far-reaching plan.
To hurt your fellows to achieve success,³
Can scarcely be considered a long-range strategy.
Use of pseudonyms and disguised appearance,
Are always necessitated by resort to specious words.
Exposure to lawsuits and loss of property,
Are the inevitable consequences of inhumane conduct.⁴

THE STORY GOES that An-t'ung accepted the document and letter, took his leave of Assistant Prefect Huang Mei, and set out on the highroad to Shantung. Upon inquiry, he learned that the regional investigating censor was currently in residence at his office in Tung-ch'ang prefecture, that his name was Tseng Hsiao-hsü,⁵ that he was the son of the former censor-in-chief, Tseng Pu,⁶ had passed the chin-shih examination in the year 1115, and that he was an official of absolute integrity and honor.

An-t'ung thought to himself, "If I say that I am delivering a letter, the gate-keepers are certain not to let me in. I had better stay here until they hang up the tablet announcing the category of cases to be heard, at which point I can make my way in on my knees and present both the letter and my complaint at the same time. When His Honor sees them, he will surely consent to adjudicate the case."

Thereupon, he put the text of the complaint, which he had long since prepared, in his breast pocket and remained outside the gate of the regional investigating censor's office. After he had waited there for some time, he heard the sounding of the cloud-shaped gong that announced the sessions of the court. The main gate and the inner gate were opened, and Investigating Censor Tseng took his place on the bench. When the first tablet was displayed, it stated, in large characters, "Accusations against imperial princes, distaff relatives of the imperial family, consorts of imperial princesses, and members of influential households." When the second tablet was displayed, it read, "Complaints against the regional military commission, the provincial administration commission, the provincial surveillance commission, and the officers and functionaries of the armies and guards." Finally, when the third tablet was displayed, it read, "Lawsuits among commoners over census registration, marriage, land ownership, and other subjects of litigation."

An-t'ung, accordingly, followed in the wake of this tablet as it was carried inside, and it was only after all the other cases had been disposed of, that he knelt down at the foot of the red steps leading up to the dais. The attendants standing to either side demanded to know what his business was, and only then did An-t'ung present his letter, holding it up with both hands as high as he could.

From his position on the bench, Investigating Censor Tseng was heard to call out, "Bring it up here."

The docket officers in attendance hurriedly came down from the dais and, taking the letter back up with them, placed it on the table before him, after which Tseng Hsiao-hsü proceeded to open and peruse it. Truly, what did the contents of the document say? The letter read:

Earnestly indited by his junior fellow graduate in the capital, Huang Mei, for the perusal of his mentor and fellow graduate the distinguished censor Tseng, courtesy name Shao-t'ing:

Since I forsook your illustrious countenance,⁷ a year has abruptly elapsed.⁸ Those who truly understand one are difficult to meet.⁹ The most satisfying intercourse is easily interrupted. This heart of mine is ardent,¹⁰ ever endeavoring to keep at your side. Last autumn, upon the unexpected receipt of your elegant epistle, when I opened and reverently perused it, my spirit was transported, and I felt exactly as though we were face to face in the capital as of old. Whenever I am feeling melancholy, I recite it once again, and find that it relieves my spirits. Not long after that, you returned south to visit your parents, and I heard the good news that you had been appointed regional investigating censor of Shantung. I am quite:

Unable to contain my satisfaction.¹¹
Congratulations! Congratulations!

In consideration of the fact that my fellow graduate is an exemplar of the great virtues of loyalty and filiality, whose integrity is like the wind and frost, whose mind is ever subject to the grindstone of self-cultivation, who is a shining light in the imperial court, and a frequent topic of remark in the discourse of the gentry, now that you have taken up your position as an investigating censor, it is truly the season for you to expose examples of official malfeasance, with a view to the reformation of public morality. In the light of my humble admiration for you, this is something that I cannot forget.

I venture to observe that my fellow graduate, who has always possessed a capacity for significant deeds, and who finds himself at an appropriate time for action, it being an era of sage enlightenment and rectitude, and a day when his venerable father is still alive and well, should take advantage of the opportunity to greatly extend his talent and faculties in the cause of improving law and morals, so as not to allow pettifoggery functionaries to manipulate the statutes, or treacherous malefactors to practice their deceptions.

How is it then that in the prefecture of Tung-p'ing there should be such an egregious lawbreaker as Miao Ch'ing, and such a victim of unrequited injustice as Miao T'ien-hsiu? I would not have thought that in an era of sage enlightenment such demons could exist. Since this falls within my fellow graduate's jurisdiction, it is to be hoped that he will adjudicate this miscarriage of justice and set the record straight.

The bearer, An-t'ung, is the body servant of the victim, and the carrier of a written complaint that I hope you will condescend to consider. I am unable to express myself more fully. Composed on the sixteenth day of the middle month of spring.

When Investigating Censor Tseng Hsiao-hsü had finished reading the letter, he asked, "Does he have a written complaint or not?"

The attendants hurriedly came down from the dais and said, "His Honor wants to know whether you have a written complaint or not."

An-t'ung thereupon reached into his breast, pulled out the complaint, and formally presented it.

When Tseng Hsiao-hsü had perused it, he picked up his brush and endorsed it with the words, "The prefectural officials of Tung-p'ing prefecture are hereby adjured to conduct an honest inquiry in order to ascertain the facts of the case, examine the corpse of the deceased, and submit a report with all the relevant documents."

He then ordered that An-t'ung should proceed to Tung-p'ing prefecture in order to await the outcome of the proceedings. An-t'ung hastily kowtowed, got up from his knees, and was allowed to exit through a side door, while Tseng Hsiao-hsü, for his part, put the written complaint, along with his endorsement, in a dispatch case, sealed it with his official seal, and sent someone to deliver it to Tung-p'ing prefecture.

When the prefect, Hu Shih-wen, saw that the case had been remanded to him by a higher authority, he was thrown into such consternation that:

He did not know where to put hand or foot,¹² and delegated the problem to the vice-magistrate of Yang-ku district, Ti Ssupin.¹³ This individual was a native of Wu-yang in Honan province, was rigid and upright by nature, and did not solicit bribes, but was so muddleheaded in hearing cases that everyone called him Turbid Ti.

Sometime before this mandate came down, he had set out to reconnoiter the banks of the canal in the hope of locating the corpse of Miao T'ien-hsiu. It turned out to be one of those occasions on which:

Something was destined to happen.

Who could have anticipated that when Vice-Magistrate Ti Ssu-pin led his entourage in reconnoitering the banks of the canal to the west of the district seat of Ch'ing-ho, as they were going about their task, a whirlwind¹⁴ suddenly appeared in front of his mount, that refused to dissipate but kept pace with his horse as he proceeded.

"How uncanny!" remarked Ti Ssu-pin, reining in his horse, "You go follow this whirlwind wherever it goes," he ordered the runners in his entourage. "It's essential that we get to the bottom of this."

The runners did, indeed, follow in the wake of the whirlwind until it came to a halt just as they approached the port on the New Canal, and they went back to report this information to Ti Ssu-pin. The latter ordered them to take the local community elder into custody, and when they had used spades to excavate the soil of the embankment to a depth of several feet, they discovered a corpse, which actually displayed the scar of a knife wound on its throat. After ordering the coroner's assistant to complete his examination, he asked what the place that lay before them might be.

"The Tz'u-hui Ssu, or Temple of Compassionate Wisdom, is located not far from here," the runners reported.

Vice-Magistrate Ti then ordered that the resident monks of the temple be taken into custody and interrogated. They testified unanimously that during the tenth month of the preceding winter, when the temple was engaged in setting water lanterns afloat, they had found a corpse that had drifted into the inlet from upstream; that the abbot, out of compassion, had retrieved and buried it; and that they had no knowledge of the circumstances of the death.

"It is obvious," pronounced Vice-Magistrate Ti Ssu-pin, "that you monks conspired to kill this man and bury him here. No doubt he had valuables on his person, so you are unwilling to testify to the truth."

Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation, he had the abbot subjected to a session with the head-press, two applications of the finger-squeezers, and then put into ankle-squeezers which were struck a hundred blows. The remaining monks were each given twenty strokes with the heavy bamboo, after which he ordered that they all be incarcerated in the lockup.

When this information was conveyed to Tseng Hsiao-hsü, he ordered that the matter be reinvestigated and reported back to him, but the monks all claimed to be victims of injustice and refused to alter their testimony.

Tseng Hsiao-hsü thought to himself, "If these monks had really conspired to do him in, they would surely have thrown the corpse into the river. Why should they have buried it on the embankment instead? Moreover, there would have been too many people involved. There is something suspicious about this."

He therefore ordered that the monks should be kept in custody, and they had already been incarcerated for nearly two months when this formal complaint of An-t'ung's unexpectedly came into the picture, as a consequence of which, officers were deputed to escort An-t'ung to the site where the body had been discovered in order to identify the corpse.

When An-t'ung saw the body, he wept grievously, saying, "It truly is my master, and the wound inflicted by the knife of those bandits is still visible."

Thereupon, once the examination was completed, the results were reported back to Tseng Hsiao-hsü, who immediately released the monks in custody, while, on the other hand, he ordered a review of the documents in the case and had Ch'en the Third and Weng the Eighth interrogated once again. When they persisted in testifying that Miao Ch'ing had been the instigator of the plot, Tseng Hsiao-hsü was greatly angered and sent someone with an arrest warrant to go to the relevant prefecture in his jurisdiction and hale Miao Ch'ing before the court. At the same time he drafted a memorial impeaching the two judicial commissioners who had heard the case for having accepted bribes and put justice up for sale. Truly:

But Tseng Hsiao-hsü's review of this case righted an injustice.
Yet, though his orders were as stringent as the wind or thunder;
The wins and losses occurring in a dream are always unreliable.¹⁵

At this point the story divides into two. To resume our story, no sooner had Wang Liu-erh obtained the hundred taels of silver and four outfits of clothing for intervening on Miao Ch'ing's behalf, than she consulted with her husband, Han Tao-kuo, that very night and then busied herself all day and remained sleepless the following night, planning to have head ornaments, hairpins, and bracelets fashioned for herself, calling in a tailor to design clothes for her, and ordering the manufacture of a new fret of silver filigree. She also expended sixteen taels of silver to purchase an additional maidservant, named Ch'un-hsiang, to wait upon her, and, sooner or later, also serve the sexual needs of Han Tao-kuo. But no more of this.

One day Hsi-men Ch'ing dropped by Han Tao-kuo's home and Wang Liu-erh ushered him inside and served him with tea. When he had finished drinking his tea, Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to the rear of the house to relieve himself and happened to notice that there was a terrace on the second floor of the adjacent house.

"Who does that belong to?" he asked.

"It's the terrace on the house of Yüeh the Third next door," replied Wang Liu-erh.

Hsi-men Ch'ing directed Wang Liu-erh, "You tell him that he'd better take it down, or else. How can you allow him to interfere with the geomantic situation of your residence that way? If you won't, I'll have the local constable order him to do it."

Wang Liu-erh consulted with Han Tao-kuo about this, saying, "They're our neighbors. How can we broach the subject with them?"

"The best thing to do," said Han Tao-kuo, "would be to keep His Honor in the dark, buy a few sticks of lumber at the temple fair, and put up a terrace behind our own place over here. We can benefit by sun-drying bean paste on top of it, and using the room below for either a stable or a privy."

"Phooey!" his wife exclaimed. "What a louse of a senseless creature you are! Rather than erecting a terrace, wouldn't it be better to lay in some bricks and tiles, and construct two upper-story sheds?"

"If we merely put up two sheds," said Han Tao-kuo, "they won't be much use to us. We'd only use them for storage purposes. We might as well put up a single story, containing two small regular rooms."

Thereupon, they proceeded to lay out thirty taels of silver and had two flat-roofed rooms added to the back of their property. Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Tai-an in charge of a considerable quantity of wine, meat, and baked wheat cakes for them to use in rewarding the artisans for their efforts. Among the residents of the street there were none who were unaware of this.

Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, upon obtaining these several hundred taels of silver, used them to enroll his seventeen-year-old son, Hsia Ch'eng-en, as a degree candidate in the military school of the local guard, where he became a government student. Every day he entertained his instructors and friends, with whom he practiced archery and horsemanship. Hsi-men Ch'ing got together with Eunuch Director Liu and Eunuch Director Hsüeh, Commandant Chou Hsiu, Battalion Commander Ching Chung, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, and the entire officers corps of the guard battalion to contribute toward the cost of presenting him with a commemorative scroll in celebration of the occasion. But there is no need to describe this in detail.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had recently arranged for the construction of an artificial hill, summerhouses, and additional buildings on the site of his family graveyard, but, since the birth of Kuan-ko and his appointment as a battalion commander, he had not yet visited the family graves in order to sacrifice to his ancestors. After ordering Master Hsü, the yin-yang master, to assess the geomantic configuration of the site, he had a new gateway erected, a paved causeway leading to the tombs of his ancestors built, a mausoleum constructed, willows placed about the gate, pines and cypresses planted all around, and raised embankments situated on either side.

In anticipation of his visit to the graves of his ancestors on the Ch'ing-ming Festival, he planned to install a new plaque announcing his status as a member of the Embroidered-Uniform Guard, slaughter pigs and sheep, and order the appropriate table settings. Prior to the festival itself, which fell on the sixth day of the third month that year, he sent out invitations to a lot of people, arranged for the transportation of the requisite accoutrements, wine, rice, and other culinary supplies, and engaged the services of musicians and tumblers, a troupe of players, the boy actors Li Ming, Wu Hui, Wang Chu, and Cheng Feng, and the singing girls Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, Han Chin-ch'uan, and Tung Chiao-erh. The male guests he invited included Militia Commander Chang Kuan, Ch'iao Hung, his brothers-in-law Wu K'ai and Wu the Second, Hua Tzu-yu, Brother-in-law Shen, the husband of Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Manager Fu, Han Tao-kuo, Yün Li-shou, Pen Ti-ch'uan, and his son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi, more than twenty people in all. The females invited were Militia Commander Chang Kuan's wife, Kinswoman Chang, Ch'iao Hung's wife, Censor Chu's wife, the wife of Provincial Graduate Shang, Wu K'ai's wife, Wu the Second's wife, Aunt Yang, Old Mrs. P'an, Hua Tzu-yu's wife, Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, Meng Yü-lou's elder sister, Wu Shun-ch'en's wife, Third Sister Cheng, Ts'ui Pen's wife, Big Sister Tuan, and, from his own household, Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, Ch'un-mei, Ying-ch'un, Yü-hsiao, Lan-hsiang, and the wet nurse, Ju-i, holding Kuan-ko in her arms. Altogether, twenty-four or twenty-five sedan chairs were required to accommodate them all.

Before the day in question, Yüeh-niang had spoken to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "There's no need to have the child taken out to the graveyard. On the one hand, he's not even a year old, and on the other hand, Dame Liu says that his parietal bones are not yet completely formed, and that he has a timorous disposition. It's a long way to the graveyard, and I fear he could become frightened. In my view, it would be better not to have him go, but to leave him here at home, where the wet nurse and Old Mother Feng can look after him, and let his mother go without him."

But Hsi-men Ch'ing would not listen to her, saying, "Really! Why shouldn't the two of them, mother and child, both go to the graveyard to kowtow to my ancestors? You put too much stock in the nonsense put out by that crone. The old whore! Even if it be true that the child's parietal bones are not yet completely formed, as long as you have the wet nurse wrap him up securely in a quilt while they are in the sedan chair, what is there to be afraid of?"

"Since you refuse to take anyone's advice," said Yüeh-niang, "you may do as you please."

Early on the morning of the day in question, the female guests all left their homes to forgather for the occasion, mounted their sedan chairs, and set off. But no more of this.

When they approached the family graveyard, five li outside the South Gate, they beheld from a distance that:

The verdant pines were luxuriant,
The emerald cypresses were dense.

The graveyard had been enhanced by the newly erected gateway, the two raised embankments on either side, and a stone wall surrounding the entire site. The paved causeway in the middle, the mausoleum, the spirit platform, the incense burners, and the candlesticks were all hewn out of white alabaster. The newly replaced plaque on the gate was inscribed in large characters, reading: The Ancestral Graveyard of Master Hsi-men, Commandant for Military Strategy of the Embroidered-Uniform Guard. The main facade of the mausoleum was:

Encompassed by raised earthen embankments, and
A copse of trees with interlacing branches.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, clad in scarlet official attire, having seen to the setting out of the slaughtered pigs and sheep and other sacrificial offerings, and table settings, proceeded to pay formal homage to his ancestors. Only after the male guests had followed suit did the female guests do likewise.

As these acts of worship took place, percussion instruments, gongs, and drums were all sounded simultaneously, and the resulting din so frightened Kuan-ko that he hid himself in the wet nurse's breast, started to choke, and did not dare to move a muscle.

Yüeh-niang then called out, "Sister Li, how come you haven't had the wet nurse take the child back to the rear yet? Just see how frightened he is. I said there was no need to bring the child, but that obstinate good-for-nothing of ours insisted on having him wrapped up and brought along anyway. Just see how frightened he is."

Li P'ing-erh promptly came down from her seat, ordered Tai-an to have them stop beating the gongs and drums, and directed the wet nurse to quickly cover the baby's ears and take him back to the rear of the premises.

In a little while, after the sacrifices were finished, Master Hsü had recited the elegy to the dead, and the paper money had been burnt, Hsi-men Ch'ing invited the male guests to join him in the front reception hall, while Yüeh-niang invited the female guests to come with her to the summerhouse in the rear. They proceeded through the garden to get there.

To either side of the juniper hedges,
Were arrayed bamboo-lined walks and balustrades;
In all directions the flowering trees,
Stretched before them as far as the eye could see.

Truly:

The red peach blossoms and the green willows¹⁶ are traversed by shuttling orioles;
All of which were brought into being by the creativity of the Lord of the East.

Thereupon, the troupe of players put on a performance for the female guests in the summerhouse, while the four boy actors sang for a time in the front reception hall for the entertainment of the male guests, and the four singing girls took turns serving the wine. The four senior maidservants, Ch'unmei, Yü-hsiao, Lan-hsiang, and Ying-ch'un, waited on the female guests, holding flagons and pouring wine, after which they stood beside Hsi-men Tachieh's table and had something to eat.

After the female guests had feasted for some time, P'an Chin-lien, along with Meng Yü-lou, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, Li Kuei-chieh, and Wu Yin-erh, went into the garden together, where they enjoyed themselves on the swing for a while.

It so happens that behind the summerhouse Hsi-men Ch'ing had put a structure consisting of three compartments, one well-lighted parlor, and two less well-lighted inner rooms, each provided with a k'ang frame. Inside they were furnished with bed-curtains, and supplied with tables and chairs, comb-boxes, dressing mirrors, toilet stands, and the like, in order that female visitors to the graveyard would have a place to make themselves up and rest, or that casual visitors from the demimonde could be entertained. The rooms had been plastered so that they were as spotless as snow grottoes and were embellished with calligraphy, painting, zither, and chessboard,¹⁷ all of which were elegantly displayed.

The wet nurse Ju-i, who was looking after Kuan-ko, happened to be reclining just then on the gold-flecked k'ang frame, on which she had placed a little sleeping mat for the baby, with whom Ying-ch'un, who was standing by her side, was playing. What should they see at this juncture but P'an Chin-lien, who suddenly came in from the garden, all by herself, holding a sprig of peach blossoms in her hand.

Upon entering the room and seeing Ying-ch'un, she remarked, "So you've been here all this time, instead of waiting on us up front."

"Ch'unmei, Lan-hsiang, and Yü-hsiao are all up front," protested Yingch'un. "Mother told me to come back here to see how the baby is doing, and to bring two saucers of delicacies for Ju-i to eat."

Chin-lien noticed that there was a saucer of goose meat, a saucer of pig's trotters, and some pieces of fruit on the table.

When the wet nurse saw Chin-lien come in, she picked up Kuan-ko, and Chin-lien proceeded to tease him, saying, "Little oily mouth! When they struck up the gongs and drums a little while ago, you were so frightened you were speechless. Are you really as timorous as all that?"

Thereupon, she opened up her jacket of pale lavender silk and her gold lamé blouse, took the baby in her arms, held him fast in her embrace, and proceeded to kiss him, mouth to mouth. All of a sudden, Ch'en Ching-chi came in, and, seeing that Chin-lien was playing with the child, proceeded to do likewise.

"Little Taoist," said Chin-lien, "give your brother-in-law a kiss."

At which:

Strange as it may seem,
Kuan-ko actually giggled at him, and Ching-chi:

Without permitting any further explanation, took the child into his arms and proceeded to give him a series of kisses.

"You crazy short-life!" protested Chin-lien. "It's all right to show your affection to the child, but you're mussing the hair over my temples."

Ching-chi flirted with her, saying, "You don't say. It's a good thing I didn't kiss the wrong person by mistake."

When Chin-lien heard this, fearing that the maidservants would catch on, she facetiously turned over the fan in her hand and proceeded to hit him with the handle, to such effect that Ching-chi wriggled like a carp.

"You crazy short-life!" she berated him. "Who has the patience to:

Bandy words or waggle tongues, with you?"

"That's not the problem," protested Ching-chi. "You ought to pay more attention to other peoples' feelings. I'm wearing too thin a layer of clothing for you to hit me like that."

"Why should I pay any attention to your feelings for no good reason?" vociferated Chin-lien. "If you pester me that way again, I'll hit you just as hard."

When Ju-i saw the way they were mixing it up with each other, she took Kuan-ko into her arms and let Chin-lien and Ching-chi carry on as they liked. Chin-lien bent the sprig of peach blossoms in her hand into a wreath, which she surreptitiously stuck on top of Ching-chi's cap. When they came outside, they happened to encounter Meng Yü-lou, along with Hsi-men Ta-chieh and Li Kuei-chieh, the three of whom were coming toward them from the other direction.

When Hsi-men Ta-chieh caught sight of the wreath, she asked, "Who's responsible for this bit of funny business?"

Chin-lien Puts a Wreath of Peach Blossoms on Ching-chi's Cap

Ching-chi took it off and went his way, without saying another word about it.

When four long scenes from a hsi-wen drama had been performed for the female guests, it was observed that:

The sunlight outside the window goes its way in a snap of the fingers;

The flower shadows in the banquet hall move among the revellers' seats.¹⁸

Evening was gradually coming on. Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Pen the Fourth to provide each of the chair carriers with a bowl of wine, four baked wheat cakes, and a plate of precooked pork. Only after these viands had been properly distributed did the female guests prepare to mount their sedan chairs and set off, with the male guests following behind them on horseback, while Laihsing and the caterers, carrying their food boxes, slowly brought up the rear. Tai-an, Lai-an, Hua-t'ung, and Ch'i-t'ung accompanied the sedan chairs of Wu Yüeh-niang and company; Ch'in-t'ung and four orderlies followed after Hsi-men Ch'ing on his horse; while the wet nurse, Ju-i, all by herself in a small sedan chair, carried the baby in her arms, wrapped up tightly in a quilt.

As they entered the city, Yüeh-niang was still concerned enough about the baby to send Hua-t'ung back, instructing him, "Stick close to the wet nurse's sedan chair. I'm afraid the crowds may get rowdy as we enter the city."

When Yüeh-niang's sedan chair had entered the city, she parted ways with the sedan chairs of the female guests from the Ch'iao family and made her way home, where she descended from her chair and went inside. It was some time after that before Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'en Ching-chi arrived home and dismounted from their horses.

Whom should they encounter there but P'ing-an, who met them at the gate and reported, "Today His Honor Judicial Commissioner Hsia came in person, dismounted, went into the reception hall, asked for you, and then left. After that, he has sent people to ask after you twice. I don't know what it's all about."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he was troubled in his heart. When he arrived in the reception hall, whom should he see but Shu-t'ung, who came up to take his outer clothes.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked him, "When His Honor Hsia came today, what message did he leave for me?"

"He didn't divulge anything," said Shu-t'ung. "He merely asked where you had gone, saying, 'Send someone after him. I've got something important to say to him.' I told him, 'Today they've all paid a visit to the family graveyard to burn paper money to the ancestors and won't return until evening.' At which, His Honor Hsia said, 'I'll come back at noontime.' After that, he sent people to ask after you twice, and I told them that you had not returned yet."

Hsi-men Ch'ing's mind was not put to rest by this information, and he wondered all the more, "What could it be about?"

Just as he was in this perplexity, whom should he see but P'ing-an, who came in to report, "His Honor Hsia is here."

It was already dusk when Judicial Commissioner Hsia appeared, wearing informal clothes and a Tung-p'o hat,¹⁹ with two servitors in attendance.

He dismounted, came into the reception hall, exchanged the customary social amenities, and said, "So my colleague has paid a visit to his country estate today."

"Today we have been sweeping the graves and making sacrifices at my ancestral tombs," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Not knowing that my colleague would condescend to pay us a visit, I was not here to greet you myself. Forgive me. Forgive me."

"I have ventured to come," said Judicial Commissioner Hsia, "on account of a matter that I need to report to you."

"Let's go to the guest room over there and sit down," he went on to say.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Shu-t'ung to open the door of the summerhouse and invited his guest to accompany him there for a chat, after which he dismissed all his attendants.

"Today," said Judicial Commissioner Hsia, "His Honor Li Ta-t'ien of the district yamen came to my place and reported, thus and so, that recently the regional investigating censor has submitted an impeachment to the Eastern Capital, in which both my colleague and myself are implicated. I ordered someone to make a copy of the draft for your perusal."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he:

Turned pale with consternation, hastily took the copy of the draft, and proceeded to read it by lamplight. What did the text actually say?

Memorial Submitted by Tseng Hsiao-hsü, Regional Investigating Censor of Shantung

In re: An Impeachment of Venal, Refractory, and Unqualified Military Officials, Requesting that They Be Dismissed from Office with a View toward the Rectification of Law and Morals

Your servant has heard that to make a circuit of the four quarters in order to monitor the state of public morality is the responsibility of the Son of Heaven in making his tours of inspection. To impeach and repress official malfeasance in order to improve law and morals is the task of the censor in his endeavor to rectify government. In ancient times, according to the Spring and Autumn Annals, when the ruler went on his tours of inspection, the myriad states felt cherished and protected, the morals of the populace were ameliorated, the way of the ruler was made manifest, the four classes of people were rendered obedient, and the advantages of the sage king's administration were illuminated. Since the day last year that your servant accepted appointment as regional investigating censor of Shantung, the land of the ancient states of Ch'i and Lu, until the present time when my assignment is about to expire, I have successively inquired into the worthiness, or lack thereof, of all the regional officials, both civil and military, who hold office in my jurisdiction, and am confident that I have succeeded in ascertaining the truth about them. Now that the end of my assignment is imminent, it is incumbent upon me to differentiate among them according to precedent, and report my conclusions to Your Majesty. In addition to the separate memoranda I have submitted regarding other regional officials from this jurisdiction, I ask that Your Majesty take cognizance of the following cases.

The judicial commissioner of the Ch'ing-ho office of the Shantung Provincial Surveillance Commission, and concurrently, battalion commander in the Imperial Insignia Guard, Hsia Yen-ling, is a man whose mediocre talents and corrupt conduct have long excited public comment and besmirched the reputation of his unit. In the past, when he was in charge of herds in the horse pasturages of the imperial domain, he created so much trouble with his flagrant depredations that his speculations were exposed by one of his own subordinates. Now that he is a judicial commissioner in Shantung, his rapacious greed is once more so blatant that it has had to be restrained by his colleagues. He allowed his son, Hsia Ch'eng-en, to assume a false district of origin when taking the military examination, and then hired a stand-in to take the qualifying test for him, with the result that:

The esprit of the officer class is debased.²⁰

He permitted his servant, Hsia Shou, to appropriate funds while responsible for the payroll, thereby giving rise to the vituperation of the troops in his command, and exposing his ignorance of proper administration. In his relations with others he exhibits such a:

Servile countenance and obsequious posture,²¹ that his coevals call him "The Maidservant." In adjudicating cases he is so:

Equally indifferent to the pros and cons.²² that his subordinates deride him as "The Puppet."

The assistant judicial commissioner, and concurrently battalion vice-commander, Hsi-men Ch'ing, was originally no more than a "bare stick" from the marketplace, who took advantage of his connections to obtain office, and has laid false claim to military accomplishment, while being so ignorant that he is:

Incapable of telling beans from wheat, and

Unable to recognize the simplest character.²³

He lets his wife and concubines roam the streets and alleys for their pleasure, thereby failing to maintain the purity of his household. He invites female musicians to join him for drinking bouts in the marketplace, thereby blemishing the reputation of the official class. He has even gone to the extreme of maintaining the wife of Mr. Han as his mistress, for the purpose of indulging his lusts, thus failing to regulate his conduct;²⁴ and taking the clandestine bribe of Miao Ch'ing, in order to cover up his crime, though the evidence of his guilt is manifest.

These two venal and incompetent officials have long been the objects of principled criticism, and should not be permitted to remain in office another hour. I respectfully hope that Your Majesty, in his sage enlightenment, will deign to take note of this matter by ordering the appropriate board to conduct a thorough reinvestigation; and, if your servant's words prove not to be unfounded, direct that Hsia Yen-ling and his associate be promptly removed from office,²⁵ so that the norms of official conduct may be relied upon, and Your Majesty's sage virtue may be made eternally manifest.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished perusing this document, he was so agitated that he and his companion could only:

Gaze at each other in consternation,

Too dumbstruck to utter a single word.

"My colleague," Hsia Yen-ling finally said, "in this situation, what are we to do?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, "As the saying goes:

When armies come the general confronts them;

When waters overflow earthworks arrest them.²⁶

Once things have come to a head,²⁷

The Way is what man makes of it.

The only thing you and I can do is to prepare gifts and send people to the Eastern Capital as soon as possible, in order to entreat His Honor to intercede on our behalf."

Thereupon, Judicial Commissioner Hsia bid him a hasty farewell and went home, where he came up with two hundred taels of silver and two silver flagons for the purpose, while Hsi-men Ch'ing, on his hand, came up with a girdle of gold, inlaid with jade and assorted jewels, and three hundred taels of silver. The Hsia household chose their servant Hsia Shou for this assignment, while Hsi-men Ch'ing entrusted the job to Lai-pao. By the time these gifts had been properly wrapped up, and Hsi-men Ch'ing had written a covering letter to the majordomo Chai Ch'ien, the two deputies had hired mounts for themselves and proceeded to set off on their mission to the Eastern Capital that very night. But no more of this.

To resume our story, from the time that Kuan-ko returned home from the visit to the family graveyard, he kept crying from fright all night and would not allow himself to be breast-fed, spitting up whatever milk he swallowed. This threw Li P'ing-erh into such consternation that she came and told Yüeh-niang about it.

"It's just as I said," responded Yüeh-niang. "The child is not even a year old and should not have been taken on an excursion outside the city walls. But that obstinate good-for-nothing of ours would not agree, no matter what the consequences might be. His only response was to say, 'Really! Why shouldn't the two of them, mother and child, go to the graveyard today to sacrifice to my ancestors? If you don't allow the mother and child to go, it will look as if you're afraid she might want to replace you or something like that.' He actually opened his eyes wide and shouted at me. And now, what are we to do?"

Li P'ing-erh really didn't know what to do. Moreover, because of the impeachment lodged against him by the regional investigating censor, Hsi-men Ch'ing was busy talking to Judicial Commissioner Hsia in the front compound about sending someone to the Eastern Capital to try to fix things up and was too preoccupied to pay any attention to the fact that the child of the house was unwell again. Yüeh-niang sent a page boy after Dame Liu to come and examine him and also engaged the services of a licensed pediatrician, with the result that, what with the:

Opening of gates and closing of doors,²⁸
the household was in a state of disruption all night long.

When Dame Liu had examined him, she said, "The child is suffering from the colic brought on by a fright and must have encountered the General of the Five Ways²⁹ along the road. It doesn't matter. Just burn some paper money on his behalf to send the General on his way and he'll be all right."

She also left behind two doses of medicine in the form of cinnabar pills. Only after he had swallowed these, together with a decoction of field mint and bog rush, did he quiet down and go to sleep, no longer crying from fright and spitting up his milk, but his fever had not yet receded. Li P'ing-erh promptly produced a tael of silver and gave it to Dame Liu with which to buy paper money. That afternoon she came back with her husband, Stargazer Liu, and a shamaness, who proceeded to burn paper money and perform a shamanistic dance on behalf of Kuan-ko in the summerhouse.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was up at the fifth watch to send Lai-pao and Hsia Shou on their way, after which he and Judicial Commissioner Hsia were preoccupied with going to Tung-p'ing prefecture to get news from Prefect Hu Shihwen on whether or not Miao Ch'ing had been arrested.

When Yüeh-niang heard Dame Liu say that the child had been subjected to a fright along the road, she expressed resentment at the wet nurse, Ju-i, saying, "You didn't look after the child carefully enough, but must have allowed him to become frightened in the sedan chair along the way. Otherwise, why should he have taken ill this way?"

"I had him inside the sedan chair, wrapped up tightly in a quilt," protested Ju-i. "And he was not jounced about. When you sent Hua-t'ung back to accompany my sedan chair, he was perfectly all right, and I held him as he slept. It was only after we had entered the city, and were almost at the door of the house, that I felt a cold shiver go up his spine. Then, when we got home, he rejected his milk and started to cry."

Let us put aside for the moment the events in the household as they burnt paper money and invoked the gods on behalf of the child.

To resume our story, Lai-pao and Hsia Shou hastened on their way and in only six days found themselves in the Eastern Capital, where they went to the grand preceptor's mansion, gained access to the majordomo Chai Ch'ien, and completed the process of turning over the gifts proffered by their two households.

When Chai Ch'ien had read Hsi-men Ch'ing's letter, he said, "Censor Tseng's bill of impeachment has not yet been delivered, so you had better stick around for a few days. At present, the situation here is that His Honor has just submitted a memorial laying out proposals with regard to seven matters, but the imperial rescript in response to it has not yet come down. You might as well wait until this document comes down. After that, when Censor Tseng's memorial arrives, I'll be able to speak to him about it, and get him to issue a verbal notation in the Grand Secretariat, ordering that it be:

Directed to the attention of the appropriate board.³⁰

On my part, I'll then send someone with my card, instructing the minister of war, Yü Shen,³¹ to suppress the memorial so that it is not resubmitted. Your master can relax. I guarantee that nothing will ever come of it.”

Thereupon, after the two men had been entertained with food and drink, they returned to their inn to rest and await further developments.

One day, the imperial rescript approving the memorial laying out proposals with regard to seven matters that had been submitted by Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching duly came down. Lai-pao prevailed upon one of the gatekeepers at the grand preceptor's mansion to copy the relevant material from the government gazette so that he could take it home and show it to Hsi-men Ch'ing. What seven matters did this memorial actually propose the implementation of?

Memorial Submitted by Ts'ai Ching, Grand Academician of the Hall for Veneration of Governance, Minister of Personnel, and Duke of Lu

In Re: The Exposition of His Ignorant Views, the Realization of His Modest Hopes, the Recruitment of Human Talent, the Achievement of Effective Results, the Amplification of Fiscal Resources, the Amelioration of the People's Condition, and the Strengthening of Your Majesty's Sage Administration

Proposal number one:³² The abolition of the system of recruiting scholars by examination, replacing it by allowing local schools to recommend candidates for bureaucratic appointment.

I venture to observe that the deterioration of cultural standards and the decay of public morals³³ are all due to the failure of the existing system of recruiting scholars to select candidates of genuine talent, with the result that cultural standards lack anything on which to rely. The Book of Documents says, “Heaven in giving birth to the people, made for them rulers, and made for them instructors.”³⁴ In the Han dynasty candidates were recommended for being filial and incorrupt. The T'ang dynasty established government schools. It was our dynasty that first established a system which combined examination and recommendation, but due to bias and corruption in its administration the candidates selected lack genuine talent, and the people are unable to rely upon their guidance. Your Majesty seeks after talent both awake and asleep, and strives for good government both early and late. Now, good government depends upon the cultivation of worthy men, and nothing contributes more toward the cultivation of worthy men than schools. From now on, in recruiting scholars, we should adhere to the precedents of antiquity, and allow local schools to recommend candidates for bureaucratic appointment, while abolishing the system of having prefectures and districts send candidates to the capital for examination by the Ministry of Rites. Every year an examination administrator can be designated to examine the students in the Superior College of the National University, in a fashion similar to that employed by the Ministry of Rites.³⁵ A system should also be established for recruiting scholars renowned for eight kinds of virtuous conduct. These eight kinds of virtuous conduct are filiality, brotherly love, cordiality with agnatic kin, good relations with affinal kin, trustworthiness with friends, kindness toward neighbors, loyalty to the ruler, and judiciousness in differentiating the right from the profitable. Scholars who possess these virtues should be admitted to the Superior College of the National University without examination.³⁶

Proposal number two: The abolition of the Financial Advisory Bureau.

I venture to observe that at the inception of the present reign, when the institutional structure was being determined, a Financial Advisory Bureau was set up under the Department of State Affairs,³⁷ the purpose of which was, on behalf of the ruler, to limit superfluous expenditure, and conserve the wealth of the people. Now, since Your Majesty acceded to the throne, you have neither valued exotic products from afar, nor overtaxed the resources of your subjects, but have set a personal example of frugality³⁸ in supplying your own needs. As a result, the empire is without customs that cannot be corrected, or expenses that cannot be reduced, while those in authority devote themselves to accomplishing the reformation of morals, and establishing the inviolability of the prohibitions, being neither lax in the beginning nor negligent in the end. The government is flourishing, morals are honest, and the state of the realm is characterized by the words abundance, prosperity, contentment, and greatness.³⁹ That being the case, what need is there for a Financial Advisory Bureau. Let it be completely abolished.⁴⁰

Proposal number three: The reform of the salt voucher system.

I venture to observe that the salt voucher system is a means of raising tax revenue for the state in order to supply the needs of border defense. At the present time, would it not be appropriate for Your Majesty to restore the salt administration system of your ancestors by ordering that the merchants who have received old salt vouchers in return for delivering grain and fodder to the Three Border Regions of Yün-chung, Shensi, and Shansi be required to exchange them for new salt vouchers from the southeastern Huai-Che region? The price of the new vouchers should be thirty percent of their face value in cash, with the remainder payable in old vouchers at seventy percent of their face value.⁴¹ Now merchants should go to the salt production areas designated on the vouchers in order to take delivery of the salt, and then, as in the case of the tea voucher system, after undergoing official weighing and inspection of their consignments, pay the required duty, receive their duly authorized certificates, and then proceed, within the designated time limits, to the areas in which they trade in order to sell the salt. If they exceed the time limits, their salt should be subject to confiscation, and they should be required to purchase new certificates. If they try to sell more than their certificates entitle them to, they should be subject to the penalties for salt smugglers. If this proposal is enacted, the tax revenues of the state will be regularly enhanced, and the logistic needs of border defense will be met.⁴²

Proposal number four: The standardization of the currency.

I venture to observe that currency is the blood and pulse of the state. It is essential that it circulate freely and not be subject to blockage. If it is subject to obstruction or blockage, so that it fails to circulate, how will the common people be able to cope, and on what will the tax revenues of the state depend? From the minting of “goose-eye” coins⁴³ in the latter days of the Chin dynasty⁴⁴ to the early years of the present reign, the coinage has been unacceptably heterogeneous, sometimes even being debased by adulteration with lead, iron, or tin. The residents along the border sell these coins to the barbarians, who melt them down in order to cast weapons, the harm resulting from which is not insignificant.⁴⁵ Would it not be appropriate to completely prohibit the circulation of these heterogeneous coins, and require them to be redeemed for the larger denomination coins that Your Majesty has minted during the Ch'ung-ning and Ta-kuan reign periods,⁴⁶ at an exchange ratio of ten to one, so that the common people will be supplied with a viable currency and the price of goods will not be subject to sudden inflation.⁴⁷

Proposal number five: The reinstitution of the system of government sale and distributive purchase of grain in order to alleviate scarcity.⁴⁸

I venture to observe that the government sale of grain at reduced prices is for the purpose of relieving the victims of famine. In recent years, whenever floods and droughts have succeeded each other, and the people have lacked sufficient food, Your Majesty has issued rescripts ordaining this method of relief. Recently, the vice-minister of the Ministry of Revenue, Han Li,⁴⁹ has submitted a memorial requesting the reinstitution of this system, which has elicited imperial assent. It is recommended that each of the subprefectures and districts affected should establish community institutions to carry out this system of government sale of grain at a reduced price and purchase of grain before it is harvested. The security groups within each ward, the wards within each village, and the villages within each township should promote the establishment of these community institutions. The households of each township should be divided into three categories, upper, middle, and lower, with the upper households required to contribute a quota of grain, the middle households half as much, and the lower households entitled to receive an appropriate allotment. The amount of money advanced to farmers for specified quantities of grain prior to the harvest is what is referred to as distributive purchase. If this method is followed, a system for government acquisition and distribution of grain for the benefit of the people will be implemented, and Your Majesty will be able to augment Your benevolence at little cost. It only remains to authorize the relevant prefects and district magistrates to rigorously carry it out. The benefit to be derived from this policy is not insignificant.

Proposal number six: The promulgation of a rescript ordering the subprefectures and prefectures of the empire to exact a commutation tax in lieu of corvée labor.

I venture to observe that at the inception of the present reign, because the threat of foreign invasion had not yet been put to rest, conscript soldiers and able-bodied males were assembled in the capital in order to provide logistic transport and strengthen the defenses of the state. Now that we have enjoyed peace for an extended period,⁵⁰ and the people are content with their occupations, it would be appropriate to promulgate a rescript ordering the subprefectures and prefectures of the empire to exact an annual commutation tax in lieu of corvée labor, at the rate of thirty strings of cash per capita, and transmit the proceeds to the capital in order to defray the cost of provisioning the border regions. By so doing we would achieve two ends with a single action,⁵¹ and thus somewhat relieve the demands on the people's strength.⁵²

Proposal number seven: The establishment of a Supervisorate of Palace Transport.

I venture to observe that since Your Majesty acceded to the throne you have refused to accept the presentation of musicians, beauties, dogs, and horses. The flowers and rocks for which You have expressed appreciation are all products of the mountains and forests in which most people have no interest. It is simply due to the excessive zeal with which the authorities have sought them out for presentation to the throne that the populace has been disturbed, which has injured the reputation of Your sage administration. If Your Majesty sees fit to curtail these excesses, it is proposed that a Supervisorate of Palace Transport be established, the expenses of which would all be defrayed out of the Palace Treasury, so that designated officials could be dispatched to obtain the desired products without disturbing the people of the subprefectures and prefectures.⁵³

An imperial decision with regard to these matters is hereby humbly requested.

The imperial rescript elicited by this memorial read as follows:

Your proposals are highly relevant to the problems of the times, and serve both to augment Our feeling of delight, and demonstrate your penchant for loyal counsel. Let them all be enacted as proposed, and directed to the attention of the appropriate board.

Lai-pao had a copy made of the relevant material from the government gazette, after which, when Majordomo Chai Ch'ien had written a reply to Hsi-men Ch'ing's letter, and provided them with five taels of silver for their traveling expenses, he and Hsia Shou took to the road and headed back toward Ch'ing-ho district. When they arrived there in due course, Hsi-men Ch'ing was at home, where he was:

Unable to get the matter off his mind, while Judicial Commissioner Hsia had been sending someone over twice a day to inquire after the news. As soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing learned that Lai-pao and his companion had arrived, he summoned them into the rear compound and interrogated them about the facts of the case.

Lai-pao gave him a complete report on the above-mentioned events, saying, "When we saw Master Chai Ch'ien in the ministerial mansion, after reading your letter, he said, 'This affair should not be a problem. You can tell your master to relax. Right now, the regional investigating censor's term of office has already expired, and a new investigating censor has been appointed. And moreover, his bill of impeachment has not yet arrived in the capital. When his memorial arrives, I'll mention it to His Honor, and, no matter how serious the charges it contains may be, he'll merely issue a notation directing that it be:

Directed to the attention of the appropriate board.

His Honor can then send someone with his card instructing the minister of war, Yü Shen, to file the memorial without resubmitting it. In that case, even if he should have the ability to breach the gates of Heaven, it would be to no avail."

Only after hearing this report was Hsi-men Ch'ing's anxiety relieved.

He then went on to ask, "How did it happen that his memorial had not yet been delivered?"

"When we left," Lai-pao explained, "we traveled on horseback by day and night and succeeded in getting to the capital in only five days. It's not surprising that we got there first. On starting back, we encountered a group of mounted couriers, with jangling bells, one of whom was carrying a yellow dispatch case on his back, with a pair of pheasant tails stuck in it, as well as two serrated pennants. No doubt it was the sealed text of the memorial from the office of the regional investigating censor that was only then arriving."

"If his memorial was that late in getting there," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "everything ought to be all right. I was afraid we might not have acted in time."

"You can relax, master," said Lai-pao. "I guarantee that nothing will ever come of it. But that is not the only thing I accomplished. I also learned of two other favorable developments that I can report to you."

"Really," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and what might they be?"

"His Honor the grand preceptor," said Lai-pao, "has recently submitted a memorial laying out proposals regarding seven matters, all of which have already been approved for enactment by imperial rescript. At present, His Honor's relative by marriage, the vice-minister of the Ministry of Revenue, Han Lü, has been authorized according to precedent to encourage salt production in the Three Border Regions of Yün-chung, Shensi, and Shansi by setting up charity granaries in every prefecture, subprefecture, commandary, and district for the government sale of grain at reduced prices. Among the common people, the top rank of the upper grade households will be required to contribute a quota of grain to these granaries for which they will receive granary vouchers that may be exchanged for salt certificates which entitle the holder to take delivery of specified quantities of salt. The old vouchers may be exchanged for new vouchers at seventy percent of their face value plus thirty percent in cash. The thirty thousand taels worth of vouchers that you formerly received, in partnership with your kinsman, Ch'iao Hung, for delivering grain to the Kao-yang customs station⁵⁴ can be exchanged for thirty thousand taels worth of salt certificates, to be allocated by the Ministry of Revenue. You might as well take advantage of the fact that His Honor Ts'ai Yün has been appointed salt-control censor there to send someone to the designated salt production area and take delivery of the specified quantity of salt. It should turn out to be a highly profitable transaction."

Lai-pao Passes the Mounted Courier Conveying the Impeachment

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he said, "Is this information really true?"

"If you don't believe me," said Lai-pao, "I've got a copy of the relevant material from the government gazette right here."

Pulling it out of his letter case, he handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing to read. Upon glancing over the extensive vocabulary of characters in the text, Hsi-men Ch'ing called Ch'en Ching-chi in from the front compound to read it out loud to him. Ch'en Ching-chi succeeded in reading part way through it before coming to a halt, stumped by several unfamiliar characters. Consequently, Shu-t'ung was called in to read it. Now Shu-t'ung, having gotten his start in life as a "gate-boy,"⁵⁵ was able to read it through, all the way to the end, as fluently as flowing water, without making a single mistake. The seven proposals contained in the memorial were those enumerated above.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard them, he was delighted. He went on to read Majordomo Chai Ch'ien's letter, from which he learned that their gifts had all been safely delivered, and that the principal graduate Ts'ai Yün, upon an audience with the emperor, had, indeed, been appointed salt-control censor of the Liang-Huai region. In his heart he felt:

Unable to contain his delight.

On the one hand, he sent Hsia Shou home with the injunction to, "Give your master the good news," while, on the other hand, he rewarded Lai-pao with five taels of silver, two bottles of wine, and a side of pork. After which, he went back to the master suite to rest. But no more of this.

Truly:

When a tree is tall it attracts the wind,⁵⁶ and the wind damages the tree;

When a man's name becomes too prominent, his prominence will do him in.⁵⁷

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Success and failure, flourishing and decay, are controlled by fate;
Everything is determined by the year, month, day, and hour of birth.
Those who harbor ambition in their breasts may achieve their goals;
But those whose purses are devoid of money cannot depend on talent.⁵⁸

Chapter 49

HSI-MEN CH'ING WELCOMES INVESTIGATING CENSOR SUNG CH'IAO-NIEN; IN THE TEMPLE OF ETERNAL FELICITY HE ENCOUNTERS AN INDIAN MONK

With relaxed temperament and relaxed bosom let the years go by;
People are dying and people are being born before your eyes.
Whether it be exalted or whether it be lowly,¹ submit to your fate;
Though it be long or though it be short,² do not repine.
Though you possess much or possess nothing,
forgo your sighs;
Whether you be wealthy or whether you be poor is Heaven's decree.
Be content to accept your lifetime allotment of clothing and wages;
Even a single day of undisturbed leisure³ is a day of immortality.⁴

THE STORY GOES that when Hsia Shou returned home and reported on his mission, Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling immediately came over to express his gratitude to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "My colleague has done me:

The favor of saving my life.⁵

Had I not been able to rely upon the powerful influence of your diffracted radiance, how could this affair ever have been brought to an end?"

"My colleague can relax," said Hsi-men Ch'ing with a smile. "I figure that you and I did not do anything inappropriate. Let the censor criticize our conduct however he likes. His Honor will have a clear understanding of the case."

He then ordered that a table be set up in the reception hall and entertained his visitor with a meal. They chatted and laughed together until evening before Hsia Yen-ling said goodbye and went home. The next day they both went to the yamen and conducted their business as usual. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when the regional inspecting censor Tseng Hsiao-hsü saw that his memorial of impeachment had been submitted without eliciting any result, he realized that the two officials had succeeded in putting in the fix, and his heart was filled with ire. Because there were so many points in the seven proposals submitted by Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching that he deemed to be:

Either illegitimate or wrongheaded;
and because all of them were:

Injurious to those below while benefiting those above;⁶
when he returned to the capital for an audience in order to report on his assignment, he submitted a memorial in which he argued forcefully as follows:

The wealth of the empire should be allowed to circulate freely. To seize the economic resources of the people and accumulate them in the capital is not, I fear, the way to obtain a just administration.⁷
The proposed system of government sale and distributive purchase of the people's grain should not be instituted. The requirement that the coins currently in circulation be redeemed for larger denomination coins at an exchange ratio of ten to one should not be implemented. The salt voucher system should not be repeatedly changed. I have heard it said that if the people's resources are exhausted, who will there be to protect the country for You?⁸

Ts'ai Ching was enraged by this and submitted a memorial to Emperor Hui-tsung in which he accused Tseng Hsiao-hsü of "giving vent to slanderous words, and interfering with national affairs."

At this juncture, Tseng Hsiao-hsü was turned over to the Ministry of Personnel for investigation, and subsequently demoted to the position of prefect of Ch'ing-chou in Shensi. The regional investigating censor of Shensi at the time was Sung Sheng-ch'ung,⁹ who was the elder brother of Ts'ai Yu's wife. Ts'ai Ching secretly suborned him into traducing Tseng Hsiao-hsü for an alleged private transgression, as a result of which his servants were arrested and:

Tortured into giving evidence to substantiate the case.¹⁰

Ts'ai Ching consequently succeeded in having him removed from office and:

Banished to the southern extremity of the country, in order to accomplish his revenge. But this is a subsequent event; having mentioned it, we will say no more about it.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing, back at home, had already entrusted his granary vouchers to Han Tao-kuo, along with Ch'iao Hung's nephew, Ts'ui Pen, and sent them to report to the office of Vice-Minister Han Lü of the Ministry of Revenue at the Kao-yang customs station, in order to have them properly registered.

Meanwhile, he kept Lai-pao at home to take charge of ordering the provisions for an elaborate feast and then deputed him to ascertain when the salt-control censor Ts'ai Yün's boat would arrive in the vicinity.

One day Lai-pao learned that Ts'ai Yün's boat had left the capital at the same time as that of the new regional investigating censor, Sung Ch'iao-nien,¹¹ and that they were about to arrive in the neighborhood of Tung-ch'ang prefecture. When he sent someone home to report this news, Hsi-men Ch'ing, together with Hsia Yen-ling, set out to meet them, while keeping the magistrates of the various prefectures, subprefectures, and districts, and the officers of the various guards, who had all gotten their attendants, men and horses, together for the same purpose, as completely in the dark as if they had been:

Locked tight in an iron bucket.

Lai-pao paid an advance visit to Salt-Control Censor Ts'ai Yün's boat when it arrived at Tung-ch'ang prefecture and delivered a gift for the road from his master. It was only after this that Hsi-men Ch'ing and Hsia Yen-ling came out some fifty li beyond the suburbs to meet them at the port on the New Canal, at a place called Pai-chia Ts'un, or Hundred Family Village. They first went aboard Ts'ai Yün's boat to pay their respects, and to communicate the fact that they wished to extend an invitation to Sung Ch'iao-nien as well.

"I understand," responded Salt-Control Censor Ts'ai Yün. "You can be sure that he will accompany me on a visit to your mansion."

It was only then that the presiding magistrate of Tung-p'ing prefecture, Hu Shih-wen, together with the regional officials from all the subprefectures and districts in his jurisdiction, the officers of the various guards, the docket officers and government students, the Buddhist and Taoist authorities and Yin-yang masters, with their respective curricula vitae in hand, arrayed themselves in attendance to receive the new regional investigating censor. Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command, Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, and Militia Commander Chang Kuan, in command of contingents of men and horse, dressed in armor and carrying weapons, cleared the way so effectively that even chickens and dogs stayed out of sight, as they escorted Sung Ch'iao-nien, to the music of drums and wind instruments, into the office of the regional investigating censor in Tung-ch'ang prefecture. After all the attending officials had been introduced and given the chance to hand in their documents, the newly arrived censor was finally allowed to rest for the night.

The next day, who should appear but the gatekeeper, who announced that His Honor, the salt-control censor, Ts'ai Yün had come to pay him a visit. Sung Ch'iao-nien hurriedly ordered that the cases he had been examining be put away, while he straightened his headgear and came out to meet his visitor. When the two of them had finished exchanging amenities, they sat down in the positions of guest and host.

A little later, after tea had been served, Sung Ch'iao-nien asked, "Since my fellow graduate must make the deadline for reporting to his new post, when are you going to set out?"

"I plan to stay another day or two," Ts'ai Yün replied.

Hsi-men Ch'ing Meets the Boat of the Salt-Control Censor

He then went on to say, "There is an acquaintance of mine, Battalion Commander Hsi-men Ch'ing, who resides in Ch'ing-ho district and belongs to one of the great lineages of that place. He is honest and scrupulous by nature, is one of those who are:

Wealthy yet observant of the rites,¹² and is also a protégé of His Honor the venerable Ts'ai Ching. Since I have a nodding acquaintance with him, and he has been good enough to come out to welcome me at a distance, I would like to pay a visit to his residence in order to pay my respects."

"Just who is this Battalion Commander Hsi-men Ch'ing?" asked Sung Ch'iao-nien.

"At present he is a battalion commander in the local guard and a judicial commissioner in the Ch'ing-ho office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission," replied Ts'ai Yün. "He is one of those who came to pay their respects to my fellow graduate yesterday."

Sung Ch'iao-nien ordered his attendants to fetch the curricula vitae that had been submitted to him the day before and, when he had located the names of Hsi-men Ch'ing and Hsia Yen-ling, said, "This must be the person who has some relationship with Chai Ch'ien, is it not?"

"That's the one," replied Ts'ai Yün. "Right now he is waiting outside and has asked me to accompany my fellow graduate in paying a visit to his place for a meal. But I don't know how my fellow graduate feels about it."

"I have only just arrived here," said Sung Ch'iao-nien. "It would hardly be appropriate for me to go."

"What is there to be afraid of?" said Ts'ai Yün. "It would be doing a favor to Chai Ch'ien for the two of us to visit him. What harm could it do?"

Thereupon, orders were given to prepare their sedan chairs, and the fact that the two of them were about to depart for this purpose was duly promulgated.

No sooner was Hsi-men Ch'ing apprised of this news than he set out for home, together with Lai-pao and Pen the Fourth, riding fast horses, in order to arrive there ahead of his guests, and have time to make the necessary preparations for the feast. A hill-shaped screen-wall and gaily decorated bowers were erected outside his front gate. Musicians from the two Music Offices were engaged to provide music, and a troupe of Hai-yen¹³ actors, as well as a troupe of tumblers, were engaged to provide the entertainment.

It so happens that Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien dismissed most of the men and horse in his entourage, only retaining several squads of soldiers bearing blue flags to clear the way, along with the officials and functionaries in his suite, and set out, together with Salt-Control Censor Ts'ai Yün, seated in two large palanquins, protected by double-tiered canopies, in order to pay a visit to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence.

At the time, this had the effect of:

Dumbfounding Tung-p'ing prefecture,
While elevating Ch'ing-ho district.

Everyone said, "Even His Honor the regional investigating censor is sufficiently familiar with the Honorable Hsi-men Ch'ing to attend a banquet at his residence."

Commandant Chou Hsiu, Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, and Militia Commander Chang Kuan all felt compelled to put in an appearance by leading contingents of the men and horse under their respective commands to station themselves at the mouths of the streets to left and right of the Hsi-men residence in order to maintain order. Hsi-men Ch'ing, dressed in black and attired in his official cap and girdle, came out a considerable distance to welcome his guests. On either side of the street, musicians struck up their drums and stringed instruments as his visitors made their way to the main gate and dismounted from their palanquins.

As they proceeded inside, Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien and Salt-Control Censor Ts'ai Yün were both garbed in robes of scarlet brocade, decorated with an embroidered hsieh-chih, a mythical one-horned goat that was said to gore wrongdoers, black silk caps, black shoes, and official girdles featuring plaques of "crane's crest red,"¹⁴ and were accompanied by attendants bearing two large flabella.

They saw before them a thirty-foot-wide reception hall, in which:

Speckled bamboo blinds were rolled high,¹⁵ and Brocaded standing screens were arrayed, while in the place of honor there stood two fancy table settings, of a kind intended as much for display as for eating, replete with:

High-stacked pyramids of square-shaped confectionery,
Ingot-shaped cakes, and cone-shaped piles of fruit, all of them meticulously arranged.

The two officials, politely deferring to each other, entered the reception hall in order to exchange amenities with Hsi-men Ch'ing. Salt-Control Censor Ts'ai Yün ordered his retainers to proffer:

The customary presentation gifts, consisting of two bolts of Hu-chou silk, the collected literary works of a well-known author, four bags of tender leaf tea, and an inkstone from Tuan-ch'i.¹⁶ Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien merely presented a single calling card on safflower red paper,¹⁷ which read, "Your devoted servant Sung Ch'iao-nien pays his respects."

Addressing himself to Hsi-men Ch'ing, he said, "Your pupil has long been aware of your illustrious reputation but, having just arrived in this region, has not yet had an opportunity to fully express the extent of his admiration. I really ought not to impose upon you, but had it not been for my fellow graduate, Ts'ai Yün, who invited me to join him in paying our respects, how could I have been fortunate enough to gaze upon your distinguished countenance?"

This threw Hsi-men Ch'ing into such consternation that he knelt down to kowtow, saying, "Your servant is but an insignificant military official who is subject to your jurisdiction. The fact that, today, I have been fortunate enough to be the beneficiary of your disinterested attention, has had the effect of:

Shedding glory on my humble abode."¹⁸

Thereupon, he prostrated himself in order to pay his respects, exhibiting the utmost modesty in his courteous demeanor. Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien returned his salutation, and they exchanged the customary amenities.

At this point, Censor Ts'ai allowed Censor Sung to take the position of honor on the left, while he took that on the right, and Hsi-men Ch'ing obsequiously kept them company with lowered head. After tea had been served:

Classical melodies saturate the ears;¹⁹

Drums and music resound to the heavens, as the musicians began to play. After Hsi-men Ch'ing had seen to the serving of the wine, and sat down to preside over the feast, the various courses were presented from below.

Words are inadequate to describe the scene:

Only the rarest delicacies are arrayed;²⁰

The soup shows off its peach-red waves;

The wine overflows with golden ripples.²¹

Truly:

The singers and dancers display voice and color;

The tables, ten-foot square, are laden with food.²²

Hsi-men Ch'ing was aware of the large number of attendants that had accompanied his visitors, so, for the retinues of each of the two sedan chairs, he set aside fifty bottles of wine, five hundred snacks, and a hundred catties of precooked pork, which were duly accepted and taken outside. The personal servants, secretaries, "gate-boys," etc. were separately entertained in an ante-chamber, but there is no need to describe this in detail. Suffice it to say that it cost Hsi-men Ch'ing all of a thousand taels of silver to put on the banquet that day.

This Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, being a native of Nan-ch'ang in Kiangsi province, was impatient by nature. Without having stayed very long, after listening to the performance of but a single scene from a hsi-wen drama, he got up to go. This threw Hsi-men Ch'ing into such consternation that he repeatedly insisted upon his remaining a while longer.

Censor Ts'ai Yün chimed in from the side, saying, "Since my fellow graduate has nothing else to do, you might as well stay for a while. What need is there to return in such haste?"

"My fellow graduate can stay if he likes," responded Censor Sung, "but I need to get back to the Investigation Bureau in order to take care of some public business."

Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly ordered his servants to pack up the contents of the two table settings, including the gold and silver utensils, in food boxes, making twenty carrier loads in all, and summoned the servitors of his visitors to take charge of them. Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien's lavish table setting consisted of two jugs of wine, two carcasses of mutton, two pairs of ornamental flowers fashioned out of gold filigree, two bolts of red satin, a set of gold salvers, two silver flagons, ten silver wine cups, two silver ewers with hinged lids, and a pair of ivory chopsticks. That of Censor Ts'ai Yün was the same. Lists of the contents of both table settings were duly presented.

Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien repeatedly demurred, saying, "How could your pupil presume to accept these things?"

Thereupon, he directed his gaze at Censor Ts'ai Yün, who said, "This falls within my fellow graduate's distinguished jurisdiction.

It is only natural,²³ that he should accept. But how could I be worthy of such an honor?"

"It is but a paltry gift," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "no more than something to enhance a drinking bout, that's all. Why be so standoffish?"

By the time the two officials had done with their demurrals the table settings had long since been carried out the gate. Only then did Censor Sung, seeing that there was no help for it, order his attendants to accept the list of gifts and express his thanks.

"Today," he said, "on the occasion of my first visit in order to make your acquaintance, I have not only put you to the trouble of providing a lavish entertainment, but have also accepted your magnanimous gifts.

What can I do to be worthy of such largess?²⁴

It remains for me to find some way of repaying your generosity without fail."

Then, turning to Censor Ts'ai, he said, "My fellow graduate, stay a little longer if you like, but your pupil must announce his departure."

Then and there, he bade farewell and got up to go. Hsi-men Ch'ing expressed the wish to escort him for some distance, but Censor Sung would not allow it and, urgently pressing him to return, raised his hand in salute, got into his sedan chair, and went his way.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had returned inside to keep Censor Ts'ai company, he urged his visitor to join him in divesting themselves of their official caps and girdles and invited him back to the summerhouse in the interior of the garden where they could be more relaxed. He then ordered that the musicians be dismissed, and that only the actors need remain. Hsi-men Ch'ing directed his servants to provide new table settings for them, and to set out appropriate delicacies and viands so they could drink wine together.

"Today," said Censor Ts'ai, "it was presumptuous of me to join my fellow graduate Sung Ch'iao-nien in paying you a visit. On top of which, you have bestowed these wine vessels from your abundant storehouse upon me.

What can I do to be worthy of such largess?"

"The paltry nature of these gifts is embarrassing," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"They are no more than tokens of my esteem."²⁵

He then went on to ask, "What is His Excellency Sung Ch'iao-nien's courtesy name?"

"His courtesy name is Sung-yüan," replied Censor Ts'ai. "That is to say, the sung of the expression sung-shu, or 'pine tree,' and the yüan of the expression yüan-ch'üan, or 'fountainhead.'"

He then went on to say, "Originally he repeatedly refused to come. It was only after your pupil had extolled your surpassing virtue, and intimated that you were acquainted with the venerable minister, that he finally agreed. He is also aware that your household has some kind of marriage relationship with that of Chai Ch'ien."

"I think it must be true," observed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that Kinsman Chai has spoken to him about me, but it appears that this gentleman, Sung Ch'iaonien, has a somewhat strange personality."

"Although he is, to be sure, a native of Kiangsi province," said Censor Ts'ai, "there really isn't anything strange about him. It's simply that this was his first meeting with you. It's not surprising that he should want to put on something of a show."

When he had finished speaking, he laughed.

"It's getting rather late today," Hsi-men Ch'ing then said. "There's really no reason for the venerable gentleman to return to his boat."

"Early tomorrow morning," said Censor Ts'ai, "I have to set sail on a long journey."

"If you do not see fit to reject me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "why don't you stay overnight in my humble abode? Tomorrow morning your pupil will undertake to see you off with an appropriate libation at the roadside pavilion ten li outside of town."

"I have already benefited excessively from your generous regard," said Censor Ts'ai.

Then, turning to his retainers, he directed them, "All of you return outside the city gate, and come back to get me first thing tomorrow morning."

The crowd of his retainers all assented and took themselves off, leaving behind only two household servants to wait on him.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that his guest's retainers had all departed, he got up from his place at the table, summoned Tai-an, and proceeded to:

Whisper into his ear in a low voice, thus and so, "Go right away into the licensed quarter, single out Tung Chiaorh and Han Chin-ch'uan by name, and have them delivered to the rear door of the house by sedan chair, without letting anyone know what you are doing."

Tai-an, for his part, departed on his mission, while Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to his place at the table, in order to keep Censor Ts'ai company while they drank together, and listened to the singing of the troupe of Hai-yen actors who stood to one side and performed for their entertainment.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked his visitor, "Venerable Sir, how long were you able to remain at home before returning to the capital? And is your venerable mother still able to get around, and in good health?"

"My elderly mother, as it happens, is doing all right," said Censor Ts'ai. "As for your pupil's sojourn at home, the half year passed by swiftly before I knew it. But, upon my return to the capital for an audience with the emperor, who would have thought that I would be impeached by Ts'ao Ho,²⁶ as a result of which your pupil, along with fourteen of his fellow graduates who were serving in the Historiography Institute, were all simultaneously demoted to provincial offices. In my case, I was appointed to the Censorate, and, most recently, selected for the post of salt-control censor of the Liang-Huai region, while my fellow graduate, Sung Ch'iao-nien, was appointed to the position of regional investigating censor in your distinguished province. He is also a protégé of the venerable minister, Ts'ai Ching."

"At the present time," asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "what post is the venerable gentleman, An Ch'en, occupying?"

"An Ch'en," responded Ts'ai Yün, "has already been promoted to the position of secretary in the Ministry of Works and has been sent to Ching-chou to expedite the delivery of imperial lumber. He is doing all right for himself."

When they had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing summoned the troupe of Hai-yen actors to come over and serve them with wine.

Censor Ts'ai instructed them, "Sing a song suite beginning with the tune 'Fisherman's Pride' for us."

The actors, standing beside them, clapped their hands to keep time and proceeded to sing to the tune "Fisherman's Pride":

Since our parting we are distant and there are no letters.

This ailment that causes no physical hurt or pain²⁷ is hard to get rid of.

Alas, in this desolate inn, who is there who knows me?

The message-bearing fish are submerged and the geese bring no letters.

As for that beauty from the three Isles of the Blest, who knows where she is to be found.

I yearn for her asleep and long for her in dreams.²⁸

On whose behalf do I endure these feelings?

Listlessly, listlessly wasting away,

I am just like a willow catkin tossed in the breeze.

Who knows when we will ever be able to meet again?

To the tune "Black Silk Robe"

Before my eyes the yellow chrysanthemums have just bloomed.

I wonder why that T'ao Yüan-ming²⁹ of mine has not returned home.

It makes me gaze into the distance until my eyes are worn out.

Lover of mine, why can't you do me a good turn?

Ever since he left,

I've been beset by lovesickness.³⁰

As confused as though drunk,

My tears continually flowing.

Who knows when we will ever be able to see each other again?

To the same tune

I love the peach blossoms that make up her face;

The bamboo shoots that form her ten slender fingers;³¹

I love the faint spring peaks of her eyebrows, like willows tangled in the mist;

I love the bright clarity of her pair of eyes, that remind me of autumn ripples;

The raven locks that adorn her temples;

The black silk filaments tied in a bun;

The pendant crescents of her sickle brows;

The sunset glow suffusing her countenance.

I can't help longing for her until my liver and intestines are sundered.

To the same tune

The drum on the battlements has begun to sound the watch.

I listen to the dying notes of the bugle³² as it plays taps on the watchtower.

Banging on my bed and pounding my pillow³³ several thousand times;

I give vent to long sighs as well as short³⁴ on a myriad occasions.

My spirits are distraught;

My words are inarticulate;³⁵

Forgetting to eat, neglecting to sleep,³⁶

I lie down in my clothes as my tears flow.

All day long I remain in a stupor, too tired to do anything.

To the same tune

Only on your account, all the livelong day I am given over to longing;

While you are there, playing and laughing in pursuit of pleasure.

Whenever I happen to call it to mind, my thoughts are suspended;

Every time the subject comes up, I am only the more resentful.

My regard for you is as deep as the sea;

My feelings are as weighty as mountains.³⁷

Our assignation was scarcely accidental;³⁸

Separation is the hardest thing to bear.

As the saying goes, "The lotus root may be broken, but the threads remain connected."³⁹

As they were singing, who should appear but Tai-an, who asked Hsi-men Ch'ing to step aside for a word with him.

"I have summoned Tung Chiao-erh and Han Chin-ch'uan," Tai-an reported. "They came in through the back door and are sitting in Mother's room at the moment."

"You'd better give orders that their sedan chairs be carried out of the way somewhere," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"They've already been carried out of the way," said Tai-an.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded back to the master suite, where the two singing girls stepped forward and kowtowed to him.

"I've invited the two of you here today," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing, "so that you'll be available to wait upon His Honor Ts'ai Yün in the grotto underneath the artificial hill this evening. At present he holds the post of regional inspector, so you can't afford to be remiss with him. If you do your best to accommodate him, I'll reward the two of you independently of whatever he may give you."

Han Chin-ch'uan laughed, saying, "There's no need for you to instruct us. We'll know what to do."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then went on to say, with a wink, "He's one of those southerners, you know, who are enamored of the 'southern breeze.'⁴⁰ You mustn't be squeamish with him."

"Mother, just listen to him!" exclaimed Tung Chiao-erh. "Father, you're just like:

The ramshorn scallion that grows by the southern wall;

The longer it stays there the hotter it gets.

Since we've already kowtowed before the prince's palace;

Would we refuse to drink the water from his well?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this as he made his way back toward the front compound. Just as he arrived at the ceremonial gate that separated the compounds, whom should he encounter but Lai-pao and Ch'en Ching-chi, who were carrying a card to show to him.

"Just now," said Lai-pao, "your kinsman Ch'iao Hung has made the suggestion that you take advantage of the fact that His Honor Ts'ai Yün is at leisure here at the moment, to broach this matter with him. I fear that tomorrow when he's getting ready to go, he'll be too busy to consider it. I've gotten your son-in-law to write our two names down on the card here."

"You come along with me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Lai-pao then followed him as far as the summerhouse, where he knelt down outside the latticework partition.

In the course of drinking with his guest, Hsi-men Ch'ing brought the subject up, saying, "There's a certain matter here that I'm reluctant to trouble you with."

"My dear Ssu-ch'üan,"⁴¹ responded Censor Ts'ai, "what have you got in mind? Just tell me what you'd like me to do. Your pupil would not presume to reject your command."

"Last year," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "in partnership with my kinsman Ch'iao Hung, we delivered a consignment of grain to the border, in return for which we were issued salt certificates that entitle us to take delivery of the specified quantity of salt at the seat of your distinguished jurisdiction in Yang-chou. All we are hoping for is that when our agents show up there, you will look upon the matter favorably, and allow them to take early delivery of the salt, as a token of your generous regard."

He then proceeded to proffer the card to him, and when Censor Ts'ai looked at it, he saw that it read, "The merchants Lai-pao and Ts'ui Pen, who hold previously issued salt certificates entitling them to thirty thousand taels worth of salt from the Liang-Huai region, request that upon presentation of the said certificates, they may take early delivery."

When Censor Ts'ai had perused it, he laughed, saying, "A thing like this is no big deal."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then called for Lai-pao to come inside and kneel down, instructing him, "Perform a kowtow to His Honor Ts'ai."

"After I get to Yang-chou," said Censor Ts'ai, "the two of you can come straight to the Investigation Bureau and ask to see me. I'll let you take delivery of your salt a month before any of the other merchants."

"Venerable Sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you are considerate enough to let them have it ten days earlier than the rest, that will be sufficient."

Censor Ts'ai Yün proceeded to put the card in question into his sleeve, while Shu-t'ung served them with wine, and the actors continued with their song suite, to the tune "The Tiger Descends the Mountain":

As the Mid-autumn Festival draws near,
I realize that my feelings have turned sour.
All I can see is the moon in the window;
I do not see the return of my lover.
The dinning sound of pounding laundry bats resounds in my ears;
With strident cries, the northern geese return to the south.
How could these things fail to increase the sadness in my heart?
I anticipate that this lovesickness,
Will be the ruination of my youth.
After the dusk has fallen,
As the night watches recede,
Only after trimming the silver lamp am I able to sleep.

To the same tune

Originally, when we held hands together,
Standing side by side beneath the moon,
We swore to be as faithful as the hills and seas;
And made an oath before Heaven,
That whoever should break faith and forget favor⁴² should revert apace to the Nine Springs.
How is it then that, all this time, news of you has been so inaccessible,
That all I can do is cast my lot in coins?
Neglecting to sleep, forgetting to eat,
Who is there to express concern for me?
After the dusk has fallen,
As the night watches recede,
Only after trimming the silver lamp am I able to sleep.

CODA

If azure Heaven is only willing to do me a good turn,
Send my lover back to my pillow side as soon as possible.⁴³
So that this student will no longer have to sleep alone.

By the time they had finished singing it was lamplighting time, and Censor Ts'ai said, "I have put you to a great deal of trouble all day. I think we had better call a halt to the drinking."

Whereupon, he got up from his place at the table, and his attendants prepared to light him on his way.

"There's no need to light the lamps yet," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. May I invite you, Venerable Sir, to adjust your toilet in the interior."

Thereupon, he conducted his visitor on a tour of the garden. When they arrived back at the Kingfisher Pavilion, they found that:

Speckled bamboo blinds were hanging low,

Candles burned brightly in silver stands,⁴⁴ and a complete new feast had already been laid out for them. In the interim, Hsi-men Ch'ing had arranged for his servants to provide the troupe of Haiyen actors with food and wine, reward them for their services with two taels of silver, and send them on their way; and Shu-t'ung had cleared away the used utensils from the summerhouse and closed the postern gate.

What should they observe at this point but the two singing girls, resplendently dressed, waiting for them beneath the steps, who now came forward and;

Like sprigs of blossoms swaying in the breeze,
kowtowed to them. Behold:

Graceful of figure, comely of countenance, garbed in golden threads,
Without even disturbing the fragrant dust, she descends the stairs,
When her time comes, the sprinkling water will moisten her silk skirt,
Just like the Goddess of Witches' Mountain returning from her rainmaking.

When Censor Ts'ai Yün caught sight of them:

Though he wished to advance, he couldn't;

Though he wished to retire, he was unable.⁴⁵

"Ssu-ch'üan," he protested, "how can you show me such generous regard? I fear that it will never do."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "How does this differ from the way in which, in former times, Hsieh An enjoyed himself in the Eastern Mountains?"⁴⁶

"I fear that I do not measure up to the genius of Hsieh An," said Censor Ts'ai. "But you, Sir, do possess the discriminating taste of Wang Hsi-chih."⁴⁷

Thereupon, he held hands with the two singing girls beneath the moon, looking for all the world like Liu Ch'en or Juan Chao upon their arrival in the T'ien-t'ai Mountains.⁴⁸ Upon entering the pavilion, and seeing that it contained all the cultural artifacts that he remembered from his previous visit, he asked for paper and writing brush that he might compose a memorial of the occasion.

Hsi-men Ch'ing directed Shu-t'ung to comply with his wishes, and he promptly supplied an inkstone from Tuan-ch'i, ground the ink until it was appropriately dark, and spread out a sheet of brocade notepaper before him.

Now this Censor Ts'ai Yün possessed the talent of a principal graduate, after all, so:

Taking the writing brush in hand,⁴⁹

Without altering a single stroke,⁵⁰

Engendering characters like dragons and serpents, under the lamplight, he:

Dashed off a composition with a single flourish,⁵¹ producing a poem, which read:

It has been more than half a year since I visited your home;
The cultured decor of your studio is just the same as before.
When the rain is over, Shu-t'ung opens up the herb garden;
As the breeze returns, immortals pace among the flower beds.
As we near a state of inebriation, how swiftly the cups fly;
When our poems are finally composed, the clepsydra urges us on.
Our impending separation only adds another source of regret;
Who knows when the day will come that I visit you again?

When he had finished his composition, he had Shu-t'ung paste it on the wall in order to commemorate the occasion.

He then asked the two singing girls, "What are your names?"

"My surname is Tung," one of them replied, "and my given name is Chiaoerh. My companion's name is Han Chin-ch'uan."

"Do the two of you have courtesy names?" Censor Ts'ai went on to ask.

"We are but unknown singing girls," replied Tung Chiao-erh. "Where would we get courtesy names from?"

"There is no call for you two to be so modest," said Censor Ts'ai.

Only after he had enquired repeatedly did Han Chin-ch'uan respond, "My courtesy name is Yü-ch'ing, or Jade Darling."

"And my humble courtesy name is Wei-hsien, or Crape Myrtle Fairy," said Tung Chiao-erh.

When Censor Ts'ai heard the words "Crape Myrtle Fairy," his heart was filled with delight, and he consequently devoted special attention to her. After Shu-t'ung had been ordered to bring in a table with an inlaid chessboard on its surface, they laid out the pieces, and Censor Ts'ai played a game with Tung Chiao-erh, while Hsi-men Ch'ing kept them company, and Han Chin-ch'uan stood to one side, holding a flagon with which to serve them with wine.

Clapping his hands to keep time, Shu-t'ung sang a song for them, to the tune “Jade Lotus Blossoms”:

The east wind sends willow catkins flying;
By jade flagstones orchid shoots are small.
The resplendence of the spring scene would tax the skill of an artist to depict.
Over the top of the wall, red-rouged beauties⁵² are seen to smile.
Once finished with their swinging,⁵³ they are drenched in perfumed sweat.
In pursuit of fragrant flowers,
One does not repine over the distance.
Behold, at last I see the banner of the wine shop fluttering beyond the apricot blossoms.

By the time he finished singing, Censor Ts'ai had won the chess game with Tung Chiao-erh. After drinking a cup of wine as a forfeit, she toasted Censor Ts'ai in turn. Han Chin-ch'uan, for her part, replenished Hsi-men Ch'ing's wine, and he drank a cup to keep them company. Shu-t'ung then continued to sing, to the same tune:

The wind turns over the trailing plantain fronds;
The rain scatters the pearls on the lotus leaves.
I see a beauty with spit curls like cicada wings adorning her temples.
Her beige silk fan coquettishly half conceals her lotus blossom cheeks;
The art with which her variegated sleeves flutter rivals that of Hsiao-man.⁵⁴
Her eyes are autumn ripples.
It is hard for us both to cope with our emotions;
Which makes me so despondent and lonely that tears lie crisscross on my face.

When they had finished their drinks, the two of them proceeded to play another game, and this time Tung Chiao-erh was the winner, whereupon she promptly proffered a cup of wine to Censor Ts'ai. Hsi-men Ch'ing, in his position on the sidelines, again drank a cup of wine to keep him company. Shu-t'ung then continued to sing, to the same tune:

Yellow chrysanthemums are blooming everywhere;⁵⁵
As other varieties of verdure begin to wither.
Little crickets chirrup incessantly on the empty steps.
The Herd Boy, as always, is at his post night after night;
Why is it, then, that the Weaving Maid is not to be seen?⁵⁶
Lovesick as I am,
What am I to make of my confused dreams?
On her account, my tears have soaked the memento of her phoenix-toed shoes.

When he finished the song, Censor Ts'ai said, “Ssu-ch'üan, it's getting late, and:

I cannot handle the effects of the drink.”⁵⁷

Thereupon, he walked outside and stood under the flowering trees. At the time, it was around the middle of the fourth lunar month, and the moon had just arisen.

“Venerable Sir,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “it's early yet, and Han Chin-ch'uan has not yet had a chance to offer you a cup of wine.”

“That's true,” said Censor Ts'ai. “Call her out, and I'll drink a cup while standing under the flowers here.”

Thereupon, Han Chin-ch'uan took a large gold goblet in the shape of a peach, filled it with wine, and proffered it to him with her slender hands, while Tung Chiao-erh stood by his side and offered him some fruit. Shu-t'ung, clapping his hands to keep time, then sang a fourth song to the same tune:

The snow falls like scattered pear blossoms;
The wings of roving bees are no longer seen.
In front of the small window, magpies perch on withered branches.
It is disheartening to learn of the advent of those who brave the snow to look for plum blossoms.
One suddenly becomes aware that the bronze tanks of the clepsydra are marking extended intervals.
These heartbreaking events,
Make me think of the sadness of separation.
On her account, I cannot set aside the writing brush with which I compose love letters.

When Censor Ts'ai had finished his drink, he poured out a cup to reward Han Chin-ch'uan and then begged off, saying, “Ssu-ch'üan, the wine is too much for me today. Have your esteemed servant take it away.”

Thereupon, taking Hsi-men Ch'ing by the hand, he said, “Worthy Sir, your:

Lavish hospitality and surpassing virtue, are:

Forever suspended in this heart of mine.⁵⁸

If you were not:

Bone and flesh of this culture of ours,⁵⁹

How could you ever have come thus far?⁶⁰

As for that loan that you formerly made to me:

It is a conspicuous burden on my mind.⁶¹ and I have already said as much to Chai Ch'ien in the capital. If, at some future date, I should:

Advance so much as an inch in my career,

I could hardly fail to repay your surpassing virtue.”

“Venerable Sir,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing:

“How can you say such a thing?⁶²

You need not give it a thought.”

When Han Chin-ch'uan saw the way that Ts'ai Yün was holding hands with Tung Chiao-erh, she understood the situation and tactfully withdrew to the rear compound.

Upon her arrival in the master suite, Yüeh-niang asked her, "Why have you come back here instead of spending the night with him?"

"He chose to keep Tung Chiao-erh with him," Han Chin-ch'uan said with a laugh. "If I had not come back here, what would I have done with myself over there?"

After some time, Hsi-men Ch'ing also said good night and returned to the front compound, where he summoned Lai-hsing and instructed him, saying, "Early tomorrow morning, at the fifth watch, prepare food boxes with the requisite wine and rice, snacks and other refreshments, and hire a chef to accompany them to the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the South Gate, where I plan to provide a farewell collation for His Honor Ts'ai Yün. Also engage the services of two boy actors, and see that nothing goes amiss."

"Tomorrow is the eve of the Second Lady's birthday," said Lai-hsing, "and there won't be anyone here at home to take care of things."

"Have Ch'i-t'ung stay behind to buy the necessary provisions," said Hsimen Ch'ing, "and engage a cook to prepare things on the big stove in the rear compound."

In no time at all, Shu-t'ung and Tai-an had cleared away the used utensils and procured a pot of high-grade tea, which they took into the garden for Ts'ai Yün to rinse out his mouth with. In the studio within the Kingfisher Pavilion, quilts and pillows were all properly laid out on the bed. Censor Ts'ai noticed that Tung Chiao-erh was holding a folding fan made of speckled bamboo with a gold-flecked surface, on which there was depicted in ink-wash a variety of aquatic orchid beside the flowing water of a level stream.

"Might I trouble Your Honor," said Tung Chiao-erh, "to do me the favor of writing a poem on the face of this fan for me?"

"I don't have any subject at hand," said Censor Ts'ai, "so I'll allude to your courtesy name, Crape Myrtle Fairy."

Thereupon, under the lamplight, he was inspired to take up a writing brush, with which he indited a quatrain on the fan.

The little courtyard with its empty portico⁶³ is silent and undisturbed;
Above the garden pool the moon has arisen, bathing the window gauze.
Having encountered each other by chance,⁶⁴ the time is not yet too late;
The Secretary of the Hall of Purple Myrtle confronts the myrtle blossom.⁶⁵

When he had finished writing out the poem, Tung Chiao-erh hastily kowtowed to him in gratitude, and the two of them, after performing the necessary preliminaries:

Got into bed and prepared to sleep.

Shu-t'ung and Tai-an, together with Ts'ai Yün's personal servants, retired to sleep together in the parlor. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

Early the next morning, Censor Ts'ai presented Tung Chiao-erh with a single tael of silver, sealed up in an ostentatious packet of red paper.

When she returned to the rear compound and showed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, he laughed, saying, "That's the typical behavior of a civil official. Where would he come up with the big money to reward you more appropriately? This is the very best you could hope for if you were to consult your fortune with the bamboo sticks."⁶⁶

He then went on to instruct Yüeh-niang to give each of the singing girls five mace of silver, and see that they were sent on their way through the rear door.

Shu-t'ung, meanwhile, fetched some water for Ts'ai Yün to wash his face with, and helped him perform his toilet and put on his clothes, after which, Hsi-men Ch'ing came out to the front compound to keep him company as he ate his breakfast congee in the reception hall. By this time, his subordinates were already standing by with his sedan chair and horse, ready to accompany him on his way. As he took his leave of Hsi-men Ch'ing, he thanked him again and again.

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by saying, "As for that matter that your pupil mentioned to you yesterday, after you arrive at your post, Venerable Sir, were I to send you a letter about it, if you should see fit to pay it some attention, I would be much indebted to you."

"Worthy Sir," said Censor Ts'ai, "even if you should not deign to honor me with an elegant epistle, if your esteemed servant were to show up with the merest note:

There is nothing I would not do on your behalf."⁶⁷

When they had finished speaking, the two of them mounted their horses together and, followed by their attendants, proceeded to the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city, where Hsi-men Ch'ing had borrowed the abbot's quarters in which to provide a farewell libation before seeing off his visitor. Lai-hsing and the chef that he had hired for the occasion had long since made all the necessary preparations, and the two boy actors, Li Ming and Wu Hui, played and sang for their entertainment. After a few cups of wine had been consumed, without sitting very long, Censor Ts'ai got up to go. His chair-bearers, horse, and palanquin were waiting for him outside the temple gate.

As Ts'ai Yün was about to set out, Hsi-men Ch'ing brought up the matter of Miao Ch'ing, saying, "He is an acquaintance of your pupil's. Because he was falsely implicated in a case adjudicated by the former regional investigating censor, Tseng Hsiao-hsü, a warrant for his arrest has been sent to Yang-chou, and the final disposition of the litigation awaits his apprehension. Since this matter has already been adequately dealt with, if you should happen to run into His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien, I hope that you will:

Put in a word on his behalf,⁶⁸
for which we would both be very grateful."

"That's no problem," said Censor Ts'ai. "When I see my fellow graduate Sung Ch'iao-nien, I'll mention it to him, and, even if he has been taken into custody, he'll be released. That's all there is to it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing once again expressed his gratification with a bow.

Gentle reader take note: Later on, while Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien was on his way to Chi-nan to take up his post, he happened to be in conference with Censor Ts'ai Yün aboard his boat on the canal, when the arresting officers brought Miao Ch'ing before him. "This has to do with a case adjudicated by His Honor Tseng Hsiao-hsü," said Censor Ts'ai, "so why should you concern yourself with it?" As a result, he was released and allowed to return home. At the same time, a directive was sent down to Tung-p'ing prefecture, ordaining that the two boatmen should be:

Executed without waiting for the customary season,⁶⁹
and that An-t'ung should be set at liberty. Truly:

Though men may plan to do thus and so:
Heaven's principles may yet deny them.

There is a poem, designed to explicate the difficulties that human feelings make for people, which goes as follows:

Justice and human feelings are frequently in conflict;
Human feelings and justice⁷⁰ are difficult to reconcile.
If one insists upon doing justice, human feelings will suffer;
If one gives way to human feelings, justice will lose out.

The prefect of Tung-P'ing prefecture, Hu Shih-wen, had already been suborned by Hsi-men Ch'ing and Hsia Yen-ling in connection with this case, so there was nothing he would not do on their behalf. I would say more about it, but this is a subsequent event.

That day, Hsi-men Ch'ing wanted to see his visitor off as far as his boat, but Censor Ts'ai would not permit it, saying, "Worthy Sir, there is no need for you to escort me for such a distance. I will simply bid you farewell here and now."

"Pray take care of yourself," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and permit me to ask after you by means of my paltry servant in the future."

When they had finished speaking, Censor Ts'ai got into his sedan chair and departed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to the abbot's quarters and took a seat. The abbot then came in to offer him some tea. He wore a Vairocana hat on his head and was attired in a cassock. A young novice brought in the cups of tea in their raised saucers, and after presenting them withdrew. The abbot saluted his visitor by pressing his palms together in front of his chest and bowing to him in the Buddhist fashion. Hsi-men Ch'ing returned the compliment by saluting him in return.

Noticing that:

His snowy eyebrows were glistening white,
he asked the abbot, "How old are you?"

"This humble monk is seventy-four," the abbot replied.

"You're still looking remarkably healthy," exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"And what is your religious name?" he went on to ask.

"This humble monk's religious name is Tao-chien,⁷¹ or Stand Hard," replied the abbot.

"And how many disciples do you have?"

"I have only two young acolytes," the abbot replied. "But there are thirty-odd monks in this temple."

"This temple of yours," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is certainly capacious enough. But it is sadly in need of repair."

"There is no need for me to dissemble," said the abbot. "This temple was originally erected by His Honor Chou Hsiu. But the monastic treasury does not contain enough in the way of money or grain to maintain it. So it is in danger of falling down."

"So this is the family temple of His Honor Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I noticed that his country estate is not far from here. This shouldn't be a problem. If you petition His Honor for permission to prepare a subscription list, and circulate it elsewhere in the usual way, when you come to my place, I will undertake to contribute something toward its upkeep."

Tao-chien promptly pressed his palms together and expressed his gratitude by saluting him in the Buddhist manner.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Tai-an to extract a single tael of silver from his letter case, with which he thanked the abbot, saying, "I've put you to a good deal of trouble here today."

"This humble monk did not know that you were coming," said Tao-chien. "So I was unable to prepare a vegetarian repast."

"I would like to go inside in order to adjust my toilet," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Tao-chien promptly called for a young novice to show him the way to a side door.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished adjusting his toilet, he observed that behind the abbot's quarters there was a large thirty-foot-wide meditation hall, occupied by a considerable number of itinerant monks, who were beating on wooden fish and reciting sutras. Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Without premeditation or forethought, strolled inside to take a look and noticed a monk whose physique was out of the ordinary, and whose appearance was grotesque. His leopard-shaped head with its sunken eyes was the color of purple liver and was crowned with a cock's comb-like chaplet. He wore a long flesh-colored gown. The whiskers beneath his chin bristled unevenly, and he had a shiny annular ridge around the base of his head. Truly, he was:

An authentic arhat, of the most extraordinary aspect;⁷²
A one-eyed dragon, undivested of his fiery temperament.

In the Temple of Eternal Felicity He Meets an Indian Monk

He had fallen into a trance on his meditation couch, so that his head was drooping, his neck had subsided into his upper trunk, and a trickle of jade-white mucus was dribbling from his nostrils.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished observing him:

From his mouth no word was uttered, but

In his heart he thought to himself,

"This priest must surely be a monk of high attainments, possessed of extraordinary powers. If not, how could he exhibit such an unusual appearance? I might as well wake him up and ascertain the truth of the matter."

Thereupon, raising his voice, he called out to the monk, "Where do you come from, and what temple are you attached to, that you have arrived here in the course of your peregrinations?"

The first time he called out to him, there was no response; and the second time, he also failed to reply; but the third time, behold, that monk on his meditation couch jerked himself erect, gave his torso a stretch, opened his one good eye, sprang up from his relaxed position, nodded his head toward Hsi-men Ch'ing, and said, in a coarse voice, "Why are you interrogating me?

I neither alter my given name when abroad,

Nor change my surname when at home.

I am a foreign monk from the land of India in the Western Regions, who has descended into the mundane world from Cold Shivers Temple, beneath Navel Waist Peak, in Dense Sperm Forest.²³ Having come here in the course of my peregrinations I plan to distribute medicine in order to cure people. In calling upon me this way, sir, what have you got to say?"

"Since you plan to distribute medicine in order to cure people," said Hsimen Ch'ing, "were I to ask you for some restorative medication, might you have such a thing, or not?"

"I do! I do!" exclaimed the monk.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then went on to ask, "Were I to invite you to my home, would you come, or not?"

"I'll come! I'll come!" asseverated the monk.

"Since you say you'll come," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we might as well start out at once."

The Indian monk straightened himself erect, picked up his iron staff from the head of the bed to support himself with, hitched the leather pouch containing his two medicine gourds onto his back, stepped down from the meditation hall, and strode outside.

Hsi-men Ch'ing directed Tai-an, saying, "Hire two donkeys, and escort His Reverence back home right away. You can wait for me there. I'll be along directly."

"There's no need to go to all that trouble, sir," said the Indian Monk. "You can mount your horse and go right ahead. Even without the aid of a donkey, I guarantee I'll be there before you."

"He certainly must be a monk of high attainments, possessed of extraordinary powers," said Hsi-men Ch'ing to himself. "If not, how could he talk so bluntly?"

Fearing that he might get away, he ordered Tai-an, "Make sure, whatever you do, not to let him out of your sight."

Thereupon, he took his leave of the abbot, mounted his horse, and, accompanied by his retinue, headed straight into the city on his way home.

That day was the seventeenth day of the fourth month, which happened to be Wang Liu-erh's birthday. It was also the eve of Li Chiao-erh's birthday, and some female guests had been invited to the house to celebrate it. That afternoon, Wang Liu-erh, having no one else at hand to send, deputed her younger brother, Wang Ching, to come and invite Hsi-men Ch'ing to visit her. She instructed him that when he got to the gate of the house, he should seek out Tai-an, and no one else, in order to deliver her message.

When he failed to find Tai-an at the gate, he decided to stand and wait, and he remained standing there for a good two hours. At this juncture, Wu Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh came out to see off Auntie Li the Third as she got into her sedan chair. When they noticed a fourteen- or fifteen-year-old boy, with his hair done up in a topknot, standing there, they asked who he was.

The young man, unthinkingly, came up to them and kowtowed to Yüeh-niang, saying, "I'm from the Han household, looking for Brother An, to have a word with him."

"What Brother An is that?" asked Yüeh-niang.

P'ing-an, who was standing to one side, was afraid that Yüeh-niang would realize that he came with a message from Wang Liu-erh if he said anything amiss, so he stepped forward and pulled him aside, explaining to Yüeh-niang, "He's been sent from Manager Han's place to speak to Tai-an, and find out when Manager Han will be coming home."

By so doing, he managed to pull the wool over Yüeh-niang's eyes, so that she said nothing more about it, and returned to the rear compound.

Not long after this, Tai-an and the Indian monk arrived at the gate before Hsi-men Ch'ing did. Tai-an had been constrained to walk so fast that his two legs ached, and:

His whole body was covered with sweat,⁷⁴ which made him as resentful as could be; whereas, the Indian monk seemed to be completely relaxed and was not even short of breath.

P'ing-an told Tai-an all about how Wang Liu-erh had sent Wang Ching to speak to him and explained, "Who could have anticipated that the First Lady happened to come out just then in order to see off Auntie Li from the licensed quarter as she got into her sedan chair. Catching sight of her, he:

Recklessly and impulsively,⁷⁵ came right up to the First Lady and kowtowed to her. When the First Lady asked who he was, he said he was from the Han household. Fortunately, I was standing nearby and was able to pull him aside. After that, when the First Lady asked me, I explained that he had been sent from Manager Han's place to find out when Manager Han would be coming home. At that, the First Lady had nothing further to say, so that, luckily, no horse's hoof was exposed to view. Later on, if Mother asks you anything about it, you'd better say the same thing."

Tai-an had been put through his paces until his eyes were staring out of his head, and all he could do was fan himself with his fan.

"Has this turned out to be my unlucky day, or hasn't it!" he complained. "Father insisted that I escort this lousy baldpated jailbird home, for no good reason. It's some distance, I can tell you! From that temple outside the city gate all the way here, I never once had a chance to rest my legs along the road. I've been walking so fast:

Each new breath has not had a chance to catch up with the last.

Father wanted me to hire donkeys for us, but he refused to ride one. If he preferred to walk, that's no matter, no matter at all, but it has really been hard on these two legs of mine. The soles of my shoes are worn through, and my feet are blistered. What a provoking business!"

"What has Father invited him home for, anyway?" said P'ing-an.

"Who knows?" said Tai-an. "He tells me he's hoping to obtain some kind of medicine from him."

As they were speaking, what should they hear but the sound of an escort shouting to clear the way, as Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that the Indian monk was at his gate, he exclaimed, "Master, you must really be a god among men to have actually gotten here before me."

As he spoke, he ushered him inside and offered him a seat in the large reception hall. Hsi-men Ch'ing called for Shu-t'ung to take his outer garments and changed into an informal skullcap, before sitting down to keep him company.

The Indian monk opened his eyes wide and observed that:

The chamber was lofty and spacious, and

The courtyard was secluded and imposing.⁷⁶

Over the door there was suspended:

A glossy-green beaded portiere, woven of shrimp's whiskers, with a tortoiseshell pattern.

On the floor there was positioned:
A rug fashioned of woolen yarn, displaying a pair of lions,
playing with a brocade ball.²⁷
In the center of the room there was:
A soap-colored table in raised relief,
on bulging "mantis belly" legs, with cabriole "dragonfly feet."²⁸
On the table there was displayed:
A vertical marble monolith, mounted on a ringlike stand,
like the base of Mount Sumeru.
All around it there were placed:
Folding armchairs of swollen shape,
with backs of nan wood,
and loach-head finials.
On the two walls were displayed:
Hanging scrolls, replete with damask borders and agate knobs, adorning purple bamboo rollers.

Truly:

While painted drums of alligator hide,
resound in courts and halls;
The banquet table, wrought of ebony, is loaded with wine vessels.

When the Indian monk had seen his fill, Hsi-men Ch'ing asked him, "Master, do you drink wine, or not?"

"I consume both wine and meat," proclaimed the monk.

Hsi-men Ch'ing accordingly directed a page boy, "When you go back to the kitchen, don't bother to bring any vegetarian fare, but serve us with regular food and wine."

That day, being the eve of Li Chiao-erh's birthday, there were delicacies of every kind to be had in the kitchen. Once the table was set in place, all that had to be done was to serve the feast.

To begin with, there were four saucers of nuts, and four saucers of appetizers. Then there were another four dishes to complement the wine, namely, one saucer of bullhead, one saucer of duck preserved in a fermented wine mash, one saucer of black-bone chicken, and one saucer of still wriggling male sculpin. Still another four dishes to go with the rice were then served, to wit, a saucer of walnut kernels blanched with ramshorn scallions, a saucer of finely minced goat-meat hash, a saucer of fatty stuffed sheep's-gut sausage, and a saucer of shiny smooth slippery loach. Yet another two courses were then forthcoming. One of which was a soup served in a bowl containing two meatballs straddling a gristly roulade of pork, and called "The Lone Dragon Toys with a Pair of Pearls," while the other was a large platter of overstuffed steamed pork buns, the heads of which were bursting open.

Hsi-men Ch'ing encouraged the Indian monk to eat his fill. He then ordered Ch'in-t'ung to fetch a round-handled chicken-crop flagon, open the red clay stopper, and pour gush after gush of the whitish, yin-replenishing, liquor, painstakingly distilled in the Province of the Loins, into a high-stemmed goblet in the shape of a drooping lotus seedpod, which he presented to the Indian monk. The Indian monk put it to his lips and drank it off with one gulp.

Thereupon, after the table had been cleared, another two courses were presented. One, a saucer of inch-thick horseback sausages, and the other, a saucer of salt-cured goose necks. These were supplemented by two more stimulating dishes for the enjoyment of the Indian monk as he drank his wine. One, a saucer of bitter melon, and the other, a saucer of oozing overripe red plums. After these had been consumed, a large bowl of eel noodles, along with a serving of spring rolls, was also provided for the Indian monk to dispose of.

In no time at all, the Indian monk was so stuffed that the eyes were starting out of his head, and he said, "I'm already:

Drunk on wine and satiated with food.

It's time to call a halt."

Hsi-men Ch'ing summoned his attendants and had them remove the table at which they had been drinking, after which he besought his visitor to supply him with the promised medication to enhance his performance of the arts of the bedchamber.

The Indian monk responded, "I have in my possession a remedy that was:

Perfected by the Lord Lao-tzu himself, and Transmitted by the Queen Mother of the West.
For the wrong person it will not prove effective;
To the wrong person it must never be transmitted.
It will work only for one with the right affinity.

Since you have entertained me so lavishly, Sir, I will provide you with a few pills thereof."

Thereupon, he groped out one of the gourds in his pouch, from which he decanted some hundred or so pills, saying, "You must only take one pill at a time, not any more than that, and wash it down with a draft of distilled spirits."

Shifting then to the other gourd, he squeezed out a glob of about two-tenths of an ounce of pink ointment, saying, "Be sure to use no more than twothousandths of an ounce at a time. Don't use too much of it. If your organ becomes uncomfortably congested, use your hands to knead your thighs on either side of it, and slap them a hundred or so times. Only then will you be able to ejaculate. You must employ these medications sparingly, and not lightly let them fall into the hands of other people.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing respectfully received the proffered items with both hands, saying, “Permit me to inquire, what efficacy does this medication possess?”

The Indian monk said:

“Its shape is like a hen's egg;
Its coloring is gosling yellow.
It has been thrice refined by the Lord Lao-tzu;
And transmitted by the Queen Mother of the West.
Examined externally, it is as worthless as dung;
Inspected internally, it is rarer than carnelian.
It may be compared to gold, but not acquired with gold;
It may be compared to jade, but not procured with jade.
Though you be girdled with gold and garbed in purple,⁷⁹
Though you occupy spacious structures and high halls,⁸⁰
Though you own the lightest furs and sleekest horses,⁸¹
Though you manifest the talents of a pillar of state,
Once you have this medication firmly in your grasp,
Your body will be impelled into the bridal chamber.
Within the chamber, spring reigns eternally;
Beyond the mundane, vistas are ever-fragrant.
Your jade pinnacle will never be impaired;
Your cinnabar field will glow in the dark.
After one battle, your spirits remain valiant;
As the duel continues, your vigor is enhanced.
No matter how captivating and voluptuous your favorites,
Though you possess twelve beauties in their rosy makeup;
You may engage with them however you wish,
Remaining stiff as a spear all night long.
If used for long, your appetite will be insatiable;
It will stir your testicles and stiffen your organ.
In a hundred days your hair will regain its color;
In a thousand days your stamina will be augmented.
It will strengthen your teeth and brighten your eyes;
Only when yang is in the ascendant will yin diminish.
If you are not able to believe these claims,
Mix it in with rice and feed it to your cat.
For three days it will indulge itself without restraint;
On the fourth day it will be too overheated to stand it.
A white cat will be transformed into a black one,
Its excretory functions will stop and it will die.
In the summer months you should sleep in the breeze,
In the winter you should submerge yourself in water;
But should you ever be unable to ejaculate,
Your hair will drop out and leave you bald.
If you use a thousandth or so of an ounce at a time,
Your organ will become erect and stronger than ever;
You will be able to handle ten women in one night,
And your reservoir of sperm will not be exhausted.
Older women will contract their brows in dismay;
Prostitutes will find it hard to accommodate you.
If you should ever lose interest in the battle,
Wishing to retire your warriors from the field,
Swallow a mouthful of cold water,
So as to retain your sperm intact.
Your pleasures may thus extend throughout the night,
And spring colors will pervade your nuptial chamber.
This present is offered only to the cognoscenti,
As a recipe for their lasting self-preservation.”

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he wanted to ask him for the prescription, saying:

“In engaging a physician you should engage only the best;

In prescribing drugs you should impart the prescription.

Master, if you do not give the prescription to me, should I happen to run out of it at a later date, where could I hope to find you? No matter how much you want for it, I will be happy to comply.”

He then ordered Tai-an, “Go back to the rear compound as quick as you can and fetch me twenty taels of silver to give to this Indian monk in exchange for the prescription for this medication.”

The Indian monk laughed, saying, “I am someone who has left home to become a priest, and:

Wanders like a cloud among the four quarters.

What would I want this money for? Pray take it back, Sir.”

He then got up to take his leave.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing realized that he would not give him the prescription, he said, “Master, if you won't accept money, I have a forty-foot-long bolt of muslin, which you could use to clothe yourself with.”

So saying, he immediately ordered his attendants to fetch it and proffered it to the Indian monk with both hands. Only then did the monk express his thanks by pressing his palms together in front of his chest and bowing to him in the Buddhist fashion.

As he was about to go out the gate, he enjoined him one more time, “Don't use too much of it. Take heed! Take heed!”

When he had finished speaking, he hitched his pouch onto his back, fastened his staff to it, went out the gate, and proceeded nonchalantly on his way. Truly:

Suspended from his staff he bears on high the dyad sun and moon;

In his straw sandals he traverses all nine divisions of the realm.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Maitreya Buddha,^{82} as a mendicant monk, has appeared in China;

His calico bag is hanging from the tip of his walking staff.^{83}

No matter how many myriad transformations you can perform;

Every incarnation must cope with its own burden of sorrow.^{84}

Chapter 50

CH'IN-T'UNG EAVESDROPS

ON THE JOYS OF LOVEMAKING;

TAI-AN ENJOYS A PLEASING RAMBLE

IN BUTTERFLY LANE

Heaven has bestowed the rouge with which to dab their ruby lips;
Their faces, blithe as the eastern breeze,
are wreathed in smiles.
Their fragrant hearts, needless to say,
are replete with delight;
Their inebriated faces constantly suggest new forms of satisfaction.
Kingdom-topping beauties are oft disposed to agitate their patrons;
Inclining toward the sun, without a word,
they flirt with but a smile.
How many men in the world of the Red Dust,
with sorrow-laden brows,
Are wont to visit flowery groves, to seek for intimate companions?

THE STORY GOES that the day in question was the eve of Li Chiao-erh's birthday, and Nun Wang from the Kuan-yin Nunnery, as she had promised, had invited Nun Hsüeh of the Lotus Blossom Nunnery and her two disciples, Miao-feng and Miao-ch'ü, to come help celebrate the occasion. Wu Yüeh-niang, on hearing that Reverend Hsüeh had arrived, and having heard her to be a nun renowned for her exemplary conduct, hastened out to welcome her.

She was attired in the headdress of an immaculate nun, was clothed in a dull brown tea-leaf-colored cassock, had been shaved so closely as to produce a bluish, finely polished pate, and presented an imposingly corpulent figure, with a pondlike mouth and piglike cheeks. As she came in, she pressed her palms together in front of her chest and saluted Yüeh-niang and the others in the Buddhist fashion.

As she did so, Nun Wang said, "This is the mistress of the household, and these are her fellow ladies."

This threw Yüeh-niang and the others into such consternation that they made haste to return her salutation. Impressed by her proclivity for:

Raising her brows and batting her eyes,¹

Assuming attitudes and putting on airs;²

and observing that she was given to:

Hairsplitting and logic-chopping; in speaking to her, the words "Reverend Hsüeh" were seldom out of their mouths; while she, in turn, addressed Yüeh-niang with the words "Lay Bodhisattva,"³ or "My Lady." Yüeh-niang treated her with the greatest possible respect.

That day Sister-in-law Wu and Aunt Yang were also present. Yüeh-niang had prepared tea for her guests, as well as vegetarian fare in the form of various dishes and treats, all of which were laid out on a large table, making a more than ordinarily sumptuous repast. Nun Hsüeh's two young disciples, Miao-ch'ü and Miao-feng, were only thirteen or fourteen years old and were naturally very good-looking. They stood by her side and helped themselves to the refreshments on the table.

When they were finished with their tea, they all sat down in the master suite, along with Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, in order to listen to Nun Hsüeh expound on the Buddhist Dharma. What should they see at this juncture but Huat'ung, who came in from the front compound carrying a load of used utensils.

Yüeh-niang took the occasion to ask him, "Has that meat- and wine-consuming Buddhist priest left yet?"

"He has just gotten up to go," reported Hua-t'ung. "Father has gone out to see him off."

"Where did he invite that priest to come here from?" asked Sister-in-law Wu.

"He is a priest that Father brought back with him after going to a temple outside the South Gate to see off Censor Ts'ai Yün," replied Yüeh-niang. "He consumes both meat and wine. Father wanted to get the prescription for some medication from him and offered him silver for it, but he said he had no need for it and refused to take any money. Who knows what sort of business he's up to? He's been gorging himself all day, before taking himself off."

When Nun Hsüeh heard this, she said, "As for eating meat and drinking wine,⁴ these two acts are hard to justify. In the final analysis, it is we Buddhist nuns who are more likely to keep our vows. What do these male monks care about such things? Is it not stated in the Great Buddhist Canon that for every mouthful of such substances that you consume you will be required to make recompense in a subsequent incarnation?"

When Sister-in-law Wu heard this, she said, "For people like us who eat meat all day long, there's no telling how much evil karma we will have accumulated by the time we're reincarnated."

"As for venerable bodhisattvas such as yourself," Nun Hsüeh asserted, "it's all due to the good fortune you have cultivated for yourselves in former incarnations that you are destined to bask in glory and luxury, and enjoy wealth and distinction.² It is just as it is with the five grains; if you do not plant them in the spring, when autumn comes, how can you hope to reap a harvest?"

We will say no more about this conversation for the moment.

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing came inside after seeing off the Indian monk, whom should he see but Tai-an, who quietly stepped forward and said, "A little while ago, Auntie Han sent her younger brother over here to extend you an invitation. She said that today is her birthday, and that she hoped, whatever happens, that you will be able to come over and pay her a visit."

Ever since acquiring the aphrodisiac from the Indian monk, Hsi-men Ch'ing had made up his mind to go there in order to try it out with the woman, but how could he have anticipated that she would actually send him an invitation. Since this development coincided precisely with his own wishes, he immediately ordered Tai-an to prepare his horse and sent Ch'in-t'ung ahead to deliver a jug of wine in honor of the occasion.

Thereupon, he went straight into P'an Chin-lien's quarters, picked up the bag of sexual implements, attired himself in casual clothes and an informal skullcap, put on his eye shades, and headed straight for Wang Liu-erh's house, with Tai-an in attendance.

Upon dismounting and going inside, he gave directions, saying, "I'll keep Ch'in-t'ung here to wait on me, while Tai-an can go home with the horse. If anyone at home asks, just say that I'm in the shop on Lion Street going over the accounts."

Tai-an assented with the words, "I understand," after which he mounted the horse and went home.

When Wang Liu-erh came out to greet her visitor, she was wearing her chignon enclosed in a fret of silver filigree, held in place with gold filigree pins and combs, along with ornaments with kingfisher feather inlays, and a pair of earrings adorned with two pearls apiece. Her head was uncovered, and she was attired in a jade-colored silk vest, over a linen blouse, and a white-waisted drawnwork skirt with a single border.

After kowtowing to Hsi-men Ch'ing, and sitting down beside him, she said, "Having some free time, I've invited you to come relax and visit together. Also, thank you very much for the wine you sent over."

"I had forgotten that it was your birthday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I was obliged to go outside the South Gate to see someone off today and have only just gotten back."

He then pulled a pair of hairpins out of his sleeve and presented them to her, saying, "This is in honor of your birthday."

The woman, accepting them and looking them over, saw that they were a pair of gold hairpins in the shape of the character for long life, and exclaimed, "What fine workmanship!"

She then hastened to bow to him in thanks.

Hsi-men Ch'ing also gave her five mace of silver and said to her, "Weigh out five candareens, and get my page boy to buy a bottle of southern distilled spirits for me to drink."

Wang Liu-erh laughed at this, saying, "Father, you've grown tired of other wines have you? So now you've come up with the idea of trying southern distilled spirits."

Thereupon, she promptly weighed out five candareens of silver and sent Ch'in-t'ung out with a bottle in hand to buy it for him.

Wang Liu-erh then helped Hsi-men Ch'ing off with his outer garments and invited him into her room to sit down, while she took the trouble to:

Wash her hands and trim her nails, before personally shelling some nuts for him. She had ordered her maidservant to brew some fine tea, which she brought out for Hsi-men Ch'ing to drink. A small table was set up in the room so they could play cards together. Only after they had played for a while did they put the cards away and fall to drinking. But let us put this aside for the moment and say no more about it.

Let us now return to the story of Tai-an. By the time he returned home with the horse, he had been hard at work all day and was utterly exhausted from trying to keep up with the Indian monk. He went straight to his room in the front compound and lay down for a nap. It was not until lamplighting time that he woke up, rubbed his eyes, and, seeing that it was already late in the day, went to the rear compound to fetch a lantern with which to go back for Hsi-men Ch'ing.

As he was standing there, Yüeh-niang said to him, "Earlier today, after Father had seen off the Indian monk, he didn't even come inside to change his clothes, but took off somewhere before anyone was aware of it. Really now, whose place has he gone off to drink at?"

Tai-an was at a loss for words but finally said, "Father hasn't gone to anyone else's place. He's at the shop on Lion Street going over the accounts with Lai-pao."

"Even if he were going over the accounts," said Yüeh-niang, "it wouldn't take him all day."

"After finishing the accounts," said Tai-an, "he's probably having himself a drink."

"Without anyone to keep him company?" said Yüeh-niang. "No doubt he's drinking all by himself, for no good reason! It's obvious that your story is duplicitous. What was that young man up to who came looking for you from Han Tao-kuo's household a while ago?"

"He came to ask when Uncle Han was coming home," said Tai-an.

"You lousy jailbird!" Yüeh-niang vociferated. "Who knows what kind of mischief you're up to?"

Tai-an did not dare say any more on the subject.

Yüeh-niang told Hsiao-yü to fetch a lantern for him, saying, "You tell him that the Second Lady is waiting for him at home to celebrate the eve of her birthday."

Hsiao-yü accordingly fetched a lantern and turned it over to Tai-an, who made his way out to the shop in the front compound.

What should he see there but Shu-t'ung and Manager Fu, sitting together at the counter, on which there were laid out a bottle of wine, two sets of cups and chopsticks, several bowls and saucers, and a platter of beef tripe, while P'ing-an was on the way in from outside with two bottles of preserved fish in fermented mash.

Just as they were settling down to enjoy their wine, whom should they see but Tai-an, who came in, put his lantern down, and said, "Great! I've arrived just in the nick of time."

Then, catching sight of Shu-t'ung, he said in jest, "What a fine wanton you are! What are you doing here? I've been looking all over for you, and it turns out you've been hiding in here all the time drinking wine."

"Just what did you want me for?" said Shu-t'ung. "Have you been harboring the wish to be my grandson for a spell?"

"Why you 'sweetie' of a page boy!" cursed Tai-an. "You have the nerve to talk back to me, do you? I was looking for you so I could fuck you in the ass."

Thereupon, stepping forward, he held him down on his chair and gave him a kiss.

Shu-t'ung pushed him away with both hands, complaining, "You crazy good-for-nothing! I'd just be wasting my breath on you! You've not only scraped the tartar right off my teeth, but knocked the hat off my head."

When Manager Fu saw that his hat was lying on the floor, he exclaimed, "It's a brand new lantern-shaped hat."

Then, turning to P'ing-an, he said, "Pick it up, or, I fear, it might get stepped on."

Shu-t'ung grabbed it out of his hands and threw it onto the k'ang, his face turning bright red as he did so.

"What a fine wanton you are!" said Tai-an. "I was just teasing you, and you're all hot and bothered."

Whereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation,

he lifted him up by the legs, forced him down onto the k'ang, and spit a mouthful of saliva into his mouth, as hard as he could, knocking the wine over in the process, so that it ran all over the surface of the counter.

Manager Fu was afraid the account books would get wet, so he promptly grabbed a towel and started mopping it up, saying, "You can be sure it won't be long before the way the two of you are horsing around will turn nasty."

"A fine wanton you are!" said Tai-an. "Whose countenance have you procured that's made you so squeamish today?"

Shu-t'ung, whose hair had gotten all rumpled, complained:

"A game's a game;

A joke's a joke,

but you've spit a mouthful of filthy jizz all over me."

"Why you lousy hick of a 'sweetie'!" said Tai-an. "As though this were the first time you've ever swallowed jizz. From first to last, who knows how much jizz you may have swallowed?"

P'ing-an poured out a goblet of wine and gave it to Tai-an, saying, "You drink this off, and then go on to fetch Father. If you have anything left to say, you can say it to him when you get back."

"Just wait till I've come back from fetching Father," said Tai-an, "and I'll have something to say to him. If I don't fix it so that 'sweetie' of a page boy starts:

Seeing spirits and seeing ghosts,⁶ he won't take me seriously. As for my saliva, am I someone:

Not sired by a human being,⁷ that I must be expected to keep my mouth sucked dry?"

Thereupon, having drunk the wine, he picked up a houseboy from the duty room in the gatehouse to carry the lantern for him and rode on horseback to Wang Liu-erh's place.

After calling for someone to open the door, he asked Ch'in-t'ung, "Where's Father?"

"Father's asleep in the bedroom," replied Ch'in-t'ung.

Thereupon, the two of them closed the door and made their way back to the kitchen in the rear of the house.

Old Mother Feng said to him, "So Master Tai-an has finally shown up. Your Auntie Han has been expecting you, but you were not to be seen. She has set aside a portion of something for you."

She then opened a kitchen cabinet and pulled out a platter of donkey meat, a saucer of preserved roast chicken, two bowls of birthday noodles, and a carafe of wine for him.

Tai-an ate for a while and then offered Ch'in-t'ung some wine, saying, "Come over here. I can't manage all of this wine. The two of us might as well finish this carafe off between us."

"It was set aside for you," said Ch'in-t'ung. "Drink it yourself."

"I've just had a goblet a little while ago," said Tai-an.

Thereupon, the two of them proceeded to finish it off together.

When they were done, Tai-an said, "Old Mother Feng, I've got something to say to you. Don't be offended. It seems to me that you're supposed to be keeping house for the Sixth Lady, and yet here you are, right now, keeping house for Auntie Han. When I get home, just see if I speak to the Sixth Lady about it, or not."

Old Mother Feng gave him a playful slap, saying, "You crazy monkey! You'll drop dead in your tracks someday! Cut it out!

Those may be words but they don't make utterances.

If you go home and say that sort of thing, you'll have her upset with me for the rest of my life, and I won't dare go near her."

While Tai-an and Old Mother Feng were bandying words, who would have thought that Ch'in-t'ung had stationed himself under the window of the bedroom in order to surreptitiously eavesdrop on the events within.

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing had swallowed a dose of the Indian monk's medicine, and washed it down with distilled spirits. After taking off all his clothes, he had gone to bed in order to engage in sexual intercourse with the woman. Sitting down on the edge of the bed, he opened the bag of sexual implements, fastened the silver clasp around the base of his penis, fitted the sulfur-imbued ring around his turtle head, and, pinching up one and a half thousandths of an ounce of the pink ointment the Indian monk had given him, which he kept in a little silver box, daubed it in the eye of his urethra. In no time at all, the medication began to take effect. His organ became engorged with rage,

Its protuberances swelled and its head sprang up,

Its sunken eye grew round, and
Its distended blood vessels were all exposed.
It was the color of purple liver, was six or seven inches long, and more than ordinarily thick and large.
Hsi-men Ch'ing was:

Secretly delighted in his heart,⁸ thinking to himself, "Sure enough, this Indian monk's medicine is something else."

The woman, who had stripped herself stark naked, sat in his lap and pumped his organ with her hand, saying, "No wonder you wanted distilled spirits to drink, since it turns out that this is what you're up to."

She then went on to ask, "Where did you get this medication?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing hastily recounted the whole story, from the beginning, of how he had obtained the medicine from the Indian monk.

He then started out by telling the woman to recline faceup on the bed, supporting her back on a pair of pillows, while she guided his organ to its destination with her hand. His turtle head was proud and large, so that, even with moistening and reaming, it was some time before he was able to achieve any penetration. The woman's vaginal secretions then began to overflow, until, in a little while, it felt smoother, and the knob of his glans was completely submerged.⁹ Hsi-men Ch'ing was exhilarated by the spirits he had consumed and gave himself over to a series of shallow retractions and deep thrusts,¹⁰ until he felt a melting sensation the pleasure of which was indescribable.¹¹

The woman, for her part, was drunk with lecherous desires. Reclining languidly on the pillows, she gave vent to incessant groans of satisfaction, protesting again and again, "My big-dicked daddy! This whore of yours is going to die at your hands today."

She then went on to say, "Whatever else you do, save some energy to play around with my backside."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, turned the woman over so she was kneeling on the edge of the bed, plunged his organ into her orifice, lifted up her haunches, and slammed away at her with all his might. As he slammed away at her:

The reiterated sounds reverberated loudly.

"Daddy," the woman said to him. "Keep on slamming away at this whore of yours. Don't stop. Better yet, why don't you move the lamp over, so you can get a better view of the fun?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, moved the lamp closer, told the woman to stick her two feet straight back, and then straddled them, while he lifted up her thighs, assumed a squatting position, and proceeded to thrust away. The woman, from her position below him, stimulated her clitoris with one hand, while raising her haunches to meet him, and making quavery noises without end.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then said to the woman, "When your husband gets home, I'll send him to Yang-chou, along with Lai-pao and Ts'ui Pen, in order to take delivery of a consignment of salt. Then, after they have taken delivery of the salt, and sold it, I'll send him to Hu-chou to arrange a shipment of woven silk goods. How would that be?"

"My good daddy!" exclaimed the woman, "Send him wherever you want, just so he's out of the way. What's the point of keeping the cuckold idle at home?"

She then went on to ask, "As for the shop, who will you put in charge of it?"

"I'll keep Pen the Fourth at home," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and have him take care of the business in his stead."

"That's all right, then," said Wang Liu-erh. "Let Pen the Fourth take care of it."

While the two of them were engaging in sexual intercourse, who would have thought that Ch'in-t'ung, from his vantage point outside the window, heard everything so clearly that he might well have ejaculated:

"Is it not delightful?"

Tai-an, who happened to come in from the back and noticed him eavesdropping beneath the window, gave him a playful slap, saying, "What's the point of listening to them for no good reason? We'd do better to take advantage of the time before they get up to go out somewhere on our own."

Ch'in-t'ung, accordingly, accompanied him outside.

"You don't know about it," said Tai-an, "but in the little lane right behind here, two fine young girls have recently shown up. When I was riding over on horseback just now, I went by there and got a look at them. They're working at that place, the madam of which is called Lu Ch'ang-t'ui, or Longleg Lu. One of them is named Chin-erh, and the other is named Sai-erh, and they're both no more than fifteen or sixteen years old. If we get the houseboy I brought with me to act as a lookout for us here, we can go over there and have some fun for a while."

He then instructed the houseboy, saying, "You stay here and listen at the gate. We're going out onto the street to relieve ourselves. If they start looking for us inside, just step over to the mouth of the little lane there and call for us."

When he had finished giving his instructions, the two of them, traversing the moonlit ground, strode into the little lane.

It so happens that this lane was called Butterfly Lane, and there were ten or more establishments along it whose owners made their living by operating unlicensed houses of prostitution. Tai-an was already inebriated, and it seemed like half a day before his calls succeeded in getting anyone to open the gate.

It so happened that the procurer and the madam, Longleg Lu, were engaged, just then, under the lamplight, in weighing out the day's take of silver on a big scale with its yellow yard. When they saw that two intruders had barged in like avenging spirits, they promptly blew out the lamp in their inner room. The procurer, who recognized that Tai-an was a head servant in the household of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, came out and offered him a seat.

"Call out the two girls," demanded Tai-an, "so they can sing a song for us, and then we'll go."

"I'm afraid you've come a step too late, sir," explained the procurer. "The two of them are both engaged with customers just now."

Without permitting any further explanation,

Tai-an swept into the interior in large strides, where he found it to be as dark as a cave, since none of the lamps were lit. On the k'ang there were two senior wine-making artisans, wearing white felt caps.

One of them had already lain down on the k'ang, while the other had just finished taking off his foot-bindings and asked, "Who is that coming into the room?"

Ch'in-t'ung Eavesdrops on the Joys of Lovemaking

"I'll fuck your mother's hole!" exclaimed Tai-an, and, without any warning, he sent a clenched fist whistling into him, leaving the wine-maker with no alternative but to complain vociferously as he flew outside, without even putting on his foot-bindings and stockings. The other one, also, crawled up off the surface of the k'ang, and:

Stumbling at every step, followed him outside.

"Light up the lamps!" called out Tai-an, and he cursed, saying, "Those lousy uncivilized vagrants! They actually had the nerve to ask who I am, did they! It's lucky for them I didn't choose to pluck them clean, just now, but let them get away, for no good reason. How do you suppose they would have liked it if I had them dragged into the yamen and given a taste of our new ankle-squeezers?"

Longleg Lu came forward at this point, lit the lamps, and, bowing repeatedly, said, "Temper your rage, my good brethren. They're from out of town and don't know who's who. You've got to make allowances for them."

Then she instructed Chin-erh and Sai-erh, "Come on out and sing a song for your two uncles."

Lo and behold, the two of them, with their hair done up in casual "bag of silk" spiral buns, wearing bleached white blouses, and red and green silk skirts, came forward and said, "We didn't know that our two uncles were coming today, and it's already late at night, so we have been caught unprepared."

Four saucers of pickled vegetables were then laid out, in addition to which there were saucers of duck eggs, dried shrimp, preserved fish mash, salted fish, the meat from a braised pig's head, dried sausage, and the like.

Tai-an proceeded to embrace Sai-erh where he was sitting, while Ch'in-t'ung, for his part, hugged Chin-erh. Tai-an noticed that Sai-erh was wearing a pink silk scent bag, so he reached into his sleeve for a handkerchief, and the two of them exchanged love tokens. In a little while, wine was decanted, and Sai-erh poured out a cup and offered it to Tai-an.

Before this, Chin-erh had already taken up a p'i-p'a, and, after proffering a cup of wine to Ch'in-t'ung:

Commencing to sing in full voice,
she sang a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope":

The camp of mist and flowers,
Is truly difficult to endure.
One simply never has the spare time to sit down and relax.
One's days are spent welcoming visitors and treating guests.
The livelihood of the entire establishment is totally dependent on me alone.

Tai-an Enjoys a Pleasing Ramble in Butterfly Lane

When night falls, I am also the one under pressure from the loan sharks.
As for the old procuress,
She doesn't care whether I am dead or alive.
I have to stand outside the door until the late watches of the night;
But, when evening comes, who bothers to ask whether I am hungry or full?
If I manage to last another three to five years in the camp of mist and flowers,
The chances of my surviving are few, while the chances of my dying are many.
I can't help the fact that the tears in my eyes come and go like shuttles.¹²
Only when the iron tree shall blossom forth,¹³
Will I ever be able to harvest my garden and reap my just reward.¹⁴

When Chin-erh had finished singing, Sai-erh poured another cup of wine and offered it to Tai-an, after which she took over the p'i-p'a and sang another song to the same tune:

When I enter my room,
And look around me,
All I can see is that p'i-p'a hanging on the plastered wall.
I notice that the p'i-p'a is covered with dust.
Reaching into my sleeve and pulling out a handkerchief,
I brush away the dust.
Holding it in my arms, I tune the strings, and play a lonesome melody,
My tears gushing like a spring.
When I possessed that lover of mine, how happy we were,
But now that my lover has gone, he's abandoned me just like that neglected p'i-p'a.
When he was here, how we used to sing together and play together;
But at the present time, I am left all by myself.
I can't help shedding tears of desolation.
The keepsake remains, and I will hold on to it,
But I don't know where that man of mine is to be found.

Just as she was in full voice, the houseboy suddenly appeared to call them away.

The two of them hastily got up to go, and Tai-an said to Sai-erh, "We'll come to see you again another day."

When he had finished speaking, they went out the door and returned to Wang Liu-erh's place, where they learned that Hsi-men Ch'ing had just gotten up, and the woman was having a drink of wine with him.

The two of them went into the kitchen, and Tai-an asked, "Old Mother Feng, has Father been looking for us?"

"Father has not been looking for you," said Old Mother Feng. "He merely asked if the horse had come back, to which I replied that it had. That's all he had to say."

The two of them sat down in the kitchen and asked Old Mother Feng for some tea. After each of them had drunk a cup of tea, they had the houseboy light the lantern and lead the horse outside.

As Hsi-men Ch'ing was about to get up and go, the woman said to him, "Father, this is nice heated wine. Have another cup. Or, perhaps, you're going to have more to drink when you get home."

"I'm not going to drink any more when I get home," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Thereupon, he picked up the wine and drained another cup.

"Now that you're going," the woman asked him, "when will you come by for another visit?"

"I won't come back until I've sent your husband and the others off," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When he had finished speaking, a maidservant brought him a cup of tea to rinse out his mouth with, and Wang Liu-erh saw him to the door. Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing mount his horse and go home.

To resume our story, P'an Chin-lien and the rest had assembled in Yüeh-niang's room to listen to Nun Hsüeh's two disciples sing Buddhist songs for their entertainment, and it was only after the first watch that she returned, temporarily, to her own quarters.

Upon her arrival there, she thought to herself, "A while ago, when Yüeh-niang accused Tai-an of being duplicitous in his response to her, I wonder what he was up to."

With this in mind, she looked in the bedroom for the bag of sexual implements but couldn't find it.

She called for Ch'un-mei and interrogated her, but she said she hadn't taken it.

"A while ago, when you weren't here," she reported, "Father came into the room and fumbled about in the drawers of the cabinet on the rear wall of the bedstead, before going off somewhere. Who knows where that bag is to be found?"

"When did he come in here," Chin-lien asked, "without my knowing about it?"

"Mother had just gone back to the rear compound to see Nun Hsüeh," said Ch'un-mei, "when Father came in, wearing an informal skullcap. I asked him what he was up to, but he didn't reply."

"He must have taken those things off to the place of some whore in the licensed quarter," opined Chin-lien. "When he gets home, I'll subject him to a thorough interrogation."

Who could have anticipated that when Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home, seeing that it was late at night, he didn't even go back to the rear compound. Ch'in-t'ung, carrying the lantern, escorted him as far as the postern gate leading into the garden, from which point he made his way to Li P'ing-erh's quarters. Ch'in-t'ung then took the lantern back to the rear compound and turned it over to Hsiao-yü, who put it away.

At this time, Wu Yüeh-niang, along with Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and the two nuns, were sitting together in the master suite.

Yüeh-niang asked Ch'in-t'ung, "Has Father come home?"

To which Ch'in-t'ung replied, "Father is here. He's gone to the Sixth Lady's quarters in the front compound."

"Just look at him!" exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "How unprincipled can you get? Everyone is waiting for him here, and he doesn't even bother to come in."

Li P'ing-erh hastened out to the front compound and said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "The Second Lady is in the rear compound, waiting for you to come celebrate the eve of her birthday. Why have you come into my quarters for no good reason?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing merely laughed, saying, "I'm drunk. Tomorrow will do just as well."

"Even if you're drunk," said Li P'ing-erh, "you could go back to the rear compound and share a cup with her. If you refuse to go, you can hardly avoid upsetting the Second Lady."

Thereupon, by means of vigorous urging, she succeeded in getting Hsi-men Ch'ing to go back to the rear compound.

After Li Chiao-erh had offered him a cup of wine, Yüeh-niang said, "What were you doing today, drinking all by yourself at the house over there, until this time of night?"

"I was drinking with Brother Ying the Second," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"There you are," said Yüeh-niang. "Just as I said, without a companion, how could anyone drink all by himself?"

Having said this, she dropped the matter and made an end of it.

Hsi-men Ch'ing did not sit around very long before picking up his feet and stealing off to Li P'ing-erh's quarters in the front compound.

It so happens that, as a result of taking the Indian monk's medicine at Wang Liu-erh's place, he was still so much in the grip of the aphrodisiac that, even after fooling around with the woman all day, although he was on the verge of ejaculation, he had been unable to get himself off. His organ was stiffer and harder than ever and resembled an iron pestle.

When he arrived in her quarters, he had Ying-ch'un help him off with his clothes and then climbed into bed, intending to sleep with Li P'ing-erh. Li P'ing-erh had not expected him to return and was already asleep on the bed with Kuan-ko.

Turning her head around, and seeing who it was, she said, "You might as well have gone to sleep in the rear compound. What are you coming back here for? The child has just dropped off and is sleeping soundly. I'm really not in the mood for it, and besides, my period has come on, and it wouldn't be convenient. Go and sleep in someone else's quarters, why don't you, instead of coming here to pester me."

Before she knew it, Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced her by the neck, held her down, and gave her a kiss, saying, "You crazy slave! Your daddy has it in his heart to sleep with you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing accordingly exposed his organ for Li P'ing-erh to see.

Li P'ing-erh was frightened to death and exclaimed, "Ai-ya! How did you ever manage to make it that big?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed and explained how he had taken the Indian monk's medicine, saying, "If you refuse to sleep with me, I'll be so randy it will be the death of me."

"What am I to do?" said Li P'ing-erh. "My period came on two days ago and isn't over yet. It would be better to wait a while until it's over, and then I'll sleep with you. Today, you might just as well spend the night at the Fifth Lady's place. It's all the same."

"Today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I don't know why, but the only thing I want to do is sleep with you. Right now, do I have to:

Sacrifice a chicken in order to plead with you?

On the other hand, you could get a maidservant to fetch some water, and wash yourself before sleeping with me. That ought to take care of it."

"You make me laugh," said Li P'ing-erh. "Where have you been drinking today, to make you drunk enough to come home and give me such a hard time? Even if I were to wash myself, I still wouldn't be clean. For a man's body to be contaminated by a woman's menses is not only filthy, but bad luck as well. If I should die as a result of this, you'll look for me in vain."

Thereupon, unable to resist his pressure any longer, she had Ying-ch'un fetch some water and washed her private parts clean before getting into bed in order to engage in sexual intercourse with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Strange as it may seem, when Li P'ing-erh finally succeeded in coaxing Kuan-ko to sleep, no sooner did she crawl over to the other side of the bed, than the child woke up. After this had happened three times in a row, Li P'ing-erh told Ying-ch'un to get the child's toy clapper-drum¹⁵ to keep him amused, and take him over to the wet nurse's room. Only then were the two of them able to:

Enjoy themselves to their heart's content.

Hsi-men Ch'ing seated himself inside the bed curtains, while Li P'ing-erh got down on all fours beside him, allowing Hsi-men Ch'ing to insert his organ into her vagina from the rear. This position enabled him, under the lamplight, to observe his organ, as well as her snow-white bottom. Using both hands, he embraced her haunches in order to:

Observe the sight as he went in and out.

Half of his organ had already been engulfed, and he could hardly contain his excitement. Li P'ing-erh was afraid that his organ would carry blood out with it, so she continually wiped it off with a handkerchief. Hsi-men Ch'ing engaged in thrusting and retracting for a long time, gripping her around the hips with both hands, and kneading away at her. His organ penetrated her all the way to the root, without leaving even a hairsbreadth outside, while the pubic hair beneath his navel prickled her bottom, and he felt a melting sensation the pleasure of which was indescribable.

Li P'ing-erh said, "Daddy! Slow down a bit. You're thrusting so hard it really hurts inside."

"If you're hurting," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll let go and be done with it."

Thereupon, he reached for the tea on the bedside table, and swallowed a mouthful of cold tea. Instantaneously, his semen arose and he:

Ejaculated like a geyser.

Truly:

His four limbs are suffused with pleasure;

His entire body a mass of spring feelings.

Only now did Hsi-men Ch'ing fully realize what a marvelous medicine he had obtained from the Indian monk. By the time they went to sleep, it was the third watch.

To resume our story, when P'an Chin-lien saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had gone to spend the night in Li P'ing-erh's quarters, she merely assumed that he had taken the bag of sexual implements in order to enjoy himself with her, and failed to ascertain what he had been up to on the outside. That night she could only:

Silently gnash her silvery teeth, close the door, and go to sleep.

Wu Yüeh-niang invited Nun Hsüeh and Nun Wang to spend the night with her in the master suite. Nun Wang took the afterbirth of a firstborn male child that she had procured, along with the medication concocted by Nun Hsüeh, and surreptitiously handed them over to Yüeh-niang.

Nun Hsüeh instructed Yüeh-niang, saying, "If you select a jen-tzu day,¹⁶ take these preparations with some wine, and then sleep with your husband that night, you will be sure to conceive. But you must not let even a single person know what you are doing."

Yüeh-niang promptly put the medications away and bowed in gratitude to the two nuns.

"I waited expectantly for you throughout the first month," Yüeh-niang said to Nun Wang, "but you never came."

"That's a fine thing to say!" protested Nun Wang. "I was going to come and see you, but then I said to myself, 'I might as well wait until the Second Lady's birthday in the fourth month, when I'll be able to come together with Reverend Hsüeh.' Who would have thought that, thanks to the Reverend here, I was able to procure the critical ingredient. It is the afterbirth of the firstborn child of a certain family's daughter-in-law. It just so happened that Reverend Hsüeh was there and was able to obtain it surreptitiously from the midwife, with whom she was familiar, for three mace of silver. We have brought it here after cleansing it with alum water, dehydrating it according to formula in a vessel containing a new pair of coupled male and female tiles, sifting it through a heavy gauze sieve, and then mixing it into the talismanic potion provided by Reverend Hsüeh."

"I fear I have put the two of you, Reverend Hsüeh and Reverend Wang, to a lot of trouble," said Yüeh-niang.

Thereupon, she brought out two taels of silver for each of them and said, "In the future, if I should in fact conceive, I will also provide Reverend Hsüeh with a bolt of dark brown silk with which to make a cassock."

Nun Hsüeh placed her palms together and saluted her in the Buddhist fashion, saying, "I am most grateful for the Bodhisattva's good-heartedness."

As the saying goes:

You may peddle a load of truths for ten days without making a sale;

While, in a single day, a load of falsehoods will actually sell out.¹⁷

Truly:

If persons of this ilk were really capable of attaining Buddhahood;

The monks and nuns dwelling in this world would overflow like water.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 51

YÜEH-NIANG LISTENS TO THE

EXPOSITION OF THE DIAMOND SUTRA;

LI KUEI-CHIEH SEEKS REFUGE

IN THE HSI-MEN CH'ING HOUSEHOLD

Too ashamed to face the phoenix mirror,
I grieve over my pink face;
Propping my fragrant cheek upon my hand,¹
I am too indolent to sleep.
My slender waist is so emaciated that my turquoise belt is loose;
As tears flow over my powdered face,² my golden hairpin falls out.
The annoying conduct of my fickle lover produces an aching sorrow;
It disturbs my fragrant heart³ until my resentment is unending.
When will I be able to avail myself of the eastern wind;
To blow my handsome lover all the way to my pillow side?

THE STORY GOES that when P'an Chin-lien realized that Hsi-men Ch'ing had taken the bag of sexual implements and gone to spend the night in Li P'ing-erh's quarters, she was so upset that she was unable to sleep all night long and secretly stored up resentment in her heart.

The next day, upon learning that Hsi-men Ch'ing had gone to the yamen, and that Li P'ing-erh was still combing her hair in her quarters, she lost no time in going back to the rear compound, where she said to Yüeh-niang, "Li P'ing-erh has been criticizing you severely behind your back. She said, 'Elder Sister puts on the airs of a grande dame, ordering people around as though she were holding court. It was someone else's birthday, but you insisted on taking charge. It was your husband who got drunk and came into my quarters when I was not there, but you shamed me before the others for no good reason, causing me to lose face. I was so upset by this that I went back up front and insisted that Father return to the rear compound, but after a while, somehow or other, he didn't remain there, but chose to come back to my quarters.' The two of them engaged in intimate conversation all night long and managed to expose everything but their hearts and entrails to me in the process."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, how could she help but be upset.

Turning to Sister-in-law Wu and Meng Yü-lou, she expostulated, "Luckily the two of you were here yesterday and saw what happened. I didn't say anything against her. When the page boy brought in the lantern, I merely asked him, 'Why hasn't Father come inside?' To which he replied, 'He's gone into the Sixth Lady's quarters.' I then said, 'The Second Lady is waiting here. How can he be so unprincipled as not to come inside?' If you stop to consider it, there was nothing intended to reflect upon her. How can she say that I put on the airs of a grande dame, or order people around as though I were holding court? She may think of me as a whorish wife, but I have always treated her as a decent person. It so happens that:

In knowing people, you can know their faces, but you can't know their hearts.⁴

How is one to judge what people are really like?

She turns out to be nothing but:

A needle in a wad of cotton;

A thorn in the flesh.

Who knows what tales she may have told our husband about me behind my back? No wonder she departed so resolutely for the front compound yesterday. My clever sister! Never fear! Even if our husband should choose to spend all his days in your quarters, without coming out, don't think that it would affect this heart of mine one way or the other. I relinquish him to the lot of you. You can do whatever you like. It's not as though I can't abide maintaining my widowhood. Remember how it was, not long after he married me, when for some time that lousy ruffian and I:

Had nothing to do with each other, either indoors or out.⁵

How do you suppose I managed to survive that?"

Sister-in-law Wu intervened from the sidelines, saying, "Sister-in-law, that's enough! Take the child into consideration. It has always been true that:

A grand councilor must have enough room in his gut to float a boat,⁶

The head of a household is a receptacle for catching dirty water.⁷

The good things that take place should be kept to yourself;

The bad things that happen should also be kept to yourself.”⁸

“Sooner or later,” said Yüeh-niang, “I’m going to confront her about those two charges of hers. I’ll demand to know just how it is that I put on the airs of a grande dame, or order people around as though I were holding court.”

This statement flustered Chin-lien so much that she blurted out, “Elder Sister! You’d better be magnanimous with her. As the saying goes:

A great person does not deign to notice the faults of petty persons;⁹

What petty person is there who has never committed some indiscretion?

As for the things she says about us to our husband behind our backs when she’s got him in her room, who is there among the rest of us who hasn’t been victimized by her allegations? After all, my quarters and hers are separated by only a common wall. If I didn’t make allowances for her, there’d never be an end to it. Whatever she does, she depends upon that child of hers to take advantage of the rest of us. And she has fine things to say too. For example, she says that in the future, when that child of hers grows up, he will:

Requite favor with favor, and Requite enmity with enmity.¹⁰

So it looks like the rest of us are fated to die of starvation. You don’t know the half of it.”

“My dear lady!” said Sister-in-law Wu. “How could she have said any such thing?”

Yüeh-niang had nothing further to say about it, but, as the saying goes:

When an injustice is witnessed on the road,¹¹

Someone will always try to shed light on it.¹²

Who could have anticipated that Hsi-men Ta-chieh had been, for some time, on extremely good terms with Li P’ing-erh. Whenever she was out of needles and thread, or shoe uppers, Li P’ing-erh would supply her with what she needed, giving her even the best quality satins and silks, or two or three fine handkerchiefs at a time. It goes without saying that she also surreptitiously supplied her with cash when the need arose. On that day, when she overheard these allegations about her, how could she help telling her about it.

Li P’ing-erh was in her quarters at the time, engaged in making a silk cord and amulet for her child to wear on the Dragon Boat Festival, along with different-colored little silk tsung-tzu, and tigers adorned with apotropaic artemisia leaves.¹³ When she saw Hsi-men Ta-chieh come in, Li P’ing-erh offered her a seat, so she could look on with her as she continued with her work.

“Bring some tea for the young lady to drink,” Li P’ing-erh instructed Ying-ch’un.

As they drank the tea, Hsi-men Ta-chieh said, “When you were invited back to the rear compound for tea a while ago, why didn’t you come?”

“After seeing Father off,” said Li P’ing-erh, “I thought I would take advantage of the morning coolness to start making up these miscellaneous things for the child to wear.”

“This is not just talebearing, mind you,” said Hsi-men Ta-chieh, “but something has come up that I thought I should tell you about. It is reported that you said that Mother puts on the airs of a grande dame. You must have done something to annoy the Fifth Lady. In the rear compound, while speaking, thus and so, to Mother, she lodged a whole string of accusations against you. Right now, Mother wants to confront you about this. You mustn’t say that I told you about it or she might take it amiss, but you ought to prepare something to say about it when you have to explain it to her.”

Nothing might have happened if Li P’ing-erh had not heard about this, but having heard these words, she could not even lift the needle she was holding in her hand. Her two arms went soft on her, and she was rendered speechless for some time.

Facing Hsi-men Ta-chieh with the tears falling from her eyes, she said, “Young lady, I never said so much as a word of idle talk on this subject. Last night, while I was in the rear compound, on hearing the page boy say that Father had gone to my quarters, I came out front and urged him to go back to the master suite. Since when did I ever say a word against anybody? Your mother has always been so kind to me, do you really think that I’m so:

Unconscious of right and wrong,¹⁴ as to say that sort of thing? And even if I were to have done so, to whom would I have said it? There has to be some evidence for such an allegation.”

Hsi-men Ta-chieh said, “When she heard Mother say that sooner or later she was going to confront you about these charges, she became flustered. If it were up to me, the two of you ought to have it out between you, like:

The gong on the one hand,

And the drum on the other.”

“As though I could hope to contend with that mouth of hers!” exclaimed Li P’ing-erh. “All I can do is leave it to Heaven. One way or the other, she is constantly plotting against me. Mother and son, it won’t come to an end until she manages to underhandedly do away with one or the other of us.”

When she had finished speaking, she started to cry. Hsi-men Ta-chieh sat down and endeavored to comfort her for a while.

Whom should they see at this point but Hsiao-yü, who came in and said, “The Sixth Lady and the young mistress are invited to come and eat.”

She then returned to the rear compound. Li P’ing-erh dropped her needlework and accompanied Hsi-men Ta-chieh back to the master suite. She did not eat anything, however, but returned to her quarters and went to bed. When Hsi-men Ch’ing came home from the yamen, he found her asleep and asked Ying-ch’un about it.

“Mother hasn’t eaten a thing all day,” reported Ying-ch’un.

This threw Hsi-men Ch’ing into such consternation that he went over to her and demanded, “Why haven’t you eaten anything? Tell me what’s the matter.”

He also noticed that her eyes were red with weeping and asked insistently, "What's troubling you? Tell me about it."

Li P'ing-erh promptly got up, rubbed her eyes, and said, "My eyes are sore. That's all. There's nothing wrong with me. I just didn't feel like eating anything today."

She did not utter a word about what had happened. Truly:

A whole breastful of intimate concerns,

Resides in what is not expressed in words.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Do not suppose that a beautiful woman is always foolish;
No amount of brightness and cleverness¹⁵ may do her any good.
It is only because she is so well versed in human affairs,
That she has brought a bellyful of grief upon herself.¹⁶

While Hsi-men Ta-chieh was in the rear compound, she said to Yüeh-niang, "I asked her about it, and she asserted, 'I never said anything of the sort. And to whom am I alleged to have said it?' Moreover:

Swearing by the gods and uttering oaths, she turned to me and wept, repeating that, in view of the kindness that Mother has always shown her, how could she ever have brought herself to say such a thing?"

"I simply don't believe it," said Sister-in-law Wu. "Sister Li is such a good person. How could she ever have said such a thing?"

"I imagine," said Yüeh-niang, "that the two of them must have had some minor falling out over who knows what, and that, when she was unable to induce our husband to act on her behalf, she came back to the rear compound and made these groundless allegations, making me out to be an object of obloquy. I've got one shadow too many around here as it is."

"Sister-in-law," said Wu K'ai's wife, "from now on you must be on your guard lest you do her an injustice. It's not that I'm just engaging in gossip behind her back, but she's worth more than a hundred P'an Chin-liens. She's good-hearted by nature. In the two or three years since she became a member of our family she hasn't made so much as a false step."

As they were talking, whom should they see but Ch'in-t'ung, who came in carrying a large bag made of blue cloth on his back.

"What have you got there?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"Thirty thousand taels worth of salt certificates," said Ch'in-t'ung. "Han Tao-kuo and Ts'ui Pen have just arrived back from registering the granary vouchers in exchange for them at the Kao-yang customs station. Father said to see they were given something to eat. Right now, they're weighing out the silver and packing things up. Day after tomorrow, on the twentieth, which is an auspicious day, the two of them, along with Lai-pao, are to set off for Yang-chou.

"I fear my brother-in-law will be coming inside," said Sister-in-law Wu. "The two nuns and I will go visit for a while in the Second Lady's quarters."

Before she had even finished speaking, who should appear but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who lifted aside the portiere and came in. This so flustered Sister-in-law Wu, along with Nun Hsüeh and Nun Wang, that they lost no time in running off to Li Chiao-erh's quarters.

But they were not quick enough to avoid being seen by Hsi-men Ch'ing, who interrogated Yüeh-niang, saying, "That was Nun Hsüeh, the lousy fat shaven-pated whore! What's she doing here?"

Yüeh-niang replied, "How can you persist in being so:

Bad-mouthed and evil-tongued?

It's really outrageous. What's she ever done to annoy you? And how do you know that her name is Hsüeh?"

"You don't know the feats she's capable of," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She inveigled the daughter of Vice Commissioner Ch'en into visiting the Ksitigarbha Nunnery, of which she was the abbess, on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, where she engaged in illicit intercourse with a young scamp named Juan the Third. Who could have anticipated that this Juan the Third died on top of the young woman's body. Nun Hsüeh was an accessory before the fact, having received ten taels of silver for her cooperation. When the matter came to light, and she was brought into the yamen, I saw to it that she was stripped of her clothing, given twenty strokes of the bamboo, and ordered to marry a husband and return to lay life.¹⁷ How is it now that she has not returned to lay life? How do you suppose she would like it if I had her dragged into the yamen and given another taste of the squeezers?"

"As though you didn't know any better!"

expostulated Yüeh-niang. "You persist in:

Blaspheming gods and profaning Buddhas.

Since she is a devoted Buddhist, I imagine that:

Her good roots continue to exist.

Why should she return to lay life for no good reason? You may not be aware of it, but she is known for her exemplary conduct."

"Just ask her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if she exhibits such exemplary conduct, how many men she can take on in a single night?"

"Stop talking so deliriously," said Yüeh-niang, "or you'll provoke me into a real tirade."

She then went on to ask, "When are you sending those three off on their mission?"

"I have just now dispatched Lai-pao to confer with our kinsman Ch'iao Hung," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He's going to put up five hundred taels, and I'm going to put up five hundred taels. The twentieth is an auspicious day, so they can start off then."

"Who will you put in charge of the silk goods store?" Yüeh-niang asked.

"I'll get Pen the Fourth to substitute for him," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When they had finished speaking, Yüeh-niang opened a trunk and got out the silver, which was duly weighed out and turned over to the three servants, who were in the summerhouse at the time, looking after the packing for their trip. Five taels of silver were weighed out for each of them, and they were told to return to their homes and take care of packing their personal belongings. But no more of this.

Who should appear at this juncture but Ying Po-chüeh, who walked into the summerhouse and saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was supervising the packing.

"What are you having packed up, Brother?" he inquired.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then explained to him all about how, on the twentieth, he was sending Lai-pao and the others to Yang-chou to take delivery of the salt.

Raising his hand in salute, Ying Po-chüeh said, "Congratulations, Brother. When they get back from this trip you're sure to reap a large profit."

Hsi-men Ch'ing offered him a seat, on the one hand, while calling for tea, which they proceeded to drink together.

He then went on to ask, "When are Li the Third and Huang the Fourth going to receive payment of the silver that is due them?"

"They should receive payment no later than the end of this month," said Ying Po-chüeh. "They said to me the other day that right now, in Tung-p'ing prefecture, there is another contract being let for the purveying of twenty thousand taels worth of incense, and they would like to ask if you couldn't help them out in this temporary exigency¹⁸ with the loan of another five hundred taels of silver. When they receive the payment for their current contract, they will bring it over to you, without touching so much as a candareen of it."

"As you can see," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'm in the process of preparing to send my agents off to Yang-chou, but I'm so strapped for cash that I've had to borrow five hundred taels of silver from my kinsman Ch'iao Hung. Where would I come up with any additional silver?"

"They have repeatedly urged me," said Ying Po-chüeh, "to remind you that:

One guest does not trouble two hosts.

If you refuse to help them out in this exigency, where else would you have them go?"

"The shop of Hsü the Fourth, on the east side of the street outside the city gate," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "owes me some money. I could transfer five hundred taels of what he owes me to them. How would that be?"

"That's the spirit," said Ying Po-chüeh.

As they were speaking, whom should they see but P'ing-an, who came in carrying a card and said, "His Honor Hsia Yen-ling has sent Hsia Shou with an invitation for Father to pay him a visit tomorrow."

Hsi-men Ch'ing opened the invitation, which read, "So and so."

"The reason I have presumed to come visit you today," said Ying Po-chüeh, "is because there is something I want to tell you about. You know about this affair concerning Li Kuei-chieh from the quarter, I suppose. Has she not come to see you?"

"She hasn't been here since she left in the first month," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I don't know about any affair concerning her."

Ying Po-chüeh then set out to explain matters, saying, "It so happens that the third son in the household of the late Imperial Commissioner Wang I-hsüan is married to the niece of Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch'en¹⁹ in the Eastern Capital. In the first month of this year, when they went to the Eastern Capital to wish him a happy new year, the old eunuch gave the two of them a thousand taels of silver as a new year's present. You may not know it, but this niece of Defender-in-Chief Huang's is as pretty as a picture. Really, if an artist were able to depict even half of her beauty, she would still present an elegant appearance. With someone like that at home, one would expect you to stick to her, but every day he allows Blabbermouth Sun, Pockmarked Chu, and Trifler Chang, the three or four of them, to inveigle him into carrying on in the licensed quarter. He has deflowered Ch'i Hsiang-erh, that little slavey from the Ch'i Family Establishment on Second Street, and has also been frequenting Li Kuei-chieh's place. He has even taken to pawning his wife's head ornaments, which has angered her so much that she has tried to hang herself at home. Who would have thought that the other day, earlier this month, she went to the Eastern Capital to celebrate the old eunuch's birthday and told him all about it. The old gentleman was so angry that he sent the names of these fellows to Chu Mien, the defender-in-chief of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, and Chu Mien has issued a mandate to the authorities of Tung-p'ing prefecture ordering that they be taken into custody. Yesterday Blabbermouth Sun, Pockmarked Chu, and Trifler Chang were all apprehended at Li Kuei-chieh's place. Li Kuei-chieh, herself, managed to hide out at Greenhorn Chu's place next door, where she spent the night, but today, she says, she is going to come to your place to beg for your help."

"As I have said," remarked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "during the first month they had already latched onto him and were inveigling him into trying to borrow money under false pretenses, first from this place, and then from that. Pock-marked Chu was trying out his new tricks right in front of me even then."

When he had finished speaking, Ying Po-chüeh said, "I'm going. In a little while, I fear, Li Kuei-chieh is likely to show up. No matter whether you agree to help her out or not, she'll accuse me of interfering with you if she knows I've been here."

"Why not stay a little longer," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've got something else to say to you. As far as Li the Third is concerned, don't promise him anything until I've had a chance to collect that silver that's owed to me outside the city gate, and given you the go-ahead."

"I understand," said Ying Po-chüeh.

By the time he went out the front door, Li Kuei-chieh's sedan chair was there, and she had already gotten out of it and gone inside.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the act of instructing Ch'en Ching-chi to ride a mule outside the city gate to Hsü the Fourth's place and dun him for the money, when whom should he see but Ch'in-t'ung, who came into the summerhouse to fetch him, saying, "The First Lady would like you to come back to the master suite. Li Kuei-chieh has come to pay a call."

Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to the rear compound where whom should he see but Li Kuei-chieh, who was wearing plain tea-colored clothing, without any makeup, and had a white drawn-work kerchief fastened around her head.

With her:

Cloudy locks in disarray, and her

Flowery countenance dispirited, she kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing and started to weep, saying, "Father, I don't know how it is that I've been implicated in this unlucky business. Truly:

Though you sit in your house behind closed doors,

Catastrophe may yet strike you out of the blue.

This Wang the Third is someone we weren't even acquainted with, but Pock-marked Chu and Blabbermouth Sun, for no good reason, brought him by our place looking for a cup of tea. My elder sister was not at home, and I figured that we'd be better off having nothing to do with them, but my mother, who is getting more demented by the day, was just setting out for your place that day to celebrate my aunt's birthday. It would have been better if she had just gotten into her sedan chair and gone her way, but when she saw the way that Pockmarked Chu was groveling about on his knees to her, she came back inside and said to me, 'Sister, wouldn't it be treating them shabbily not to go out and serve them a cup of tea?' After which she headed off for your place here. I had just locked the door and refused to come out, when who could have anticipated that a crowd of men should come bursting in from outside and:

Without permitting any further explanation, apprehended the three of them and took them away. Wang the Third managed to bolt out the gate and escape, while I succeeded in hiding out in the house next door, so there was nobody left in the place. When I sent the male servant here to fetch my mother, she was so frightened when she got home that her soul fled, and all she wanted to do was commit suicide. And today the black-robed lictors from the district yamen, with an arrest warrant in hand, raised a hue and cry about the place all morning before finally taking off. Right now, it seems, I am wanted by name to answer to interrogation in the Eastern Capital. Father, if you refuse to take pity on me and do something to rescue me, what am I to do? Mother, for your part, won't you say something to him on my behalf?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, and said, "Get up."

He then went on to ask, "What other names are there on the arrest warrant?"

"The other name is that of Ch'i Hsiang-erh," said Li Kuei-chieh. "He has deflowered Ch'i Hsiang-erh, and spent his money at her establishment, so that is only appropriate. But if our place has ever seen so much as a candareen of his money, may the pupils of our eyes drop out. If he ever laid a hand on me, may I develop an abscess in every hair follicle."

Turning to Hsi-men Ch'ing, Yüeh-niang said, "That's enough of that. Lest she continue making these horrific oaths, why don't you speak up on her behalf?"

"At the present time," asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "has Ch'i Hsiang-erh been arrested or not?"

"Ch'i Hsiang-erh is hiding out in the home of Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family," said Li Kuei-chieh.

"If that's the case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can stay at our place here for a few days. If anyone comes looking for you, I'll send someone to the district yamen to plead on your behalf."

Thereupon, he called for Shu-t'ung and instructed him, "Quickly, write out a calling card and deliver it to His Honor Li Ta-t'ien in the district yamen. Just say that Li Kuei-chieh's services are constantly required here, and ask him to see if there isn't some way to avoid having her haled into court."

Shu-t'ung assented and went off on his errand wearing his livery of black silk. It was not long before he returned with a reply from District Magistrate Li.

"His Honor Li," reported Shu-t'ung, "sends his greetings to you but says that, although with regard to any other matter he would not presume to reject your command, this is a case of a certified document issued by his superiors in the Eastern Capital, ordering the district authorities to take the designated persons into custody. The district is only responsible for apprehending the persons named. As a favor to you, he would be willing to relax the deadline by a couple of days, but if you want to avoid having her haled into court altogether, you will have to address yourself to his superiors in the Eastern Capital."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he thought to himself silently for a while and then said, "Right now Lai-pao is due to set out in a day or two, so there's no one available to send to the Eastern Capital."

"That's all right," said Yüeh-niang. "If you were to send the other two ahead and keep Lai-pao here, so he could go to the Eastern Capital and address himself to this matter on Kuei-chieh's behalf and then catch up with them later, it wouldn't be too late. Just look at the state this fright has put her in."

At this, Li Kuei-chieh hastened to kowtow to Yüeh-niang and Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then sent someone to summon Lai-pao and told him, "You are not to go on the twentieth after all. I'm going to send the other two ahead of you. Tomorrow you can set out for the Eastern Capital instead and negotiate this matter on behalf of Li Kuei-chieh. When you see Majordomo Chai Ch'ien, make sure that whatever he does he sends someone to speak about this matter at the headquarters of the Embroidered Uniform Guard."

Kuei-chieh promptly prostrated herself before Lai-pao, which threw him into such consternation that he kowtowed in return and backed off, saying, "Sister Kuei, I'll go."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then told Shu-t'ung to write a letter for him, thanking Majordomo Chai Ch'ien for all the trouble he had been put to earlier in connection with Regional Investigating Censor Tseng Hsiao-hsü, and also sealed up twenty taels of silver in lieu of a seasonal gift and entrusted it to Laipao along with the letter.

This pleased Li Kuei-chieh so much that she took out five taels of silver and offered it to Lai-pao to defray his expenses on the road, saying, "When you come back, Brother Pao, both my mother and I will see that you are amply rewarded."

Hsi-men Ch'ing would not allow this and told Kuei-chieh to take back her money, while he directed Yüeh-niang to provide another five taels of silver for Lai-pao's expenses.

"That doesn't make any sense," said Kuei-chieh. "Since I'm the one who's begging Father to intervene on my behalf, am I to put him to extra expense?"

"Do you take me for such a laughingstock," protested Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that I can't come up with five taels of silver for his traveling expenses, but have to get the money from you?"

Only then did Li Kuei-chieh put her silver away, bowing to Lai-pao again and again, while saying, "I'm imposing on you, Brother Pao, but I hope, whatever happens, you'll be able to start out tomorrow, or it may be too late."

"I'll be on the road by the fifth watch tomorrow morning," said Lai-pao.

Thereupon, he took the letter and went off to Han Tao-kuo's home on Lion Street. Wang Liu-erh was in the house at the time, engaged in sewing up some underwear for her husband.

When she saw through the window that it was Lai-pao, she promptly said, "If you have something to say, please come inside and sit down. He's not at home right now, having gone to the tailor's to pick up some clothes, but he'll be back any moment."

She then summoned Chin-erh and said, "Why don't you go across the street to Tailor Hsü's place and fetch your master? Tell him that Mr. Lai-pao is here."

"I have presumed to come over," explained Lai-pao, "in order to tell you that it turns out I won't be able to go off with your husband tomorrow. Another karmic impediment has come up, and the master has decided to send me off to the Eastern Capital in order to intercede on behalf of Li Kuei-chieh from the licensed quarter. Just now, she kowtowed repeatedly in front of Father in an act of formal obeisance and supplication, at which Mother consulted with Father, and then said, 'That's all right. If you are willing to make a trip to the Eastern Capital to intercede in this matter on her behalf, we can let Han Taokuo and Ts'ui Pen go on ahead, and it won't be too late for you to catch up with them after you get back.' So I'll have to set out early tomorrow morning, and the letter has even been entrusted to me just now."

He then went on to ask, "Sister-in-law, what's that you're working on?"

"It's his underwear," replied Wang Liu-erh.

"You can tell him there's no need to take a lot of clothes with him," said Lai-pao. "That area is the cradle of production for silks and gauzes, satins and damasks, so he needn't worry about not having clothes to wear."

As they were speaking together, Han Tao-kuo arrived home.

After the two of them had exchanged salutations, and the above matters had been explained to him, Lai-pao went on to ask, "When the day comes, where am I to look for you two in Yang-chou?"

"The master has directed," said Han Tao-kuo, "that we should put up right on the docks at the inn of a merchant named Wang Po-ju. He says that his own late father and the father of Wang Po-ju were on good terms with each other, that the rooms in his inn are spacious and can accommodate many traders, and that it is a safe place to store merchandise without having to worry about it. The best thing to do would be to look for us there."

Lai-pao then went on to say, "Sister-in-law, when I set out for the Eastern Capital tomorrow, do you have any shoes and foot-bindings, or things like that, that I can deliver to your daughter in the minister's residence?"

"I don't have anything," said Wang Liu-erh, "except for two pairs of hairpins that her father has had made for her, and two pairs of shoes, if we could trouble you to deliver them to her."

Thereupon, she wrapped these items up in a handkerchief and handed them to Lai-pao, on the one hand, while on the other, she called for Ch'unhsiang to prepare something to eat and decant some wine. The woman then hastily set aside the needlework she had been doing and saw to the setting up of a table.

"Sister-in-law," said Lai-pao, "don't go to all that trouble. I can't stay for long. I've got to go home and pack my bag so that I'll be ready to start off tomorrow."

"Ai-ya!" exclaimed Wang Liu-erh with an ingratiating smile, "how can you start:

Waxing supercilious before you enter the door?

When your fellow employee's household offers you such a farewell collation, you ought to have a cup to drink."

She then went on to complain, "Han Tao-kuo, how can you be so sober-sided? The table isn't steady on its feet. See if you can't steady it, and offer Uncle Pao a seat. You're acting like a mere bystander."

Thereupon, dishes of food were brought out, and wine was poured and offered to Lai-pao. Wang Liu-erh joined them at the side of the table, and the three of them sat down to drink.

After Lai-pao had drunk a few cups, he said, "I'd better get home. If I stay any later, I'm afraid the gate back there will already be closed."

"Have you hired your mount or not?" asked Han Tao-kuo.

"I'll hire it first thing tomorrow morning," said Lai-pao.

He then went on to say, "You might as well turn over the keys to the shop, and the account books, to Pen the Fourth, so you won't have to spend the night there. A good night's rest at home will prepare you for the journey."

"What you say is true enough," said Han Tao-kuo. "I'll hand them over to him tomorrow."

Wang Liu-erh poured out another goblet of wine and said, "Uncle Pao, if you'll just finish off this cup, we won't presume to keep you any longer."

"Sister-in-law," said Lai-pao, "if you want me to drink it, could you warm it up a little?"

Wang Liu-erh promptly poured it back into the flagon and told Chin-erh to reheat it, after which she filled his cup and proffered it to Lai-pao with both hands, saying, "I'm afraid we don't have anything worth eating in order to go with Uncle Pao's wine."

"That's a fine thing to say, Sister-in-law!" protested Lai-pao. "After all:

The normal formalities do not apply in the home."²⁰

So saying, he lifted up his wine in order to toast the woman, and the two of them drained their cups together, before he got up to take his leave.

Wang Liu-erh then handed the gifts for her daughter back to him, saying, "Might I trouble you, Uncle Pao, whatever happens, when you get to the minister's mansion, to ask how my daughter is getting along? I'll be relieved to know."

Thereupon, she bowed to him, saying, "Many felicitations," after which she and her husband saw him to the door.

We will say no more for the moment about how Lai-pao went home, packed his baggage, and set out for the Eastern Capital the next day, but return to the story of Yüeh-niang, who was in the master suite engaged in serving tea to Li Kuei-chieh. Sister-in-law Wu, Aunt Yang, and the two nuns were all visiting together with her there.

At this juncture, Brother-in-law Wu K'ai showed up and said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "A document has been sent down from Tung-p'ing prefecture, deputing the seal-holding officers of the Left and Right Battalions of our Ch'ingho Guard to supervise the repair of the local Charity Granary. The edict of authorization states that if the work is completed by the deadline in the sixth month, they will be promoted one grade, but that if they fail to meet the deadline, they will be subject to investigation and impeachment by the provincial regional inspector. If my brother-in-law has the silver to spare and could lend me a few taels to defray the cost of the work, I would be able to return every bit of it as soon as I receive reimbursement for these expenses."

"Brother-in-law," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "whatever you need is yours for the asking."

"If you'll deign to help me out," said Wu K'ai, "twenty taels ought to do the trick."

They then went back to the rear compound and spoke to Yüeh-niang about it. Hsi-men Ch'ing had her get out twenty taels and turn them over to Wu K'ai. After drinking a cup of tea, they came out again. Because there were female guests being entertained in the master suite and it was inconvenient to accommodate them there, Yüeh-niang had suggested that he invite her brother to stay a while and have some wine with him in the main reception hall.

As they were drinking their wine, whom should they see but Ch'en Ching-chi, who came in to report, saying, "As for that debt that you're trying to collect from Hsü the Fourth outside the city gate, he sends you his regards but asks that you give him another couple of days' grace."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I need the money here right now. Why should I give him another couple of days' grace? You go right back there and give that dog of a whore's spawn a piece of my mind."

When Ch'en Ching-chi had agreed to do so, Wu K'ai offered him a seat, and he bowed to him in response before sitting down to one side. Ch'in-t'ung promptly provided him with chopsticks and a wine cup, and they continued to drink together in the front compound.

To resume our story, in the rear compound, Sister-in-law Wu, Aunt Yang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, and Hsi-men Tachieh were all keeping Li Kuei-chieh company as they drank wine in Yüeh-niang's room. To begin with, Big Sister Yü, who had been performing the story of Chang Chün-jui's sightseeing visit to the Temple of Universal Salvation²¹ for a while, finally put down her p'i-p'a.

Meng Yü-lou, who was located at her side, poured out some wine and offered her a serving of food, saying, "What a lousy blind millstone-turning donkey you are! You've been singing for us all day, and you'll probably say we don't even take care of you."

P'an Chin-lien, for her part, picked up a piece of pork shank with her chopsticks and teased her by dangling it provocatively in front of her nose.

Li Kuei-chieh then said, "Sister Yü-hsiao, if you'll hand me Big Sister Yü's p'i-p'a, I'll sing a song for my aunt and Sister-in-law Wu."

"Kuei-chieh," said Yüeh-niang, "you've got enough on your mind as it is. There's no need for you to sing."

"It's no problem," said Kuei-chieh. "Let me sing. Now that Mother and Father have agreed to intervene on my behalf, I'm not anxious about things any more."

Meng Yü-lou smiled at this, saying, "Li Kuei-chieh is a true child of the quarter. She can alter her demeanor at will. When she first arrived just a little while ago, her brows were knit, and she was so anxious she couldn't even drink her tea. But now:

She talks, and she laughs."

Thereupon, Li Kuei-chieh:

Deftly extended her slender fingers,

Impulsively plucked the icy strings, and proceeded to sing for a while. As she was still singing, who should appear but Ch'in-t'ung, who was engaged in bringing in the utensils from the front compound.

Yüeh-niang asked him, "Has Brother-in-law Wu left yet?"

"He has already left," replied Ch'in-t'ung.

"I fear Brother-in-law will soon be coming inside," said Sister-in-law Wu. "We'd better bestir ourselves."

"Father won't be coming back to the rear compound," said Ch'in-t'ung. "He's gone to the Fifth Lady's quarters."

When P'an Chin-lien heard that he had gone to her quarters, she was unable to remain in her seat and could hardly wait to take off, but she felt embarrassed to leave too precipitously.

Yüeh-niang, without even waiting for her to make a move, said, "Since he's gone to your quarters, you'd better get going, lest you end up as a kinswoman with an empty womb."

"A likely story!" protested P'an Chin-lien; but although her mouth remained adamant, her feet carried her quickly away.

When she arrived in the front compound and went into her quarters, she found that Hsi-men Ch'ing had already taken a dose of the Indian monk's medicine, gotten Ch'un-mei to help him off with his clothes, and was sitting inside the bed curtains on the bed.

On seeing this, Chin-lien laughed, saying, "My child, what a good boy you are today, going to bed without even waiting for your mother. I've been in the rear compound, just now, keeping company with Sister-in-law Wu and Aunt Yang, while listening to Li Kuei-chieh sing, and being compelled to have a few cups too many. All by myself, in the dark shadows, staggering along with:

One step high, and

One step low.²²

I've only just managed, somehow or other, to make it home."

Then, calling to Ch'un-mei, she said, "If you've got some tea, pour out a cup for me."

Ch'un-mei proceeded to pour a cup of tea for her, and Chin-lien drank it; after which she gave her a meaningful moue, which Ch'un-mei correctly understood. She had long since heated some water for her in the adjacent room, where the woman shook some sandalwood and alum into it, washed her private parts, took down her hair under the lamplight, retaining only a single gold hairpin, took up the mirror with which to apply a new coat of rouge to her lips, and put a breath-sweetening lozenge into her mouth, before coming back into the bedroom. Ch'un-mei fetched her sleeping shoes from the head of the bed, helped her exchange them for the ones she had on, put the latch on the door, and went out.

The woman then proceeded to move the lampstand closer to the bed, where she placed it on a table, let down half of the silk bed curtain with one hand:

Took off her red drawers, and Exposed her jadelike body.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was sitting on the pillow, with two clasps fastened around his organ, which had caused it to swell to a prodigious size, exposed it for her to see. When the woman caught sight of it under the lamplight, it gave her quite a start. It was so thick she could hardly get her hand around it, empurpled and tumid, it was more than she could encircle with her thumb and forefinger.

Casting an amorous glance at Hsi-men Ch'ing, she said, "My guess would be that you can hardly deny having already taken a dose of that monk's medicine in order to work it up to such dimensions, with the sole intention of giving me a hard time. But:

The best wine and the finest meat,
Get eaten by Community Head Wang.

Whoever it is that you've tried it on first has reduced you to no more than:

The bested general of a defeated army,²³ by the time you bother to show up in my room here. Am I only fit to be fucked by what's left of that spent prick of yours? And you claim not to be practicing favoritism! No wonder the other day, when I wasn't in my room, you made off to her quarters with that bag of implements without anyone being the wiser. So it turns out that she was the one you were up to your business with that night. And yet she contrives to protest her own virtue in front of others. As for you, you're simply nothing but an incorrigible three-inch good-for-nothing! Come to think of it, I'd be better off if I refused to have anything to do with you though I live to be a hundred."

"You little whore," Hsi-men Ch'ing exclaimed with a laugh, "come over here. If you have the talent to suck it to ejaculation, I'll forfeit a tael of silver to you."

"You're delirious," the woman said. "No matter what it is that you've imbibed, you expect me to put up with it."

Thereupon, she lay down diagonally across the mat, grasped his organ with both hands, and engulfed it with her ruby lips, saying as she did so, "What a big thing it is! It stretches my mouth till it hurts."

When she had finished speaking, she either:

Sucked it audibly as it moved in and out; or Explored the mouth of his urethra with the tip of her tongue; or Licked the frenum underneath his turtle head; or Held it in her mouth to nibble and toy with as it came and went; or Brushed it back and forth against her powdered cheek;
Titillating it in a hundred different ways.

His organ was stiffer and harder than ever and stood up, tumid and perpendicular.

In the bursting melon-head the sunken eye grows round;
Trailing its side whiskers the body swells itself erect.

Hsi-men Ch'ing bent his head in order to observe the woman's fragrant flesh by the flickering light underneath the silk bed curtains. With her slender fingers, she took hold of his limber organ with both hands and popped it into her mouth, moving back and forth as she did so under the lamplight.

Who could have anticipated that a white long-haired leonine cat²⁴ that was crouching by their side was attracted by the motion, and, not knowing what kind of an object it was, pounced forward and batted at it with her claws. Hsimen Ch'ing, from his superior vantage point, took to playfully teasing it with the gold-flecked black fan in his hand, at which the woman grabbed the fan away from him and hit the cat as hard as she could with the handle of the fan, driving it outside the bed curtains.

Giving Hsi-men Ch'ing an amorous glance, she said, "What a crazy excuse for a lover you are! On top of the fact that she's sticking her paws in where they don't belong in such an obnoxious²⁵ way, you would humor her into:

Assuming privileges above her station.

If she should happen to scratch my face, what would you do then? I might as well call this business to a halt here and now. How would that be?"

"You crazy little whore!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You'll do me in yet with all your objections."

Chin-lien Hits the Cat while Sucking Off Hsi-men Ch'ing

"Why don't you get Li P'ing-erh to suck it off for you then?" said the woman. "It's always my room you come to when you want someone to submit to your pestering. I don't know what it is that you've imbibed, but I've been sucking you off all day to no avail."

Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon took the little silver box out of his handkerchief, picked out some of the pink ointment it contained with a toothpick, and daubed it in the mouth of his urethra. After which, adopting a prone position, he had the woman sit astride his body.

"Let me stretch it open," the woman said, "so you can get inside more easily."

His turtle head was proud and large, so that, even with moistening and reaming, it was some time before the knob of his glans was completely submerged. The woman in her superior position rubbed her body back and forth against his, while seeming to be unable to overcome her distress.

"My own daddy!" she exclaimed. "I feel completely stuffed inside. It's really hard to bear."

While fondling it with her hand, she saw under the lamplight that half of his jade chowrie handle²⁶ had already been engulfed by her vagina, the labia of which were stretched to capacity on either side. No longer moving back and forth, the woman used her saliva to moisten her labia until it felt somewhat smoother, whereupon she resumed her motions, alternately raising and lowering herself, until his organ finally penetrated her to the root.

The woman addressed herself to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "That aphrodisiac you usually use, called 'The Quavery Voices of Amorous Beauties,'²⁷ induces a hot and itchy sensation inside that is hard to stand. How can it be compared to this monk's medication? When it penetrates all the way to the womb, it produces a cool shivery feeling that reaches all the way up to the heart. Right now:

My whole body, from top to bottom,²⁸ is infused with a melting sensation. I foresee that today I may die at your hands, but it's a hard thing to bear."

"Fivey," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've got a joke to tell you, which I heard from Brother Ying the Second. A certain man died, and King Yama enveloped his body in a donkey's skin in order to change him into a donkey. Later, however, the Assessor consulted his ledgers and found that he still had thirteen years in the human realm allotted to him, so he was allowed to return to life. His wife noticed that although the rest of his body had reverted to human form, his male organ was still that of a donkey and had not returned to its former dimensions. 'Let me go back to the nether regions and get it changed,' the man said. But this threw his wife into consternation and she replied, 'Brother, if you undertake this journey, I fear that you may not be allowed to return, and what would we do then? Just leave it as it is, and I'll gradually learn to put up with it.'" ²⁹

When the woman heard this, she laughed, gave him a whack with the handle of the fan, and said, "No wonder Beggar Ying's two wives are so inured to that donkey's prick of his. You filthy-mouthed good-for-nothing! If I didn't care for the opinion of the world, I'd really let you have it!"

The two of them went at it for a full two hours, but Hsi-men Ch'ing had still not ejaculated. He merely lay underneath her with his eyes closed, and let the woman squat on top of him, thrusting and retracting for all she was worth. These efforts of hers caused his turtle head to make a weird noise, kua-ta kua-ta, as it went in and out. After she had been at it for a long time, she stooped forward so that she was looking right at Hsi-men Ch'ing. Hsi-men Ch'ing lifted up her haunches with both hands and alternately submerged and exposed the knob of his glans, moving back and forth with abandon. ³⁰ Although Hsi-men Ch'ing's body was in contact with hers, and he was able to observe the action with his eyes, he seemed to remain completely unaffected. After some time, the woman's feelings came to a climax, and, stooping down again, she embraced Hsi-men Ch'ing around the neck with both hands, resting her body on his, and sticking her tongue into his mouth. His organ had penetrated all the way to the interior of her vagina, as he continued kneading away at her.

"My own daddy!" she cried out inarticulately. "That's enough. Your Fivey is dying."

A moment afterwards:

She swooned completely away, ³¹

The tip of her tongue became ice-cold, and

She gave way to an orgasm.

Hsi-men Ch'ing became aware of a wave of warmth within her vagina that penetrated all the way to his cinnabar field, while in his heart, he felt a melting sensation the pleasure of which was indescribable. Meanwhile, her vaginal secretions overflowed, and the woman wiped them up with a handkerchief. The two of them continued:

Hugging and embracing each other,

With entwined necks, thigh over thigh,

Audibly sucking each other's tongues, while his organ remained embedded in her. After napping for an hour, the woman, whose lascivious feelings were still unsatisfied, climbed back on top of his body, and the two of them went at it again.

The woman had two orgasms in a row and began to feel somewhat fatigued, but Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Feigning total indifference, ³² thought to himself, "This medication of the Indian Monk's is truly super-natural."

Before long:

The cock crowed outside the window, and

The eastern horizon began to grow light.

"Dear heart," the woman said. "You still haven't ejaculated. What should we do? This evening, if you come again, I'll be sure, whatever happens, to suck it off for you."

"Even if you suck it, I won't ejaculate," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I can assure you, there's only one thing that will bring about an ejaculation."

"Tell me," the woman said, "what might that be?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing said:

"The dharma must not be divulged to six ears. ³³

Wait until I come back this evening, and I'll tell you."

That morning he got up, combed his hair, and performed his ablutions, after which Ch'un-mei helped him on with his clothes. Han Tao-kuo and Ts'ui Pen were already outside, waiting for him. When Hsi-men Ch'ing came out, he burnt some paper money to ensure a safe journey and prepared to send them on their way.

Turning over a pair of letters to them, he said, "One of these is addressed to Wang Po-ju at his inn on the docks at Yang-chou. The other is addressed to Miao Ch'ing. You must go into the city of Yang-chou to find him, discover how his affair has turned out, and send the information back to me post haste. If your funds prove insufficient, I'll send Lai-pao with some more later on."

"Do you also have a letter for His Honor Ts'ai Yün?" asked Ts'ui Pen.

"His Honor Ts'ai Yün's letter hasn't been written yet," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll have Lai-pao bring it with him later on."

The two men then got onto their mounts and set off on their journey. But no more of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, having donned his official cap and girdle, set out for the yamen, where he met with Judicial Commissioner Hsia and thanked him for his invitation of the day before.

"Today," said Hsia Yen-ling, "in presuming to hope that my colleague will deign to come over for a chat, I have not invited any other guests."

When they had finished disposing of the business at hand, the two of them separated and returned to their homes.

Wu Yüeh-niang had long since prepared a meal in the master suite and invited Hsi-men Ch'ing to partake of some congee.

Who should appear at this juncture but a black-liveried lictor, mounted on a swift steed, and carrying a felt dispatch case, who arrived at the front gate with his face bathed in sweat and asked P'ing-an, "Is this the home of the judicial commissioner, His Honor Hsi-men?"

"Where have you come from?" asked P'ing-an.

The man hastily dismounted from his steed, made a bow, and said, "I have been sent ahead by His Honor An Ch'en, who is engaged in expediting the delivery of imperial lumber, in order to present some gifts to His Honor Hsimen Ch'ing. My master, together with His Honor Huang, who is in charge of the imperial brickyard, are on their way to attend a drinking party in Tungp'ing prefecture at the invitation of His Honor Hu Shih-wen. Taking advantage of the opportunity, they would like to stop off for a visit with His Honor on the way. So I have been sent ahead to find out if His Honor is at home or not."

"Do you have a card or not?" asked P'ing-an.

The man reached into his felt bag and pulled out a card, which he turned over to P'ing-an, along with the presents. P'ing-an took them inside and delivered them to his master.

Hsi-men Ch'ing seeing that the list of gifts read:

Two bolts of Chekiang silk,
Four catties of Hu-chou silk floss,
One girdle with a decorative plaque of aromatic wood, and One antique mirror, ordered that five mace of silver be wrapped up and presented to the courier, together with a reply, stating that he would respectfully await the impending visit. The licitor, then, went swiftly on his way.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had wine and food prepared in his home for the event and waited until noon, when the two officials duly arrived, preceded by escorts shouting to clear the way. On this occasion, they were riding in palanquins, protected from the sun by elaborate baldachins. Upon arrival, they sent in their calling cards, one of which read, "Your devoted servant An Ch'en pays his respects," and the other read, "Your devoted servant Huang Pao-kuang³⁴ pays his respects." Both of them wore robes emblazoned with mandarin squares portraying a silver pheasant against a background of azure clouds,³⁵ black silk caps, and black shoes. They deferred politely to each other as they came in, and Hsi-men Ch'ing went out to the main gate to welcome them. Upon arriving in the main reception hall, and exchanging the customary amenities, they each expressed:

The sentiments they had felt while apart,³⁶ and then sat down in the positions appropriate for guests and host. Secretary Huang took a place on the left, Secretary An took a place on the right, while Hsi-men Ch'ing assumed the host's position in order to keep them company.

Secretary Huang initiated the proceedings by raising his hand, and saying, "Having long been an admirer of your worthy name, surpassing virtue, and illustrious reputation, I fear I have been tardy in paying my respects."

"You do me too much honor," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I fear I am guilty, Venerable Sir, of putting you to the trouble of paying me an initial visit. You must allow me to return the favor in the future. May I venture to enquire as to your distinguished courtesy name?"

"My fellow graduate Huang's courtesy name is T'ai-yü, or Vast Vision," said Secretary An. "It is derived from the line, 'He whose vision is vast and serene emits a Heavenly light.'³⁷

"May I venture to enquire as to your distinguished courtesy name?" said Secretary Huang.

"Your pupil's courtesy name is Ssu-ch'üan, or Four Springs," replied Hsimen Ch'ing. "It was chosen because my country estate has four wells on it."

"The other day," said Secretary An, "I met with my fellow graduate Ts'ai Yün, who reported that he and Sung Ch'iao-nien had put you to the trouble of entertaining them at your distinguished mansion."

"In consideration of Chai Ch'ien's esteemed request," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and the fact that he is also the superior official in my humble jurisdiction, I could hardly fail to make him welcome. While my paltry servant was in the capital, he learned of your illustrious appointment, but I have not, heretofore, been able to congratulate you in person."

He then went on to ask, "When did you take leave of your native place?"

"After departing from your distinguished mansion last year," said Secretary An, "your pupil returned to his home in order to remarry. After the New Year's celebrations, I came back to the capital in the first month and have been appointed to the position of secretary in the Ministry of Works, where I have been put in charge of expediting the delivery of imperial lumber, a task that requires me to travel to Ching-chou. Since my route takes me by this place, I could hardly fail to pay my respects."

Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to say, "As for your lavish gifts:

My gratitude knows no bounds."³⁸

When he had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing invited his guests to loosen their formal clothing and relax, while ordering his attendants to set up tables for them.

Secretary Huang wished to depart immediately, and Secretary An explained, "To tell the truth, my fellow graduate Huang and I are currently on our way to attend a banquet at the invitation of Prefect Hu Shih-wen in Tungp'ing prefecture. Since our route took us past your distinguished mansion, we could hardly fail to pay our respects. On another day we will come again and impose upon your hospitality."

"If you are proceeding to Hu Shih-wen's place," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you still have some distance to go. Even if you two gentlemen are not hungry yourselves, what about your attendants? Your pupil would not presume to provide a formal libation. I have merely prepared a meal here, with which to regale your subordinates and attendants."

Thereupon, platters of viands were sent out for the chair bearers, and table settings were simultaneously arrayed in the reception hall.

The rare dainties and exotic delicacies,³⁹

Were the finest the season could provide, consisting of soup, rice, sweetmeats, and delectable fresh seafood. After Hsimen Ch'ing had toasted his visitors with but three small golden goblets of wine, these table settings were carried out for the refreshment of the personal attendants and docket officers in their entourage.

After a little while, the two officials bade farewell and got up to go, saying to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Tomorrow your pupils will dispatch a paltry missive, presuming to hope, Worthy Sir, that you will deign to pay a visit to the estate of my fellow graduate Huang's colleague, Eunuch Director Liu, for a chat. But we don't know whether you will consent to order out your equipage or not."

"As the recipient of your magnanimous summons," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I could but hasten to comply."

When they had finished speaking, he escorted his visitors to the main gate, where they got into their sedan chairs and departed.

Whom should he encounter at this juncture, but a servant sent by Judicial Commissioner Hsia to remind him of his invitation.

"I'm leaving right away," Hsi-men Ch'ing told him.

Having ordered his horse to be prepared, he went back to the rear compound, changed his clothes, came out again, mounted his horse, and set out for the residence of Judicial Commissioner Hsia, accompanied by Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung, and preceded by orderlies who shouted to clear the way, holding aloft a black flabellum to shield him from the sun.

After he arrived in the reception hall, and they had greeted each other, he said, "Just now, Secretary An Ch'en of the Ministry of Works, who is expediting the delivery of imperial lumber to the capital, and Secretary Huang Paokuang, who is in charge of the imperial brickyard, paid me a visit and stayed for half a day before departing. Otherwise, I would have come over earlier."

When they had run through the customary amenities, he was helped off with his outer clothes, which Tai-an directed an orderly to fold up and put into his felt bag, together with his official girdle. There were two table settings arrayed in the reception hall. Hsi-men Ch'ing was ushered to the position of honor at the one on the left, while the position next to his was occupied by Licentiate Ni, a tutor employed in the household of Hsia Yen-ling.

In the course of the ensuing conversation, Hsi-men Ch'ing said to him, "Might I enquire as to your distinguished courtesy name, Venerable Sir?"

"Your pupil is named Ni P'eng, or Familiar Ni," replied the licentiate. "My informal name is Shih-yüan, and my courtesy name is Kuei-yen. At present I occupy a position in the prefectural school and also serve as a tutor in the residence of my venerable patron Hsia Yen-ling, where I am engaged in preparing the young gentleman, his worthy son, for the civil service examinations. I fear I have been remiss in failing to make your acquaintance."

As they were speaking, two boy actors came forward and kowtowed before the company. When they had finished their soup and rice, the chef came out and carved the entrée, after which Hsi-men Ch'ing directed Tai-an to reward him with an appropriate gratuity.

"Bring me my informal cap to wear," Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Tai-an. "Take my official cap, girdle, and robe home with you, and come back to fetch me this evening."

Tai-an assented, ate the snack that had been provided for him, and went home with the horse. But no more of this.

To resume our story, P'an Chin-lien, after seeing Hsi-men Ch'ing off that morning, slept until noon before crawling out of bed. And once she was up, she was too lazy to comb her hair. Fearing that this would subject her to criticism by the denizens of the rear compound, when Yüeh-niang invited her to join them for lunch, she refused on the grounds that she was not feeling well. It was late afternoon before she ventured out the door of her quarters and made her way to the rear compound.

Yüeh-niang, taking advantage of Hsi-men Ch'ing's absence, planned to listen to Nun Hsüeh expound the Buddhist dharma by performing the Chin-kang k'o-i, or Liturgical Exposition of the Diamond Sutra. With this end in view, a lectern for the sutra recitation had been set up in the parlor of the master suite, incense had been ignited, Nun Hsüeh and Nun Wang sat facing each other, while Nun Hsüeh's two disciples, Miao-ch'ü and Miao-feng, stood to either side, ready to chime in by reciting the Buddha's name in unison. Sister-in-law Wu, Aunt Yang, Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Li Kuei-chieh, one and all, seated themselves around them, prepared to listen to the performance.

Nun Hsüeh began the recitation as follows:⁴⁰

I have heard tell that:

The flash of lightning is quickly extinguished;
The spark from a flint is difficult to sustain.
Fallen blossoms are not fated to return to the tree;
Flowing water is not destined to return to its source.⁴¹
Though you dwell in painted hall and brocade room,⁴²
When your life is over, they are like the infinite void;
Though you possess supreme rank and lofty office,
When your salary stops, they resemble nothing but dreams.
Yellow gold and white jade,⁴³
Are merely prerequisites for disaster;
Red powder and light furs,
Are but the expenses of mundane labor.
Wives and children cannot ensure a lifetime of happiness;
The darkness of the grave entails a myriad forms of grief.
One fine day, while sleeping on your pillow,
You'll end up underneath the Yellow Springs.⁴⁴
An empty epitaph will proclaim your specious fame;
The yellow earth will entomb your fragile bones.
Your hundred acres of fields and gardens,
Will only create dissension among your sons and daughters;
Your thousand trunks of satin and brocade,⁴⁵

Will not furnish you an inch of thread after your death.⁴⁶
Before the springtime of youth is half over,
White hair will encroach upon your head;
No sooner will your well-wishers be heard,
Than they will come to condole at your wake.⁴⁷
It is bitter! Bitter! Bitter!
The breath is transformed into a clear breeze, the dust returns to earth;
The wheel of transmigration turns inexorably, it cannot be called back;
The head is altered and the face replaced⁴⁸ an infinite number of times.⁴⁹

Homage to the Three Jewels, the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, that permeate the empty void, and pervade the dharma realm, past, present, and future.⁵⁰

The subtle and mysterious dharma of utmost profundity,
Is difficult to encounter even in myriads of kalpas.
Now that we have heard it, and are able to keep it,
We wish to understand the true meaning of the Tathāgata.⁵¹

Nun Wang said, “In those days of yore, how did Śākyamuni Buddha, the patriarch of all the Buddhas, and founder of the Buddhist faith, come to leave home in order to take up the religious life? We would like to hear you expound it.”

Nun Hsüeh then sang, to the tune “Five Offerings”:

Śākyamuni Buddha,
The Indian prince,
Relinquished his kingdom in order to meditate in the Himalayas.
Severing his flesh to feed the eagles,⁵² magpies nested on his crown.⁵³
He cultivated himself until,
Nine dragons sprayed him with water,⁵⁴ turning his body to gold.
Only then was he revered as the World-honored Śākyamuni,
Lord of the Greater Vehicle and supreme enlightenment.

Nun Wang continued, “Now that we have heard you expound the story of Śākyamuni Buddha, in those days, how did the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara engage in religious practice until attaining the glorious realization of multi-form transformations and vast numinous powers? We would like to hear you explain it.”

Nun Hsüeh then continued, to the same tune:

The great and glorious,
Princess Miao-shan,⁵⁵
Forsook the imperial palace in order to dwell in Hsiang-shan.
Devas brought her offerings⁵⁶ as she sat in meditation.
She cultivated herself until,
She was able to manifest the fifty-three forms⁵⁷ of her transformation body.
Only then was she revered as Kuan-shih-yin, the bodhisattva who,
Perceives the sounds of the world and saves people from suffering and disaster.

Nun Wang said, “Now that we have heard the dharma of the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, in days of yore there were the Six Patriarchs, Buddhas who transmitted the lamp. The first of them, Bodhidharma, since the Western Regions had already been converted, turned to the East, in order to transmit the ineffable teaching that does not rely on written words.⁵⁸ What arduous austerities did he undergo? We would like to hear the details.”

Nun Hsüeh then continued, to the same tune:

Master Bodhidharma, from whom the Dharma passed
To the Sixth Patriarch, whose lay surname was Lu,⁵⁹
Meditated with his face to the wall for nine years,⁶⁰ so arduous were his austerities.
He remained so still reeds grew between his knees,⁶¹ while subduing dragons and tigers.
He cultivated himself until,
With the aid of a single shoe or a plucked reed⁶² he was able to go where he willed.
Only then was he revered as the Buddha Vairocana, who, with supreme compassion, Swore the great vow to work for the salvation of all sentient beings.

Nun Wang said, “Now that we have heard the details about how the Six Patriarchs transmitted the lamp, I venture to ask for an explanation of how, in days of yore, the layman P’ang Yün disposed of all his worldly wealth by sending it to the bottom of the sea⁶³ and thereby reaped the true fruit?”

Nun Hsüeh then sang, to the same tune:

The layman P’ang Yün,
An enlightened being,
Invested in his future life by coming to the aid of the impoverished and wretched,
After overhearing the complaints against him of donkeys and horses one night.⁶⁴
He cultivated himself until,

Abandoning his wife and children,⁶⁵ he was able to embark upon the dharma boat. Only then was he revered as the guardian of the monastic establishment, The abode of the wonderful vehicle and its wonderful dharma.

Just as Yüeh-niang was fully absorbed in listening to the performance, whom should she see but P'ing-an, who appeared in a state of obvious agitation and said, "The household of His Honor the regional investigating censor Sung Ch'iao-nien has sent two couriers and a gate-boy to deliver some presents."

Yüeh-niang was flustered and said, "Father has gone to have a drink at Judicial Commissioner Hsia's house. Whoever can we send to fetch him?"

As they were in the very midst of perturbation over this problem, who should appear but Tai-an, who had come in to put away his master's felt bag and said, "That's no problem. I'll just take his card and go explain the situation to Father. Simply have Brother-in-law invite the gate-boy in and give him something to eat and drink."

Tai-an then turned over the felt bag, took the card in hand, mounted the horse, and took off for Judicial Commissioner Hsia's house like a cloud scudding before the wind.

Upon arrival, he reported, thus and so, saying, "His Honor the regional investigating censor Sung Ch'iao-nien has had some gifts delivered to you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing looked at the accompanying card, on which the list of presents read, "One freshly slaughtered pig, two flagons of Chin-hua wine, four hundred sheets of official-quality stationery, and a miniature book," underneath which was written, "Your devoted servant Sung Ch'iao-nien pays his respects."

Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly ordered, "When you get back home, have Shu-t'ung send an acknowledgment in a double-folded accordion-bound album that states my official rank. Reward the gate-boy with three taels of silver and a pair of handkerchiefs, and the bearers with five mace of silver each."

When Tai-an arrived home, he looked everywhere for Shu-t'ung, but he was nowhere to be found. This made him so anxious all he could do was:

Turn round and round like a millstone.

Ch'en Ching-chi was also not at home, so he got Manager Fu to keep the messenger company while he had a drink. Tai-an then fetched the handkerchiefs and silver from the second floor room in the rear compound, but there was no one available to seal them properly, so he had to seal them up on the shop counter himself and get Manager Fu to write the superscriptions on the three large and small gift packages.

He then asked P'ing-an, "Have you no idea where they've gone?"

"Originally, before Brother-in-law had left," said P'ing-an, "he was still here; but, later on, when Brother-in-law went outside the city gate to collect a debt of silver, he disappeared."

"Don't bother to mention it!" exclaimed Tai-an. "No doubt that 'sweetie' of a page boy has gone out on the town in order to:

Careen about rather recklessly, or even to keep a mistress."

Just as they were all in a stew about it, whom should they see but Ch'en Ching-chi and Shu-t'ung, who arrived back riding tandem on a mule. Tai-an gave Shu-t'ung a piece of his mind, after which he had him write the acknowledgment in the accordion-bound album that indicated Hsi-men Ch'ing's official rank and sent it off with the messenger who had delivered the gifts.

"You lousy 'sweetie' of a page boy!" railed Tai-an. "On the one hand you:

Lie down with spread legs to solicit trade,
while on the other you:

Clamber on top in order to drop your load.⁶⁶

When Father's not at home, rather than looking after the house, you go off with someone else to service your mistress. Father never told you to accompany Brother-in-law in going outside the city gate to collect a debt. What induced you to go off with him for no good reason? Just see if I tell Father about it or not."

"Go ahead and tell him if you want," said Shu-t'ung. "Do you think I'm afraid of you? If you don't tell him, you'll only show me what a good son you are."

"Why you lousy dog-fucked 'sweetie' of a page boy!" exclaimed Tai-an. "You think you can call my bluff, do you?"

Thereupon, he actually stepped forward, tripped Shu-t'ung up with a single kick at his ankles, and the two of them ended up rolling on top of each other on the floor. Only after Tai-an had taken advantage of the upper hand to spit a mouthful of saliva into his mouth did he call it quits.

"I've got to go back after Father," he announced, "but when I get home, I'll settle accounts with the whore."

Having said which, he mounted the horse and set straight off on his errand.

Meanwhile, in the rear compound, Yüeh-niang saw to it that the two nuns were served some tea and refreshments and then continued to listen to them as they sang Buddhist songs and recited gathas. P'an Chin-lien grew restless, first tugging at Meng Yü-lou, and then, having failed to dislodge her, pulling at Li P'ing-erh, all the while afraid that Yüeh-niang would criticize her.

Yüeh-niang finally said, "Sister Li, she's trying to get your attention. You might as well go off with her, so she won't have to remain here, where she doesn't know what to do with herself."

Only then did Li P'ing-erh consent to go outside with her.

As they departed, Yüeh-niang gave Chin-lien a look, saying:

"When you weed out the turnips, there is room for other things."⁶⁷

Now that she's gone, we won't have to put up with her hopping around the place like a rabbit any more. She's just not the sort of person to listen to the Buddhist dharma."

P'an Chin-lien, with Li P'ing-erh in tow, went out through the inner gate, saying, "Elder Sister really goes for that stuff. No one in your household is dead. So what's the point of having nuns in to recite precious scrolls, for no good reason; not to mention hovering around them like that? We might as well take a walk out to the front courtyard and see what Hsi-men Ta-chieh is up to in her quarters."

Thereupon, they went out through the main reception hall and found that lamps had been lit in the antechamber where they lived, and Hsi-men Tachieh and Ch'en Ching-chi could be heard inside bickering over the loss of a sum of silver.

Chin-lien gave a rap on the latticework of their window and said, "Not having gone back to the rear compound to listen to Buddhist songs, what are the two of you quarreling about here in your room?"

Ch'en Ching-chi came outside to see who was there and, on catching sight of the two of them, said, "It's a good thing I didn't start to swear just now. It turns out to be the Fifth Lady and the Sixth Lady. Please come in and have a seat."

"You might as well go ahead and swear if you have the nerve," said Chin-lien.

Going inside, and seeing that Hsi-men Ta-chieh was engaged in stitching the sole of a shoe by lamplight, she said, "At this hour of the day, in such hot weather, you're still stitching shoes, are you?"

She then went on to ask, "What were the two of you squabbling about?"

"You ask her," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "Father sent me outside the city gate to collect a debt, and she gave me three mace of silver and asked me to bring back some gold lamé handkerchiefs for her. But who could have anticipated that when I got there and groped in my sleeve for the silver, there was nothing there, so I was unable to bring back the handkerchiefs. Then, when I got home, she maintained that I had been carrying on with a mistress and started to rail at me. She's been abusing me all this while, which got me so agitated that I was reduced to:

Swearing by the gods and uttering oaths.

Who would have thought that a maidservant, in sweeping the floor, happened to pick up the missing silver, but she has confiscated it and refuses to give it to me, while still demanding that I buy the handkerchiefs for her tomorrow. Let you two ladies be the judge. Who is at fault in this matter?"

"Why you lousy jailbird, shut your mouth!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ta-chieh. "If you haven't been carrying on with a woman, why should you have taken Shu-t'ung with you, for no good reason? Just now, Tai-an didn't mince words in giving you a piece of his mind. I imagine the two of you must have been in cahoots to make out with some woman. Otherwise you wouldn't have gotten home so late. And where is that debt of silver you were sent to collect."

"Is the missing silver in your possession or not?" asked Chin-lien.

"I've got the silver," said Hsi-men Ta-chieh. "Just now, a maidservant was sweeping the floor and picked it up. I'm holding on to it."

"It's no problem," said Chin-lien. "If I give you the money, you can also bring me back two gold lamé handkerchiefs tomorrow."

"Brother-in-law," inquired Li P'ing-erh, "if there are gold lamé handkerchiefs for sale outside the city gate, would you bring back a few for me as well?"

"Outside the city gate, on Handkerchief Lane," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "the well-known Wang family shop specializes in:

Every color and variety, of gold lamé, shot with turquoise, handkerchiefs and kerchiefs. No matter how many you might want, they would have them in stock. If you'll just tell me what color and pattern you want, I can bring them all back to you tomorrow."

"I'd like one gold lamé, shot with turquoise, handkerchief," said Li P'ingerh, "the color of old gold, and decorated with a motif of 'phoenixes traversing the flowers.'"

"Sixth Lady," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "gold lamé work on a ground the color of old gold will not show the gold to advantage."

"Mind your own business," said Li P'ing-erh. "I also want one pink satin handkerchief with a motif of 'waves splashing on the shore,' and decorated with the symbolic representations of the 'eight treasures,' as well as one gold lamé handkerchief with a sesame flower design in shot silk."

"Fifth Lady," Ch'en Ching-chi then asked, "what kind would you like for yourself?"

"I'm short of money," said Chin-lien, "so two handkerchiefs is all I can afford. I'd like one gold lamé handkerchief of jade-colored satin, with a diapered ground."

"You're not an elderly person yet," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "What would you want with something as white as that?"

"What's it to you?" said Chin-lien. "If I can't use it yet, I'll save it for some time in the future when I'm in mourning."

"What color do you want the other one to be?" Ch'en Ching-chi asked.

"As for the other one," said Chin-lien, "I want a gold lamé handkerchief, intermittently shot with turquoise, of delicate, purple grape-colored, Szechwanese satin, with a variegated brocade insert displaying the motif of 'joined hearts' in the form of interlocking lozenges, enclosing a roundel with a pair of magpies face to face, a rebus for the words 'happy reunion,' and with the symbolic representations of the 'eight treasures' worked into the borders on either side in beadwork."

"Ai-ya! Ai-ya!" exclaimed Ch'en Ching-chi. "That's enough of that. You're just like:

The melon seed peddler who opens his box and then sneezes into it:

What a giant hodgepodge of a mess!"

"You crazy short-life!" exclaimed Chin-lien.

"Those who have the means to purchase their hearts' desires,

Ought to feel perfectly free to buy whatever they want.

What's it to you, anyway?"

Li P'ing-erh then reached into her purse and pulled out a piece of silver, which she handed to Ch'en Ching-chi, saying, "You can include the cost of the Fifth Lady's purchases in this."

Chin-lien shook her head, saying, "Let me take care of it."

"We might as well have Brother-in-law make a single purchase out of it," said Li P'ing-erh. "What need is there to make a separate undertaking?"

Ching-chi Loses at Cards and Consents to Stand a Treat

"Even if I include the cost of the Fifth Lady's items," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "there's more than enough silver here to cover it all." He then put it on the scales, and it turned out to weigh one tael and nine mace.

"Take whatever's left over," said Li P'ing-erh, "and bring back two handkerchiefs for Hsi-men Ta-chieh."

Hsi-men Ta-chieh hastily expressed her gratitude with a bow.

"Since the Sixth Lady is offering to buy handkerchiefs for you," said Chin-lien to Hsi-men Ta-chieh, "you'd better produce those three mace of silver you're holding onto, and the two of you can play cards to see who will stand treat with it. If it isn't enough, you can ask the Sixth Lady to supplement it. Tomorrow, when Father's not at home, you can use it to buy a roast duck and some distilled spirits to entertain us with."

"Since the Fifth Lady has spoken," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "you'd better come up with it."

Hsi-men Ta-chieh gave it to Chin-lien, who turned it over to Li P'ing-erh to hold while they got out a deck of cards and had Hsi-men Ta-chieh and Ch'en Ching-chi play forfeits against each other. Chin-lien stood at her side and advised Hsi-men Ta-chieh, with the result that, in no time at all, she had defeated Ching-chi in three hands.

Just at this juncture, they heard a knocking at the front gate, indicating that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come home. Only then did P'an Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh return to their quarters.

Ch'en Ching-chi went out to welcome Hsi-men Ch'ing and reported on his errand, saying, "As for the debt that Hsü the Fourth owes you, he will send you a preliminary payment of two hundred fifty taels the day after tomorrow, and repay the remainder at the end of the month."

Hsi-men Ch'ing uttered a few imprecations, after which, being:

Half inebriated with wine,⁶⁸ he did not even go back to the rear compound but headed straight for the quarters of P'an Chin-lien. Truly:
Past mistress of the intimate arts, she caters to her lover's whim;
What need is there to fear that tomorrow the flower will refuse to open.

Chapter 52

YING PO-CHÜEH INTRUDES ON

A SPRING BEAUTY IN THE GROTTO;

P'AN CHIN-LIEN INSPECTS A MUSHROOM

IN THE FLOWER GARDEN

On the flowering crab apples deep in the courtyard¹
the rain has just let up;
With no breeze sweeping over the mossy paths
the butterflies make free.
The hundred-budded clove blossoms blazon forth their exquisite beauty;
The thrice dormant weeping willows² manipulate their supple branches.
The red of the peach blossoms, lustrous as wine,
is of a lighter shade;
The green of the foliage, in the lingering chill,
grows more luxuriant.
Silently making their way through beaded curtains
the swallows return;
The cry of the cuckoo carries with it the sorrow of the departing spring.³

THE STORY GOES that while Hsi-men Ch'ing was drinking at the home of Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling that day and received the information that the regional investigating censor Sung Ch'iao-nien had sent a set of gifts to him, he was as delighted as could be. Hsia Yen-ling also treated him with a degree of respect:

Different from that of former days,⁴ blocking the door and urging him to have another drink, so that it was the second watch before he permitted him to go home.

P'an Chin-lien had long since taken off her headdress under the lamplight, revealing her:

Powdered face and glossy hair, and ordered Ch'un-mei to lay out the quilts and pillows on the bed and wipe off the cool bamboo bed mat, after which she proceeded to:

Light incense and wash her private parts, in expectation of Hsi-men Ch'ing's arrival. When he came in the door, she observed that he was:

Half inebriated with wine, and hastened to help him off with his clothes. After drinking the tea that Ch'un-mei served them, they proceeded straight to bed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that the woman, who had stripped herself stark naked, was sitting on the edge of the bed, with her head bent low, as she adjusted the foot binding on one of her fresh, white legs, which was resting horizontally over her knee, preparatory to changing into her scarlet flat-soled sleeping shoes, that were:

Barely three inches long,

But half a span in length.

Upon observing this sight, Hsi-men Ch'ing's:

Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused, and his jade chowrie handle became conspicuously erect. He then asked the woman for the bag of sexual implements, and she promptly groped it out from underneath the mattress and handed it to him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, having fastened both of the clasps in place, pulled the woman onto his lap with one hand and said, "Today your daddy would like to pluck the flower in your rear courtyard. Are you willing to agree to that?"

The woman gave him a look, saying, "What an utterly shameless lover you are! After screwing around with that page boy Shu-t'ung until you're tired of it, you've come to pester me. Just continue carrying on with that slave, why don't you?"

"What a crazy little oily-mouth!" Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed. "That's enough of that. If you'll agree to go along with me, what would I hanker after that page boy for? You may not know it, but what your daddy delights in the most is this very thing. You can be sure that if I just get it inside, I'll ejaculate."

The woman was unable to withstand his pestering and said, "My only fear is that I'll not be able to accommodate that great big thing of yours. If you'll remove the ring from your glans I'll consent to try it out with you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing actually did remove the sulfur-imbued ring and left only one of the silver clasps around the base of his organ. He then ordered the woman to get down on all fours on the surface of the bed, with her bottom raised high, while he used saliva to moisten his turtle head, and then moved back and forth, moistening and reaming, before attempting to plunge it into her orifice. His turtle head was proud and firm, so that it was some time before he succeeded in immersing the knob of his glans. The woman, in her abject position, knit her brows and silently endured the pain, biting on a handkerchief in her mouth when it became too difficult to bear.

"Daddy!" she cried. "Slow down a bit. This is not like it is in front. You're stretching me so tightly inside that it hurts as though I'm being:

Seared with heat or scorched with fire."

"Dear heart!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Keep on calling me 'Daddy.' It's not a problem. Tomorrow I'll buy a set of patterned silk clothing for you to wear."

"The sort of clothing I want is readily available," said Chin-lien. "Yesterday I noticed that Li Kuei-chieh was dressed in a drawnwork silk skirt of glossy gosling-yellow with silver stripes, and an inset of gold-spangled sheepskin, trimmed with varicolored thread, that really looked nice. She said that it was purchased in the licensed quarter, and that they all possessed them. But I alone don't have a skirt of that kind. I don't have any idea how much they cost, but if you buy one for me to wear, I'll stop complaining."

"That's no problem," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Tomorrow I'll buy one for you."

In the meantime, while this conversation was taking place, from his superior vantage point, he began to thrust and retract in earnest, alternately submerging and exposing the knob of his glans, as he gave himself over to a series of shallow retractions and deep thrusts, as if there were no end in sight.

The woman:

Turning her head around with an amorous glance, called out, "Daddy! It's tight in there. You're really hurting me. How can you insist on carrying on so strenuously? I beg of you, whatever else you do, ejaculate as quickly as possible, and be done with it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing paid no attention, but lifted her haunches in order to:

Savor the sight as he went in and out, while, at the same time, crying out, "P'an the Fifth, you little whore, devote yourself to wantonly calling me 'Daddy,' in order to coax out your daddy's spunk."

The woman, in fact, in her abject position:

As her starry eyes grew dim,

Her oriole's voice all a quaver,

Gently wriggled her willowy waist,⁵

Half responding with her fragrant flesh,

while:

The lascivious sounds and complaisant words,
that issued from her mouth:

Were too multifarious to describe in detail.

After some time, Hsi-men Ch'ing, feeling that he was about to ejaculate, grasped her haunches with both hands and proceeded to ram away at her with all his strength, so that, as his body collided with her bottom:

The noise was incessant.

Meanwhile the woman, in her abject position below him, moaned inarticulately:

Unable to control herself.⁶

As he was on the brink of ejaculation, Hsi-men Ch'ing grasped the woman's bottom, inserted his jade chowrie-handle all the way to the root, so that it reached straight into the most deep and marvelous region, producing a pleasurable sensation that could hardly be endured. Thereupon:

Responding to her with abandon,

He ejaculated like a geyser.

The woman, for her part, received his semen, and their two bodies remained glued to each other.

After some time, when the jade chowrie-handle was withdrawn, the stalk was seen to be stained blood-red, and fluid was still oozing from the mouth of the urethra. Only after the woman had wiped it off with her handkerchief did they go to sleep. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, when Hsi-men Ch'ing returned home after going to the yamen in the morning, a messenger came from Secretary An Ch'en and Secretary Huang Pao-kuang, in order to deliver an invitation to a banquet, on the twenty-second, at the estate of Eunuch Director Liu, the manager of the Imperial Brickyard, and to urge him to come as early as possible.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sent the messenger on his way and was just coming out of the reception hall after eating some congee in the master suite, when he encountered Little Chou, the barber, who prostrated himself before him, kowtowed, and then stood in waiting to one side.

"You've arrived in the nick of time," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I was just going to look for you to do my hair."

Thereupon, Hsi-men Ch'ing led him into the garden, as far as the small summerhouse, the Kingfisher Pavilion, where he sat down on a cool chair, took off his cap and headband, and let his hair fall loose. Little Chou then laid out his combs and implements on a table behind him and proceeded to comb out his hair, examining his dandruff as he did so, as a way of assessing his prospects.

Kneeling down in expectation of a tip, he said, "Your Honor is sure to receive a major promotion in the course of the coming year. The coloration of your hair is very propitious."⁷

Hsi-men Ch'ing was greatly pleased, and, after his hair had been combed, also had him clean the wax from his ears, and give him a massage. He possessed a complete set of implements for this purpose and gave Hsi-men Ch'ing a thorough going over, in addition to which he had him engage in some of the therapeutic gymnastic techniques called tao-yin, or "guiding and pulling,"⁸ that gave:

His entire body a feeling of well-being.⁹

He rewarded him with five mace of silver and told him to have something to eat, and then stay in attendance so that he could cut Kuan-ko's hair. Hsi-men Ch'ing then went into his studio, where he collapsed on the bed, inlaid with Yunnanese marble, and went to sleep.

On that day, Aunt Yang departed, and Nun Wang and Nun Hsüeh also prepared to go home. Wu Yüeh-niang had the gift boxes that they had brought with them filled with steamed-shortcake pastries and saw them off, presenting each of them with five mace of silver, and Nun Hsüeh's two young disciples with a narrow bolt of cotton fabric apiece.

As Yüeh-niang ushered them out the front gate, Nun Hsüeh once more enjoined her, "When the next jen-tzu day occurs, if you take that potion, you will be sure to conceive."

"Reverend Hsüeh," said Yüeh-niang, "after you leave today, whatever you do, come for another visit on my birthday in the eighth month. I'll be expecting you."

Nun Hsüeh placed her palms together and saluted her in the Buddhist fashion, saying, "We have put the lay Bodhisattva to a lot of trouble already. I will be sure to come when that day arrives."

Thereupon, they took their leave of Yüeh-niang, and the rest of the women-folk, who had all come out to the main gate to see them off, and Yüeh-niang and Sister-in-law Wu then returned to the rear compound.

However, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, and Hsi-men Tachieh, along with Li Kuei-chieh, who was wearing a white silver-striped silk blouse that opened down the middle, over a gosling-yellow drawnwork silk skirt, embellished with gold thread, a chignon enclosed in a fret of silver filigree, a hair ornament displaying a motif of turquoise water and auspicious clouds, gold filigree hairpins, pendant amethyst earrings, and scarlet shoes, and was carrying Kuan-ko in her arms, seized the occasion to take a walk in the garden.

"Kuei-chieh," said Li P'ing-erh, "hand him over. Let me carry him."

"Sixth Lady, it's no problem," responded Li Kuei-chieh. "I'm enjoying the chance to carry the youngster."

"Kuei-chieh," said Meng Yü-lou, "you haven't yet been to the new studio that Father has fixed up for himself. Come take a look at it."

As they entered the garden, Chin-lien noticed that the crape myrtle blossoms were in full flower and picked two of them for Li Kuei-chieh to stick in her hair.

Thereupon, they proceeded along the juniper hedge to the Kingfisher Pavilion, where they observed that the interior of the studio was furnished with a curtained bed and standing screens, and further embellished with calligraphy, painting, zither, and chessboard, all of which were elegantly displayed. The bed was arrayed with chiffon curtains, held in place by silver hooks, cool matting, and a coral pillow. Hsi-men Ch'ing was lying collapsed upon the bed:

In a state of slumbering oblivion.

A skein of burning ambergris incense wafted from a small gilded censer. The green gauze window was half closed, and the plantains outside the casement¹⁰ bent to catch the light.

P'an Chin-lien picked up the incense case on the table and fiddled with it, while Meng Yü-lou and Li P'ing-erh sat down on chairs.

All of a sudden, Hsi-men Ch'ing turned over and, observing the womenfolk in the room, said, "What are you doing here?"

"Li Kuei-chieh wanted to see your studio," said Chin-lien, "so we brought her along to take a look at it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that she was carrying Kuan-ko with her and playfully teased him for a while, when Hua-t'ung suddenly appeared and said, "Master Ying the Second has come."

The crowd of womenfolk hastily got out of the way and headed toward Li P'ing-erh's quarters.

When Ying Po-chüeh got as far as the juniper hedge and saw Li Kuei-chieh carrying Kuan-ko, he said, "Wonderful! So Li Kuei-chieh is here."

He then went on meaningfully to ask her, "How long have you been here?"

Li Kuei-chieh continued on her way, saying, "That's enough, you crazy beggar! It's none of your business. What do you want to know for?"

"What a consummate little whore you are!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "If it's none of my business, that's that. Just give me a kiss and I'll call it quits."

Thereupon, he embraced her and endeavored to give her a kiss, but Kuei-chieh pushed him away with her hand and swore at him, "You lousy, obnoxious, crazy chunk of knife-bait! If I weren't afraid of frightening the baby, I'd give you a rap with the handle of my fan."

Hsi-men Ch'ing came outside at this point and, observing that Ying Pochüeh was holding on to Li Kuei-chieh, said, "You crazy dog! Be careful or you'll scare the baby."

Then he turned to Shu-t'ung and said, "You take the baby and carry him to the Sixth Lady's place."

Shu-t'ung promptly took the baby in his arms. The wet nurse, Ju-i, who was waiting by the corner of the juniper hedge, then took charge of him and bore him away.

Ying Po-chüeh, who remained standing in parley with Kuei-chieh, asked her, "How has that affair of yours turned out?"

"I am much indebted to Father here," said Kuei-chieh, "who has taken pity on me and sent Brother Lai-pao to the Eastern Capital to intervene on my behalf."

"Wonderful! Wonderful!" exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. "That should take care of it. In that case, you ought to be able to relax a little."

When he had finished speaking, Kuei-chieh started off for the rear compound, but Ying Po-chüeh said, "Come back here, you crazy little whore! I've still got something to say to you."

"I've got to go now, but I'll be back," said Kuei-chieh.

Thereupon she went over to Li P'ing-erh's quarters to join the others. Only then did Ying Po-chüeh salute Hsi-men Ch'ing with a bow, and the two of them sat down in the studio together.

"Yesterday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "while I was having a drink at Hsia Yenling's place, His Excellency Sung Ch'iao-nien, the regional investigating censor, sent someone to deliver some gifts, including a freshly slaughtered pig. Fearing that it wouldn't keep, I engaged a cook, this morning, to come and dismember it, season it with pepper, and braise the whole thing, including the head. If you will stay a while, I'll invite Hsieh Hsi-ta to join us, so we can play backgammon and enjoy it together."

He then directed Ch'in-t'ung, "You go, right away, and invite Master Hsieh to join us. Tell him that Brother Ying the Second is also here."

Ch'in-t'ung assented and went straight off on his errand.

Ying Po-chüeh then asked, "With regard to that debt that Hsü the Fourth owes you, have you collected it yet?"

"That lousy unprincipled dog-bone," exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "claims he won't be able to come up with the whole amount until tomorrow, but he made me an initial payment of two hundred and fifty taels. You can tell those two to come here the day after tomorrow. If I'm still short, I'll make up the amount out of my household funds, that's all."

"That will be fine," said Ying Po-chüeh. "I expect they'll buy some fresh things in season and come to pay their respects to you later today."

"There's really no need for them to go to so much trouble," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After they had chatted for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing asked, "Have those two, Blabbermouth Sun and Pockmarked Chu, already set out for the capital, or not?"

"By this time they're on their way," replied Ying Po-chüeh. "After they were apprehended at Li Kuei-chieh's place, they were incarcerated in the lockup at the district yamen overnight. The next day, the three of them were linked together on a single length of iron chain and escorted off to the Eastern Capital. Once they get there, it's not likely that any of them will return home unscathed. You thought you could help yourselves to:

Wine by the bowl and meat by the hunk, day after day, just like a bug on the pantry shelf, and now your efforts have earned you a tasty treat. This sort of suffering is only their just deserts. They're on the road in this hot weather, weighed down by iron chains, and without any traveling expenses, but what does it matter."

"You crazy dog!" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If they're not up to standing guard duty when condemned to military exile, whoever was it, in the first place, who induced them to hang out and fool around all day with that youngster from the Wang household? It's really a case of their suffering the consequences of trouble they made for themselves."

"Brother, you've got a point there," said Ying Po-chüeh. "After all:

Flies don't cluster on eggs unless they're cracked.

Why do you suppose they didn't come after me or Hsieh Hsi-ta, if not because:

The clear is ever clear,

The turbid ever turbid?"¹¹

As they were speaking, Hsieh Hsi-ta arrived and, after bowing in greeting, sat down and devoted himself to fanning himself with his fan.

"How have you managed to work up such a faceful of sweat?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Don't even mention it, Brother," replied Hsieh Hsi-ta. "If your servant had shown up so much as a step later, I wouldn't have been at home. I had just come out the front gate when he happened to arrive at the same time. I've had:

A bellyful of anger,
out of the blue today."

"What have you had to be angry about?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"Early this morning," said Hsieh Hsi-ta, "Blabbermouth Sun's wife showed up at my place, claiming that I had been responsible for getting him into such a pickle. What reason would I have had to do that? The unreasonable old whore! 'It was your husband who inveigled him into the licensed quarter day after day, scrounging:

Wine by the bowl and meat by the hunk, and bringing home silver by the handful for you to expend on your own gratification. Everyone knows that you were getting a kickback for his pains, but since when did you ever share a candareen of it with anyone else?' I had just told her off with a sentence or two, and come outside, when I unexpectedly received a summons from Brother's place over here."

Ying Po-chüeh said, "Didn't I just say to Brother here that:

If newly fermented wine is put in separate containers,

The clear is ever clear,

The turbid ever turbid?

It could hardly avoid turning out just as we predicted. As I said, if they continued to hang out with that youngster from the Wang household, sooner or later they would come a cropper, and now see how they've managed to stumble into this net. They've no one to blame but themselves."

"What sort of great prowess does that youngster from the Wang household possess?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "How old is he, after all? His parietal bones are not yet fully formed. He hardly has what it takes to satisfy the sort of women that we rejected in our early days. It's enough to embarrass a ghost."

"What's he ever seen of the great world," said Ying Po-chüeh, "that could stand comparison with your doings in those days? If he even heard tell of them, he'd be scared to death."

When they had finished speaking, a page boy served them with tea, and they proceeded to drink it.

"Why don't the two of you play a game of backgammon?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "They're cooking up some noodles in the rear compound. I'll have a page boy bring some out for us to eat."

Before long, Ch'in-t'ung came in to set up a table, and Hua-t'ung brought in four square boxes, that enclosed four diminutive picnic saucers, containing four different delicacies. There was one saucer of squash and eggplant julienne marinated with ten spices, one saucer of an assortment of pickled beans, one saucer of fresh fagara marinated in soy sauce, and one saucer of candied garlic. These were accompanied by three saucers of garlic extract, for dipping purposes, and a large bowl of pork pot roast, along with three pairs of ivory chopsticks, all of which were laid out in proper order. Only after Hsi-men Ch'ing had joined his guests at the table were three bowls of noodles placed before them, each person pouring onto his noodles as much of the pot roast, garlic, and vinegar as he liked.

Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta picked up their chopsticks and disposed of the contents of their bowls in:

Three mouthfuls and two swallows.

In no time at all, the two of them had wolfed down seven bowls apiece.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had not even been able to finish his second bowl, said, "My sons, the two of you certainly know how to put it away."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "which of your womenfolk is responsible for preparing these noodles today? They're both tasty and delicious."

"This pot roast has been braised to perfection," said Hsieh Hsi-ta. "Were it not for the fact that I had just eaten at home before coming over here, I'd be prepared to suffer another bowl."

The two of them, who had gotten overheated from eating so fast, took off their outer clothes and hung them over their chairs.

On seeing Ch'in-t'ung clearing away the utensils, Ying Po-chüeh said, "Young gentleman, when you get back to the rear compound, bring some water for us to rinse out our mouths with."

"Some warm tea would be good too," said Hsieh Hsi-ta. "If it's too hot, it will only bring out the smell of the garlic."

In a little while, Hua-t'ung arrived with the tea, and the three of them drank it, after which they came outside and strolled among the flower beds on the other side of the juniper hedge.

Who should appear at this point but P'ing-an, who brought in four boxes of gifts that had just been delivered from the household of Huang the Fourth for Hsi-men Ch'ing to see. One box contained fresh black caltrops, one contained fresh water chestnuts, one contained four large iced shad, and one contained loquats.

When Ying Po-chüeh saw them, he said, "What fine stuff! Who knows where he dug it up to send over here? Let me take a taste."

Snatching up a number of items with one hand, he handed two of them to Hsieh Hsi-ta, saying, "There are those who:

Live to old age and death, without knowing that such things as this exist."

"You crazy dog!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Even before they're offered to Buddha,

You snatch them for your own enjoyment."

"Who accuses me of failing to offer them to Buddha?" said Ying Po-chüeh.

"Upon entering my mouth the evidence is destroyed."

Hsi-men Ch'ing directed that the gifts be taken to the rear compound and put away, adding, "Ask the Third Lady for three candareens of silver to give the messenger."

Ying Po-chüeh inquired, "Was it Li Chin who delivered them, or was it Huang Ning?"

"It was Huang Ning," replied P'ing-an.

"It must be that dog-bone's lucky day," said Ying Po-chüeh, "to be rewarded with these three candareens of silver."

Hsi-men Ch'ing continued to look on as the two of them played a game of backgammon. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Li Kuei-chieh, along with her aunt, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, had all eaten in the parlor of the master suite and were sitting in the veranda outside, when they noticed that Little Chou could be seen:

Sticking out his head and craning his neck, on the other side of the screen-wall.

"Little Chou," said Li P'ing-erh, "you've come at a good time. Come in and cut the little master's hair, which has been allowed to grow too long."

Little Chou hastily came forward and kowtowed to all of them, saying, "Just a while ago, His Honor directed that I should come inside to cut little brother's hair."

"Sister Six," said Yüeh-niang, "take a look at the almanac and see whether this is an auspicious day or an inauspicious day to cut the child's hair."

Chin-lien told Hsiao-yü to fetch an almanac, opened it up and perused it for a while, and then said, "Today is the twenty-first day of the fourth month, a keng-hsü day, for which the descriptive character is ting, or steady. It is governed by the constellation lou-chin-kou, or Aries, and is an auspicious day for making sacrifices, donning official cap and girdle, setting out on a journey, having clothes made, performing ablutions, getting one's hair cut, repairing or constructing, and for breaking ground. The best time to initiate these activities is the period from 11:00 AM to 1:00 PM. It is an auspicious day."¹²

"Since it's an auspicious day," said Yüeh-niang, "I'll have a maidservant heat water, and you can also shampoo the child's hair."

She then admonished Little Chou to proceed cautiously and coax the child into letting him cut his hair. Hsiao-yü stood to his side in order to catch the hair in a handkerchief. But before the barber had made more than a few cuts with the scissors, Kuan-ko, with the sound of a gurgling cry, started to howl in earnest. Little Chou continued to cut away hastily even as the child cried out, but who could have anticipated that the boy would choke on himself, falling silent, as his face became swollen and red.

Li P'ing-erh, who became panic-stricken at this, hastily exclaimed, "Don't cut any more! Don't cut any more!"

Little Chou, for his part, was thrown into such consternation that he abandoned the tools of his trade and fled outside as fast as his legs would carry him.

"As I've observed before," said Yüeh-niang, "this child is rather a hopeless case, forever anxious to protect his head. We should have cut his hair ourselves instead of calling someone in to do it for no good reason. What sort of a job can he do?"

As providence would have it, after the child had remained choked up for what seemed like half a day, he let out a cry. Only then did Li P'ing-erh feel as though:

The stone on her head had finally fallen to the ground.

Taking the child in her arms, she devoted herself to petting him, saying as she did so, "What a fine thing for Little Chou to do! What a nerve, to come in here for no good reason, and insist on cutting your hair. On top of which, he's taken advantage of you by leaving the job only half-finished. Why don't I drag him back in here and give him a drubbing, in order to vent your spleen?"

Thereupon, she carried him over to Yüeh-niang, who said, "What a hopeless little beggar! The haircut was originally intended for your benefit, but it's only resulted in a crying fit. With no more hair than this left, you're likely to be mistaken for a shaven-headed convict."

After she had playfully teased him for a while, Li P'ing-erh turned him over to the wet nurse, and Yüeh-niang instructed her, "Don't breast-feed him right away, but wait until he's had a nap before feeding him."

The wet nurse then carried him back to the front compound.

Who should appear at this juncture but Lai-an, who came in to collect Little Chou's implements and reported, "Little Chou is at the front gate, so frightened that his face has turned a scorched shade of brown."

"Has he had anything to eat?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"He has eaten," said Lai-an, "and Father has rewarded him with five candareens of silver."

"Take a goblet of wine out and give it to him," said Yüeh-niang. "He's been so frightened that these few candareens must seem hard-earned."

Hsiao-yü promptly poured out a cup of wine, fetched a saucer of cured meat, and told Lai-an to give them to Little Chou and send him on his way.

Wu Yüeh-niang then turned to Chin-lien and said, "Take a look at the almanac and see when the next jen-tzu day will be."

Chin-lien examined it and said, "The twenty-third is a jen-tzu day. It falls within the solar term mang-chung, or 'Grain in Ear,'¹³ which also includes the Fifth Month Festival, or Dragon Boat Festival."

She then went on to ask, "Sister, why do you ask?"

"For no particular reason," said Yüeh-niang. "I just thought I'd ask."

Li Kuei-chieh then picked up the almanac to look at and said, "The twenty-fourth, I regret to say, is my mother's birthday, and I won't be able to be at home for it."

"The tenth day of the last month," said Yüeh-niang, "was your elder sister's birthday and has already been celebrated. And now the twenty-fourth day of the current month just happens to be your mother's birthday. It would seem that you denizens of the quarter suffer from two ailments a day, while celebrating three birthdays as well. During the daylight hours, you suffer from the ailment of yearning for money, while, during the night, you suffer from the ailment of yearning for customers. In the morning it's your mother's birthday, at noon it's your elder sister's birthday, and in the evening it's your own birthday. How do they all come to occur so close together? As long as your patrons have money, you might as well contrive to make every day a birthday."

Li Kuei-chieh merely smiled at this, without making a sound.

Who should appear at this juncture but Hua-t'ung, who had been sent by Hsi-men Ch'ing to invite Li Kuei-chieh to join him. Only then did Kuei-chieh go into Yüeh-niang's room to put on new makeup and redo her face, after which she headed off for the summerhouse in the garden, where an Eight Immortals table had already been set up, the blinds had been lowered both in front and in back, and the table had been spread with a variety of delicacies.

There were two large platters of roast pork, two platters of roast duck, two platters of newly pan-fried fresh shad, four saucers of rose-flavored pastries, two saucers of boiled chicken and bamboo shoots, and two saucers of boiled squab. These were followed by four saucers of chitterlings, blood pudding, pork tripe, fermented sausage, and the like.

As the company proceeded to eat for a while, Kuei-chieh stood by their side, replenishing the wine cups.

"I say this in your father's hearing," Ying Po-chüeh said to her, "and I'm not just giving you a hard time, but that affair of yours has already been taken care of satisfactorily. Your father has also spoken on your behalf to the district yamen, so they're no longer looking for you. And who do you have to thank for this but yours truly? It was only after I had repeatedly begged your father to intervene that he consented to do so. Do you suppose he would ever have taken the initiative in pulling strings on your behalf for no good reason? Choose whatever you like from your repertoire of songs, and sing one for me to enjoy as I drink my wine. It would be a case of making up for my efforts with one of your own."

Kuei-chieh laughed at this and cursed him, saying, "You crazy indecent beggar!

With the bigness of a flea,

How much face have you got,

that Father would believe anything you said?"

"Why you lousy little whore!" retorted Ying Po-chüeh.

"Before the sutra has even been recited,

You start to take the stick to the monk.

If you want something to eat,

You shouldn't offend the cook.

You may think that since:

A monk has no mother-in-law,

Being but a solitary male,

I can't handle the likes of you. You little whore! You'd better not take me for a joke.

Though only half functional,¹⁴

I'd still be up to the job."

At this, Kuei-chieh whacked him twice, as hard as she could, with the handle of the fan in her hand.

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed and cursed him, saying, "You dog! In the future:

Your sons will be thieves and your daughters whores, thanks only to the example you set for them."

They laughed at this for a while before Kuei-chieh finally picked up her p'ip'a, held it horizontally across her knees:

Opened her ruby lips,

Exposed her white teeth, and proceeded to sing a song suite beginning with the tune “Three Terraces Song from I-chou”:

I think of how flagrantly you have betrayed my love,
How you have forgotten our vows of devotion.
On fine occasions such as flowery mornings and moonlit evenings,¹⁵
You have caused me to waste the springtime of my youth.
Depressed as can be, I lean upon the balustrade,
Gazing fixedly into the distance, but there is no news of you at all.
Again and again I think to myself,
It must just be that my lot is meager and my fate fickle.

To the tune “Yellow Oriole”:

Who could have anticipated such a thing?

Ying Po-chüeh interpolated, “Though a boat were to capsize in your open drain, ten years might pass without your knowing it.”

My fragrant flesh has been reduced,
Distress has rendered me emaciated.

Ying Po-chüeh said, “No matter how much you love him, and yearn for him, he’s left you in the gutter.”

My image in the mirror is covered with dust, and I am loath to improve it.
I am sparing of rouge and powder,
And too indolent to stick flowers in my hair.
The mascara on my eyebrows vainly accentuates the resentment of spring peaks.

Ying Po-chüeh said, “You remember the sayings:
Though I’ve taken a thousand comers,
My feelings are concentrated on one.
Silently I face the mirror, giving vent to long sighs.
I am half enamored of you, and half resentful of you.”¹⁶

The two of you got along well enough at the outset, but now you’re anticipating surprise and suffering fear on his account. Enough of that. Give over your resentment.”

“You’re delirious,” protested Kuei-chieh. “How can you talk such nonsense?”

The hardest thing to bear,

“If you can’t bear it,” interjected Ying Po-chüeh, “how could anyone else be expected to?”

Is the bugle on the watchtower,
The dying notes of which are enough to break one’s heart.

“It’s not your heart that’s broken,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “but the strings by which your puppeteer manipulates you. The two of you are no longer able to perform together.”

At this, Kuei-chieh gave him a whack as hard as she could and cursed him, saying, “You lousy dog-fucked beast! You’re delirious today. All you do is try to provoke people.”

To the tune “A Gathering of Worthy Guests”:

All is silent within my secluded window and the moon is bright;
In my resentment, I lean alone against the standing screen.¹⁷
Suddenly I hear a solitary wild goose cry outside my bower,
Which only serves to reawaken the sorrow of separation.
The watches are long and the clepsidra never-ending.¹⁸
Before I know it, the lamp grows dim, the incense burns out,¹⁹ and I am unable to get to sleep,
While, wherever he may be, he is sleeping soundly.

“You silly little whore!” remarked Ying Po-chüeh. “Why shouldn’t he be sleeping soundly? Not having been hustled off anywhere, he’s happily asleep at home, while you’ve had to hide out at someone else’s place, feeling as agitated as a sheepskin drum every day, awaiting the arrival of someone from the Eastern Capital before you can feel that:

The stone on your head has finally fallen to the ground.”

Kuei-chieh was so disturbed by this banter that she exclaimed, “Father, just look at the way Beggar Ying here is carrying on, persisting in pestering me, I don’t know why.”

“It’s about time you got around to acknowledging your father,” said Ying Po-chüeh; but Kuei-chieh ignored him and, plucking her p’i-p’a, continued to sing.

To the tune “Alliterations and Rhymes”:

When I think of him,
When I think of him,
How can I help taking it to heart?

“Since he scratches you where you itch,” interjected Ying Po-chüeh, “you can’t help taking it to heart.”

When there is no one around,
When there is no one around,
My teardrops silently cascade.

“There was once a man,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “who habitually wet his bed. One day his mother died, and, as an expression of his filiality, he set up a bunk in front of her spirit tablet. Having gotten to sleep late, who could have anticipated that he would, once again, wet his bed. When someone came in and, noticing that the mattress was wet, asked how it had happened, he was at a loss for words and only replied, ‘You wouldn’t understand, but I consigned my tears to my stomach, and they overflowed.’ Your case is analogous to his. Since you can’t refer to him in the open, all you can do is cry over him in secret.”

“You shameless pip-squeak!” protested Kuei-chieh. “You were an eyewitness, I suppose. You’re delirious.”

I blame him,
I blame him,
More than words can tell.

“As to that,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “I’ve got something else to say. You might just as well blame Heaven. Who knows how much money you’ve made off him already? And today, now that you’re reduced to hiding out at someone else’s place, your business has been disrupted ‘more than words can tell.’ Your affectation is about as incongruous as a left-hand Gate God masquerading with a white face.²⁰ Who do you think you’re going to fool with that rigma-role?”

Who could have known, when he was here, that he would be so elusive?

“You might have known,” commented Ying Po-chüeh, “that though you thought you had him in hand, he might still fly away.”

My only regret is that, to begin with, I ought not to have taken him so seriously.

“You silly little whore!” remarked Ying Po-chüeh. “Nowadays, around here, you couldn’t fool a three-year-old child with that stuff, let alone a habitu   of the world of breeze and moonlight. So you took him seriously, did you? Just you wait a minute, while I sing a song for you, to the tune ‘A Southern Branch’:

As for the realm of breeze and moonlight, let me explain it to you.
Nowadays, there is no distinguishing between true and false.
Each and every denizen of that world is a downright degenerate;
Each and every denizen of that world is a practiced old hand.
Their arts are designed only to bury you alive, making blind scapegoats of you.
The old procuress is only out to make money;
While the young whore has no choice but to stick her neck out and forge ahead.
It is bitter enough to make her jump into the river;
It is sad enough to make her want to seek out a well.
She wonders when her crock of bad karma will ever be full,
So that even if she is reborn as a donkey or horse,
She will not have to continue in this line of work.”

By this time, his raillery had reduced Kuei-chieh to tears, and Hsi-men Ch’ing intervened by giving Ying Po-chüeh a whack on the head with his fan, laughing as he cursed him, saying, “You insensitive dog! You simply insist on plaguing people to death.”

He then turned to Kuei-chieh and said, “Go ahead and sing. Don’t pay any attention to him.”

“Brother Ying,” chimed in Hsieh Hsi-ta, “Don’t be such a killjoy. Today:

Trying first this and then that, you’ve devoted yourself exclusively to offending this goddaughter of mine. If you say another word, may you develop a huge boil on your mouth.”

After some time had elapsed, Li Kuei-chieh picked up her p’i-p’a and continued to sing, to the tune “Mustering the Palace Guard”:

Everyone said that he was trustworthy,

Ying Po-chüeh was about to say something, but Hsieh Hsi-ta put his hand over his mouth and said, “Kuei-chieh, go ahead and sing. Don’t pay any attention to him.”

Li Kuei-chieh then continued to sing:

But he turns out to have been bent only on seduction.
His eyes were wide open,
But his heart and his mouth were not in agreement.²¹

Hsieh Hsi-ta having removed his hand, Ying Po-chüeh resumed his commentary, saying, “If they had been in agreement it would have been a good thing. This affair might never have occurred. Your hearts and mouths may not have been in agreement, but your tiger’s mouths²² were certainly responsive enough. Though not many, at least two or three cones of moxa were burnt there.”²³

“How can you be so:

Barefaced and red-eyed?”

protested Kuei-chieh. “You were an eyewitness, I suppose.”

“I may not have seen it with my own eyes,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “but it took place in the Star of Joy Bordello, did it not?”

The whole company, including Hsi-men Ch’ing, couldn’t help laughing at this.

Swearing to be as faithful as the hills and seas,
He spoke falsehood while alleging truth.²⁴
I nearly made the mistake of contracting a case of lovesickness on his account.

“What a silly creature!” said Ying Po-chüeh.
“People may buy things by mistake,
But nobody sells things by mistake.
You denizens of the quarter are hardly likely to contract any diseases by mistake.”

That unfaithful lover,
Judging from the way he's been carrying on,
What kind of a future will he allow me to have?

“You may not be able to expect much in the way of a future,” remarked Ying Po-chüeh, “but someday he is bound to inherit the rank of Imperial Commissioner.”

To the tune “An Amber Cat Pendant”:

Every day we are estranged we grow further apart.²⁵
How will we ever meet again?
It is in vain that, in my infatuation, I have been content to patiently wait.

“How long must you wait, after all?” asked Ying Po-chüeh. “In the days to come, once this affair in the Eastern Capital is taken care of, it won't be too late to relight the furnace.”

My dreams of clouds and rain on Witch's Mountain²⁶ are unlikely to be fulfilled.
You fickle fellow,
As far as this life is concerned,
The phoenix and its mate are destined to part,²⁷
The phoenix and its mate are destined to part.

CODA:

Lover of mine, you've shown yourself to be altogether too fickle.
You've found it possible to give me up, leaving me all alone.
Our love in a previous incarnation has turned into nothing but a painted pastry.²⁸

When she had finished singing, Hsieh Hsi-ta said, “That's enough. That's enough. Let Hua-t'ung take away her p'i-p'a, so I can reward her labors by presenting her with a cup of wine.”

“And I'll offer her a serving of food,” said Ying Po-chüeh. “My talents may not amount to much, but at least it would be a case of making up for her efforts with one of my own.”

“Get out of here, you beggar!” said Li Kuei-chieh. “Why should anyone pay attention to you?

First you beat a person with your big fists,
And then you rub the bruises with your hand.”

At this juncture, Hsieh Hsi-ta proffered Kuei-chieh three cups of wine in a row and then pulled Ying Po-chüeh aside, saying, “We still have those two games of backgammon to complete.”

Thereupon, the two of them resumed playing backgammon, while Hsimen Ch'ing tipped Kuei-chieh a wink and then got up to leave the room.

“Brother,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “if you're going to the rear compound, send some breath-sweetening lozenges out to us, would you. We ate all that garlic a little while ago, and now it's paying us back by eructing in an unpleasant way.”

“Where would I get any breath-sweetening lozenges from?” said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

“Brother, who do you think you're fooling?” said Ying Po-chüeh. “I happen to know that school official named Liu from Hang-chou has sent you a considerable quantity of them. It would hardly be fitting for you to consume them all by yourself.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this and proceeded to head for the rear compound. Li Kuei-chieh also disappeared outside, where she stood next to the T'ai-hu rockery and pretended to busy herself picking flowers to wear in her hair. Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta played three games of backgammon in a row while waiting for Hsi-men Ch'ing to return, but he did not appear.

When they asked Hua-t'ung, “What is your father doing in the rear compound?” he replied, “Father went back to the rear compound but came right out again.”

“If he came right out again,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “where could he have gone?”

Then, turning to Hsieh Hsi-ta, he said, “You stay sitting here while I go have a look for him.”

Hsieh Hsi-ta then proceeded to play a game of elephant chess with Shut'ung on the surface of the desk.

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing, after paying a visit to Li P'ing-erh's quarters, had come outside and was standing under the banksia rose arbor, when he caught sight of Li Kuei-chieh, pulled her into the “snow cave” in the Hidden Spring Grotto, and closed the door; whereupon the two of them sat down on a low couch to chat. The fact is that Hsi-men Ch'ing, upon ducking into Li P'ing-erh's quarters, had taken a dose of the aphrodisiac before coming out again. Taking Kuei-chieh onto his lap and settling her down upon his thighs, he proceeded, without more ado, to expose his organ for her to see, which gave her quite a start.

“How on earth did you make it as big as that?” she asked.

Hsi-men Ch'ing told her the whole story about the Indian monk's medication and then started out by having her:

Bend low her powdered neck,
Gently part her scarlet lips, and suck him off for a while. After that, he lightly lifted her two tiny golden lotuses, that were:
But half a span in length,
Barely three inches long,

With handsome heel lifts,
Vying with lotus buds,
Fit to tread fragrant dust, or Pirouette upon an emerald disk,²⁹
Beloved of thousands,
Craved by tens of thousands, and hung them over his arms to either side. She had on scarlet shoes of plain silk with high white satin heels, and figured ankle leggings with gold borders, the ends of which were tied in place with lengths of sand-green cord. He then carried her over to a chair, where the two of them started to go at it.

Who would have thought that Ying Po-chüeh, having looked for Hsi-men Ch'ing in every one of the pavilions in the garden without finding him, passed through the miniature Dripping Emerald Cavern, came down to the banksia rose arbor, went around the grape arbor, and arrived at the Hidden Spring Grotto, deep among the pines and bamboos. Here he faintly overheard the sound of people laughing, though he wasn't sure where it was coming from. Ying Po-chüeh then slowly proceeded with:

Skulking step and lurking gait,³⁰ to lift aside the portiere, exposing the fact that the two leaves of the door were ajar, and, taking his stand immediately outside, devoted himself to eavesdropping on the scene within.

Ying Po-chüeh Intrudes on a Spring Beauty in the Grotto

He overheard Kuei-chieh, calling out in a quavery voice as she responded with her body to the movements of Hsi-men Ch'ing,

"Daddy, finish off as quickly as you can. I'm afraid someone may come along."

At this, Ying Po-chüeh, giving vent to a loud cry, suddenly pushed open the door and burst in. Seeing that Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had Kuei-chieh's legs hoisted over his arms as she laid back on the chair, was just in the thick of things, he said, "Quickly, fetch some water to splash on them. The two rutting creatures have gotten themselves stuck together."

"You crazy chunk of knife-bait!" protested Li Kuei-chieh. "Breaking in on us that way, you've given me quite a start."

"Finish off as quickly as you can, eh?" said Ying Po-chüeh. "It's not as easy as all that. You've got to wait until things run their course, after all. You no sooner expressed the fear that someone might catch you in the act, than I turned up. Come over here, and let me have a share of the take."

"You crazy dog!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Get out of here immediately, and stop pestering me. I fear a page boy may come by and see us."

"You little whore!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "You'd better consent to entreat me nicely, or I'll raise such a hue and cry that even the ladies in the rear compound will hear what's going on. You've already been acknowledged as an adopted daughter by the First Lady, and she's kindly agreed to let you hide out here for a day or two, and here you are carrying on an affair with her husband. If she were to find out, you'd never hear the end of it."

"Get out of here, you crazy beggar!" responded Kuei-chieh.

"I'll go," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but not before snatching a kiss."

Thereupon, holding Kuei-chieh in place, he gave her a kiss before starting outside.

"You crazy dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Aren't you even going to put the latch on the door?"

Ying Po-chüeh came back to put the latch on the door and said, "My son, the two of you can just fuck away, fuck away to your heart's content. You can knock the bottom out of her for all I care. It's no concern of mine."

He had gotten no further than the pine tree outside, when he came back and said, "As for those breath-sweetening lozenges that you promised me a while ago, where are they?"

"You crazy dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Just wait a little while and I'll see that you get them, that's all. Why continue to pester us?"

Only then did Ying Po-chüeh take his leave, laughing as he went.

"What an obnoxious chunk of knife-bait!" exclaimed Kuei-chieh.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh continued to carry on with each other in the "snow cave" for a good two hours until, by eating a red date,³¹ he was finally able to finish off, with the result that:

The rain evaporated and the clouds dispersed.³²

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Among the crab apple boughs, orioles dart quickly to and fro;
In the shade of green bamboos, swallows parley incessantly.
Even if one were to entrust the scene to a skillful painter;
This picture of spring beauty could never be properly depicted.³³

In a little while, the two of them straightened their clothing and ventured outside. Kuei-chieh reached into Hsi-men Ch'ing's sleeve and groped out a quantity of breath-sweetening lozenges, which she proceeded to secrete in her own sleeve. Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had so exerted himself that:

His whole body was bathed in fragrant sweat,³⁴

And he couldn't help panting and puffing, went over under the flowering lantana to urinate, while Kuei-chieh, for her part, groped out a mirror from about her person, put it on the sill of the moon window, in order to:

Arrange her cloudy locks and adjust her tresses, after which, she went back to the rear compound. Hsi-men Ch'ing went into Li P'ing-erh's quarters to wash his hands, and when he came out to rejoin his company, Ying Po-chüeh demanded the breath-sweetening lozenges.

"You crazy beggar!" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You must be splenetic! How can you persist in pestering people so?"

He then handed a few lozenges to each of them, at which Ying Po-chüeh complained, "You're only giving me these measly couple of them, are you? Never mind. Never mind. I'll just have to ask that little whore from the Li Family Establishment for some."

As they were speaking, who should they see but Li Ming, who came in and kowtowed to them.

"Li Ming," said Ying Po-chüeh, "where have you come from? You haven't heard anything about how this affair of theirs is going, have you?"

"As for this Kuei-chieh of ours," said Li Ming, "thanks to the intervention of Father here, no one has come pressing us about her for the last couple of days. They are just waiting for word from the capital of the final disposition of the case."

"Has that young woman from the Ch'i Family Establishment come out of hiding yet?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"Ch'i Hsiang-erh is still hiding out in the home of Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family," said Li Ming. "It's a good thing that Kueichieh is here at Father's place. Who would dare to come looking for her here?"

"Were that not the case," said Ying Po-chüeh, "she'd be in a pretty pickle. She has only to thank myself and Master Hsieh here, who repeatedly pointed out to your patron that if he didn't consent to intervene on her behalf, where was she to go for succor?"

"If Father here had refused to intervene," said Li Ming, "there would have been no end to the matter. This Auntie Li the Third of ours conducts her business in such a haphazard way, there's no telling what the outcome might have been."

"I recollect," said Ying Po-chüeh, "that her birthday is coming up any day now. We'll get together with your patron here, and help to celebrate her birthday."

"There's no need for you gentlemen to do that," said Li Ming. "Once this affair is concluded, you can be sure that Auntie Li the Third and Kuei-chieh will ask you gentlemen over for a visit."

"When the time comes, then," said Ying Po-chüeh, "we can celebrate her birthday after the fact."

He then summoned Li Ming to come forward and said to him, “You drink this cup of wine for me. I’ve been drinking all day and can’t handle any more.”

Li Ming accepted the silver goblet with handles that was proffered to him, knelt down, and:

Drained it in one gulp.

Hsieh Hsi-ta also told Ch’in-t’ung to pour out a goblet of wine and offer it to him.

“You probably haven’t had anything to eat yet,” said Ying Po-chüeh. “There’s still a plate of pastries left over on the table there.”

Hsieh Hsi-ta also picked up two platters of braised pig’s head and roast duck and handed them to him.

Li Ming accepted them with both hands and was in the process of retiring to eat them, when Ying Po-chüeh detached a half-section of shad with his chopsticks and offered it to him, saying, “It seems to me that you are unlikely to have eaten anything like this so far this year. Have a taste of something new.”

“You crazy dog!” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “You might as well let him have the whole thing to eat. What do you want to keep it around for?”

“In a little while,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “if the wine should run out, I might be hungry and wouldn’t be satisfied to eat rice. This fish of yours from Chiang-nan is only in season once a year. If it gets stuck in the cracks between your teeth, when you manage to extricate it, it is still fragrant. It’s not easy to come by. To tell the truth, I doubt if it is available even at court. Where else are you likely to find it except at Brother’s place here?”

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Hua-t’ung, who came in carrying four saucers of fresh things in season, one saucer of black caltrops, one saucer of water chestnuts, one saucer of snowy lotus root, and one saucer of loquats. Before Hsi-men Ch’ing even had a chance to put any of these in his mouth, Ying Po-chüeh proceeded to snatch away whole saucers full and dump them into his sleeve.

“You’d better leave a couple of them for me,” protested Hsieh Hsi-ta, taking advantage of the opportunity to appropriate the saucer of black caltrops, leaving only the lotus root on the table.

Hsi-men Ch’ing managed to pick up a single piece and put it in his mouth, leaving the remainder for Li Ming to eat.

He then directed Hua-t’ung, “Bring another two loquats back from the rear compound and give them to Li Ming.”

Li Ming put these in his sleeve, saying, “When I get home I’ll share them with Auntie Li the Third.”

Only after Li Ming had finished eating the fare provided for him did he rejoin the company, take up his psaltery, and prepare to sing.

“Sing us that song suite that begins with the tune” The Herbaceous Peony Enclosure,” said Ying Po-chüeh.

After tuning the strings of his psaltery, Li Ming, doing his best to show off the quality of his voice, sang:

By the pond with its new verdure,
I suddenly strike the balustrade;
With whom can I discuss what’s in my heart?
The flowers have nothing to say,
The butterflies have nothing to say;
The frustration of separation fills my breast,³⁵ entangling my feelings.
I resent the Lord of the East’s unwillingness to retain the parting guest.
I sigh at the dancing red blossoms and drifting catkins,
Lightly sprinkled with the powder of butterfly wings.
The scene remains the same,
Things remain the same,
But, sadly, I no longer see my lover’s face.

To the tune “Autumn Geese on the Frontier”:

When we parted from each other it was early spring.
The flowering crab apples had just begun to bloom,
Their buds barely open and intermittently visible.
Imperceptibly, the pomegranate blossoms burst,
The red lotus flowers were in bloom,
Iced fruits were submerged,
And silk fans were waved to avoid the heat.
In no time at all, the chrysanthemums were yellow,
The metallic autumn wind began to blow,
The dead leaves were scattered,
And the foliage of the phoenix tree changed color.
Before long, the wintersweet was in bloom,
Frozen flakes were falling,
And people were mulling wine within heated chambers.
The scenes presented by the four seasons are multifarious,
Even to think of them is to be enraptured.
But I don’t know where that handsome lover of mine,
Out in the cold,
All by himself,
Deeply depressed,
Is enduring his lonely resentment.

To the tune “Redoubled Joy in the Golden Palace”:

I sigh with resentment.
It has always been true that romance leads young people astray.
How can I bear that it is late spring again?
I dread the twilight hours,
Grieve at the twilight hours;
All by myself, I am too depressed to enjoy anything.
Though I were to fumigate my bedding with rare incense, with whom would I share it?
I sigh that the night is long, my pillow is cold, and my coverlet is chill.³⁶
You sleep alone,

I sleep alone,
Only in dreams can we meet.

To the tune “The Peddler”:

One day, should our lifelong desires ever be fulfilled,
We will be united as husband and wife;
Heaven be thanked.
That would make a happy marriage affinity in this incarnation,
Rather than being out in the cold, suffering from loneliness,
Or being sunk deep in depression, enduring misfortune.

To the tune “Exhilarated by Peace” (Coda):³⁷

Solely on account of that impassioned karmic encumbrance of mine,
I am today troubled with resentment and entangled in emotion.³⁸
I think how, beneath the stars, we first swore oaths of fidelity by the hills and seas,
Which only served as an impediment during the romantic years of my youth.
If, one day, we should ever be united in wedlock like the morning clouds and evening rain,³⁹
Enjoy the singing and dancing in decorated halls⁴⁰ during a joyous wedding feast,
Celebrate a perpetual reunion within silk screens and brocaded curtains,
Where our enamored branches may intertwine amidst the painted candles of the nuptial chamber,⁴¹
We must never forget the abundance of misfortunes that we have had to endure.⁴²

That day the three of them continued to drink until the lamps were lighted and, even then, waited until some congee made with polished rice, flavored with mung beans, had been brought out from the rear compound for them to eat before preparing to depart.

“Brother,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “are you busy tomorrow?”

“Tomorrow,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “I'm going to pay a visit to the estate of Eunuch Director Liu, the manager of the Imperial Brickyard. Yesterday, Secretary An Ch'en and Secretary Huang Pao-kuang invited me there for a banquet, and I have to get an early start.”

“With regard to that matter concerning Li the Third and Huang the Fourth,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “I'll arrange with them to come the day after tomorrow then.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing nodded his head and instructed him to have them come on the afternoon of that day, and not to show up any earlier. His two guests then made their departure, without waiting to be seen off. Hsi-men Ch'ing told Shu-t'ung to clear away the utensils and then went back to the rear compound, where he spent the night in Meng Yü-lou's quarters. Concerning that evening there is nothing more to relate.⁴³

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing got up early and did not go to the yamen. Having eaten some congee, he donned his official cap and girdle, mounted his horse, holding a gold-flecked fan in his hand, and, followed by a retinue of servants, made his way to Eunuch Director Liu's estate thirty li outside the South Gate to attend the banquet. On this occasion, both Shu-t'ung and Tai-an accompanied him. But no more of this.

P'an Chin-lien, taking advantage of Hsi-men Ch'ing's absence from the house, made plans with Li P'ing-erh to take the three mace of silver that Ch'en Ching-chi had forfeited, together with the seven mace that Li P'ing-erh had agreed to add, and get Lai-hsing to buy one roast duck, two chickens, a mace of silver's worth of other dishes to go with the rice, a jug of Chin-hua wine, a bottle of distilled spirits, and a mace of silver's worth of square, stuffed glutinous rice cakes, to be served cold. These foodstuffs were all properly prepared by Lai-hsing's wife, Hui-hsiu.

Chin-lien said to Yüeh-niang, “The other day Hsi-men Ta-chieh won three mace of silver from our son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, at a game of cards, and our sister Li P'ing-erh has augmented this with an additional seven mace of silver. Today we would like to play host, and invite our sister to enjoy a repast with us in the garden.”

Wu Yüeh-niang, accordingly, along with Meng Yü-lou, Li Chiao-erh, Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and Li Kuei-chieh, joined P'an Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh and started out by feasting for a while in the summerhouse. Afterward, taking what was left of the food and wine with them, they made their way up the artificial hill to the highest point in the garden, the Cloud Repose Pavilion, where they proceeded to amuse themselves by playing board games and “pitch-pot.”

Meng Yü-lou, along with Li Chiao-erh, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and Sun Hsüeh-o, then ascended the Flower-Viewing Tower, where they leaned over the balustrade, from which they could see extending below them, in front of the artificial hill:

The tree peony grove,
The garden peony bed,
The crab apple bower,
The seven sisters trellis,
The banksia rose arbor,
And the rosa rugosa shrubs.

Truly:

All four seasons produce their never-fading flowers;
All eight festivals appear one everlasting spring.

After they had enjoyed the scene for a while, they came back down to the Cloud Repose Pavilion, where Hsiao-yü and Ying-ch'un were waiting on Yüeh-niang, pouring the wine and serving the food.

Yüeh-niang suddenly remarked, “Today I forgot to invite Master Ch'en.”

“Today,” said Hsi-men Ta-chieh, “Father has once again sent him to Hsü the Fourth's shop outside the city gate, to dun him for the silver he owes him. He should be back any time now.”

It was not long before Ch'en Ching-chi presented himself:

His body clad in a gown of jet velour,
His feet shod in sandals and white socks,
His head adorned with a tasseled "tile-ridge" hat,
Held in place with a gold hairpin.

After making his bow of greeting to Yüeh-niang and the rest, he pulled Hsimen Ta-chieh aside and sat down with her.

Addressing himself to Yüeh-niang, he said, "I've brought the final payment of silver from Hsü the Fourth's place back with me. It's in five sealed packages, two hundred fifty taels in all. I delivered it to the master suite, and Yü-hsiao has put it away."

Thereupon:

With the raising of glasses and passing of cups,
Several rounds of wine were consumed, and
Their faces all took on the glint of spring.⁴⁴

Yüeh-niang went back to playing board games with Li Chiao-erh and Li Kueichieh, while Meng Yü-lou, Li P'ing-erh, Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and Ch'en Ching-chi sauntered about enjoying the flowers and verdant foliage.

Chin-lien wandered off by herself, behind the artificial hill, among a thick grove of plantains, where she amused herself by batting at the butterflies with the round white-silk fan in her hand.

Unexpectedly, Ch'en Ching-chi, who had surreptitiously crept up behind her, abruptly addressed her, saying, "Fifth Lady, you don't know how to go about batting a butterfly. Let me show you how it's done. These butterflies are just like you, they've got:

The mind of a ball,
Bobbing up, bobbing down, elusive creatures that they are."

Chin-lien swiveled her powdered neck, gave him a sidelong glance, and berated him with a laugh, saying, "You dead duck of a lousy short-life! Who needs you to bat butterflies for them? If anyone should overhear you, you'd be done for: though I suppose you're too far gone to care. Having knocked back several goblets of wine, you've come here to pester me, have you?"

She then went on to ask, "What about those handkerchiefs you undertook to buy for me?"

Ch'en Ching-chi, with an ingratiating smile, reached into his sleeve, pulled them out, and handed them to her, saying, "I've got the Sixth Lady's here too."

"Now that I've delivered the handkerchiefs," he went on to say, "what are you prepared to give me in return?"

Thereupon, he put his face up to hers; to which Chin-lien responded by giving him a shove.

Though neither of them realized it, Li P'ing-erh, carrying Kuan-ko in her arms, and accompanied by the wet nurse, happened to come along from the other side of the juniper hedge and caught sight of Chin-lien and Ch'en Ching-chi flirting together and batting butterflies.

When she saw that no one was looking, she stepped nimbly into the grotto in the artificial hill, from which she suddenly emerged, crying out, "Why don't the two of you bat a butterfly for Kuan-ko's amusement?"

This threw P'an Chin-lien into such consternation, fearing that Li P'ing-erh might have caught them out, that she calculatedly inquired, "Has Son-in-law Ch'en given you the handkerchiefs you requested from him, or not?"

"No, he hasn't given them to me yet," Li P'ing-erh replied.

"He had them in his sleeve," said Chin-lien, "but didn't feel comfortable giving them to us in front of Hsi-men Ta-chieh, so he slipped them to me unobtrusively, just now."

The two of them then sat down together on the stone border of the flower bed, opened the package, and divided the handkerchiefs between them.

Chin-lien, having noticed that Kuan-ko had a white drawnwork handkerchief fastened around his neck, while he sucked on a plum that he was holding in his hand, asked, "Is that one of your handkerchiefs?"

Li P'ing-erh said, "It's one that his senior mother put around his neck, just now, when she saw that he was sucking on a plum, the juice of which was dripping onto him."

The two of them continued to sit together beneath the grove of plantains.

"This place is really quite shady and cool," said Li P'ing-erh. "Let's sit here and enjoy it for a while."

She then directed Ju-i, "You go and get Ying-ch'un to fetch the child's little pillow from my quarters, and also bring the cool bamboo bed mat, so we can put him down here for a nap. Also tell her to bring a set of dominoes, so I can play a game of dominoes with the Fifth Lady here. You can stay there and look after the place."

Ju-i went off on this errand, and, before long, Ying-ch'un showed up with the pillow and mat, as well as the set of dominoes. Li P'ing-erh arranged the mat and laid Kuan-ko down on his little pillow, where he was left to amuse himself while she played dominoes with Chin-lien. After they had been playing for a while, she told Ying-ch'un to go back to her quarters and boil a pot of fine tea for them.

Who could have anticipated that Meng Yü-lou, from her vantage point at the balustrade of the Cloud Repose Pavilion, caught sight of them and waved to Li P'ing-erh with her hand, saying, "Elder Sister has something to say to you. She'll be right there."

Li P'ing-erh, abandoning her child, whom she entrusted to Chin-lien's care, responded, "I'll be right there."

Chin-lien, however, who was preoccupied by the fact that Ch'en Ching-chi was still lurking in the grotto, was scarcely concerned about the welfare of the child, but seized the opportunity to step nimbly through the door of the grotto, locate Ch'en Ching-chi, and say to him, "There's no one else around. You can come out now."

Ch'en Ching-chi then called to the woman to come inside and see the mushroom, saying, "Some mushrooms with enormous heads have sprung up in here."⁴⁵

Having thus inveigled the woman into the grotto, he bent his knees, knelt down before her, and proposed that they indulge in the play of clouds and rain together. The two of them then embraced and began to kiss each other.

It so happens that:

As providence would have it, when Li P'ing-erh arrived at the Cloud Repose Pavilion, Wu Yüeh-niang said to her, "Sister Meng the Third has just lost a game of pitch-pot with Hsi-men Ta-chieh. Why don't you come and try your hand at a couple of pitches on her behalf?"

"There's no one down below to look after the child," said Li P'ing-erh.

"After all, Sister Six is there," said Meng Yü-lou. "What is there to be afraid of?"

"Sister Meng the Third," said Yüeh-niang, "why don't you go look after the child for her?"

"Third Lady," said Li P'ing-erh, "might I also trouble you to bring the baby back with you?"

She then turned to Hsiao-yü and said, "You go along with her, and bring the mat and his little pillow back with you."

When Hsiao-yü and Meng Yü-lou arrived beneath the grove of plantains, they found the baby lying on his back on the mat:

Gesticulating with both hands and feet, and screaming at the top of his voice, while Chin-lien was nowhere to be found. What should they see beside him but a large black cat, which, on seeing them arrive, disappeared in a puff of smoke.

"Where has the Fifth Lady gone?" exclaimed Meng Yü-lou. "Ai-ya! Ai-ya! She's left the child here all alone, and he's been terrified by a cat."

Chin-lien then emerged from the grotto to one side, saying, "I've just been in here relieving myself. Who's gone off anywhere? And how could any cat have terrified him? How can you be so:

Barefaced and red-eyed?"

Meng Yü-lou did not go into the grotto for a look but merely took Kuan-ko in her arms and devoted herself to petting him, as she made her way back up to the Cloud Repose Pavilion, while Hsiao-yü followed her with the pillow and mat. Chin-lien, who was afraid she might tell tales about her, stuck right to her tail.

P'an Chin-lien Inspects a Mushroom in the Flower Garden

"Why is the child crying?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"When I got there," said Meng Yü-lou, "there was a large black cat, from who knows where, crouched right beside the child's head."

"It must clearly have terrified the child," said Yüeh-niang.

"The Fifth Lady was looking after him," said Li P'ing-erh.

"Sister Six had gone into the grotto to relieve herself," said Meng Yü-lou.

Chin-lien stepped up at this point and said, "Yü-lou, how can you be so:

Barefaced and red-eyed?

Where would I have gotten a cat from? I imagine he must have been hungry and was crying to be breast-fed. You're just trying to lay the blame on me."

Li P'ing-erh saw that Ying-ch'un had come back with the tea and said to her, "Go summon the wet nurse so she can breast-feed the child."

Meanwhile, Ch'en Ching-chi, on seeing that the coast was clear, sneaked out of the grotto, made his way along the juniper hedge, rounded the corner of the summerhouse, and headed straight out the postern gate into the front compound. Truly:

With both hands he tore open the road between life and death;

Flopping over and leaping out through the gate to perdition.

Yüeh-niang, on seeing that the baby would not allow himself to be breastfed but continued to cry, said to Li P'ing-erh, "You carry him back to your quarters, and do what you can to get him to go to sleep."

Thereupon, the wine drinking came to an end, and the party broke up.

It so happens that Ch'en Ching-chi had failed in his attempt to make out with P'an Chin-lien.

Though they may have wished to emulate the billing swallows and cooing orioles;

The bee's antennae had no more than grazed the corolla of the flower.

His endeavor had not turned out propitiously, and when he returned to his anteroom in the front compound, he couldn't help muttering unhappily to himself. Truly:

Unable to help themselves,⁴⁶ the blossoms fall;

Conveying a sense of déjà vu,⁴⁷ the swallows return.⁴⁸

There is a song to the tune "Plucking the Cassia" that testifies to this:

I saw her rakishly sporting a spray of blossoms;
Smiling as she toyed with her spray of blossoms.
On her ruby lips she wore no rouge;
But looked as though she did wear rouge.
When we met the other day,
And then met again today;
She seemed to have feelings for me,
But displayed no feelings for me.
Though she wished to consent,
She never gave her consent.
It looked as though she refused me;
But she really never did refuse me.
When can we make another assignation;
When will we ever see each other again?
If we don't meet,
She may long for me;
When we do meet,
I still long for her.⁴⁹

Chapter 53 ¹

WU YÜEH-NIANG ENGAGES IN COITION

IN QUEST OF MALE PROGENY;

LI P'ING-ERH FULFILLS A VOW

IN ORDER TO SAFEGUARD HER SON

In this life, to have a son is the consummation of a myriad desires;²
After death, to leave behind no male heir is to have lived in vain.
If one should produce a dragon steed, one must endeavor to protect it;
If one hopes to bear a unicorn, one must enact good deeds in secret.
Praying to the gods, she is anxious to fulfill the promise of her vow;
By imbibing a potion, she hopes to be able to make her womb receptive.
Parents would do well to carry out their human obligations to the full;
But the good or bad luck that may result must be left to Azure Heaven.

THE STORY GOES that Wu Yüeh-niang, having spent some time amusing herself along with Li Chiao-erh, Li Kuei-chieh, Meng Yü-lou, Li P'ing-erh, Sun Hsüeh-o, P'an Chin-lien, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, began to feel somewhat fatigued, retired to her room, and took a nap.

When she awoke, around the first watch, she sent Hsiao-yü to say to Li P'ing-erh, "Has Kuan-ko stopped that unnatural crying of his? Have the wet nurse wrap him up carefully and coax him to sleep. Don't let anything disturb him into crying again."

The wet nurse, who was eating her supper on the k'ang, did not get down from her position but kept the child there beside her.

Li P'ing-erh said, "Thank the First Lady for me, and tell her that when we came back to my quarters, he kept on crying out loud and suffering from the cold shivers continuously, and he has only now stopped crying, cuddled up against the wet nurse's body, and fallen asleep. His forehead feels rather feverish, and the wet nurse is unwilling to move for fear of disturbing him. In a little while, I'm going to wake him, so he can have his evening feeding and relieve himself."

Hsiao-yü returned to the master suite and reported this information to Yüeh-niang.

"They're not taking things as seriously as they should," said Yüeh-niang. "How could she have left a little baby like that under the plantains, and just gone off somewhere else, so that he was scared to death by a cat? Only now are they:

Lamenting before the gods and weeping to ghosts.

At this rate, they're likely to do him some real harm before they come to their senses."

At that time, after expressing these few words of criticism, she washed her face and went to sleep for the night.

The next morning, when she got up:

Having nothing else to say, she sent Hsiao-yü to ask if Kuan-ko had been able to get any sleep during the remainder of the night, or not?

She also reported, "As soon as the First Lady has eaten her congee, she is planning to drop by and see how Kuan-ko is doing."

Li P'ing-erh said to Ying-ch'un, "The First Lady is about to come over here. Quickly, fetch me some water, so I can wash my face."

Ying-ch'un flew off on this errand and returned with the water for her to wash her face. Li P'ing-erh hastily combed her hair and ordered Ying-ch'un to heat some water for tea as quickly as possible, and to light some benzoin incense in the room.

Before they knew it, Hsiao-yü came in and announced, "The First Lady has entered your quarters."

This had the effect of causing Li P'ing-erh to jump up in consternation to greet Yüeh-niang and lead her to the wet nurse's bed, where she caressed Kuan-ko, saying as she did so, "What a hopeless little oily mouth! You're constantly taking your own mother and:

Dunking her in a water crock, for no good reason."

At this, Kuan-ko, with the sound of a gurgling cry, started to howl in earnest. Yüeh-niang made haste to playfully tease him for a while before he finally stopped.

Yüeh-niang then turned to Ju-i and said, "Since I haven't been able to have a child myself, this little bit of a boy is the only issue of our family. You can't afford to underestimate his importance. To get right down to it, you've simply got to look after him conscientiously."

The wet nurse Ju-i replied, "As to that, there is no need for the First Lady to instruct me any further."

Yüeh-niang was about to take her leave, when Li P'ing-erh said, "Now that the First Lady is here, I have had a cup of tea prepared. Won't you visit a while before leaving?"

Yüeh-niang then sat down and asked, "Sixth Lady, how is it that your hair is so mussed?"

Li P'ing-erh said, "It's all on account of the way this heartless enemy of mine has been:

Acting up and making trouble, that I haven't even had a chance to comb my hair. Then, when I heard that you were coming, I hastily twisted it into a knot and fitted the fret over it, without realizing what sort of laughable shape it was in."

"Just look at you!" exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "How unprincipled can you get? He's your own flesh and blood, to whom you've given birth, and yet you refer to him as your heartless enemy. While, as for me, though I long for such a heartless enemy all day long, I haven't been able to have one."

"It's just a manner of speaking," said Li P'ing-erh. "If only he weren't beset by all these spectral visitations, everything would be all right. But nowadays, I hardly get two or three days of peace without the occurrence of such an outbreak. The other day, when we visited the family graveyard, he was frightened by the gongs and drums. Not long after that, he started to cry like anything when he had his hair cut. And now he's been frightened once again by a cat. Other people's babies seem easy enough to raise, but this creature of mine turns out, contrarily, to be as fragile as a rush."

After they had chatted for a while, Yüeh-niang walked out of the room, and Li P'ing-erh followed behind her to see her off.

"Don't bother to see me off," said Yüeh-niang. "Go back inside and look after Kuan-ko."

Li P'ing-erh, accordingly, returned inside, while Yüeh-niang made her way back to the master suite.

As she did so, she overheard someone talking, as furtively as a thief trying to destroy evidence, on the other side of the screen-wall.

Yüeh-niang stopped to listen and, on peeking through a crack between the boards, saw that one of them was P'an Chin-lien, who was leaning on the balustrade, together with Meng Yü-lou, while she chattered away,³ in a subdued voice, saying, "Our elder sister really has no sense of decorum. Having no child of her own, when someone else bears a son, she insists to the point of befuddlement on claiming a specious intimacy, and sucking up to her in the most egregious way.⁴ It seems to me that:

Even the indigent should maintain their indigent spirit,

Just as the eminent should display their eminent spirit.

What's the point of playing up to her that way? When the child grows up, he will only acknowledge his natural mother, why should he acknowledge you?"

Who should pass by at this point but Ying-ch'un, which caused the two of them to slip off toward the rear compound, pretending to be looking for the cat in order to feed it.

Nothing might have happened if Yüeh-niang had not overheard this conversation, but having overheard these words:

Anger arose in her heart, and Resentment stiffened her jaw.

At the time, she would have liked to interrupt the conversation and call them to account, but since it was not something that could be solved by making a fuss, and would, instead, only have the effect of detracting from her own dignity, she chose to restrain herself. She went directly into her room and lay down on the bed, but she did not feel free to cry over the situation, lest the maidservants overhear her. All she could do was:

Complain silently to herself,⁵ giving vent to:

Long sighs as well as short.

Truly:

Even in her own home she dared not risk crying out too loudly,

Fearing lest the gibbons on hearing her should break their hearts.⁶

At that time, it was just high noon, and she had not yet gotten up.

Hsiao-yü stood beside her bed and said, "First Lady, won't you get up and have something to eat?"

"I'm not feeling well," said Yüeh-niang, "and don't want to eat anything, but you can close the door of the room, and prepare some tea for me."

Only after Hsiao-yü had brought in the tea did Yüeh-niang get up and sit disconsolately in her room, saying to herself, "Simply because I don't have a son of my own, I have to put up with all this annoyance at other people's hands. I have:

Besought Heaven and worshipped Earth, in the hope of obtaining one, so that I can shame those lousy whores to their fucking faces."

Thereupon, she went to the comb box on the dressing table in her inner room and got out the afterbirth of a firstborn male child that Nun Wang had provided, as well as the medication that Nun Hsüeh had procured for her, and saw that the sealed container in which they were enclosed was engraved with four characters that read:

An efficacious elixir for conceiving sons.

There was also an eight-line poem, which read:

Like Ch'ang-o who mischievously fled to the moon with the elixir of immortality;

This potion has obligingly appropriated the horn on the striped dragon's crown.

It has been sanctioned by the Peach Blossom Mandate of an emperor of the Han dynasty;⁷

And has also been ordained by the Bamboo Leaf Edict of a ruler of the Liang dynasty.⁸

In no time at all, once the medication starts to act, it will produce enviable results;

Even the elderly and decrepit will be rejuvenated, such are its praiseworthy effects.

Do not take it as something to enhance the joys of snow and flowers, breeze and moon;

Even the smallest amount will enable you to conceive a handsomely black-bearded son.

After this there was an encomium, which read:

Its flaming red color sparkles,
Exactly like coral that has been ground to powder;
Its fragrant redolence is dense,
Resembling that of newly ignited sandalwood or musk.
If you hold it in your mouth,
A sweet exudation will rise up about the base of your teeth;
If you place it in your palm,
A warm sensation will suffuse the area beneath your navel.
It will enable you to retain your essence and replenish your fluid;⁹
What need is there to seek the Magic Frost Pounded with a Jade Pestle?¹⁰
It will allow you to change a female embryo into a male embryo;¹¹
What need is there to look elsewhere for the Divine Bower Powder?¹²
Do not waste it on the chickens and dogs by your alchemical furnace;¹³
It is meant to enhance the joys of mandarin ducks beneath the quilt.
If you ingest it when the spirit moves you,
It will produce the dream of an azure dragon;¹⁴
If you act upon it when the time is ripe,
It will engender the omen of a flying swallow.¹⁵
Those who seek to bear a son may accomplish their objective with a single try;
Those who wish to achieve transcendence can become immortals in a hundred days.

After this there were some further directions, which read:

Anything damaging to the brain, or harmful to the blood stream,
Should be strictly avoided.
Radishes as well as spring onions should also be avoided.
If you engage in intercourse on an odd day you will conceive a son;
If you engage in intercourse on an even day you will conceive a daughter;
You may do as your heart desires.
If you take this medication for a year,
You may achieve everlasting life.

When Yüeh-niang had finished reading this material, she felt a sense of pleasure gradually arise in her heart. Observing that the container was tightly sealed:

With slender tapering fingers,
She delicately prized it open.

When she unfolded the packet within and took a look, she found that it consisted of three or four layers of “black gold paper,”¹⁶ wrapped around a single bolus of medication, the exterior of which was attractively decorated with gold-flecked vermillion. Yüeh-niang placed it in the palm of her hand and, sure enough, she felt a warm sensation arise below her navel. She then held it next to her nose and, sure enough, becoming moist:

Her mouth was filled with sweet spittle.

With a smile, Yüeh-niang said to herself, “This Nun Hsüeh must really be a person of exemplary conduct. Who knows where she must have gone to locate such a:

Marvelous medicine and efficacious elixir?

It must be that I am fated to conceive, since I have come upon such a fine medication, but who knows?”

After toying with the medication for a while, fearing lest it might lose its efficacy, she hastily fetched some paste and sealed it up tightly as before, went back into her inner room, and locked it up inside her comb box.

Strolling out onto the veranda, she gazed up to Heaven and gave a long sigh, saying, “Should this woman, née Wu, tomorrow, which is a jen-tzu day, take this medication of Nun Hsüeh's and succeed in conceiving a son to perpetuate the ancestral rites of the Hsi-men house, so that she does not end up as a ghost with no one to sacrifice to it, my gratitude to August Heaven will know no bounds.”

By that time, the day was drawing to a close, and Yüeh-niang finally had something to eat, but there is nothing more to say about this.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived at Eunuch Director Liu's estate that day, he sent in his card, and the servants informed Secretary Huang Pao-kuang and Secretary An Ch'en, who came out together to meet him. They were both formally attired in their official caps and girdles.

When they had exchanged the customary greetings and sat down, Secretary Huang Pao-kuang opened the proceedings by saying, “The other day, motivated by admiration of your great fame, we presumed to visit you unceremoniously but did not expect to put you to such great expense.”

“I fear I was guilty of treating you remissly,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

“On that occasion,” said Secretary An Ch'en, “we were on our way to respond to an invitation from our fellow graduate, Prefect Hu Shih-wen, and were therefore compelled to take our leave rather precipitously. But:

The profound sentiments of our host,¹⁷ still resonate in our hearts. Today it is only appropriate that we should enjoy ourselves fully until break of day.”

“I am deeply affected by your lavish hospitality,” responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After a “gate boy” had announced in a low voice that the feast was fully prepared, Hsi-men Ch'ing was invited to repair to the summerhouse, where they divested themselves of their official caps and girdles and proceeded to take their seats. Hsi-men Ch'ing was ushered to the seat of honor where, after a pro forma demurrer, he consented to sit down.

A singing boy then came forward and sang a song to the tune “Embroidered Oranges and Plums”:

The fragrant redness of her face is suffused with the glow of sunset clouds;
The glossy blackness of her raven locks is heaped in piles about her temples.
I expect that she,
Must be a denizen of the quarter,
Dressed up as she is, a fit subject for an artist's brush.
Quiveringly, she is wearing a turquoise ornament in her hair;
Ostentatiously, she is clad in garments of the thinnest silk.
The stylishness she exhibits is enough to slay the beholder.
Ch'a!
Whose establishment does she hail from,
That she should secretly look me over so unceasingly with her eyes?¹⁸

Hsi-men Ch'ing praised this performance, and Secretary An Ch'en and Secretary Huang Pao-kuang presented him with cups of wine. When Hsi-men Ch'ing had returned the compliment, the singing boy once again:

Accompanying himself with a sandalwood clapper, sang a song to the tune “Vanquishing the Yellow Dragon, Quick Tempo”:

Since there is no convenient way to correspond,
I am too lazy to inscribe my brocade notepaper.
The gold bracelet about my wrist is loose;
The jade of my flesh has become emaciated;
My silken garments droop completely slack.
Tears have encroached upon,
The makeup on my two cheeks.
I am too sorrowful to look into my precious mirror,
And ashamed to wear my halcyon-feathered ornaments.

To the same tune:

I have pointlessly squandered,
The good days and fine nights.¹⁹
In my jade incense burner,
On the silver candlestick,
The incense has dissipated and the candle gone out.²⁰
The phoenix bed curtains have been forsaken,²¹
The mandarin duck quilt is supplied in vain.
I incessantly fidget with my jade fingers,
And repeatedly stamp my embroidered shoes.²²

On this occasion, they continued drinking until after 6:00 o'clock:

With the raising of glasses and passing of cups;
but we have already said enough about this.

To resume our story, back at home, P'an Chin-lien, having failed on the previous day in her attempt in the “snow cave” to make out with Ch'en Ching-chi, took advantage of the opportunity presented by the fact that Hsi-men Ch'ing was away at Eunuch Director Liu's estate, drinking with Secretary Huang Pao-kuang and Secretary An Ch'en, and that Wu Yüeh-niang was staying in her room, to:

Run in and run out, of her quarters, just like:

An ant on a hot plate.²³

As for Ch'en Ching-chi, after escaping from the “snow cave,” he had gone to sleep in the shop, where his organ remained stiff all night long. On this occasion, while Hsi-men Ch'ing was not at home, he and P'an Chin-lien uninhibitedly:

Exchanged looks with eyes and eyebrows,
This went on until after dusk, when the lamps were about to be lighted in the various quarters. At this point Chin-lien proceeded with:

Skulking step and lurking gait, to tiptoe out behind the summerhouse, where Ch'en Ching-chi just happened to come by. When he perceived by the dim light that it was Chin-lien, he proceeded without more ado to embrace her tightly and put his face next to hers, whereupon the two of them exchanged some ten or more kisses.

“My darling,” said Ch'en Ching-chi, “yesterday when that pain in the neck, Meng the Third, interrupted us, I had such a stiff erection that it stayed up all night. And today, when I saw how:

Seductively and bewitchingly,²⁴
you swayed as you strolled by, my whole body was infused with a melting sensation.”

“You dead duck of a lousy short-life!” said Chin-lien. “You must be utterly devoid of principles to grab hold of your own mother-in-law and kiss her. Aren't you afraid that someone might come along and hear what you're up to?”

“If I spot a lantern light coming in this direction,” said Ch'en Ching-chi, “I'll have time to get out of the way.”

Ch'en Ching-chi kept on uttering the word “darling” with his mouth, while beneath the single thickness of his gown, his organ, like a bar of red-hot iron, surged forward beneath the fabric. Chin-lien, for her part, couldn't help thrusting her body forward to meet the overheated organ beneath his gown. Unable to restrain herself, Chin-lien lifted Ch'en Ching-chi's gown aside with her hand and firmly gripped his male organ. Ch'en Ching-chi was so flustered that in trying to pull down Chin-lien's waistband, he only succeeded, with a rending sound, in ripping out one of the pleats in her skirt.

"You lousy slave!" expostulated Chin-lien with a laugh. "How clumsy can you get? You're still so unused to snitching your food, and so timorous in going about it, that all you've done, in your flusteration, is to rip out one of the pleats in my skirt."

So saying, she pulled down her own waistband, exposing the mouth of her vagina, lifted one of her legs onto the balustrade, and proceeded to stuff Ch'en Ching-chi's male organ into the orifice. It so happens that, because Chin-lien had been fooling around for some time, her vagina was already sopping wet, so that when Ch'en Ching-chi gave a single forceful thrust, he succeeded immediately in effecting penetration.

"My darling," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "standing up like this, it's hard to get in all the way. What should we do?"

"If you just keep on retracting and thrusting so impetuously," said Chin-lien, "we'll come up with something."

Ch'en Ching-chi was about to resume retracting and thrusting, when they suddenly heard the dogs outside start to bark noisily, and realized that Hsimen Ch'ing must have arrived home from his drinking party. This threw the two of them into such consternation that they disappeared in a puff of smoke.

It turned out to be Shu-t'ung and Tai-an, carrying Hsi-men Ch'ing's official cap and girdle, and his gold-flecked fan, who came into the compound, creating quite a stir as they exclaimed, "We've really been put through our paces today!"

Yüeh-niang sent Hsiao-yü out to investigate, and she observed that the two page boys were both befuddled with drink.

"Why has Father not returned?" Hsiao-yü asked.

"Just now," explained Tai-an, "because we were afraid we wouldn't be able to keep up with his horse on foot, we got Father's permission to start back ahead of him. His horse is fast, so he should be right behind us."

Hsiao-yü went back to the rear compound to report this, and before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived at the gate and dismounted.

He had originally intended to spend the night in Chin-lien's quarters, but who could have anticipated that he was so drunk that he went into Yüeh-niang's room by mistake.

Yüeh-niang thought to herself, "Tomorrow is the twenty-third, which is a jen-tzu day. If I keep him here tonight, it might spoil my opportunity with regard to that important matter tomorrow. Moreover, my period is coming to an end today, so tomorrow it would be more sanitary."

"You're too groggy with drink tonight," she said to Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I don't want you fooling around here. My period is not quite over yet. It would be better if you slept in someone else's quarters, and came back here tomorrow night."

As she spoke, she pushed Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was smiling bemusedly, out of her room, and he headed straight for Chin-lien's quarters.

Pinching Chin-lien's cheeks, he said to her, "This is the little whore I've been looking for. Just now, I was intending to come over here, but who would have thought that, because I've had a few cups of wine, without knowing what I was doing, I went into the First Lady's room instead."

"What an inveterate oily-mouthed creature you are!" said Chin-lien. "No doubt you'll tell me some story about having originally intended to sleep in Elder Sister's room tomorrow. What a filthy braggart!"

A Tryst between Chin-lien and Ching-chi Is Interrupted

You wouldn't hesitate to tell a bold-faced lie to a Perfected Being. And you expect me to believe you!"

"You crazy oily mouth!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All you ever do is give people a hard time. That's the way it really is. What reason would I have to lie about it?"

"Just tell me, then," said Chin-lien, "why didn't Elder Sister keep you there tonight?"

"I don't know," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She kept claiming that I was drunk and pushed me out of her room, saying, 'Come back tomorrow night.' So I came over here as fast as I could."

Chin-lien was about to wash her private parts, when Hsi-men Ch'ing reached over to feel her there.

Covering herself with both hands, Chin-lien upbraided him, saying, "You short-life! Cut it out. I've had enough of your tricks around here."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, embracing her with one hand, stuck his other hand into her crotch, where, after feeling it, he said, "You crazy good-for-nothing! How does it happen that, night after night, it's perfectly dry, whereas tonight, it's sopping wet inside? No doubt you've been hankering after a man, so that your vaginal secretions have started to flow."

It so happens that Chin-lien had, in fact, been so preoccupied with Ch'en Ching-chi that she had neglected to wash her private parts. And now that Hsi-men Ch'ing had unintentionally hit upon what was on her mind, her face turned bright red in an instant, and she was reduced to covering up as best she could, half smiling and half objecting, as she bathed her private parts and washed her face before the two of them retired for the night. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Wu Yüeh-niang got up the next morning, it being a jen-tzu day, she thought to herself, "As Nun Hsüeh was about to take her leave, she enjoined me repeatedly, in no uncertain terms, that if I took this potion of hers on a jen-tzu day, I would be sure to conceive. Today is a jen-tzu day, so I really ought to take her medication. Moreover, it's fortunate that last night:

By a providential coincidence,²⁵ Hsi-men Ch'ing came home drunk and made his way into my room, so I was able to arrange for him to return tonight."

For this reason, Yüeh-niang secretly rejoiced in her heart. Upon arising, early in the morning, after performing her ablutions and completing her toilet, she proceeded to pay obeisance to Buddha and recited the Sutra of the White-Robed Kuan-yin.²⁶ It is essential that those who wish to conceive sons should recite this sutra, and that is why Yüeh-niang recited it. Moreover, Nun Wang had also urged her to recite it. The day in question was also a jen-tzu day, a day of critical importance. That is why, early in the morning, she closed the door to her room;

Wu Yüeh-niang Recites a Sutra in Quest of Male Progeny

Ignited incense and lit candles,²⁷ and recited this text, before going back to her inner room to fetch the medication.

Instructing Hsiao-yü to heat some wine, she did not take any congee but prepared herself by eating some cakes, biscuits, and the like. First, after having held the nostrum up reverently with both hands, and:

Uttered a prayer to Heaven,²⁸ she dissolved Nun Hsüeh's bolus of medication in the wine, producing a potion, of which:
The exotic fragrance assailed the nostrils, and finished it off in two or three mouthfuls. When she then turned her attention to the afterbirth of a firstborn male child that Nun Wang had provided, although it had been rendered into powdered form, it nevertheless made her feel somewhat skittish. It exuded a perceptible odor of incineration and was not something easy to swallow.

"If I don't take it," Yüeh-niang thought to herself, "it won't have the desired effect. While, if I do take it, I can't overcome my misgivings. But enough of this:

Once things have come to a head,

They are out of one's control.²⁹

I'll simply have to force myself to swallow it, that's all."

First taking a handful of the talismanic potion and forcing it into her mouth, she urgently swallowed half a bowl of wine and almost regurgitated it, her eyes turning red as she did so. Hastily washing this down with more wine, she still felt as though something were sticking in her throat and followed up with another few mouthfuls of wine. After which she called for some warm tea with which to rinse out her mouth and then lay down on her bed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to come by her room just then and, noticing that the door was closed, called for Hsiao-yü to open it, asking, "How come everything is so quiet, and the door to the room is closed? Could it be that the First Lady is somewhat annoyed³⁰ with me for having left her alone last night?"

"How would I know?" responded Hsiao-yü.

Hsi-men Ch'ing went into the room and called to her several times, but Yüeh-niang, who had had wine to drink that morning, was fast asleep facing the interior of the bed and did not answer him.

"You lousy slave!" Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Hsiao-yü. "Just now I called to the First Lady and she refused to answer. Why should she do that unless she were annoyed with me?"

Not knowing what to do with himself, he walked out of the room, only to encounter Shu-t'ung coming in, who reported, "Master Ying the Second is outside."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing came out, Ying Po-chüeh said to him, "Brother, when you went to Eunuch Director Liu's estate the other day to attend the party hosted by Messrs. An Ch'en and Huang Pao-kuang, were you able to enjoy yourself fully? How late did you continue to drink before the party broke up?"

"I am grateful for the lavish affection the two gentlemen have shown me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "When they condescended to visit me on that former occasion, because they were on their way to a party hosted by Prefect Hu Shih-wen, they didn't stay long. But when I arrived at their place, I found that:

Our feelings were genial, our thoughts in accord.³¹

They kept me there for some time and insisted upon my having quite a few cups of wine, right up until the time the night watches began. It was a long way home, and I was so drunk I hardly knew what I was doing."

"For people from other places," opined Ying Po-chüeh, "they are gentlemen of real feeling. You ought to send them something in the way of gifts for the road."

"You've got a point there," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

There and then, he summoned Shu-t'ung and told him to fill out a pair of red gift cards, and to direct the people in the rear compound to prepare two equally sumptuous sets of gifts, consisting of litchis, longans, peaches, dates, geese, ducks, legs of lamb, fresh fish, and two jugs of southern wine. He also had him write messages on two of his own calling cards, expressing his gratitude for their hospitality. When these tasks were completed, he called for Shu-t'ung once again and directed him to deliver the gifts himself. Shu-t'ung duly assented and went off on his errand.

At this point, Ying Po-chüeh moved closer to Hsi-men Ch'ing, sat down beside him, and asked, "Do you remember what you said to me the day before yesterday?"

"What is there to remember?" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I guess you've been so busy you've forgotten all about it," said Ying Po-chüeh. "It's what I said to you just before we left when Hsieh Hsi-ta and I were having a drink with you here the day before yesterday."

Hsi-men Ch'ing stared vacantly into space and thought for a while before saying, "It must have been something to do with that affair of Li the Third and Huang the Fourth, wasn't it?"

Ying Po-chüeh responded, with a laugh, "Just as they say:

When the rainwater from the eaves drips down from above:

Every drop hits the mark."

Hsi-men Ch'ing knit his brows and said, "Where would you have me come up with the necessary silver? You saw how it was the other day when I was arranging to take delivery of that salt and was so strapped for cash that I had to borrow five hundred taels of silver from my kinsman Ch'iao Hung in order to complete the transaction. Where would I come up with all this additional silver to invest?"

"In any event," said Ying Po-chüeh, "it's an investment that is bound to be profitable. Why don't you see if you can dig out something from the corner of one of your trunks, or somewhere, to give to them? Brother, you said that yesterday you got an initial payment of two hundred fifty taels from Hsü the Fourth's place outside the city gate, so the remaining half of what they need should be easy enough to get together."

"That's as may be," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but where am I to scrape it up from? You'd better tell them to wait until I've received the entire sum that Hsü the Fourth owes me, and I'll turn it over to them then in a lump sum."

Ying Po-chüeh adopted a serious expression and said, "Brother:

A single word from a gentleman, is like

A single whip stroke to a fleet steed.³²

If a man is untrustworthy,

How can that be tolerated?³³

It would have been better if you had not made that promise to me the day before yesterday. I've already told them that it's:

As certain as certain can be, they'll get the money today, so what am I to say to them? They have complete faith in your reputation for magnanimity. Over such a trivial matter, would you have these businessmen bad-mouthing you behind your back?"

"If Master Ying the Second says so," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I might as well give it to them, and be done with it."

He then went back to the rear compound, where he got together two hundred thirty taels of silver, and asked Yü-hsiao for the two hundred fifty taels that had been received from Hsü the Fourth's place the day before, which weighed out to a total of exactly four hundred eighty taels.

Coming outside again, he said to Ying Po-chüeh, "I have only been able to scrape together four hundred eighty taels, so I am still twenty taels short. But I can supply some satin piece goods to make up the difference. Will that do?"

"That would make things difficult," said Ying Po-chüeh. "They require ready cash in order to fulfill their part of this contract for the purveying of incense. You don't have any of the best grade of satin piece goods in stock right now, and those pieces of pink satin you do have aren't good enough to fill the bill. You might as well scrape up the ready money, and save me a lot of legwork."

"That's enough! That's enough!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

So saying, he went back inside, weighed out twenty taels of good-quality silver, and told Tai-an to take the whole amount out with him.

Li the Third and Huang the Fourth had been sitting in a neighbor's house for a long time, just waiting for a signal from Ying Po-chüeh before putting in an appearance, and Hsieh Hsi-ta happened to come in at the same time.

Having first greeted Hsieh Hsi-ta, Li the Third and Huang the Fourth saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "On a former occasion we were the recipients of your great kindness, and it is only because the silver that is due us has not yet been disbursed that we have been so dilatory in paying you back. And now, in Tung-p'ing prefecture, there is another contract being let for the purveying of twenty thousand taels worth of incense, and we have once again made bold to ask you for the loan of another five hundred taels of silver, in order to temporarily relieve this:

Eyebrow singeing exigency.³⁴

When we receive the payment for our current contract, we will bring it over to you, without touching so much as a candareen of it, and repay you in full, including the interest due."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then called for Tai-an and sent him to fetch the steelyard from the shop, and invite his son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, to join them. After which, he weighed out, first, the twenty-five packets of ten taels each that he had collected from Hsü the Fourth's place, and then, the two hundred fifty taels that he had provided himself, and turned them over to Huang the Fourth and Li the Third. The two of them, after seemingly never ending expressions of gratitude, finally took their leave.

Hsi-men Ch'ing wanted to keep Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta for a further parley, but the two of them had no stomach for an extended visit, wishing, instead, to leave forthwith in order to divvy up the brokerage fee they expected to receive from Li the Third and Huang the Fourth. Claiming falsely to have other engagements, they hastily took their leave, but on their way out, Ying Po-chüeh was pestered by Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung, who demanded something for themselves with which to buy sweetmeats.

Ying Po-chüeh waved them off with his hand, saying, "I've got nothing for you! I've got nothing for you! This is something I undertook on my own initiative. I didn't bring anything for the likes of you. Dogs of a whore's spawn that you are!" And he and his companion took themselves off.

Who should appear at this juncture but Shu-t'ung, who came in to deliver thank-you notes from Secretary Huang Pao-kuang and Secretary An Ch'en and reported, "The two gentlemen protested that they really ought not to accept such gifts from you, but agreed to receive them for fear of offending you. They asked me to convey their gratitude to you, and each of them gave me a tip in a sealed envelope."

Hsi-men Ch'ing told him to keep these gratuities for himself and also weighed out some silver for the carriers who had been hired to deliver the gifts, and sent them on their way. It being lamp-lighting time already, Hsimen Ch'ing then went into Yüeh-niang's room and sat down.

Yüeh-niang said, "Hsiao-yü tells me that you came into my room earlier today and called to me, but I was asleep at the time and didn't know that you were calling me."

"There you go again," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I knew all along that you were not too pleased with me."

"Who says that I'm not pleased with you?" protested Yüeh-niang, and then she ordered Hsiao-yü to prepare some tea and fetch some supper for them to eat.

After downing several cups of tea, Hsi-men Ch'ing, whose body was affected by several successive days of heavy drinking, would have been happy enough simply to go to sleep. But since it had been some time since he spent the night in Yüeh-niang's room, he was anxious to please her, and had used some of the Indian monk's ointment, so that his male organ was swollen into the shape of an iron pestle.

When Yüeh-niang saw it, she said out loud, "That Indian monk was so unprincipled that he would spring this kind of frightening trick on someone, would he?"

But:

In her heart she thought to herself,³⁵

"He may have the Indian monk's techniques on his side, but I've got the Nun's transcendent elixir on mine. Something good is bound to come out of this."

Consequently, they both got into bed and spent a pleasurable night together, and it was nearly noon before they got up the next day.

This fact did not fail to attract the attention of P'an Chin-lien, who:

Exercised her lips and wagged her tongue, to Meng Yü-lou, saying, "The other day, Elder Sister asked me to look up when the next jen-tzu day would occur, and that must be why she was so anxious to sleep with our husband last night. It could hardly be a mere coincidence.”

“Whoever heard of such a thing?” laughed Meng Yü-lou.

As they were speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing came by, at which Chin-lien grabbed hold of him with one hand and said, “Whoever heard of anyone going to bed so early and getting up so late? The sun is already well on its way toward setting. So where are you off to now?”

Hsi-men Ch'ing was subjected to her bantering for some time, which only had the effect of causing his organ to grow stiff again, so they simply abandoned Meng Yü-lou, leaving her to return to her quarters by herself.

Once Hsi-men Ch'ing had thrust Chin-lien through the portal of her bed, the two of them proceeded to dally with each other in earnest. Ch'un-mei fetched them something to eat, and they ate it together. But no more of this.

To resume our story, ever since Yüeh-niang had overheard Chin-lien criticizing her behind her back for being overprotective of Kuan-ko, she had refrained from visiting him in his room for two days.

Who should appear at this juncture but Li P'ing-erh, who came into her room and told her, “The child keeps on crying, day and night, and suffering from the cold shivers continuously. What are we to do?”

“Do whatever should occur to you,” said Yüeh-niang, “and if his condition improves, it will be all right. You might try making vows to burn incense on his behalf, or even a vow to sacrifice to the gods. Such steps ought to alleviate his condition.”

“The other day,” said Li P'ing-erh, “he was running a fever, and I vowed to make propitiatory offerings to the God of Walls and Moats and the local Tutelary God, and those vows are now due to be fulfilled.”

“That sounds all right,” said Yüeh-niang. “After all, they're your vows to make. But you ought also to invite Dame Liu over for a consultation, and see what she has to suggest.”

Just as Li P'ing-erh was about to take her leave, Yüeh-niang said to her, “Why do you suppose it was that all day yesterday I failed to come over to your place to see the child? It was all because the day before yesterday, after coming to see the child, as I passed by the screen-wall in front of the summer-house, I overheard P'an Chin-lien saying to Meng the Third that since I had no child of my own, I was reduced to playing up to someone else who did. It's no big deal that she should talk such rot, but I was so upset by it for half a day that I was unable to eat anything.”

“What can you expect from that crazy good-for-nothing of a splay-legged whore!” said Li P'ing-erh. “How unprincipled can you get? She's been the frequent recipient of your good intentions. What have you ever done to her that she should be up to such nasty tricks as that?”

“You keep it to yourself,” said Yüeh-niang. “In order to protect yourself from her, you'd better not say a word about it.”

“So that's what happened,” said Li P'ing-erh. “Day before yesterday Yingch'un said that when she went outside she saw her standing there talking to Meng the Third, and that when they saw her, they slipped off pretending to look for the cat.”

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Ying-ch'un, who came running in, panting for breath, and said, “Mother, you'd better come at once. For no evident reason, Kuan-ko's two eyes have started to turn up incessantly, and there is some white foam dribbling from his mouth.”

Li P'ing-erh was thrown into such consternation that:

Her mouth clamped shut without a word,³⁶ and

She knitted her brows on the verge of tears.

On the one hand, she sent Hsiao-yü to inform Hsi-men Ch'ing, and on the other, she hastily returned to her quarters. When she arrived there, she found that the wet nurse Ju-i and the others had all turned pale.

She had barely had time to assess the situation when Hsi-men Ch'ing also came into the room and, being startled to find that Kuan-ko seemed to be:

Hovering between life and death, exclaimed, “It looks bad! It looks bad! What are we to do? You women have not been adequately protective of him, allowing him to get to such a state before informing me about it. Now, what is to be done?”

Pointing his finger at Ju-i, he said, “Wet nurse, you've not been taking proper care of him, until, today, it's come to this. If, by any chance, something untoward should occur:

It would not be deemed outlandish, if you were to be pounded into mincemeat.”

Ju-i was thrown into such consternation by this outburst that she dared not open her mouth, while:

The tears flowed from both her eyes, and Li P'ing-erh could only gaze at the child while crying to herself.

“Crying won't do any good,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing. “We might as well invite Shih Cho-kuei, or Plastrancer Shih, to prognosticate on his behalf by applying heat to the plastron of a tortoise shell. Once we've determined what the prognosis for good or ill may be, we can decide what to do next.”

He then asked Shu-t'ung to take out one of his calling cards and fly on his way to request the attendance of Shih Cho-kuei.

When the latter had sat down, Ch'en Ching-chi kept him company for a serving of tea, while Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an:

Lit candles and ignited incense,³⁷ provided some purified water, and set up a table. Hsi-men Ch'ing then came out to greet him and, taking the plastron in his hands:

Uttered a prayer to Heaven, saluted him, and ushered him into the reception hall, where he placed the plastron on the table. Shih Cho-kuei then took it up in both hands, applied some medication to certain spots on its surface, and applied fire to them, after which they had another cup of tea.

As Hsi-men Ch'ing was sitting there, they heard a sharp sound of crepitation as the plastron cracked. Shih Cho-kuei proceeded to examine it and then paused for a while, without saying anything.

“What does it portend for good or ill?” asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

“What sort of problem is it that you are concerned about?” asked Shih Cho-kuei.

"My young son is ill," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "How does the general configuration look? Are there sufficient indications for a prognosis or not?"

"The general configuration does not show anything much to worry about at the present time," said Shih Cho-kuei, "but there is reason to fear that later on the malady may recur and linger on, so that there will be no possibility of a complete cure. When parents divine about their children or grandchildren, the lines for their children or grandchildren should not be unfavorable. Moreover, you see that the line for the Red Bird has been markedly disturbed, which indicates that sacrifices should be offered to the Red-Robed Guardian, the God of Walls and Moats, etc. You should slaughter a pig and a sheep to sacrifice to them. In addition you should take offerings of three bowls of soup and rice, together with effigies of one prematurely deceased male and two prematurely deceased females, and dispatch them to escort the malevolent influences responsible for the malady off to the south in a straw boat."

Hsi-men Ch'ing rewarded him for his services with a mace of silver, at which Shih Cho-kuei, who was a past master in the arts of flattery and ingratiation, bent his body into the shape of a shrimp and departed with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand expressions of gratitude.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then went into Li P'ing-erh's quarters and said, "Just now, the plastrancer said the general configuration indicates that the malady may be protracted, and that we should be on our guard for recurrences, but that in the present exigency we should sacrifice to the Lady of the God of Walls and Moats."

"I made a vow to that effect the other day," said Li P'ing-erh, "but I haven't fulfilled it yet, because the child has been such a source of trouble."

"Can such things be?"

exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing, and he immediately ordered Tai-an to go summon Ch'ien T'an-huo, or Phlegm-fire Ch'ien, a Taoist healer, experienced at burning petitions to the gods.

Tai-an promptly went out the gate on this errand.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then joined Li P'ing-erh, who embraced Kuan-ko and said, "My child, I'm going to sacrifice to the gods on your behalf, and if you get any better, I can only:

Thank Heaven and thank Earth."³⁸

No sooner had she said this, than:

Strange to relate,

the pupils of the child's eyes fell back into their normal position, as he cuddled up against his mother's body and fell asleep.

"How very strange!" said Li P'ing-erh to Hsi-men Ch'ing. "No sooner did I promise to sacrifice to the gods on his behalf, than he got significantly better."

Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing feel in his heart that:

The stone on his head had finally fallen to the ground.

When Yüeh-niang heard about it, she also was:

Unable to contain her pleasure, and sent Ch'in-t'ung off to summon Dame Liu.

Dame Liu lost no time in bustling on her way, with:

One step high, and

One step low.

Hsi-men Ch'ing did not have any faith in such female practitioners but, out of his love for Kuan-ko, felt that he was compelled to give her the benefit of the doubt.

Dame Liu headed straight for the kitchen, where she proceeded to rub the door of the stove.

"This old crone must be delirious," Ying-ch'un laughed at her. "Rather than attending to Kuan-ko, what do you think you're doing heading into the kitchen instead, and rubbing the door of the stove?"

"Little slave," responded Dame Liu, "what do you know about it? That's enough of your lip. Old-timer that I am:

I've got three hundred sixty days for every year that I'm older than you.

As I came along the road, I fear I may have come in contact with some noxious influences, which I have sought to counteract by approaching the door of the stove."

Ying-ch'un made a face at her but, on hearing that Li P'ing-erh was calling for her, accompanied Dame Liu to her quarters.

When Dame Liu had kowtowed, Hsi-men Ch'ing, who needed to order Tai-an to weigh out the silver with which to purchase the necessary items for the offerings to the gods, and slaughter the pig and sheep for this purpose, strode out of the room.

"Is Kuan-ko any better?" asked Dame Liu.

"On the contrary, his condition is critical," said Li P'ing-erh. "That's why I have invited you over for a consultation."

"As I recommended on a former day," said Dame Liu, "once you made an offering to the General of the Five Ways, he was all right. On the present occasion, judging by his coloration, if you offer propitiatory rites to the Tutelary Gods of the Three Worlds, he should recover."

"Just now," said Li P'ing-erh, "Shih Cho-kuei suggested that we ought to make an offering to the Lady of the God of Walls and Moats."

"He is consistently off the mark," said Dame Liu. "What does he know about it? This is a case of convulsions brought on by a fright. The best thing to do would be for me to exorcise the fright."

"How would you exorcise the fright?" asked Li P'ing-erh.

"Sister Ying-ch'un," said Dame Liu, "if you go fetch some rice and dip out a bowl of water for me, I'll show you how it's done."

Ying-ch'un duly went to fetch the rice and water for her.

Dame Liu proceeded to take a high-stemmed earthenware goblet and fill it to capacity with grains of rice. She then groped an old green chiffon handkerchief out of her sleeve, wrapped the rice from the goblet up in it, and kneaded it with her hands, after which she proceeded to shake it in the air as she moved it back and forth over the length of Kuan-ko's body, from his face and head to his hands and feet.

Kuan-ko was asleep at the time, and the wet nurse said, "Be careful not to wake him up."

Dame Liu gave a negative wave of her hand and said in a low voice, "I know. I know."

After moving the rice-filled handkerchief back and forth for a while, she began to mutter something incomprehensible under her breath, but one or two passages were a little more audible than the rest.

Li P'ing-erh managed to catch the words, "Affrighted by Heaven, affrighted by Earth, affrighted by humans, affrighted by ghosts, affrighted by cats, affrighted by dogs," at which point she said, "It all started when the child was frightened by a cat."

When Dame Liu had finished her incantation, she shook open the handkerchief, placed the goblet on the table, and contemplated the results for a while. Then, selecting two grains of rice from the heap created by shaking it out of the handkerchief, she dropped them into the bowl of water, by doing which she was able to prognosticate that the malady would be cured by the end of the month. She likewise recommended that the effigies of one prematurely deceased male and two prematurely deceased females should be dispatched to escort the malevolent influences responsible for the malady off in a southeasterly direction. But she argued that, rather than sacrificing to the God of Walls and Moats, she should make a propitiatory offering to the local Tutelary God.

Li P'ing-erh was perplexed by this, but finally said, "I'll just make an additional propitiatory offering to the local Tutelary God. That won't be a problem."

She then told Ying-ch'un to go outside and tell Hsi-men Ch'ing that Dame Liu, after "prognosticating with a bowl of water," had said that they ought to make an offering to the local Tutelary God; and that, since it was too late to go to the temple of the God of Walls and Moats tonight anyway, they should lay in all the proper offerings, and be prepared to hold a devout ceremony in the morning.

Hsi-men Ch'ing consequently instructed Tai-an to take care of procuring all the necessary paraphernalia for the sacrifice, as well as the pig and sheep, and be prepared to go take care of it in the morning; and that, in addition, he should purchase what was needed for an offering to the local Tutelary God, including fried rice and cocoon-shaped pastries, earthenware writing brushes and ink cakes, as well as live sparrows, loaches, eels, and the like, to be released in honor of the occasion.

No item was left unsupplied;

Each object was of the best.

Dame Liu then took leave of Li P'ing-erh's place and headed inside to Yüeh-niang's quarters in the rear compound, where Yüeh-niang kept her for supper.

To resume our story, when Ch'ien T'an-huo arrived, he sat down in the small reception hall, and Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an hastily prepared to assist him in the ceremony of making a propitiatory offering to the local Tutelary God. As soon as Ch'ien T'an-huo had finished his tea, he asked for the purport of the petition he was to present, and Hsi-men Ch'ing had Shu-t'ung write it out for him.

Ch'ien T'an-huo then donned his collapsible thunder cap, put on his customary vestments:

Brandished his sword with philter in hand, started to pace the dipper, and began to recite the altar-cleansing invocation. The invocation read:

From the mysterious void of the grotto heavens,
To the refulgent realm of the great primordial,
May the prepotent gods of the eight directions,
Assure my consonance with the forces of nature.
These Numinous Treasure talismans,
Are addressed to the Nine Heavens.
The celestial net extends its awe-inspiring sway,
Over the mysterious realms of grottoes and stars,
Decapitating demons and shackling monsters,³⁹
Killing devils by the myriads and thousands.
This sanctified invocation of the polestar,
This jade writ of the primordial beginning,
When duly incanted but a single time,
Dispels disease and lengthens years;
When dispatched to the Five Sacred Peaks,
And made known throughout the Eight Seas,
The demon-kings will be compelled,
To stand as bodyguards at my side;
Misfortune and pestilence will be dispelled,
And the force of the Tao remain ever present,⁴⁰

etc., etc.

He then asked the ordainer of the ceremony to burn incense. Hsi-men Ch'ing accordingly washed his hands, rinsed out his mouth, donned his official cap and girdle, and put on his kneepads. Sun Hsüeh-o, Meng Yü-lou, Li Chiaoerh, and Li Kuei-chieh all helped him on with his clothes, clucking with approbation as they did so. When Hsi-men Ch'ing emerged and proceeded to burn incense and pay obeisance to Buddha, a page boy followed at his heels to straighten his garments. It was all done with conspicuous formality.

On seeing that his patron had come outside, Ch'ien T'an-huo started to declaim his texts twice as loudly as before, while the womenfolk, concealing themselves behind a standing screen, peeked at Hsi-men Ch'ing, pointed at Ch'ien T'an-huo, and fell into a heap with laughter. When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard the sound of their raucous laughter, kneeling as he was before the effigy of the god, he was not in a position to say anything about it but could only survey the scene with his eyes. Only after Shu-t'ung became aware of the situation and made a gesture with his mouth did the womenfolk quiet down a bit.

Meanwhile, Chin-lien, who was coming out from the rear compound by herself, upon turning a corner, suddenly ran into Ch'en Ching-chi, who fell to kissing her and feeling her breasts.

Groping a handful of sweetmeats out of her sleeve, and giving them to him, she went on to ask, "Would you like to have a drink of distilled spirits?"

"I wouldn't mind having a little," responded Ch'en Ching-chi.

Consequently, he allowed Chin-lien to take advantage of this interval during which the others were busy, by pulling him into her quarters, and telling Ch'un-mei to shut the door.

After sharing a couple of cups with him, she said, "You'd better get going. I'm afraid someone might turn up, which would be the death of me."

Ch'en Ching-chi wanted to kiss her again, but Chin-lien said, "You indecent short-life! Aren't you afraid that the maidservants will catch on?"

Then she facetiously gave him a resounding whack, upon which Ch'en Ching-chi prepared to make his escape. Chin-lien told Ch'un-mei to precede him outside, and she saw him safely out of the way. Truly:

With two hands he tore open the road between life and death;

Flopping over and leaping out through the gate to perdition.

Chin-lien also went outside at the same time to see if the coast was clear. But no more of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, in paying his respects to the local Tutelary God, had been kneeling for what seemed like half a day, before he was able to get to his feet again. Thus far, the ceremony had only progressed as far as the initial invocation, and Ch'ien T'an-huo was about to proceed to the ritual of penance.

Hsi-men Ch'ing went behind the standing screen and admonished the womenfolk there, saying, "You've got to stop giggling like that. It's so contagious that several times I've barely been able to prevent myself from following suit."

"That Ch'ien T'an-huo," said the womenfolk, "is no more than a paper-burning ghoul. He's not a proper Taoist priest. When he dons his collapsible cap and puts on his vestments, he's being both bold-faced and shameless. In the course of his babbling, who knows how many buckets of stinking spittle he's managed to expectorate."

Hsi-men Ch'ing said:

"Sacrifice to the gods as if the gods are present.⁴¹

You really oughtn't to bad-mouth or ridicule him so cruelly."

Ch'ien T'an-huo then requested his presence for the ritual of penance, and Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to the carpeted altar space. Ch'ien T'an-huo, having started off with the introit, proceeded to recite the text of the ritual of penance, beginning with the statement of his sincere intentions in seeking an audience. As he did so, the spittle around the edges of his mouth:

Curled in and curled out, while his head:

Bobbed up and bobbed down, like that of the kowtowing bug, or click beetle, which caused the eavesdropping women to fall into a heap with laughter. Hsi-men Ch'ing was quite unable to keep up with the pace of his kowtowing. Ch'ien T'an-huo addressed himself to a different Divine Lord with each kowtow, but by the time Hsi-men Ch'ing had performed one kowtow, he had already kowtowed to several additional Divine Lords. Thereupon, being unable to keep track of things, he simply fell to kowtowing at random, which caused the eavesdropping women to laugh even harder.

Just at this juncture, Hsiao-yü came out to invite Li Kuei-chieh to the rear compound for dinner, saying, "The First Lady is sitting all by herself back there, engaged in idle chatter with Hsi-men Ta-chieh and Dame Liu, while out here the rest of you are having a merry time of it."

Li Chiao-erh and Li Kuei-chieh promptly went back inside, and the rest of them all wished to follow suit, with the exception of P'an Chin-lien, who wanted to continue eavesdropping, until, in the end, when she saw that they had all gone inside, she felt compelled to come inside as well.

Wu Yüeh-niang remarked to Hsi-men Ta-chieh, "If you have a mind to sacrifice to the gods, you ought to be appropriately devout about it. What's the point of having all these crazy womenfolk crowding around out there? It's not as though there were any real spectacle to be seen, such as live lions devouring each other, or anything like that."

She had hardly finished speaking when Li Kuei-chieh came in to join Yüeh-niang and Hsi-men Ta-chieh for dinner. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing had kowtowed until his entire body was bathed with sweat, when he came inside, took off his robe and cap, boots and girdle, went in to Kuan-ko's bedside, and caressed him, saying, "My son, I've made a propitiatory offering to the local Tutelary God on your behalf."

He then turned to Li P'ing-erh and said, "It's amazing. Come and feel his forehead. It's a lot cooler than before. Heaven be thanked! Heaven be thanked!"

Li P'ing-erh laughed, saying:

"Strange as it may seem,

ever since I promised to make a propitiatory offering to the local Tutelary God, he's been getting better. Right now, his fever has receded, his eyes are no longer turning up, and his cold shivers have subsided somewhat. How can you say that Dame Liu is without merit?"

"Tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we might as well follow up by completing the sacrifice at the temple of the God of Walls and Moats."

"The only problem is that his father has been wearing himself out," said Li P'ing-erh. "You'd better dry yourself off, and have some dinner before you go."

"If I stay here, I'm afraid I'll disturb the child," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. I'll go somewhere else to eat."

Upon making his way to Chin-lien's place, he sat down in a chair and said, "The area around my kidneys hurts as though they were about to drop out."

Chin-lien laughed, saying, "Why should anyone with such a filial heart have to feel pain? Right now, you might as well get someone to do the kowtowing in your place."

"That makes sense. That makes sense," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He then told Ch'un-mei to summon Ch'in-t'ung and instruct him, "Go invite Son-in-law Ch'en to do the kowtowing, and the seeing off of the paper effigies of the spirits on Father's behalf."

Who would have thought that Ch'en Ching-chi, after having downed several cups of distilled spirits in Chin-lien's quarters, was afraid that his face was red enough for the page boys to spot, so he endeavored to account for it by buying some weak wine, and drinking several cups of it in the shop. His capacity, however, was inadequate, so that he soon became drunk and fell asleep where he was, snoring stertorously.

Ch'in-t'ung found it impossible to rouse him and flew back like an arrow to report to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "He's fast asleep there, and I was unable to rouse him."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was annoyed by this and exclaimed, "How unprincipled can you get? Quite aside from his neglect of the family business, what sort of a spectacle does it present to our neighbors for him to fall asleep so early in the day?"

He then told Ch'un-mei to go to the First Lady's room and say to Hsi-men Ta-chieh, "Father has developed a sore back from all the kowtowing and asked our son-in-law to continue the kowtowing, and the seeing off of the paper effigies of the spirits on his behalf. He wants to know why it is that he refuses to come, but insists on remaining there asleep?"

"What a hopeless case he is!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and she started out of the room.

Yüeh-niang, however, sent Hsiao-yü to go to the shop and wake up Ch'en Ching-chi.

Still rubbing his eyes, Ch'en Ching-chi came back to the rear compound, where he saw Hsi-men Ta-chieh and said, "What's the big rush in calling for me, as though my life depended on it?"

"You've been asked to participate in the propitiatory offering to the local Tutelary God, and the seeing off of the paper effigies of the spirits on Father's behalf," explained Hsi-men Ta-chieh. "Just now, when Ch'in-t'ung went to summon you, you failed to respond, and now you're trying to give me a hard time about it. This time it was Mother who sent Hsiao-yü to summon you. In any case, you'd better start kowtowing, hadn't you?"

Thereupon:

Half pushing him and half supporting him, she hustled Ch'en Ching-chi out to the reception hall, after which she returned to her room. Hsiao-yü first reported this development back to Yüeh-niang, and then to Hsi-men Ch'ing. Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an to continue waiting upon Ch'ien T'an-huo until the ceremony was completed, and then went to sleep on Chin-lien's bed. But no more of this.

To resume our story, it was only when Ch'en Ching-chi arrived in the reception hall and saw that it was:

Blazing with lamps and candles,⁴² that he finally sobered up. Opening his eyes wide, he observed that Ch'ien T'an-huo was waiting to receive his "flower-scattering fee" for officiating over the ceremony. After they had exchanged the customary greetings, Ch'ien T'an-huo took the offering of soup and rice and, telling Ch'in-t'ung to light the way, proceeded to the door of Li P'ing-erh's quarters, where Ying-ch'un took it inside, along with some incense, and gave it to Ju-i, who blew on it on Kuan-ko's behalf, before handing it back out again. Ch'ien T'an-huo:

Alternately impersonating gods and ghosts, recited a spell over it, after which he came back to the reception hall to preside over the ceremony of seeing off the paper effigies of the spirits. After Ch'en Ching-chi had kowtowed for a while, Ch'ien T'an-huo duly finished seeing off the paper effigies of the spirits and dispatched the proclamation, along with a talismanic transcription of the hexagram ch'ien.⁴³

Having done so, he said, "Once the proclamation has been delivered to the Gate of Heaven, his condition should improve within a day or two. Even if the malady should recur, it won't amount to anything."

By the time Ch'ien T'an-huo had finished the rituals of releasing the living creatures provided for the occasion, seeing off the paper effigies of the spirits, offering a libation, and dismissing the gods:

His mouth was dry, his stomach was empty, and he was ready to have something to eat. Tai-an cleared away the utensils, and Ch'in-t'ung set up a table so that Ch'en Ching-chi could keep him company in consuming a share of the foodstuffs that remained from the preceding ceremony. Ch'ien T'an-huo was profuse in his thanks, and, after he had departed, Ch'en Ching-chi went back to his quarters. Li P'ing-erh also sent Ying-ch'un to deliver some of the leftover fruits and other sacrificial offerings to Hsi-men Ta-chieh's room, for which she expressed her gratitude. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Dame Liu, who was being entertained in Yüeh-niang's quarters, thanked her for her hospitality and took her leave. She had just emerged from the main gate when whom should she encounter but Ch'ien T'an-huo, who staggered up behind her, holding a lantern, and reeking of alcohol.

"Master Ch'ien," said Dame Liu, "you really ought to share that 'flower-scattering fee' with me, shouldn't you?"

"What's that got to do with you?" demanded Ch'ien T'an-huo.

"It was my 'prognosticating with a bowl of water' that set up this job for you, old man," said Dame Liu. "Are you totally:

Unconscious of right and wrong?

The next time the opportunity comes my way, I won't recommend you."

Ch'ien T'an-huo adamantly refused, saying, "What an inveterate oily mouth you are, you old whore! You're shooting your mouth off without foundation. Since when did you ever recommend me? He's a longstanding client of mine. Whoever heard of sharing a 'flower-scattering fee'?"

Dame Liu pointed her finger at him and cursed, saying, "May you starve to death, you lousy paper-burning ghou! before you ever expect another favor from me!"

The two of them mixed it up together, continuing their verbal dual for some time before finally separating. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing got up the next morning, he ordered a page boy to follow him and set out for the temple of the God of Walls and Moats. The carriers of the pig and sheep carried the pig and sheep, while the bearer of his official cap and girdle bore his official cap and girdle. He went straight into the temple, throwing the Taoist priests there into a flurry as they put down a carpet and proceeded to intone the memorial. Hsi-men Ch'ing donned his official cap and girdle and, when he had finished paying obeisance to the god, proceeded to divine about Kuan-ko's condition by means of selecting a prognosticatory bamboo stick, which he then asked a Taoist priest to interpret.⁴⁴ The priest took the bamboo stick and, after tea had been served, went on to interpret it.

The inscription on the stick in question indicated medium good luck, and the priest interpreted it by saying, "The party who is ill should recover, but, in order to guard against a recurrence, it is appropriate that you should take additional precautions."

After distributing the "incense money" for the ceremony, Hsi-men Ch'ing returned home. When he dismounted and came inside, he found Ying Po-chüeh sitting in the summerhouse.

"Have a seat," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll go inside and come right out."

He then went into Li P'ing-erh's quarters and told her about how he had consulted the bamboo sticks on behalf of Kuan-ko:

Thus and thus, and

So and so.

After doing which, he went straight back to the summerhouse and said to Ying Po-chüeh, "Was the brokerage fee you received for that transaction the other day adequate? You really ought to treat me to something or other."

Ying Po-chüeh laughed and said, "Hsieh Hsi-ta also made a little something out of it. Why should I alone be expected to treat you? But that's all right. I'll buy some things for Brother to eat, that's all."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this, saying, "Who wants to eat anything of yours? I was only testing you."

"That being the case," said Ying Po-chüeh, "inasmuch as you went to the temple today with a pig and a sheep, there must be quite a lot in the way of sacrificial offerings left over. Since your younger brother is here, why don't you share some of the bounty with me?"

"You've got a point there," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He then summoned Ch'in-t'ung to go invite Hsieh Hsi-ta to come over so they could enjoy it together and, at the same time, sent directions to the kitchen to prepare the foodstuffs in question and bring them out so he could share them with Brother Ying the Second over a cup of wine.

Ying Po-chüeh seated himself to wait for the arrival of Hsieh Hsi-ta, but he failed to show up, so he finally said, "Why don't we go ahead and settle down to it? Who has the patience to wait for such a slippery operator?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ying Po-chüeh then proceeded to enjoy a drink together.

When Ch'in-t'ung returned, he reported, "Master Hsieh is not at home."

"What took you so long?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I went looking all over for him," said Ch'in-t'ung.

Ying Po-chüeh then initiated a game of forfeits, the import of which was the wish for Kuan-ko's recovery, which pleased Hsi-men Ch'ing so much he was:

Unable to contain his delight.

"I am so constantly imposing on your hospitality," said Ying Po-chüeh, "that I really:

Feel uneasy at heart.

Tomorrow or the next day, I would like to play a paltry role as host in inviting the members of our brotherhood to share a cup of wine with you. How would that be?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "So, having scrounged a little something in the way of a brokerage fee, you're ready to squander your silver. But there's no need for you to lay out anything. I've got this pig and sheep left over, which I'll donate to you in order to supply the necessary ingredients."

Ying Po-chüeh thanked him, saying, "I feel that you're doing more than friendship requires."

"As for the singing girls and the boy actors," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll leave those arrangements to you."

"That goes without saying," said Ying Po-chüeh. "The only thing is, there'll be no one to wait on us. What are we to do?"

"We are all brothers, after all," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The servants of any one of us will do as well as another. We might as well make use of Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an from my place."

"That will take care of everything," said Ying Po-chüeh.

After drinking a while longer, he said farewell and departed. Truly:

Even if you were to drink all day for a hundred years,

It would only amount to thirty-six thousand occasions.⁴⁵

Chapter 54

YING PO-CHÜEH CONVENES HIS FRIENDS

IN A SUBURBAN GARDEN;

JEN HOU-CH'I DIAGNOSES AN ILLNESS

FOR A POWERFUL FAMILY

Whether the morrow will be overcast or clear is not possible to predict;¹
As the saying goes, "The pinnacle of delight begets sorrow and distress."
While the gallivanting youth is captivated by the red thoroughfares;
The neglected damsel vents her resentment by her green gauze window.
Having just visited Apricot Blossom Village²
to procure vintage wine;
One must now resort to the Orange Tree Well³ to seek a rare prescription.
How many are the occasions for sorrow and joy in the life of man;
Yet routinely the spring breeze gives way to a spell of frost.

THE STORY GOES that when Hsi-men Ch'ing got out of bed in Chin-lien's room the next morning, he told Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an to deliver the pig's feet and mutton to Ying Po-chüeh's home. When the two page boys arrived on this errand, Ying Po-chüeh was just coming home from inviting the other guests and, upon seeing them, went into the house, where he wrote a reply, couched in terms that were:

Half demanding and half inviting,
and read:

Yesterday, I imposed egregiously on your hospitality, and now I am once again the recipient of your lavish magnanimity. Thank you. Thank you. At this moment, I pray that my elder brother will deign to visit my humble abode, so that we may proceed together upon a pleasure excursion to the suburbs.

When he had finished writing it, he came outside and was about to hand it to Tai-an, when Tai-an said, "There's no need for you to write a note in reply. Father sent the two of us to wait on you here, so we're not going back."

Ying Po-chüeh laughed and said, "It's hardly right for me to put you two familiar oily mouths to so much trouble. You'll be the death of me yet." Upon saying which, he put the note back into his sleeve.

"Master Two," said Tai-an, "where are you going to be holding your drinking party today? Shouldn't we start setting the tables out? They're covered with dust."

"A fine one you are!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "I was just going to wipe them off. We'll begin by setting things up for an ordinary repast here at my place, after which, we'll repair to a suburban garden somewhere and enjoy ourselves there."

"It makes a lot of sense to eat at home first," said Ch'in-t'ung. It will save you the trouble of having to eat again once you get there. The only things we'll have to take with us, then, are the partitioned picnic boxes, the wine, and the saucers."

"The two of you are real smart asses, aren't you," remarked Ying Po-chüeh. "What you say just happens to coincide with my own crude ideas. I imagine:

You've been bored into so often, both day and night,
That the holes in your smart asses have been reamed out."⁴

"There's no need to bandy idle words," said Tai-an. "We'll help you get things ready."

To this Ying Po-chüeh responded, "That is what could be said to describe:

Three shrines to the goddess Kuan-yin lined up in a row:

Wonderful! Wonderful! Wonderful!"⁵

Just as the two page boys had completed 70 or 80 percent of their preparations, who should come swaggering through the gate but Pai Lai-ch'iang, or Scrounger Pai.

After saluting Ying Po-chüeh with clasped hands, he caught sight of Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an and exclaimed, "These two little darlings are certainly playing up to their Master Two."

"Don't you be jealous now," responded Ying Po-chüeh, at which everyone had a good laugh.

"Who all have you invited today, Brother?" asked Scrounger Pai.

"Only the members of our brotherhood are getting together," said Ying Po-chüeh. "It will be just like a meeting of the club. No one else has been invited."

"That's great," said Scrounger Pai. "What I am most put off by is having to drink with people I don't know. If we have a little gathering of the members of our brotherhood today, it will be a perfect occasion for drinking wine and having fun together. But the party will not be complete without the company of singing girls, along with Li Ming and Wu Hui, to play and sing for us, and help us down with our wine."

"There's no need for you to instruct me on that head," said Ying Po-chüeh. "You're talking to someone who knows the score, after all. Surely you don't mean to suggest that I would arrange for us to merely share a melancholy drink together, and then call it a day. When have you ever known me to do anything like that?"

"That's fine. That's fine," said Scrounger Pai. "Leave it to you, old hand that you are. The only thing is, in a little while, if the occasion should arise, don't make me drink too many forfeits of wine. The other night I had a little too much of some fiery spirits, and my throat is still as sore as can be. I'd better confine myself to tea, and rice, and vermicelli soup."

Ying Po-chüeh said:

"The best cure for a hangover is a dose of wine.

You might as well have a little. What harm can it do? The other day I also had a rather sore throat, and, after downing a few cups of wine, it felt much better. You'd better take this prescription of mine. It's absolutely marvelous."

"Brother," said Scrounger Pai, "so far, you've only proposed a cure for my sore throat. You don't happen to have a cure for my stomach, do you?"

"I imagine," said Ying Po-chüeh, "that you haven't had any breakfast."

"That's not far off the mark," said Scrounger Pai.

"What am I to do?" said Ying Po-chüeh, and he ran inside and came out with a saucer of cakes, a saucer of sandalwood-flavored biscuits, and a pot of tea for Scrounger Pai's consumption.

Scrounger Pai polished off the sandalwood-flavored biscuits:

One per mouthful,

and praised them, saying, "These biscuits are great."

"The cakes are not bad either," said Ying Po-chüeh.

Scrounger Pai, audibly smacking his lips as he did so, went on to finish them off as well. It became apparent at this juncture that Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an had finished the task of getting the utensils together, cleaning the windows, and wiping off the tables.

"Everything is in proper order," said Scrounger Pai. "The only thing is that our brothers have not all shown up yet. The earlier we forgo the more fun we can have. Why should they insist on skulking at home this way? What are they up to?"

Just as Ying Po-chüeh was gazing outside, whom should he see but Ch'ang Shih-chieh, or Cadger Ch'ang, who made his way into the room and was met by Ch'in-t'ung, coming out with a serving of tea.

After Cadger Ch'ang had saluted the company with clasped hands, he looked at Ch'in-t'ung and said, "So you're here, are you?"

Ch'in-t'ung:

Smiled but did not respond.⁶

After finishing their tea, the three of them had just stood up to stretch their legs when Scrounger Pai noticed that there was a go board on the cabinet and said to Cadger Ch'ang, "I'll play a game of go with you."

"I'm still overheated from walking over here just now," said Cadger Ch'ang. "I was about to loosen my clothing and fan myself, and now you want me to play a game of go. Well all right, I'll play a casual game with you if you like."

Having said which, they took down the go board and began to play a game of go.

"Is the loser going to treat the rest of us?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"We're putting our elder brother to enough trouble today," said Scrounger Pai. "Winner takes all would be a better way to do it. It's more convenient and would save us the need to pretend to be hungry when there's more than we can eat. Winner takes all is better all the way round."

"I'm the host," said Ying Po-chüeh, "so I won't participate. The two of you can surely come up with something to treat each other with, can't you?"

Everyone laughed at this.

"Now that we're agreed," said Cadger Ch'ang, "shall we play for objects, or for silver?"

"I didn't happen to bring any silver with me," said Scrounger Pai. "All I have here is a fan, which I pawned for two or three mace of silver and have only recently been able to redeem."

"I've got an embroidered velour handkerchief here that I won from somebody else," said Cadger Ch'ang. "It's worth a good deal, but I guess I'd be willing to hazard it."

The two of them together handed over their stakes to Ying Po-chüeh, who, upon examining them, saw that one of them was a gold-flecked folding fan, with plain bamboo slats, decorated with a painting and an accompanying poem, though the state of the slats indicated its age; while the other was a brand new embroidered handkerchief.

"They'll do," said Ying Po-chüeh. "Go ahead and play."

Ying Po-chüeh held onto the stakes while the two of them faced off against each other and began their game. Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an, seeing that their master was not present, went back and forth incessantly behind their chairs to look on as they played.

"Little oily mouths," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I've a mind to ask if you wouldn't brew another cup of tea for me?"

Ch'in-t'ung surreptitiously made a face at Tai-an but duly headed to the back of the house to heat the tea.

To resume our story, Scrounger Pai and Cadger Ch'ang were fairly evenly matched at go, but Cadger Ch'ang had a slight edge. Scrounger Pai was an inveterate reneger. As they were playing, lo and behold, a block of Scrounger Pai's stones was on the verge of being taken, and Cadger Ch'ang anticipated that he might renege.

Sure enough, Scrounger Pai wanted to retract several of his moves, so he knocked the last few stones Cadger Ch'ang had played aside with one hand, saying, "That won't do. That won't do. I didn't mean to make that move."

"Brother, come here. This conduct is unacceptable," exclaimed Cadger Ch'ang.

Ying Po-chüeh came running out, saying, "What happened? What's the row all about?"

"The last three or four stones he played were ill-considered moves," said Cadger Ch'ang, "and now he wants to retract them. That isn't fair. Brother, you be the judge. How can one be so nonchalant about such things?"

Scrounger Pai's face turned crimson, the blue veins on his temples became distended, and saliva spurted all over his face, as he shouted, "I hadn't yet made my move when he suddenly played his stone. I was just trying to get a good view of the configuration when he began moving his hand back and forth over the board, which confused me so much that:

My eyes were playing tricks on me.²

I was just in the process of making a move, and my hand had not even let go of the stone, when he claimed that I was reneging. You decide. How can he claim that I was doing anything wrong?"

"As for the move in question," said Ying Po-chüeh, "we might as well compromise by letting you play it where you like, without calling it a case of reneging. But you'd better not do that kind of thing again."

"All right," said Cadger Ch'ang. "I'll let you renege on that move. But I won't let you grab any stones of mine with impunity in the future."

"You're a perennial loser yourself," said Scrounger Pai, "yet you have the nerve to criticize me."

As they were speaking, Hsieh Hsi-ta, or Tagalong Hsieh, also showed up, and Ch'in-t'ung brought him some tea.

When he had drunk it, he said, "You two go ahead and finish your game. I'll look on while you play."

As he was observing the game, Wu Tien-en, or Heartless Wu, also came into the house and, after the conventional amenities about the weather had been exchanged, asked, "What have they staked on this game?"

Ying Po-chüeh brought out the two objects in question and showed them to the assembled company, at which, they all said, "In that case, they must see the game to its conclusion."

"Brother Nine," said Scrounger Pai, "the game is as good as over. What are you pondering over?"

Cadger Ch'ang was still engaged in scrutinizing the situation, while Heartless Wu and Tagalong Hsieh made a bet with each other on the side.

Tagalong Hsieh said, "Brother Nine has won."

"He's already lost," said Heartless Wu. "How can you claim he's won? Let's bet a cup of wine on it."

"Just you watch while yours truly wraps up the victory," said Cadger Ch'ang.

Scrounger Pai's face turned crimson, and he said, "You don't mean to say that I've already ceded this fan to you, do you?"

"That's about it," responded Cadger Ch'ang.

Thereupon, the end game having been completed, they proceeded to count up the stones. Scrounger Pai had taken possession of five areas on the board, while Cadger Ch'ang had taken only two.

Scrounger Pai, however, had forfeited three stones to Cadger Ch'ang and muttered to himself, "It was those three moves that cost me the game."

When he hurriedly counted up the stones in his possession, he found that he had lost by five stones.

"Just what I predicted," said Tagalong Hsieh, and, pointing at Heartless Wu, he continued, "You owe me the consumption of a cup of wine. In a little while you'll have to pay me off by drinking it."

Heartless Wu:

Smiled but did not respond.

Ying Po-chüeh took the fan, along with the handkerchief that he had originally pledged, and turned them over to Cadger Ch'ang, who tucked the handkerchief back into his sleeve and then made a show of opening the fan and critically evaluating the poem and the painting on it. Everyone had a laugh at this.

Tai-an then came running in from outside to report some new arrivals, who turned out to be Wu Yin-erh and Han Chin-ch'uan. The two of them:

Tugging each other by the hand, came in laughing merrily and saluted each member of the gathering with a deep bow. Scrounger Pai expressed the wish to play another game of go but only elicited the laughter of the company.

"That's enough of that," said Ying Po-chüeh. "As soon as our elder brother arrives, and we've had something to eat, we'll head for a garden in the suburbs. How long do you intend to play? Don't start another game."

Thereupon, Ch'in-t'ung cleared away the stones, and they all had a cup of tea.

"Our elder brother ought to be here by now," said Ying Po-chüeh. "We oughtn't to delay our departure too long, or we won't have time to really enjoy ourselves."

He had hardly finished speaking when Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived, dressed to befit the occasion, and accompanied by four page boys. The members of the company all got up from their places to welcome him and, after exchanging the customary amenities, offered him a seat, while the two singing girls kowtowed to him, and Li Ming and Wu Hui also showed up and came in to kowtow.

Ying Po-chüeh then urged Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an to bring in eight diminutive picnic saucers. There was one saucer of squash julienne marinated with ten spices, one saucer of an assortment of pickled beans, one saucer of fagara marinated in soy sauce, one saucer of corydalis sprinkled with strong vinegar, one saucer of candied garlic, one saucer of bamboo shoots preserved in fermented mash, one saucer of Chinese cabbage seasoned with red pepper, one saucer of Ta-t'ung ginger in a preservative sauce, and a saucer of fragrant mushrooms. Once these appetizers had been properly laid out, the two page boys, observing that Hsi-men Ch'ing had joined the company, were more careful than ever, feeling the need, more than before, to be as attentive as a groom at the horse's head.

When Ying Po-chüeh noticed that Hsi-men Ch'ing was observing the way they went about setting out the utensils, he said, "I am indebted to the two of them for taking care of a host of matters, and thereby saving me a lot of trouble."

"I fear they may not be up to the task of waiting upon you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"They're extremely adept at it," said Ying Po-chüeh.

"As the saying goes," remarked Tagalong Hsieh:

"Under an effective commander there are no incompetent troops."⁸

Once they've undergone the proper training, it's only natural that they should perform satisfactorily."

The two page boys, having laid out the appetizers, brought out a large flagon of wine, after which, in uninterrupted succession, they served up twenty bowls of delicacies to go with it, including diced roast rump of pork, seasoned with garlic and designed to resemble litchi nuts; braised mutton, seasoned with spring onions, pepper, and cinnamon; roast fish; roast chicken; glazed duck; pork tripe; and the like. Altogether, there were too many culinary specialties to enumerate in detail.

It so happens that Ying Po-chüeh, in the course of his sponging at other people's tables, had picked up some pointers about the art of cooking, with the result that:

Every single dish was done to perfection;

There was not one that was not marvelous.

The members of the company all picked up their chopsticks and proceeded to gorge themselves, making a gobbling sound as they did so. After several large cups of wine had been consumed, the rice was served. Han Chin-ch'uan was on a vegetarian diet that did not permit her to eat anything with meat in it, so she only picked at the appetizers.

"Today is neither the first nor the fifteenth of the month," said Ying Po-chüeh, "so what are you being so fastidious about? Once upon a time, there was a person who had been a vegetarian all his life. When he died and went before King Yama in the nether world, he said, 'I've been a vegetarian all my life, and expect to be reborn as a human being of good status.' 'How is one to know whether you confined yourself to vegetarian fare or not?' said King Yama. 'We'll have to cut open your belly to find out.' When he was cut open, all they found was a bellyful of saliva. It turns out that every time he had seen anyone else eating meat, he had started to salivate."

Everyone doubled over with laughter at this.

"Where do you come up with these annoying turns of yours?" said Han Chin-ch'uan. "Aren't you afraid of having your tongue plucked out in Hell?"⁹

"Only little whores like you have their tongues plucked out in Hell," said Ying Po-chüeh. "The charge being that when they kiss their tongues are overly active."

Everyone had a laugh at this.

"Let's set out on our excursion to the suburbs, shall we?" said Ying Po-chüeh.

"That would be really great," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Everyone else agreed that it would be great.

Ying Po-chüeh then asked Tai-an and the other servants to take charge of the two picnic boxes and a jug of wine, and carry them down to the riverside, where a small boat was hired, and they were loaded aboard. He also hired another empty boat to carry the company, and, once they were all aboard, they were sculled more than thirty li outside the south gate, where they passed right in front of the estate of Eunuch Director Liu.

Ying Po-chüeh ordered the boatmen to moor the boats and then climbed ashore, after which he helped Han Chin-ch'uan and Wu Yin-erh to disembark.

"Whose garden do you think would be best to visit?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"We might as well avail ourselves of Eunuch Director Liu's garden," said Ying Po-chüeh.

"All right," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "His place ought to do."

The group of them accordingly headed there. After entering a reception hall, they turned into a:

Secluded walk along a zigzag gallery, leading through:

Luxuriant forests and lofty bamboos.¹⁰

Words are inadequate to describe the beauty of the scene. Behold:

The emerald cypresses are dense,

The lofty bamboo groves whisper.

The fragrant verdure evenly spreads its mat of green brocade;

The weeping willows delicately wave their green silk braids.

Along zigzag paving and multiple balustrades,

A myriad varieties of famous flowers exhibit a profusion of hues;

Beyond secluded windows and hidden casements,

The varied notes of frolicsome birds resound like reed instruments.

Truly it resembles the fabled Gardens of Paradise,

Nothing less than the Pure Metropolis of the gods.

Leisured gentlemen of lofty status,

Daily frequent it in search of entertainment;

Wandering ladies on vagrant outings,

Ever enjoy it enough to forget their fatigue.

Surely it belongs to the category of rare sights,

This is not an instance of inflated commendation.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, leading Han Chin-ch'uan and Wu Yin-erh by the hand, set out to explore the various sights, in order to enjoy them to the full. Upon arriving under a banksia rose arbor, they found a spot that was both well-shaded and cool, to either side of which there were arrayed extensive:

Stone benches and zither stands, making it ideally suited for a casual conclave. The entire company, accordingly, sat down. Ying Po-chüeh then went back and directed Ch'in-t'ung and the two boatmen to bring the wine, picnic boxes, comestibles, portable stove, and utensils up from the boat and put them down under the green shade.

During an initial round of tea, a casual conversation started up about the predicament of Blabbermouth Sun and Pockmarked Chu, which led Cadger Ch'ang to remark, "Were it not for that, they would both be here today. What can one say about it?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "It's only another illustration of the fact that:

One must suffer the consequences of one's own acts."¹¹

"Let's all take our seats," said Ying Po-chüeh.

"That's a good idea," chimed in Scrounger Pai.

Thereupon, they proceeded to arrange themselves in appropriate order and sit down, with Hsi-men Ch'ing in the place of honor, flanked on either side by the two singing girls, while Li Ming and Wu Hui, standing beside a T'aihu rockery:

Lightly plucking their p'i-p'a,¹² and Idly raising their sandalwood clappers, sang a song to the tune "The Water Nymphs":

My old mother's temperament being what it is,

She was only waiting for the flames from the fire in the Zoroastrian Temple to flare up:¹³

kua-kua tsa-tsa;¹⁴

Forcing the mandarin ducks floating on the water to disentangle their necks:

t'e-leng-leng-t'eng;¹⁵

For the surcingle on the embossed saddle to come loose:

Shu-la-la-sha;

For the lovers' tryst to be interrupted by the night watchman, shouting the hour and ringing his bell:¹⁶

Ssu-lang-lang-t'ang;

For the string on the green jade psaltery to break, never to be mended: chih-leng-leng-cheng;

For the caltrop-patterned mirror to be smashed to pieces on the glazed bricks: chi-ting-ting-tang;

And for the silver vase to drop to the bottom of the well:¹⁷

p'u-t'ung-t'ung-tung.¹⁸

When the two musicians had finished singing, the company moved their party to the edge of a pond, where they put down felt carpets and sat down together, after which:

With the raising of glasses and passing of cups,
they fell to:

Playing at guess-fingers and gambling with dice.

Just as the party was at its height, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Why isn't that little whore, Tung Chiao-erh, here?"

"Yesterday I went to invite her in person," said Ying Po-chüeh. "She said that she was committed to escorting a patron on his way out the city gate today and consequently would not be able to show up until just before noon. I imagine that by this time, knowing that we're here enjoying ourselves, she must surely be on her way to join us."

"It's all our second brother's fault," said Scrounger Pai. "Why didn't you make absolutely certain that she'd be here?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing then turned to Scrounger Pai and whispered into his ear, saying, "Let's make a bet with this beggar. Just say that if Tung Chiao-erh hasn't shown up by noon, each of us will make our host pay a forfeit by drinking three large cups of wine."

When Scrounger Pai communicated this proposal to Ying Po-chüeh, he said, "That's all right. But if she should turn up before noon, each one of you will have to pay a forfeit by drinking three large cups of wine."

Once this bet had been made, nothing was to be seen of Tung Chiao-erh, and Ying Po-chüeh was thrown into such consternation that all he could do was to smile apprehensively. Scrounger Pai, along with Tagalong Hsieh, Hsimen Ch'ing, and the two singing girls, colluded on a plan, so and so. Hsimen Ch'ing pretended to get up in order to relieve himself and instructed Tai-an to come in and falsely proclaim that Tung Chiao-erh had arrived and was waiting outside, thus and thus.

Tai-an got the idea, and, a little while later, just as Ying Po-chüeh was beginning to get perturbed, whom should they see but Tai-an, who came rushing into their midst, saying, "Sister Tung is here. She hasn't known where to look for us."

"That thrills me to death, old matron that I am!" exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. "I told you that she'd be here soon. Quickly, fetch the wine. I must invite each of you to down three cups."

"If we had won the bet," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and demanded that you drink your forfeit, would you have consented to do so?"

"If I were to lose, and refuse to pay my forfeit," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I would not be a human being."

"That's as may be," they all said. "But you'd better go out and call her in before we'll undertake to drink our forfeits."

"All right," said Ying Po-chüeh.

"A man is as good as his word."

Having gone outside, he proceeded to scan the scene, east, west, south, and north, until his eyes grew dim, without catching so much as a glimpse of Tung Chiao-erh's soul.

Gazing into space, he cursed, saying, "You lousy whore! You've made your Master Two lose face, pulling the stepladder out from under him, while assuming the right to do as you please."

When he went back inside, his companions laughed uproariously at his discomfiture and crowded around him, saying, "It's already past noon now. You'll have to pay off each one of us by drinking three cups of wine."

"Thanks to the trickery of that little oily mouth," complained Ying Po-chüeh, "the lot of you have made sure that I'll be stuck with the wine. How am I to handle it?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Without permitting any further explanation, filled a large cup of wine to the brim and proffered it to Ying Po-chüeh, saying, "Just now you said that if you refused to drink your forfeit you would not be a human being."

Ying Po-chüeh took the cup in his hand, while Tagalong Hsieh poured another cup for him. Before he was able to finish this, Heartless Wu followed up by pouring out another large cup of wine.

This threw Ying Po-chüeh into such consternation that he called out, "It's no good. It's making me retch. You'd better get me some appetizers to help me get it down."

Scrounger Pai responded by bringing him some sweetmeats, at which Ying Po-chüeh blurted out, "You lousy short-life! Instead of bringing me something sour, you're deliberately making trouble for me by bringing me something sweet."

"You'll get something sour with the next cup of wine," said Scrounger Pai. "One way or another, you'll have a chance to savor the salty, the sour, the bitter, and the peppery before you're through. There's no need to get flustered about it."

"What an inveterate oily mouth you are," exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh, "as good a filthy braggart as ever!"

Next it was the turn of Cadger Ch'ang to proffer him a cup of wine, and Ying Po-chüeh tried to run out in the hope of gaining a temporary respite, but Hsi-men Ch'ing and the two singing girls surrounded him so that he was unable to get away.

"Tung Chiao-erh, you lousy short-life, you little whore!" exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. "You've really done your old man in this time!"

This outburst only had the effect of causing the rest of the company to fall all of a heap with laughter.

Scrounger Pai once again directed Tai-an to fetch the wine flagon and fill another bumper to the brim. Tai-an accordingly stuck the spout of the flagon an inch or more inside the cup and poured away with a gurgling sound, showing no sign of restraint.

When Ying Po-chüeh saw this, he said:

"Only a demented guest would attempt to ply his host with wine.¹⁹ That's enough of that. The lousy little whore, confirmed bugger that he is, is sticking his spout right into the mouth of the cup. You just wait and see. Even in a thousand years, your Master Two will never urge your owner to find you a wife."

Han Chin-ch'uan and Wu Yin-erh then each poured out a cup of wine and proffered it to Ying Po-chüeh.

"I'll get down on my knees to you, like a chicken on the chopping block," pleaded Ying Po-chüeh.

"You can skip the obeisance as long as you drink the wine," said Han Chin-ch'uan.

"Why didn't you abase yourself like a chicken on the chopping block to Sister Tung, and beg her to come?" asked Wu Yin-erh.

"Don't jest with me," said Ying Po-chüeh. "I've got enough to contend with as it is."

The two of them held their cups of wine right up to his mouth. Ying Po-chüeh found this difficult to handle, so, on the one hand, he took one cup in each hand and gulped them down, and then hastily ate some appetizers.

In no time at all, his face turned crimson, and he called out, "I've been had by the lot of you. Wine is better consumed slowly. Why should you want to get me hopelessly befuddled?"

His companions were about to pour out more wine for him, when Ying Po-chüeh knelt down in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing and said, "Elder Brother, I beg you to put in a word on my behalf and thereby save my poor life. After all, you'll need to preserve me in a fit state to entertain my guests. If I should become so drunk that I:

Don't know whether it's a fine day or an overcast one, what fun can we have together?"

"That's all right," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "We can postpone the payment of the additional two cups per person that you still owe until another time, and not demand that you make good on them now."

Ying Po-chüeh then got up and thanked him, saying, "If you were to exempt me from my remaining obligations altogether, it would be a manifestation of your great kindness."

"All right," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we'll forgive you. The only thing is that, just now, you said that anyone who refused to pay his forfeit would not be a human being. So that, right now, it would seem that your humanity is gradually ebbing away."

"I'm the one who's ended up inebriated," said Ying Po-chüeh, "while I don't know where that whore is up to her usual tricks."

Wu Yin-erh had a laugh at Ying Po-chüeh's expense, saying, "Hey, how is it that even when His Honor is here playing the role of master of the revels, Sister Tung Chiao-erh is unwilling to put in an appearance?"

Ying Po-chüeh responded meretriciously, "As a celebrated courtesan, who is fit to appear in the best company, she's not that easy to engage."

"She's merely off pursuing her own interests somewhere," said Han Chin-ch'uan. "What kind of a creature is she to be entitled to be called a celebrated courtesan?"

"I understand," said Ying Po-chüeh. "I imagine you must be feeling a bit jealous about some event in the past."

Hsi-men Ch'ing recognized that this must refer to the night when the young gentleman Ts'ai Yün had preferred Tung Chiao-erh's company to her own, and he gave Han Chin-ch'uan a meaningful look. But no more of this.

By this time Ying Po-chüeh was already stinking drunk. The two singing girls, for their part, were not the sort to put up with the doldrums and fell to:

Moving their lips and waggling their tongues,²⁰ exchanging quips at each other's expense.

When the drinking began to taper off, Scrounger Pai said to Han Chin-ch'uan, "Would the two of you consent to favor us with a song?"

"That we could," said Wu Yin-erh. "Let Han Chin-ch'uan go first."

"That fan that I won off Younger Brother Pai," said Cadger Ch'ang, "has sturdy slats that would make it a good thing to keep time with."

"Lend it to me to keep time with then," said Han Chin-ch'uan.

Having taken it and looked it over, she said, "I don't happen to possess this kind of a fan to keep time with. Why don't you pretend that it was I who won that game of go, and give it to me?"

"That's a good idea," pronounced Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Cadger Ch'ang was unable to resist the pressure of his peers and felt constrained to give it to her.

"Wu Yin-erh is here too," said Han Chin-ch'uan. "It wouldn't be right for me to simply appropriate it myself. Let's cast a die for it, and whoever comes up with the higher number can have it.”

“That makes sense,” said Cadger Ch'ang, and when they had each cast a die, Wu Yin-erh was the winner, and Han Chin-ch'uan handed it over to her.

“That's hardly fair,” said Cadger Ch'ang, with a false air of gentility. “I still have that handkerchief of mine, and I'll give it to Han Chin-ch'uan to make up for the loss of the fan.”

He then proceeded to hand it over to her, and Han Chin-ch'uan accepted it, saying, “This is really extravagant of you.”

“It's a pity I didn't bring one of my fine Szechwan fans with me,” said Hsimen Ch'ing, “so I could also make a display of my munificence.”

“I realize that's a hit at me,” said Cadger Ch'ang.

Tagalong Hsieh suddenly cried out, saying, “I almost forgot about it until this mention of the fan came up.”

After directing Tai-an to pour out a large cup of wine and give it to Heartless Wu, he said, “Be so kind as to pay me off for our side bet on the game of go by drinking this cup of wine.”

“Well all right,” said Heartless Wu, “but it sure took you a long time to remember it. Since the other two have forfeited their goods, what should I care about a cup of wine.”

Unable to resist the pressure of Tagalong Hsieh, he had no alternative but to swallow it down.

At that point, Han Chin-ch'uan proceeded to entertain them with a song to the tune “Rose-leaved Raspberry Fragrance”:

I remember how, when we first started going together,

More or less by chance, we achieved a casual consummation.²¹

Expecting, in our bliss, to remain inseparable.

Together we feasted and enjoyed the flowery mornings and moonlit nights,²²

Feeling that fine festivals deserve to be celebrated;

But today, it has all come to an abrupt end.

As the saying goes: Heaven is niggardly with its blessings.²³

Our happy marriage affinity has been damnably obstructed;

The male and female phoenix mates have been forcibly separated.

To the same tune:

I long for him as I sit and yearn for him as I walk,²⁴

My breast disturbed by thoughts of our old feelings.

He has betrayed all of those heartfelt vows beneath the stars, under the moon.²⁵

If he has not violated his oaths,

Or suppressed his sorrow at our parting,

Heaven and the gods may still protect him.

But if we should encounter each other unexpectedly someday,

And speak of our separation,

He is sure to see that I am wasting away.²⁶

When she had finished singing, Wu Yin-erh took over from her by singing a song to the tune “The Green Apricot”:

The wind and rain feel sorry for the flowers,²⁷

Once the wind and rain are over, the flowers will also be finished.

I urge you, do not scruple to get drunk amid the flowers.²⁸

The flowers may fade today, or

The flowers may fade tomorrow;²⁹

It is enough to turn one's hair white.³⁰

Whenever the spirit moves you, indulge yourself in two or three cups.

Select lovely spots amid the streams and hills for pleasure excursions.

As long as you have an adequate supply of wine, and nothing else to do;

If there are flowers, that is fine;³¹

If there are no flowers, that is fine;

Who cares whether it be spring or autumn?³²

When she had finished singing, Li Ming and Wu Hui were standing there next in line, and Tagalong Hsieh said, “There still remain these talents that have not yet been displayed.”

Lo and behold:

Strumming their strings, and Playing their woodwinds, they proceeded to accompany themselves:

With p'i-p'a and flute,

as they sang a song to the tune “Shorter Liang-chou”:

The red dust outside the gates of the city³³ flies in ever-rolling clouds,

But it does not fly as far as the clear streams, where fish and birds reside.

In the green shade of the tall willows, one listens to the golden oriole.

The significance of this perching in seclusion,

Is not something that ordinary people understand.

The mountains and forests are the places to which one must finally retire,

That one may serve when required, and seclude oneself when not wanted.³⁴

Grieving for posterity and emulating one's forebears,

On the fifth day of the fifth lunar month,

One sings the Songs of Ch'u and commiserates over the tragedy on the River Hsiang.³⁵

By the time they finished singing, the company's enthusiasm for drinking had begun to wane. Scrounger Pai discovered that there was a small, two-sided, barbarian drum on a stand in the garden reception hall and took it behind the T'ai-hu rockery, where he also picked a sprig of blossoms, so they could play the game of:

Passing the Flower to the Beat of the Drum.³⁶

Hsi-men Ch'ing told Li Ming and Wu Hui to beat the drum and tipped them a wink, which they understood to mean that they should peek through a hole in the rockery, and stop drumming when the flower passed into the hands of whomever he thought ought to have a drink.

Scrounger Pai objected to this, saying, "You can be sure those lousy oily mouths will be up to their usual tricks. I'll go beat the drum myself."

As a result, he was able to rig it so that Hsi-men Ch'ing had to drink several cups of wine.

Just as the drinking was at its merriest, whom should they see but Shut'ung, who came rushing in unceremoniously, approached Hsi-men Ch'ing, and proceeded to:

Whisper into his ear in a low voice, saying, "The Sixth Lady has fallen quite ill and requests that you return home as quickly as possible. I've brought a horse with me, which is waiting for you outside the gate."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he immediately got up and prepared to take his leave. By this time, the entire company was inebriated.

Everyone stood up together, and Ying Po-chüeh said, "Brother, I haven't had a chance to toast you yet today. How can you simply take off? This sort of whispered communication is no good."

He was all set to detain him, but Hsi-men Ch'ing told him the truth of the situation, thanked him, and departed on horseback.

Ying Po-chüeh, who tried to prevent the party from breaking up, saw that Han Chin-ch'uan had taken advantage of the distraction to disappear and set out to look for her with:

Skulking step and lurking gait.

Lo and behold, he found her squatting under the T'ai-hu rockery, in the process of taking a piss:

Revealing a single strand of red thread,

That emitted a myriad glistening pearls.

From his vantage point on the other side of the fence, Ying Po-chüeh proceeded to stick a blade of grass through a hole, with which he tickled the mouth of her vagina. Han Chin-ch'uan was not even able to finish what she was about but jumped up in surprise, getting the waist of her drawers all wet in the process.

"You indecent short-life!" cursed Han Chin-ch'uan. "How diabolically un-principled can you get?"

Her face turned completely crimson as:

Half smiling and half cursing, she rejoined the company. Ying Po-chüeh told everyone what had happened, and they all had another laugh over it.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had left Ch'in-t'ung to help Ying Po-chüeh take care of the impedimenta, and, once he had loaded the portable stove and picnic gear into the boat, they all returned to the city, where they thanked Ying Po-chüeh and went their separate ways. Ying Po-chüeh paid off the two boatmen, while Ch'in-tung carried the picnic things into his house, after which he invited Ch'in-t'ung to have a drink. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home, he hastened:

Covering two steps with every one,

to make his way straight to Li P'ing-erh's quarters.

"Mother is as sick as can be," reported Ying-ch'un. "You had better go see her right away."

Having arrived at her bedside, he found that Li P'ing-erh was groaning aloud with pain, and that the pain was in the area of her stomach.

Ying Po-chüeh Ticks Han Chin-ch'uan in an Indecorous Way

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard her calling out in distress, he promptly said, "We've got to send for Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i immediately to come and examine you."

He then turned to Ying-ch'un and said, "Summon Shu-t'ung and have him write out a card and go with it to invite the attendance of Dr. Jen."

Ying-ch'un went outside and did as she was told, whereupon Shu-t'ung wrote out a formal calling card and went off to invite the attendance of Dr. Jen.

Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced Li P'ing-erh and sat down on the bed beside her, whereupon Li P'ing-erh complained, "You're reeking of alcohol."

"It's only because your stomach's empty," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that you object so to the smell of wine."

He then turned to Ying-ch'un and asked, "Has she had any congee or soup to eat?"

"From this morning until now," replied Ying-ch'un, "she hasn't eaten so much as a grain of rice. All she's had is two or three cups of soup. The areas around her heart, her stomach, and her two kidneys have all been hurting to an unusual extent."

Hsi-men Ch'ing knitted his brows, screwed up his eyes, and sighed several times, after which he asked Ju-i, "Has Kuan-ko recovered?"

"Last night," said Ju-i, "he still had a feverish sensation in the head and cried a lot."

"What bad luck," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Both mother and son are sick. What can we do to restore the mother's spirits, so she will be better able to look after the child?"

Li P'ing-erh started to groan aloud with pain again, and Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Try to bear it as best you can. The doctor will be here soon. After he's examined your pulse, and you've had a couple of cups of medicine, you should be all right."

Ying-ch'un swept the room, dusted off the tables and chairs, lit some incense, prepared tea, and helped the wet nurse to coax Kuan-ko to sleep. By this time, the night watches had begun, and the dog outside began to bark incessantly, which turned out to be occasioned by Ch'in-t'ung's return from Ying Po-ch'ueh's house.

Before long, Shu-t'ung also came back, escorting Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i, and holding a lantern to light him on his way. The doctor, who was wearing a four-cornered square-cut scholar's cap and a wide-sleeved gown, arrived on horseback, entered the gate, and sat down under the portico.

Shu-t'ung came inside and reported, "I succeeded in inviting him, and he's sitting under the portico."

"That's good," exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Quickly, take some tea out for him."

Tai-an promptly picked up the tea and accompanied Hsi-men Ch'ing outside to welcome Dr. Jen.

"I don't know," the doctor said, "which resident of your distinguished mansion it is whose pulse I am to examine. I have been remiss in calling upon you, for which I am truly much at fault."

"It makes me very uncomfortable," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "to put you to so much trouble late at night. I very much hope that you will deign to forgive me."

The doctor bowed to the ground, saying, "I would not be so presumptuous."

After drinking a cup of tea steeped with cured beans, the doctor asked, "Whose honorable indisposition is it that I am to diagnose?"

"That of my sixth insignificant concubine," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After the first cup of tea had been replaced with another, flavored with salted cherries, and the exchange of a few more sentences of small talk, Tai-an started to clear away the cups, and Hsi-men Ch'ing said to him, "Have things inside been straightened up? You go in to give them the word, and bring a lantern out to light us on our way."

Tai-an went into Li P'ing-erh's quarters to give them the word and then came back out to report, with lantern in hand.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then stood up with a bow and invited the doctor to accompany him to Li P'ing-erh's quarters. The doctor followed him there, making a half bow at every gateway, the head of every flight of stairs, and every turning point, while:

His whole body expressed the utmost deference, and

His mouth was full of conventional platitudes.

When he entered Li P'ing-erh's quarters, what should he see but:

A nimbus of incense encompassing a golden tripod,

Orchidaceous flames smoldering in a silver vessel;

Brocaded curtains surrounding the bed,

With jade hooks symmetrically suspended.

Truly, a secluded realm of splendor and luxury;

It turned out to be yet another grotto heaven.

Hsi-men Ch'ing offered the doctor a chair, to which the doctor responded, "There's no need of that," as he offered his host a chair in return.

When they had both taken their seats, Ying-ch'un propped up Li P'ing-erh's hand on an embroidered cushion, wrapped her jade arm in a brocade handkerchief, and enclosed her slender fingers in her own sleeve, before exposing a segment of her powder-white arm from underneath the bed curtains, so that the doctor could examine her pulse.

The doctor, after:

Cleansing his mind and stabilizing his vital energy, began to evaluate her pulse, finding that her stomach was depleted and her vital energy weak, that her blood was deficient while her liver conduit was hyperactive, that her heart was not clear, that an inflammation had affected her tricalorium, or triple burner,³⁷ and that it was necessary to reduce the inflammation and fortify the blood. He then proceeded:

Citing the appropriate texts and relevant principles, to propound his diagnosis to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Doctor," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it is just as though you had been observing the course of her ailment with your own eyes. You have described her symptoms exactly. This insignificant concubine of mine is possessed of an exceedingly long-suffering disposition."

"That is precisely the source of the problem," said the doctor. "That is why her liver conduit is hyperactive. People do not understand what goes on inside her. The element wood in her liver has overcome the element earth in her stomach, so that the vital energy of her stomach has been weakened. As a result, there is no way for her vital energy to be replenished, or for her blood to be regenerated. The element water in her kidneys cannot sustain the element fire in her heart, so that the fire has ascended into her upper body, and the area of her chest beneath the diaphragm feels congested and painful. She also suffers from periodic pains in the stomach. Because her blood is depleted, her two kidneys and the joints throughout her body all ache, and she has lost her appetite for food and drink. Does that describe her situation?"

"Her symptoms are just as you have described them," said Ying-ch'un.

"You may truly be described as Immortal Jen," exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Where the four diagnostic methods of your noble profession are concerned, namely:

Inspection, auscultation, interrogation, and palpation,³⁸

the fact that you understand the principles of pulse taking so thoroughly that you are able to describe the patient's symptoms without prior interrogation, is my insignificant concubine's good fortune."

The doctor responded with a deep bow and said, "What does your pupil know about anything? It was mostly guesswork on my part."

"You are altogether too modest," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He then went on to ask, "At the present time, what medications should my insignificant concubine take?"

"It is a matter of reducing the inflammation and fortifying the blood," said the doctor. "Once the inflammation has been reduced, the area of her chest beneath the diaphragm will naturally be more comfortable, and when her blood has been regenerated, the pains in her waist and the area of her ribs should cease. Do not assume that this is an ailment of exogenous origin. It is not that at all. The symptoms are all those of deficiency."

He then went on to ask, "Have her menses been regular or not?"

"They have not been dependable," said Ying-ch'un.

"How often do they occur?" asked the doctor.

"Ever since she gave birth to Kuan-ko," said Ying-ch'un, "they have not been what they should be."

"Her original store of vital energy was weak," said the doctor, "and her postpartum conditions have not been stabilized, with the result that her blood has become depleted. It is not a case of blockage that would require purgative medications. Only if she is treated gradually with a regimen of pills can she be induced to come round and make a recovery. Otherwise, her condition will only become worse."

"You have certainly made a perspicacious assessment of the situation," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Right now, I hope that you can first provide a decoction that will alleviate her present pain, after which we can ask for whatever pills you may prescribe."

"That is only appropriate," said the doctor. "After your pupil has returned to his humble abode, he will deliver them immediately. It is not a serious case. It is only necessary to know that these are the symptoms of a deficiency. The pain in her chest beneath the diaphragm is caused by an inflammation and is not of exogenous origin. The unusual pains afflicting her waist and the area of her ribs are due to a depletion of her blood, and not to stagnation of the blood. Once she has taken the prescribed medications, these conditions should naturally be alleviated, one by one. There is no cause for alarm.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Expressed his gratitude without ceasing, and had just gotten up to leave the room, when Kuan-ko woke up and started to cry again.

“This young gentleman has a healthy voice,” said the doctor.

“That may be so,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “but he is too prone to become ill, which is most unfortunate, and poses a hardship for my insignificant concubine, who is:

Unable to rest comfortably on her pillow, both day and night.”

He then proceeded to escort the doctor on his way out.

To resume our story, Shu-t'ung said to Ch'in-t'ung, “When I went to request his attendance just now, he had already gone to bed. I had to knock on the gate for what seemed like half a day before anyone came out to let me in. That oldster was still rubbing his eyes as he came outside, and when he mounted his horse, he kept dozing off so frequently that I was afraid he would fall off the saddle.”

“You had a rough job of it,” said Ch'in-t'ung, “while I had as good a time as could be today. On top of which, I got to drink a bellyful of wine.”

As they were engaged in this idle chat, Tai-an appeared, holding a lantern to light the way for Hsi-men Ch'ing as he escorted the doctor on his way out.

When they got as far as the portico, the doctor wanted to continue on his way, but Hsi-men Ch'ing said, “Please relax and sit down long enough for me to offer you another cup of tea. I can also provide something in the way of ordinary fare or a snack.”

The doctor shook his head and said, “Many thanks for your lavish hospitality, but I cannot presume to accept any more of it,” as he headed straight outside.

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw him onto his horse and deputed Shu-t'ung to hold a lantern and light him on his way home. As soon as he had taken leave of the doctor, he flew inside and directed Tai-an to take a tael of silver and catch up with them, in order to take receipt of the prescribed medications.

They proceeded straight to Dr. Jen's house, where the doctor dismounted and said to the two of them, “Uncles, take a seat and have a cup of tea while I go inside to prepare the medications.”

Tai-an took out the gift box and handed it to the doctor, saying, “Please accept this payment for the medications.”

“We are friends,” said the doctor. “I would not presume to accept any remuneration from your master.”

“I beseech you to accept it before we can feel comfortable about taking possession of the medications,” said Shu-t'ung. “Otherwise, we can hardly agree to accept them. I fear that if we go home with them, we will certainly only be required to deliver them back to you, which will mean an extra trip for nothing. It would be better all the way round if you were to make no bones about accepting the payment, so we can wait for the medications and take them home with us.”

“A fortune told for nothing, is worth nothing,”³⁹ said Tai-an. “I beseech you to accept it.”

The doctor felt compelled to assent, and, seeing that the payment was lavish, he went inside and hastily got together the ingredients for a decoction and poured out a little less than half the pills in a bottle. By the time the two page boys had finished their tea, a reply was sent out from inside for Tai-an and Shu-t'ung to deliver, after which the gate was closed behind them.

When the two page boys arrived home, Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed that the pouch containing the medicine was bulky and said, “Why should there be so much?”

When he tore it open and took a look, he found that the pills were also inside and laughed, saying:

“If you have the money you can make a ghost turn the millstone for you.”⁴⁰
Just now, he said that he would first send the ingredients for a decoction, but now he has sent everything at once. That's fine. That's fine.”

Looking at the pouch containing the ingredients for the decoction, he saw that the inscription on the label read:

Decoction for reducing inflammation and fortifying the blood

Boil in two cups of water, without adding ginger, until reduced to eight parts. Take on an empty stomach. The dregs may be used a second time. Avoid eating bran or wheat flour, or anything greasy, roasted, or fried.

Affixed to the label there was also the imprint of a seal that read:

Dispensary of the hereditary physician, Dr. Jen

The crimson label on the other container read:

Pills of foxglove root to enhance appetite

Hsi-men Ch'ing turned the medications over to Ying-ch'un and directed her to start out by decocting one packet of the powdered medicine. Li P'ing-erh drank some hot water, while Ying-ch'un boiled the medicine, and Hsi-men Ch'ing personally oversaw its preparation.

After straining the dregs out of it, he carried it to Li P'ing-erh's bedside and said, “Sixth Lady, your medicine is here.”

Li P'ing-erh turned over:

Unable to overcome a beguiling tremor, while Hsi-men Ch'ing, holding the decoction in one hand, supported her head and neck with the other. Li P'ing-erh complained that it tasted bitter, and Ying-ch'un promptly fetched some hot water, with which she rinsed out her mouth. Hsi-men Ch'ing ate some congee and washed his feet, after which he lay down to sleep with Li P'ing-erh. Ying-ch'un heated some more water and put something over the kettle to keep it hot, after which she lay down to sleep in her clothes.

Strange to relate,
after Li P'ing-erh had taken this medication, she was able to sleep. Hsi-men Ch'ing also fell fast asleep, but Kuan-ko persisted in wanting to cry. Ju-i was afraid that he would wake Li P'ing-erh, so she gave him her breast to suck, and, before long, they were all sleeping quietly.

The next morning, when Hsi-men Ch'ing was about to get up, he asked Li P'ing-erh, "Are you feeling any better since last night?"

"Strange as it may seem,"

said Li P'ing-erh, "no sooner did I take that medicine than, somehow or other, I fell fast asleep. This morning, I no longer feel any particular pain in my innards. If the condition I was in late last evening had continued unabated, the pain would have been the death of me."

"Heaven be thanked! Heaven be thanked!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing, with a smile. "Right now, if we boil another two cups of water, so you can take a second dose of that decoction, you'll be all well."

Ying-ch'un, accordingly, boiled some more water for her, and she took it as directed. As for Hsi-men Ch'ing, only then did:

His affrighted soul fly off to Java.

How is one to describe such a situation? There is a poem that testifies to this:

Hsi-shih, from time to time, may be wont to knit her turquoise brows;⁴¹
But, luckily, she possesses a transcendent elixir of divine efficacy.
Verily, medicine cures only those diseases which are not fatal;
Beyond a doubt, the Buddha saves only those destined to be saved.⁴²

Chapter 55

HSI-MEN CH'ING OBSERVES A BIRTHDAY IN THE EASTERN CAPITAL; SQUIRE MIAO FROM YANG-CHOU SENDS A PRESENT OF SINGING BOYS

Myriad-year peaches of immortality are brought, while still bedecked with dew;
Brought to the chambers of the grand counselor,
to wish him a hundred years of life.
It is a day for the Eight Immortals to descend, in order to proffer their toasts;
A time for presentation of brocades, featuring seven phoenixes in flowered roundels.
From the six directions and the five waterways¹ come congratulatory scrolls;
From the four barbarian tribes and three isles² are presented exotic rarities.
Hsi-ho should not send the two orbs too swiftly along their appointed paths;³
To allow time to celebrate the birthday of the emperor's grand preceptor.

THE STORY GOES that after Doctor Jen had palpated Li P'ing-erh's pulse, he returned to the reception hall and sat down.⁴

Hsi-men Ch'ing then initiated the consultation by saying, "I do not know what your interpretation of her symptoms might be. Is it nothing to be worried about?"

"This illness of your wife's," said Doctor Jen, "is the result of inadequate care in the treatment of her postpartum conditions. That is the etiology of her ailment. At present, she is suffering from lochiorrhea, her complexion is sallow, she has an indifferent appetite, and she is easily fatigued. In your pupil's ignorant opinion, she needs to be treated with diligent care. Generally speaking, the hardest things to treat from a medical standpoint are the postpartum ailments of women and the complications of children who have contracted smallpox. If the slightest mistake is made in these circumstances, the roots of further pathology may be planted. Right now, the pulses on your wife's two wrists are feeble rather than replete. When palpated, they are both scattered and large, as well as flaccid, and unable to recuperate themselves. These symptoms are all indications of inflammation, resulting from the fact that in the liver the element earth is deficient and the element wood is in the ascendant, causing an abnormal circulation of the depleted blood. If these conditions are not treated at once, they will only grow worse in the future."

When he had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing asked, "Under the present circumstances, what medications are called for?"

"The situation requires medications that will reduce the inflammation and arrest the lochiorrhea," said Dr. Jen. "The principal drugs should be Amur cork-tree bark and anemarrhena, which may be supplemented with foxglove root, skullcap, and the like. If the doses of these ingredients are increased or decreased as observation directs, she should recover."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he told Shu-t'ung to seal up a tael of silver and give it to Dr. Jen as a down payment for the prescribed medications. After expressing his gratitude, Dr. Jen took his leave, and, before long, the prescribed medications were duly delivered, decocted, and administered to Li P'ing-erh in her bedroom. But no more of this.

To resume our story, after seeing Dr. Jen off, Hsi-men Ch'ing came back inside and sat down for a chat with Ying Po-chüeh. It suddenly occurred to him that the time for the celebration of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching's birthday in the Eastern Capital was fast approaching. In anticipation of this event, he had already sent Tai-an to Hang-chou to procure the dragon robes, brocades, floral ornaments of gold, and other precious objects appropriate to offer as birthday gifts, and they had all been duly assembled, so that he could proceed forthwith to the Eastern Capital in order to offer his congratulations in person. Upon calculating that the day in question was drawing near, and that it would take a good half a month's journey to get from Shantung to the Eastern Capital, he realized that he could just make it if he got his baggage together that night and set off the next morning, and that there was no room for further delay. Consequently, he went back to the master suite and explained the situation to Yüeh-niang, thus and so.

"All this time," said Yüeh-niang, "you've neglected to bring the subject up. And now you seem to be all in a rush about it. Just when do you plan to start out?"

"I'll have to start out tomorrow in order to get there in time, and leave myself a few days leeway," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished speaking, he went outside and directed Tai-an, Ch'in-t'ung,⁵ Shu-t'ung, and Hua-t'ung to start getting their clothes and baggage ready, so they could accompany him to the Eastern Capital the next day. Each of the four page boys proceeded to prepare his baggage without delay.

Yüeh-niang then instructed Hsiao-yü, "Go ask your various mistresses to come and help pack your father's bags."

At this juncture, only Li P'ing-erh, because she had to look after her child, on the one hand, and because she was taking medicine, on the other, was unable to leave her quarters. Among the other ladies of the household, Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien, showed up and set about the task of packing the python robes, dragon robes, bolts of silk, and other birthday presents into leather trunks and rattan boxes, making more than twenty carrier loads in all. They also completed the task of getting together the official caps and girdles and other articles of clothing that would be needed in the course of the trip.

That evening, the three ladies provided a feast of wine and delicacies in order to see Hsi-men Ch'ing off. During the feast, Hsi-men Ch'ing communicated several words of instruction to each of the ladies, after which he went into Yüeh-niang's room and retired for the night.

The next day, the twenty carrier loads of baggage were sent ahead, together with a waybill authorizing the shipment and an official tally entitling the bearer to the provision of carriers and horses at the relay stations along the way. Only after all the necessary arrangements had been made did Hsi-men Ch'ing go into Li P'ing-erh's quarters, where he looked in on Kuan-ko and then said a few words to Li P'ing-erh.

"Be diligent in treating your illness," he said. "I'll return home to see you before long."

Li P'ing-erh, with tears in her eyes, said, "Be careful and look after yourself on the road."

Then she escorted him out to the reception hall, where she joined Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and P'an Chin-lien in seeing him off at the front gate.

There Hsi-men Ch'ing got into an open sedan chair, accompanied by the four page boys on horseback, and proceeded to set off for the Eastern Capital. By the time they had wended their way for about a hundred li, evening was approaching, and Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered that they should stop for the night. The station master of the relay station received him and provided for their needs.

After spending the night there, early the next morning, Hsi-men Ch'ing urged the carriers and horses to take up their loads and proceed on their way as expeditiously as possible. Along the way they enjoyed gazing at the:

Lucent hills and limpid streams.⁶

At noon they stopped to prepare a midday meal and then continued on their journey. Those they encountered along the road consisted entirely of regional officials, both civil and military, who were on their way to the capital to congratulate the grand preceptor on his birthday. Those among them who presided over birthday gift convoys for this purpose were without number.

After traveling for another ten days or so, they calculated that there was not much farther to go, and that if they continued their current pace they should be able to arrive at their destination precisely on time. They spent the night on the road and, after another two days of travel, arrived in the Eastern Capital, which they entered through the Myriad Years Gate.

By the time they arrived:

The light was beginning to wane,⁷ and they proceeded directly to Majordomo Chai Ch'ien's quarters in Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching's residence beneath the commemorative arch on Dragon's Virtue Street, where they expected to be put up for the night.

When Majordomo Chai Ch'ien learned that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived, he hastened out to welcome him. After they had exchanged the customary amenities about the weather and had a cup of tea, Hsi-men Ch'ing told Taian to take care of the luggage and see that each and every load was carried into Chai Ch'ien's quarters, where Chai Ch'ien directed a member of the household staff to take charge of them. Chai Ch'ien then laid on a feast in order to refresh Hsi-men Ch'ing after the hardships of the road.

Before long, a carved lacquer table of the kind manufactured for official use made an appearance, laden with several tens of culinary specialties, as well as several tens of side dishes. All of them were:

Delicacies of the most delectable variety,⁸ such as swallow's nest and shark's fin, dishes of the very finest kind. The only items lacking were:

Dragon's liver and phoenix marrow.⁹

Everything displayed:

The utmost discrimination and opulence.

Even the fare provided for the enjoyment of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching himself:

Did not surpass this.¹⁰

The attendants on duty provided goblets made of "Heaven penetrating rhinoceros horn,"¹¹ which they filled with Ma-ku wine.¹² They handed one of them to Chai Ch'ien, who first poured a libation to Heaven and then refilled it and offered a toast to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who responded in kind. After the two of them had resumed their seats, a profusion of candied fruits and hot dishes to go with the wine were served to them, one after another:

Like a stream of flowing water.

After:

Two rounds of wine had been consumed,

Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Chai Ch'ien, "This visit on your pupil's part is motivated solely by the desire to offer his birthday congratulations to the venerable grand preceptor. I have seen fit to provide a few insignificant gifts to show my filial feelings for the grand preceptor, which I anticipate that he will not refuse. But it has been your pupil's wish for some time to become even more closely attached to him. If my kinsman would be so kind as to broach the matter with him in advance, so that I might become a protégé of the grand preceptor's, and be acknowledged by him as an adopted son, I would feel that:

The entire span of my natural life,¹³ will not have been lived in vain. I don't know whether you might be willing to propose this matter to him in order to accommodate your pupil, or not."

"Where's the difficulty in that?" replied Chai Ch'ien. "This patron of ours, although he may be a high official at court, is extremely susceptible to flattery. Upon seeing the lavish gifts that you have provided today, he is certain to augment your office and rank, let alone acknowledge you as an adopted son. He is sure to agree to it."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this:

His delight could not be contained.¹⁴

After they had been drinking for some time, Hsi-men Ch'ing suggested, "Let's not drink any more."

"Have another cup," urged Majordomo Chai Ch'ien. "Why should we stop?"

"Tomorrow there is serious business to attend to," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "so I don't dare have too much to drink."

Only after repeated urging did he consent to have one more cup.

Majordomo Chai Ch'ien saw to it that Hsi-men Ch'ing's attendants were provided with food and wine, and he ordered that the horses should be led back to the stables in the rear. At this point the utensils were cleared away, and he invited Hsi-men Ch'ing to his studio in the back of the mansion where he was to rest for the night. There he found prepared for him an ornate gilt lacquer canopy bed with mermaid silk curtains, held open with silver hooks, revealing a fine embroidered quilt within, that was redolent of incense. After his band of page boys had helped Hsi-men Ch'ing off with his clothes and stockings, he got into bed to:

Sleep by himself in solitary slumber.¹⁵

This was something that Hsi-men Ch'ing had never been used to, and he found it difficult to get through the night. Waiting it out until dawn, he was prepared to get up, but since in Chai Ch'ien's quarters:

The gates and doors were all closed, where was he to get any water with which to wash his face? It was not until 10:00 AM that someone with a key came through to unlock the doors. After this, one page boy came in with a towel, while another came into the studio with a wash basin and filled it with perfumed water. After Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished washing up and combing his hair, he donned his "loyal and tranquil hat," put on his formal outer garments, and sat down all by himself in the studio.

Who should appear at this juncture but Majordomo Chai Ch'ien, who came in, greeted Hsi-men Ch'ing, and sat down. An attendant then brought in a crimson box containing some thirty delectable delicacies, and a silver flagon, from which he poured out wine to go with their breakfast.

"Please go ahead and enjoy your breakfast," said Chai Ch'ien. "Your pupil is going to go into the residence beforehand, and say a word to the master, after which it will be appropriate for you to bring in your gifts."

"You are putting yourself to a lot of trouble on my behalf," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After:

Several cups of wine had been consumed, breakfast was served and eaten, and the utensils were cleared away.

"If you will just sit here for the time being," said Majordomo Chai Ch'ien, "I will go ahead into the residence and be back in no time at all."

After Majordomo Chai Ch'ien had gone on this errand, it was not long before he hurried back to his own quarters and reported to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "His Honor is still in his studio, washing up and combing his hair, while outside, the officials, both civil and military, from the entire court, are waiting in vain for the chance to congratulate him on his birthday. Your pupil has already spoken to His Honor about it. Right now, you can proceed in to offer your congratulations ahead of the rest, so as not to be lost in the crowd, while your pupil will follow right behind you."

On hearing this, Hsi-men Ch'ing was:

Unable to contain his delight, and ordered his attendants, along with several servants from Chai Ch'ien's household, to transport the twenty carrier loads of silver and gold, bolts of silk, etc., out to the front of the grand preceptor's residence. The entire retinue responded with one voice and set about their task without delay, while Hsi-men Ch'ing donned his official cap and girdle and proceeded after them in a sedan chair.

What should he encounter but a confused hubbub created by the crowds of officials, both high and low:

Rubbing shoulders and nudging backs, as they gathered to offer their birthday congratulations. From a distance, Hsi-men Ch'ing caught sight of another official, riding in a sedan chair, on his way into the Dragon's Virtue precinct, whom he recognized, after taking a closer look, to be none other than the now well-to-do gentleman and holder of a supernumerary title as squire, Miao Ch'ing. Who could have anticipated that Miao Ch'ing had also caught sight of Hsi-men Ch'ing. The two of them got out of their sedan chairs, bowed to each other, and exchanged the customary amenities about the weather.

It so happens that Miao Ch'ing was now a substantial man of property and had also acquired a prestige title for himself, in addition to which, he had earlier contrived to become a protégé of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching. That is why he had come to offer his birthday congratulations and happened to run into his old friend. On this occasion, the two of them hastily exchanged a few words by the roadside before taking leave of each other.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived in front of the grand preceptor's mansion, what should he see? Behold:

The hall extends like P'ei Tu's Green Wilderness Hall,¹⁶

Seeming to reach into the cloudy empyrean;

The pavilion rises like T'ai-tung's Ling-yen Pavilion,¹⁷

As though extending right up to the stars.

The area in front of the gate is spacious enough for horses to wheel around;

The memorial posts outside the entrance are fit for the display of banners.

Throughout the forest of brocades,¹⁸

The wind carries the brilliance of the thrushes' cries;

Amid the piles of gold and silver,¹⁹

The sun enhances the fragrance of the flowering trees.

The rafters and beams are crafted out of sandalwood;

The steps and stairs are paved with "sobering stones."²⁰
To either side the ladies forming "fleshly screens,"²¹ are all Hsi-shihs or Red-dusters;²²
Throughout the halls are arrayed valuable antiques, all Chou tripods or Shang vessels.
Shining ever so brightly,
There are twelve luminescent pearls suspended on high;
So that even in the dark of night no lamp oil is needed.
Prestigious in appearance,
Three thousand retainers gather in pearl-studded shoes;²³
Those strumming their sword hilts are all eminent men.²⁴
Though they hail from the Nine Provinces and Four Seas,²⁵
The teeming crowds of officials, both high and low,
Have all come to proffer congratulations.
Even among the grand secretaries of the Six Ministries,
And the supreme commanders of the Three Border Regions,
There are none who do not bow their heads.

Truly:

Second only to the respect due the Son of Heaven, Lord of Ten Thousand Years,
Is the veneration extended to the chief councilor who presides over the court.

Hsi-men Ch'ing made a respectful bow as he approached the main gateway. He noticed that the door in the center was closed, and that the officials all went in through a side door.

"Why is it," Hsi-men Ch'ing asked, "that on such a special day as this, the main door is not open?"

"It so happens," explained Majordomo Chai Ch'ien, "that the main door has been used by the emperor when favoring the grand preceptor with a visit. For this reason, no one else presumes to go in or out through that door."

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Majordomo Chai Ch'ien proceeded through a number of doors, all of which were guarded by military officers, who did not permit the slightest irregularity.

Upon seeing Chai Ch'ien, each of them asked, "Majordomo, where does your guest come from?"

"My kinsman is from Shantung," replied Majordomo Chai Ch'ien. "He has come to congratulate His Honor on his birthday."

After this interrogation, they proceeded through several more doors and turned a number of corners. Everywhere they looked they saw nothing but:

Painted beams and carved rafters,²⁶

as befitted:

The residence of a Chin or Chang.²⁷

They also became aware of the faint sound of drums and music, that Seemed to come from Heaven itself.

Once again, Hsi-men Ch'ing asked about this, saying, "Since, in this location, we are:

Isolated from the homes of the people,

where does this:

Resounding clamor of drums and music, come from?"

"It is created by the female musicians that His Honor is training," replied Majordomo Chai Ch'ien. "They form a troupe of twenty-four persons in all. They know how to perform the Dance of the Daughters of M \bar{a} ra,²⁸ the Dance of Rainbow Skirts,²⁹ and the Dance of Kuan-yin.³⁰ They perform before His Honor during breakfast, at lunch, and at evening banquets. I imagine that at present they are entertaining him at breakfast."

Before Hsi-men Ch'ing had heard him out, his nose sensed:

The aroma of an exotic fragrance,³¹ and the sound of the music drew ever nearer.

"We are now approaching His Honor's studio," said Majordomo Chai Ch'ien. "Walk a little more softly."

After they had traversed a zigzag gallery, what should they see but a large reception chamber that resembled:

A temple hall or an immortal's palace.

In front of this chamber there were cranes such as those ridden by immortals, as well as peacocks and other varieties of rare birds. In addition:

All four seasons produced their never-fading flowers, including alabaster blossoms, night-blooming cereus, and Chinese hibiscus. The entire scene:

Glittered and scintillated,³²

to such effect that:

It is impossible to do it justice.³³

Hsi-men Ch'ing was too diffident to barge in unannounced and asked Majordomo Chai Ch'ien to precede him, after which, he also made his way:

Hesitatingly and punctiliously, to the front of the hall. In the position of honor at the upper end of the chamber, there was placed a grand preceptor's folding armchair,³⁴ covered with a tiger skin, on which there sat a figure, garbed in a crimson python robe. It was the grand preceptor himself. Behind a standing screen, there were arrayed thirty or forty beautiful women, all of whom were dressed in palace style, holding towels and fans, in order to minister to his needs.

Majordomo Chai Ch'ien stood to one side, while Hsi-men Ch'ing faced the upper end of the chamber and kowtowed four times. Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching then stood up and, availing himself of a velvet mat, responded to the homage of his visitor with a single obeisance, in recognition of the fact that this was the first time they had met. After this, Majordomo Chai Ch'ien went up close to Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching, whispered a few words into his ear, and then came back down again.

Recognizing that this colloquy must have pertained to his request, Hsimen Ch'ing, once again, faced the upper end of the chamber and kowtowed four times, while, this time, Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching did not reply in kind. These four kowtows signified that he recognized the recipient as his adoptive father. From that time on, the two of them addressed each other as father and son.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then initiated the conversation by saying, "Your son has no way to adequately express his filial feelings for his father. But since today is your birthday, I have brought a few insignificant gifts from home, merely to express the meaning of:

A goose feather conveyed a thousand li,³⁵ and to say to Your Honor:

May you live as long as the Southern Hills."

"How could I be worthy to accept what you have to offer?" said Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching. "Please have a seat."

An attendant brought in a chair for him, and Hsi-men Ch'ing bowed toward the upper end of the chamber, announced, "I am taking my seat," and then sat down on the west side of the room to have some tea.

Hsi-men Ch'ing Observes a Birthday in the Eastern Capital

Meanwhile, Majordomo Chai Ch'ien ran hastily out to the gate and called for the bearers of the gifts to bring their twenty-odd loads inside, where he had the lids taken off the rattan boxes, and handed up a list of the presents. These consisted of a crimson python robe, a dragon robe of statutory green, twenty bolts of brocade in Han dynasty patterns, twenty bolts of Szechwan brocade, twenty bolts of asbestos fabric, and twenty bolts of cloth imported from the Western Ocean.³⁶ In addition, there were forty bolts of fabrics in flowered and plain patterns, a girdle with a jade plaque depicting the king of the Lion Barbarians,³⁷ a girdle with a plaque of aloeswood encased with gold, ten pairs each of jade cups and cups of rhinoceros horn, eight goblets of pure gold encased with floral designs, ten luminescent pearls, and two hundred ounces of gold for his personal expenditures. All of these things were being offered to Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching as:

The customary presentation gifts.

When Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching had finished perusing the list of presents and observed that some twenty carrier loads had been brought in, he was exceedingly pleased. On the one hand, he expressed his gratitude repeatedly, while telling Majordomo Chai Ch'ien to have them moved into the storehouse, and, on the other hand, he ordered that wine should be served for the entertainment of his guest.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, observing how busy his host was, put forward a pretext for taking leave of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai, to which the grand preceptor responded, "In that case, be sure to come back early this afternoon."

Hsi-men Ch'ing bowed to his host and got up to leave, while Grand Preceptor Ts'ai saw him off for a few steps but did not continue any further. Hsi-men Ch'ing, as before, was accompanied on his way out by Majordomo Chai Ch'ien, who, because he had further business to conduct inside the mansion, then bade him farewell and went back inside.

Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to Chai Ch'ien's quarters, where he doffed his official cap and girdle, consumed another fine repast that had been prepared for him, and then went back to the studio to take a nap.

In due course, Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching sent a houseman to invite him to a party, and Hsi-men Ch'ing rewarded him with some "fan money" and told him, "You go ahead back. I'll follow along shortly."

He then brushed off his official cap and girdle, directed Tai-an to prepare a considerable number of sealed envelopes containing tips and put them into a calling card case, and set off for the grand preceptor's residence in a sedan chair, accompanied by his four page boys. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching had invited each and every one of the officials, both civil and military, from the entire court, who had come to tender their congratulations, to attend a drinking party. Beginning with the next day, they were to come in three contingents. The first day was to be for the distaff relatives of the imperial family and palace eunuchs. The second day was to be for the grand secretaries of the Six Ministries and officials from other prestigious offices. The third day was to be for other officials, both high and low, from the Inner and Outer Courts. An exception was made in the case of Hsi-men Ch'ing alone. On the one hand, because he was a guest who had come from afar, and on the other hand, because he had presented so many gifts, Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching was particularly pleased with him. For this reason, on the actual day of his birthday, he had invited only Hsi-men Ch'ing to come all by himself.

Upon hearing that his newly adopted son, Hsi-men Ch'ing, had arrived, he hastened out to the portico to welcome him in.

Hsi-men Ch'ing repeatedly demurred, saying, "Pray precede me, Father," before bending his back and circumspectly stepping over the threshold.

"I have put you and your entourage to the trouble of coming a great distance," said Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching, "and occasioned you the expense of your magnanimous gifts. The fact that I have invited you over for a brief visit today is merely:

A paltry expression of my heartfelt feelings."³⁸

"The fact that your son is still able to:

Bear Heaven above and tread the Earth below,"³⁹ said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is entirely owing to his father's abundant grace. These insignificant expressions of his respect are:

Scarcely worthy of consideration."⁴⁰

The two of them went on to engage in:

Intimate laughter and conversation, just as though they were really father and son. Meanwhile, the twenty female musicians simultaneously struck up a tune, and the members of the household staff who were on duty served them with wine. Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching wished to offer Hsi-men Ch'ing a preliminary toast, which Hsi-men Ch'ing stalwartly declined, on the grounds that he was unworthy of the honor, but was finally induced to accept, remaining on his feet as he drained it to the bottom. After this, they sat down to the feast.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Shu-t'ung to bring him a gold goblet in the shape of a peach, which he filled to the brim with wine, and then, approaching Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching's seat, got down on his knees before him and said, "May my father live for a thousand years."

Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching's face was suffused with joy as he said, "Get up my son," and, accepting the proffered cup, drained it to the bottom.

Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing get back to his feet and then sit down in his place as before. On this occasion, it being a lavish feast in the residence of the grand councilor, a myriad varieties of exotic rarities were served up, but there is no need to describe all of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing continued drinking with his host until dusk, when he distributed the sealed envelopes containing tips to the various servitors and then expressed his gratitude and took his leave, saying, "Father, I know how busy you are. Your son would like to hereby express his humble thanks. In the days to come I will not presume to seek another meeting with you."

He then proceeded out the gate of the mansion and returned to the quarters of Chai Ch'ien to rest overnight.

The next day he wanted to go pay his respects to Miao Ch'ing and sent Tai-an to find out where he was staying. After the better part of the day, Tai-an succeeded in tracking him down and ascertained that he was living in the residence of Eunuch Director Li Yen,⁴¹ which was located behind the Forbidden City.

Upon making his way there, he sent Tai-an ahead with a calling card to announce his visit, and Miao Ch'ing came out to welcome him, saying, "Your pupil has been sitting here all by himself and was just thinking how nice it would be to have an intimate friend with whom to chat. Your arrival is providential.”

He then insisted on entertaining his visitor with a feast, and Hsi-men Ch'ing could not refuse but consented to remain for the occasion. There and then:

Rare viands from the hills and seas, too many to describe, were laid before them. There were also two singing boys, with:

Clear-cut brows and sparkling eyes,⁴² who opened up their throats and sang several song suites for their entertainment.

During the course of their performance, Hsi-men Ch'ing pointed to Taian, Ch'in-t'ung, Shu-t'ung, and Hua-t'ung and remarked to Miao Ch'ing, “Just look at that bunch of imbeciles. All they care about is their food and drink. How can they be compared to these two of yours?”

Miao Ch'ing laughed and said, “My only fear is that they might not be able to serve you satisfactorily. But if you admire them that much, I would have no problem making you a present of them.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing demurred, saying, “How could I presume to:

Appropriate the source of another's pleasure?”⁴³

They continued drinking until the late watches of the night, when Hsi-men Ch'ing took leave of Miao Ch'ing and returned, as before, to Chai Ch'ien's dwelling to sleep.

During the days that followed, each and every one of the officers on the staff of the grand councilor's mansion insisted on inviting him for a drink, so that he was detained for another eight or nine days.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was:

Anxious to return as swiftly as an arrow,⁴⁴ so he told Tai-an to get his baggage together, but Majordomo Chai Ch'ien tried as hard as he could to get him to prolong his stay. As a result, he felt compelled to spend another evening drinking with him, during which they reiterated their gratification at the fact that they were united by the ties of marriage and felt the greatest affection for each other.

Miao Ch'ing Presents Hsi-men Ch'ing with Two Singing Boys

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing got up bright and early, took leave of his host, and headed back for Shantung. Along the way they suffered the usual vicissitudes of travel:

Sleeping by the waters and dining in the wind,⁴⁵
but no more of this.

To resume our story, ever since Hsi-men Ch'ing had set off for the Eastern Capital to offer his birthday congratulations, the sisterhood of his wife and concubines had anxiously awaited his return, concerned as they were for his safety. For the most part they kept to their quarters, doing needlework, and not coming out to engage in idle pastimes.

Among them, only P'an Chin-lien dressed herself up to look:

As lovely as a flower or a piece of jade,⁴⁶
Making a captivating spectacle of herself, as she sallied forth to join the maidservants in playing at guess-fingers, or competing at dominoes.

She talked, and she laughed, with total abandon, guffawing raucously, heedless of whether anyone saw her or not. All she could think about was how to hook up with Ch'en Ching-chi, the thought of which produced turmoil in her heart and got her all hot and bothered, so that she:

Gave vent to long sighs as well as short, propped her cheek upon her hand, and stared vacantly into space. She kept hoping that Ch'en Ching-chi would come back inside, so they could get down to business together, but what she did not realize was that he was on duty in the shop every day and didn't have time for such things. She would have liked to go out looking for him herself, but there were so many maidservants going back and forth that it was not convenient for her to do so. During the daylight hours, just like:

An ant on a hot plate,
she constantly:

Ran in and ran out,
without being content to sit in her quarters.

One day, when:

The breeze was genial and the sun was warm,⁴⁷

Chin-lien enhanced her person with quantities of aromatic musk and liquid-ambar, walked out behind the summerhouse, and gazed longingly in the direction of the "snow cave." But Ch'en Ching-chi was doing his daily stint in the shop up front and was unable to get away and come into the garden. After gazing for a while without seeing him, all she could do was to return to her quarters:

Take her writing brush in hand, and incant a few lines to herself before jotting them down in the form of a letter, sealing it, and giving it to Ch'un-mei to deliver to Ch'en Ching-chi.

When Ching-chi received it, he tore open the envelope and read it over from the beginning. It turned out to be not an ordinary letter, but the words of a song. When Ching-chi finished reading it, he was so flustered he dropped his business in the shop and rushed inside to the back of the summerhouse, where he proceeded to look around. Lo and behold, when Ch'un-mei had gone back to her quarters and reported to P'an Chin-lien, she lost no time in running out to the summerhouse herself, so the two of them ran into each other there. Just like someone whose:

Hungry eyes have alighted on a melon skin, she couldn't help throwing herself into Ching-chi's arms, pinching his cheeks, and giving him a succession of kisses, in the course of which they sucked each other's tongues so assiduously that the sound of the sucking was quite audible.

"You fickle short-life of a lousy jailbird!" she complained. "Ever since you had to leave after our rendezvous in my room was broken up by Hsiao-yü,⁴⁸ it's been some time since we've been able to meet. In the last few days, since your father-in-law went off to the Eastern Capital, I've been sitting on the k'ang all by myself, longing for you, with the tears streaming from my eyes. Do you mean to say that your ears haven't even gotten hot? I've been thinking things over carefully, and concluded that if you're going to be so fickle, even if you should desert me, I'd simply have to give you up. But when it comes to the crunch, I just can't let you go. It's the old story of:

The fond female and the fickle lover, only you seem to be completely devoid of feeling."

Just as they were beginning to get into it together, who could have anticipated that Meng Yü-lou should catch sight of what they were up to with her sardonic eye. When Chin-lien happened to look up and see that they were being observed, she responded by giving him a shove with her free hand that nearly knocked Ching-chi head over heels, and the two of them hastily went their separate ways. But no more of this.

Later that same day, Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Li P'ing-erh were sitting together, when whom should they see but Tai-an, who came agitatedly running through the door, kowtowed upon seeing Yüeh-niang, and said, "Father is about to get back. I've been riding ahead on horseback, carrying the official tally authorizing the provision of fresh mounts at the relay stations along the way, which is why I've arrived ahead of him. By this time, he must be no more than twenty li from here."

"Have you had anything to eat?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"I had breakfast this morning," said Tai-an, "but I haven't had any lunch."

"Go to the kitchen and get something to eat," said Yüeh-niang, "and tell them to prepare some food for when the master gets home. At that time, our entire sisterhood of wives from all six chambers will go as a group to welcome him in the reception hall."

Truly:

Though the poet may have grown old, Ying-ying remains at hand;

When the gentleman comes home again, Yen-yen will bestir herself.⁴⁹

The four of them engaged in idle chat for some time, when, before they knew it, Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived in front of the gate and dismounted from his sedan chair. The crowd of his wife and concubines welcomed him inside together. Hsi-men Ch'ing and Yüeh-niang exchanged greetings first, after which, Meng Yü-lou, Li P'ing-erh, and P'an Chin-lien greeted him in turn. When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished exchanging the customary amenities about the weather with his wife and concubines from all six chambers, Shut'ung, Ch'in-t'ung, and Hua-t'ung also came in and kowtowed to the ladies, after which, they went to the kitchen to get something to eat.

Hsi-men Ch'ing told them in detail about the hardships he had encountered on the road, about how he had put up at Chai Ch'ien's residence, about Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching's lavish kindness the next day, and about how he had been invited to drinking parties day after day by various palace eunuchs.

He then asked Li P'ing-erh, "How has the child been doing all this time? And how have you been treating your own ailments? Have the medications prescribed for you by Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i proven to be at all effective? Although I made the trip to the Eastern Capital, I haven't been able to get our household affairs off my mind. And I haven't known how business has been going in my various shops. For all these reasons, I've been anxious to get home."

"Nothing has happened so far as the child is concerned," said Li P'ing-erh, "and as for my own state, after taking the prescribed medicine, I've been feeling somewhat better."

Yüeh-niang, on the one hand, directed everyone to help stow away the luggage, in addition to the gifts for the road he had received from Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching, while, on the other hand, she arranged to have a meal prepared for Hsi-men Ch'ing to eat. That evening, she also saw to it that wine was served in order to welcome Hsi-men Ch'ing back home from his trip. Hsi-men Ch'ing elected to spend that night, as well as the next, making two nights in all, in Yüeh-niang's quarters. Truly, their feelings of mutual affection were like:

Encountering sweet rain after a prolonged draught, or

Meeting an old acquaintance when traveling abroad.⁵⁰
But there is no need to describe all of this.

The next day, Ch'en Ching-chi and Hsi-men Ta-chieh came to see him and discussed the accounts for the shop. When Ying Po-chüeh and Ch'ang Shih-chieh heard that he had returned home, they also came to see him.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing came out to greet them, the two of them said with one voice, "Brother, you must have had:

A hard time of it on the road."

Hsi-men Ch'ing told them in detail about the opulence of the Eastern Capital, and about the kindness with which he had been treated by the grand preceptor, to which the two of them responded by expressing no end of wonderment and admiration. That day, Hsi-men Ch'ing retained the two of them and drank with them all day.

When Ch'ang Shih-chieh, or Cadger Ch'ang, was on the verge of getting up to go, he said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I have a request I'd like to make of you, Brother, but I don't know whether you will accede to it or not."

As he spoke, he lowered his face:

Half choking on his words and half spitting them out.

"Pray express yourself without constraint," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"The fact is," said Cadger Ch'ang, "that the house I'm living in is not convenient, and I'd like to find another one to move into, but I don't have the necessary silver. For this reason, I'd like to ask you, Brother, if you'd be willing to help me out. At a future date, of course, Brother, I'd pay you back with interest."

"Among companions like ourselves," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "what need is there to speak of interest? At the moment, however, I'm rather pressed for cash and have no way to come up with the silver. You'll have to wait until my manager, Han Tao-kuo, gets back with his boatload of goods. I should be able to manage it then."

When they had finished speaking, Cadger Ch'ang and Ying Po-chüeh expressed their thanks and departed. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Miao Ch'ing met with Hsi-men Ch'ing in front of the grand preceptor's mansion, he had invited him to a party, and at the party he had promised to make him a present of the two singing boys. On a later day, Hsi-men Ch'ing had been:

Anxious to return as swiftly as an arrow, and consequently had departed for home without saying goodbye to him. Thinking that Hsi-men Ch'ing was still in the capital, Miao Ch'ing sent one of his retainers to Chai Ch'ien's residence to ask after him, only to be told that His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing had set out for home three days before.

Only after this retainer reported back to him did Miao Ch'ing understand what had happened, and he thought to himself, "As the saying goes:

A single word from a gentleman, is like

A single whip stroke to a swift steed.

Under the circumstances, if I don't give them to him, it really wouldn't matter, but if he should hold it against me, it would be hard to remain on speaking terms with him in the future."

Consequently, he called out the two singing boys and said to them, "The other day, when I invited His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing from Shantung to come over for a drink, in the course of the party, I promised to make him a present of the two of you, but I find that he has already left the Eastern Capital to return home. It is, therefore, now my intention to send you to him there. You must pack up your things right away, so that, as soon as I've prepared a letter for him, I can send you on your way."

The two singing boys pled with him together, saying, "We have served you faithfully for some years already, so how can you now consent to get rid of us so callously? Besides, we don't know a thing about the disposition of this Honorable Hsi-men Ch'ing. We hope that you will make an appropriate decision on our behalf."

"You don't know it," said Miao Ch'ing, "but the household of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing is possessed of:

Wealth enough to splash against the sky, and is:

Copiously supplied with gold and silver.

The position he occupies:

Combines both civil and military duties.

And at present he has been acknowledged as an adopted son under the patronage of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching. Even among the palace eunuchs and court officials there are few who are not on intimate terms with him. Out of his home he operates two shops selling silk and satin piece goods, and currently he is also thinking of opening a commercial armed escort service for the protection of goods in transit. The profits he takes in from these enterprises are truly incalculable. Moreover, he is:

Good-natured and agreeable in disposition,⁵¹

given to:

Saluting the breeze and invoking the moon.⁵²

In his home he supports some seventy or eighty maidservants, every one of which is:

Dressed in satins and affects a jacket;

while in his inner apartments he has at his disposal some five or six wives, every one of which is:

Studded with pearls and draped in gold.

Each one of the boy actors and adult troupers that he patronizes borrows money from him and does his bidding. Virtually all of the courtesans from the different streets of the licensed quarter are also the recipients of his favor. All of this goes without saying. The problem is that at that drinking party the other day I promised to make him a present of the two of you, and now you can hardly expect me to go back on my word."

To this the singing boys responded by saying, "Master, over the last few years, who knows how much effort you have expended in training us to play music and sing; and now that we have finally begun to master our stringed instruments, rather than keeping us at home for your own enjoyment, how can you bring yourself to give us away to minister to the pleasure of someone else?"

When they had finished speaking, before they knew it, with a gush, the tears began to flow from their eyes.

Miao Ch'ing, who also felt himself to be:

Wretched and unhappy,⁵³ said, "My little ones, what you say is true enough. I also have wondered why I should feel compelled to do such a thing. But:

If a man is untrustworthy,

How can that be tolerated?⁵⁴

I can scarcely disregard these words, uttered by the sage Confucius himself. Under the present circumstances, there is nothing you can do about it. I'll depute a retainer to escort you there, and write a letter enjoining him to look upon you with a favorable eye. When you get there, you'll have an even happier time of it than you've had in my service here."

He then had his private secretary draft a conventional letter inquiring about the health of the recipient on eight-columned note paper, to which he appended the fact that he was sending him the singing boys and asked him to look favorably upon them. He also had him write out a list of presents, including a bolt of silk and the customary book and kerchief, to serve as indications of his good will, and ordered his servants, Miao Hsiu and Miao Shih, to take charge of these documents, and escort the two singing boys on their journey. In no time at all, their mounts were saddled, and, taking their bags of bedding and luggage with them, they set out for the home of Hsi-men Ch'ing in Shantung.

At the time of their departure, they were unable to suppress their feelings, with the result that:

The tears dripped down their cheeks.⁵⁵

But since:

A master's order is hard to disobey,
there was no alternative, so:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder,
they kowtowed several times, bade Miao Ch'ing farewell:

Vaulted onto their horses, and proceeded to wend their way forward. Behold:

Blue mountains encompass the horse's head,
Green waters surround the traveler's whip;
A wine flag is visible deep in the forest,
Before a thatched hut among sunset clouds.

Only due to the fact that,
Diverting the moving clouds,
The sound of their singing is peerless;
Before they are aware of it,
They must leave a kind master,
To brave the winds and mists of a trip.
The two of them,
Longing for home and thinking of their master,
Have taken the,
Romantic overtones of sandalwood clappers,
The classic tunes "Warm Spring" and "White Snow,"⁵⁶
And completely forgotten them.
The two of them,
Hasting to their goal and speeding on their way,
Think only of,
The early accomplishment of their mission,
Enveloped in stars, proceeding by moonlight,⁵⁷
Forgetting to sleep at night.

Truly:

In the morning they were gifted singing boys in Miao Ch'ing's residence;

But by evening they were merely entertainers in the Hsi-men establishment.

Gazing into the distance, they observed that there was a wine flag suspended deep in a forest of green trees before them.

One of the boy-singers said to the other, "Brother, we've been traveling all day long and are getting rather hungry. Let's stop for a cup of wine before going any further."

Lo and behold, the four of them promptly:

Rolled out of their saddles,⁵⁸ and walked into the wine shop. On the signboard were displayed two lines that put it very well:

Spirits and immortals have deposited their jade girdles;

Ministers and councilors have pawned their golden sables.⁵⁹

Truly, it was a fine wine shop.

The four of them sat down and called for the waiter, telling him, "Draw us two ewers of wine, pound some scallions and garlic, and serve us a large side of pork, together with a few saucers of bean curd and other side dishes."

Just as they were about to:

Unburden themselves and drink lustily, all of a sudden they happened to look around and saw that on the whitewashed wall there were two columns of characters in "flying white”⁶⁰ calligraphy, that read:

A thousand li is not a great distance,
To return after ten years is not late.
So long as we remain in this universe,
Why need we mourn over our separation?

When the eyes of the two singing boys were confronted with these sentiments, they couldn't help feeling affected by them, like:

The apothecary who finds himself to be ill.

Before they knew it, with a gush, two rows of tears began to flow from their eyes.

One of them said to the other, “Brother, we served Squire Miao faithfully, in the expectation that we'd remain together till the end, like:

A plant-stem that reaches all the way to the ground.⁶¹

Who would have thought that in the course of a drinking party:

With a single word or a couple of sentences,⁶²

he would casually give us away to someone else?

People away from home are at a disadvantage.⁶³

Who knows what will happen to us after leaving him?”

Miao Hsiu and Miao Shih attempted to reassure them with soothing words for a while, after which, having eaten a meal, they remounted their horses and resumed their journey.

What with their:

Four horses, and

Sixteen hooves,

they made decidedly good progress. In no more than a few days, they arrived in the vicinity of Ch'ing-ho district in Tung-p'ing prefecture. The four of them, after dismounting and tethering their horse, inquired for directions and eventually found their way to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence on Amethyst Street.

To resume our story, ever since Hsi-men Ch'ing had returned home from the Eastern Capital, he had been kept busy every day by people sending gifts to him, or inviting him to parties, so that day after day was spent carousing with his:

Three friends and four companions.

Not only did Wu Yüeh-niang provide an entertainment to welcome him back from his trip, but he was also obliged to resume intimate relations with each of his concubines in their various quarters, so that, for days on end, he was:

Entranced by the clouds and intoxicated by the rain.

For this reason, he had not even reported to the yamen, or canceled the certificate entitling him to time off from his official duties.

On this particular day, finding himself at leisure, he went to the yamen, where he took his place on the bench, held roll call, reheard the cases of all the defendants who had been brought to court for the crimes of rape, assault, gambling, or larceny, and took the time to sign the documents that had accumulated during his absence. He then got into an open sedan chair and headed for home, escorted by a number of jailers who shouted to clear the way.

Whom should he see upon his arrival but Miao Hsiu, Miao Shih, and the two singing boys, who had been waiting at the gate for some time and now followed his sedan chair to the front reception hall, where they got down on their knees and explained, “We come from Squire Miao Ch'ing of Yang-chou and are the bearers of a letter asking after Your Honor's health.”

Having kowtowed to him, they got up and stood to one side. Hsi-men Ch'ing, after acknowledging their salutation by raising his hand, and telling them to get up, spent some time running through the customary formalities of inquiring about Squire Miao's doings since they parted, and discussing the weather. He then summoned Shu-t'ung and had him cut open the protective outer envelope with a pair of silver scissors, after which he tore open the inner envelope, unfolded the enclosed note, and carefully perused it.

What should he observe at this juncture but Miao Hsiu and Miao Shih, who got down on their knees as before, in order to present the numerous gifts they had brought with them, saying, “These are just a few tokens of our squire's filial sentiments, which we beg that Your Honor will deign to accept.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was:

Unable to contain his delight, promptly told Tai-an to take charge of the gifts, while he invited Miao Hsiu and Miao Shih to get up, saying, “Who would have thought that when your master and I:

Encountered each other a thousand li from home,⁶⁴

Our feelings were genial, our thoughts in accord, to such an extent that the squire, in his boundless good will, promised to make me a present of these singing boys? Thinking at the time that these were merely:

Words uttered in his cups,

I had long since forgotten them. Because I was anxious to get home without delay, I failed to call upon him in order to say goodbye. And now, just as I was thinking about this, who would have thought that, for the squire:

A word of assent is worth a thousand pieces of gold,⁶⁵ so that, even at a distance, he has remembered his promise. I recall that among famous examples of fidelity between men of yore, the pledge of friendship that led Fan Shih to honor his promise to visit Chang Shao at an appointed time though they were a thousand li apart,⁶⁶ in both ancient and modern times:

Is considered to be an exemplary tale.⁶⁷

And nowadays, truly, men such as this squire of yours are not easily come by.”

Praising his strong points and acclaiming his virtue, he continued expressing his gratitude in fulsome detail for some time.

Lo and behold, at this juncture, the two singing boys once again approached him and kowtowed several times, saying, “The squire enjoined us to serve Your Honor faithfully and expressed the hope that you would look upon us with a favorable eye.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing observed that the two singing boys were clean-cut in appearance, and truly:

Both slender and seductive.

Although they may not have been females, who:

Wear their clothes in two pieces;⁶⁸

they were superior to mere girls, whose:

Lips are red and teeth are white.⁶⁹

Hsi-men Ch'ing felt:

As though nothing in Heaven or Earth could make him happier, and celebrated the occasion by inviting his four managers to a party in the front reception hall. On the one hand, he prepared generous gifts of silks and satins and other valuables, and wrote a letter to thank Squire Miao for his consideration, while, on the other hand, he had a room prepared for the two singing boys and told them that he would expect them to wait upon him in his studio.

Lo and behold, when Ying Po-chüeh and company:

Got wind of this affair, and

Were apprised of this event, they all came to see for themselves. Hsi-men Ch'ing accordingly told Tai-an to obtain some dishes of food, appetizers, snacks, and new wine from the rear compound, and lay them out on an Eight Immortals table for the entertainment of his guests. In the course of the proceedings, he called upon the two singing boys to come out and sing for them.

Lo and behold:

Holding up their sandalwood clappers, they started to sing, performing a song suite beginning with the tune “Fresh Water Song”:

In the little garden last night the river plum blossomed,
Bringing with it an intoxicating aura of a different kind.
I welcome the smiles of the pear blossom,
But envy the lissome waist of the willow,
And inquire of the rose-leaved raspberry,
If it blooms till the crab apple flowers.

To the tune “Stopping the Horse to Listen”:

Over the sparse hedge along the country road,
Gust after gust of fragrant breeze attracts the swallows.
By the secluded paving in the little garden,
Flurry after flurry of clearing rain moves past the woods.
Her fragrant heart remains undetected by the butterflies;
Her subtle fragrance has not yet been scented by the bees.
As she leans over every balustrade,
Who knows how many heartbreaking thoughts she is beset by?

To the binary tunes “Wild Geese Alight” and “Victory Song”:

Lo and behold: in the azure shade, Hsi Shih knits her brows.
With red drops, petals are stained by the cuckoo's pearly tears;
Dancing about, sprigs of flowers adorn shiny silken caps;
Fluttering airily, blossoms cascade down before the belvedere.

As ever, their fragrant aura permeates one's garments;
But their alluring forms are easily soiled in the mud.
Where they fall the fish are startled;
As they flutter hither, the butterflies become confused.
She wonders to herself,
“To whom can I entrust my yearning?”
And sorrows that,
The Peach Blossom Spring remains beyond her reach.

Hsi-men Ch'ing nodded with approval and exclaimed, “Sure enough, your singing is superb.”

The two singing boys made a half obeisance by falling to one knee before him and said, “We've also learned the words to a set of four lyrics, which we can perform for you while we're at it, if you like.”

“That would be even better,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, and directed them to proceed. To the tune “The Whole River Is Red”:

Tearing off a strip of Shantung silk,
With the aid of pigments and backing,
One depicts the scene of a herd boy in the spring.
The grass is short,
Spread out evenly over the level fields.
He sits idly on his brown water buffalo calf.
With a tattered volume in one hand, perched securely on the buffalo's back,
He sounds a few notes on his short flute, while traversing the emerald mist.
Thinking to indite a verse to go with the picture, one tries to compose a new lyric, Putting the imagination to work.

If the composition is good enough,
It may be preserved in the Palace Library.
If the tune is sufficiently catchy,
It may be set to woodwinds and strings.

If sung without accompaniment,
Though the classic tune “Warm Spring” is hard to match,
The connoisseurs of a generation may yet praise it.
It will appeal to every taste, and people may compete to transcribe it.
If one can only emulate the master who imagined the writing of the “Kao-t’ang fu,”⁷⁰
The sentiment of the lyric will suffice.

To the same tune:

One delineates a scene of summer plowing.
Beyond the suburban plain,
The paths between the fields run east and west.⁷¹
The village commons are irregular,
Encircled by the turquoise hues of the hills.
The embankments and dikes are interconnected.
The color green pervades the enclosed fields, teeming with millet and rice.
The ears of wheat are densely clustered; silkworms fill their frames.
And there also appears to be a stream circling the wattled gate,
By the sheer slopes of the hills.

Someone is leaning on a bamboo staff,
Skirting the hills and valleys,
Traversing the woods and marshes,
Listening to the gibbons and cranes.
His son is plowing, his wife brings a hamper,
As they cooperate in the work of cultivation.
The tall trees provide ample shade where they settle down to rest.
Stroking their bulging bellies, they relax by stretching out their feet.
If one can only emulate the master who imagined the composing of the “Airs of Pin,”⁷²
The pleasures of rural life will be conveyed.

To the same tune:

When one has finished applying the colors,
The new picture turns out well,
Embellished as it is with streams and hills.
Faintly discernible,
There are sand spits beyond the riverbanks,
Green clover fern and red smartweed.
A stream of autumn light seems to connect the shorelines.
A figure in a short rain cape and bamboo hat is perceptible amid misty waves,
Trying to estimate how many fresh fish he has netted by this time;
But the perch are small.

Fishermen's songs arise,
Flying geese are remote,
The river moon is white,
Returning clouds are few.
Leaning by his matted window, he looks out for,
His sworn friends, the sea gulls.
One is tempted to ask how the forgotten concerns of the past,
Can be compared with the tranquillity of his present situation.
If one can only emulate the master who imagined, the singing of the song “Blue Waters,”⁷³
One will rise above the dust of the world.

To the same tune:

On all sides the clouds are lowering;
The frozen flakes scatter,
Evenly covering the thatched dwelling.
The red brazier is warm,
In which his wife is baking sweet potatoes.
Pouring out vintage wine for himself,
The cottager tasks a servant to fetch fuel from outside the gate,
And calls to his son, who is playing with a crane in the courtyard.
If one can succeed in capturing this scene, and conveying it in a picture,⁷⁴
It will gladden the mind's eye.

Wealth and distinction,
Are bestowed by Heaven;
To keep clear of excess,
Is one's only ambition.
Giving beauty and wonder free expression,
One adorns the scroll with fine lyrics.
Fearing lest one's own talent for poetic effusions be lacking,
One gives way to one whose literary devices are up to the task.
If one can only emulate the master who imagined the joys of “mulberry and elm,”⁷⁵
One's countenance will be like jade.⁷⁶

Sure enough:

Their tones divert the moving clouds;⁷⁷
Their songs create a new “White Snow.”

The quality of their performance induced the ladies from the rear compound, Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li P'ing-erh, to come and listen. They were all exceedingly delighted by it and exclaimed, “How well they sing!”

Lo and behold, from her vantage point amid the crowd, P'an Chin-lien focused her gaze directly on the two singing boys and quietly muttered to herself, "These two youngsters not only sing well, but, in appearance, they are as handsome as can be."

In her heart, she had already registered something of a partiality for them.

At the time, Hsi-men Ch'ing arranged for the two singing boys to stay in an anteroom on the eastern side of the front courtyard. On the one hand, he directed that a meal should be provided for Miao Hsiu and Miao Shih, while, on the other hand, he prepared appropriate presents, and a reply, expressing his gratitude to Squire Miao Ch'ing.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 56

HSI-MEN CH'ING ASSISTS CH'ANG SHIH-CHIEH;

YING PO-CHÜEH RECOMMENDS LICENTiate SHUI

Those who endeavor to amass gold by the peck, emulating the luxury of the "untitled nobility,"¹
Are as deluded as was Chuang Chou in the dream in which he imagined himself to be a butterfly.²
One has heard tell that the magnificence of the Citadel at Mei proved difficult to perpetuate;³
Who would have thought that the wealth extracted from the Copper Mountains could be exhausted?⁴
Nowadays Pao Shu-ya is praised for the way in which he divided the proceeds with Kuan Chung;⁵
In former times P'ang Yün was laughed at for choosing to sink his entire fortune in the sea.⁶
As one approaches the inevitable end of life's journey, who can be said to be a bosom friend?
It is only such a noble friend who can continue to pay due honor to the customs of antiquity.

THE BURDEN of the above eight lines of regulated verse is simply that:

For humans residing in this world,⁷ Glory and luxury, wealth and honor, cannot be retained forever. One fine day, when:
Impermanence, or death, visits you,⁸ no matter how much you may have in the way of:
Piled up gold and accumulated jade,⁹
you will wind up:
Returning to the shades empty-handed.
Because Hsi-men Ch'ing was so:
Chivalrous by nature and open-handed with his wealth,
as well as being:
Willing to lend aid to those in poverty and distress, everyone sang his praises. But no more of this.

That day, Hsi-men Ch'ing retained the two singing boys to await his pleasure, telling them, "When I have occasion to call upon you:
You must not be disobedient."¹⁰

The two of them nodded their assent and withdrew.

He then saw to the preparation of a reply and return gifts to entrust to the retainers from the Miao household, and he also rewarded them with some silver. Miao Shih and Miao Hsiu kowtowed to him in gratitude and then made their departure.

Later on, because Hsi-men Ch'ing found no use for the two singing boys, he ended up making a present of them to the grand preceptor's household. Truly:

When one has spent thousands in gold¹¹ teaching her how to sing and dance;

One must bequeath her to someone else to provide pleasure during his youth.¹²

To resume our story, Ch'ang Shih-chieh, or Cadger Ch'ang, from the time he had asked for Hsi-men Ch'ing's assistance at the party on a previous occasion, did not yet have anything to show for it. Moreover, day and night, his landlord had been pressing him incessantly for his arrears. It so happened that, ever since Hsi-men Ch'ing had come home from the Eastern Capital, he had been invited out to parties to celebrate his return day after day, so that ten days in a row had gone by without Cadger Ch'ang's having a chance to meet with him. As the saying goes:

Even when people meet face to face, it is hard to express everything.

If one cannot even arrange a meeting, to whom is one to make an appeal? Every day, he asked Ying Po-chüeh to accompany him in going to Hsi-men Ch'ing's front gate and asking after him; only to be told that he was not at home, and having to return empty-handed.

Moreover, when he arrived home, his wife berated him, saying, "You claim to be a male of the species, a man of mettle, and yet you don't even have a house to call your own and have to put up with all this annoyance. You customarily boast of your friendship with His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing, yet today, when you ask a favor of him, it's like a pitcher falling into the water."

She railed at Cadger Ch'ang so effectively that:

Though he had a mouth he was left speechless, and could only stare vacantly into space, without daring to utter a word.

The next day, he got up early, sought out Ying Po-chüeh, and invited him to join him in a visit to a wine shop. What should they see there but a small thatched hut, situated by a bend in a flowing stream.¹³ In front of the door, amid the shade of the green trees, a wine flag was visible, and five or seven workers were seen to be busily engaged in carrying in supplies of wine and meat. Across the front of the shop there was a counter, over which there were suspended fresh fish, geese, ducks, and the like. It was really a nice clean place to sit, so he invited Ying Po-chüeh to share three cups of wine with him in the shop.

"I really ought not to put you to the trouble," demurred Ying Po-chüeh, but Cadger Ch'ang dragged him into the shop, and they sat down together.

The waiter measured out some wine for them and laid out a platter of smoked pork, and a platter of fresh fish.

After:

Two rounds of wine had been consumed,

Cadger Ch'ang said, "With regard to that matter that I have asked you to speak to His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing about, for some days now we haven't been able to arrange a meeting with him. Meantime, my landlord has been pressing me hard for my arrears, and last evening my wife bickered with me about it for half the night. Not being able to put up with it anymore, I extricated myself at the fifth watch this morning, only to implore you, Brother, to join me in taking advantage of the earliness of the hour to wait patiently outside his gate and waylay him before he goes out. What do you think of this proposal, Brother?"

Ying Po-chüeh replied:

"Once one has acceded to someone's request,

It is imperative to see the job through to the end."¹⁴

Today, for better or for worse, I'll make sure that His Honor helps you out, that's all there is to it."

The two of them shared another few cups of wine, after which Ying Pochüeh protested, "We'd better not drink any more so early in the morning."

Cadger Ch'ang urged him to have another cup, after which he settled the score, and they left together, going straight to the residence of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

At that time, it was early in the fall, and:

The metallic autumn wind was brisk.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had gotten drunk for several days in a row and was feeling somewhat under the weather, had received yet another invitation to a drinking party from Eunuch Director Chou, which he had found some pretext for refusing. Instead, he was relaxing in the Hidden Spring Grotto in his garden.

It so happens that the Hidden Spring Grotto in the rear of Hsi-men Ch'ing's garden was surrounded by fruit-bearing trees and fresh flowers, which:

Flourished throughout the four seasons.

At this time, although it was early autumn, an incalculable number of flowers were blooming in the garden. Hsi-men Ch'ing, being at home with nothing to do, was enjoying himself in the flower garden with Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li P'ing-erh, five of them in all. On his head, Hsi-men Ch'ing wore a "loyal and tranquil hat." On his body he wore a long gown of willow-green moiré, and white-soled boots. Yüeh-niang was wearing a willow-green jacket of Hang-chou chiffon that opened down the middle, over a light blue skirt of water-patterned pongee, and gold-red phoenix-toed, high-heeled shoes. Meng Yü-lou was wearing a raven-black satin jacket, over a skirt of gosling-yellow pongee, and peach-red high-heeled shoes of plain silk with purpled gold-spangled edging. P'an Chin-lien was wearing a pink crepe blouse that opened down the middle with a white chiffon lining, and a vest of gold-red material with a bright green border, over a skirt of white Hang-chou chiffon with a decorated border, and high-heeled shoes of pink patterned silk. Only Li P'ing-erh was wearing a wide-lapelled jacket of plain blue Hang-chou chiffon, a skirt of finished pale blue moon-colored chiffon, and light blue plain silk high-heeled shoes. The four of them:

Seductively and bewitchingly, kept Hsi-men Ch'ing company while he enjoyed himself:

Scanning the flowers and inspecting the willows.¹⁵

To resume our story, when Cadger Ch'ang and Ying Po-chüeh got as far as the reception hall and learned that His Honor was at home, they sat down happily and waited for what seemed like half a day, but no one appeared. What should they see at this juncture but Shu-t'ung and Hua-t'ung, who came in the gate from outside, panting for breath, and carrying a trunk full of satin and chiffon clothing.

Calling out agitatedly, "We waited half a day and were only able to pick up half the order," they set the trunk down in the reception hall.

"Where has your master gotten to?" Ying Po-chüeh asked them.

"Father is in the garden enjoying himself," replied Shu-t'ung.

"May I trouble you to say a word to him?" said Ying Po-chüeh.

The two of them, carrying the trunk as before, then proceeded inside.

Before long, Shu-t'ung came out and said, "Father requests Master Ying the Second and Uncle Ch'ang the Second to wait a bit. He'll be right out."

The two of them sat down and waited a while longer before Hsi-men Ch'ing finally came out. After they had saluted him with a bow, they were asked to resume their seats.

"For days on end, it seems," said Ying Po-chüeh, "Brother has been so busy attending drinking parties that he hasn't had any time to himself. How do you happen to be at home today?"

"Ever since the last time I saw you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've been invited out to drinking parties every day and have been as drunk as can be, which has left me completely enervated. I was invited out to another party today, but I concocted a pretext for not going."

"Where did that trunkful of clothing that was carried in just now come from?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"At the present time, autumn has already begun," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and everyone needs to be supplied with autumn clothing.

That trunkful just now was for your senior sister-in-law, but they haven't finished completing the order. That was only the first half of it."

Cadger Ch'ang stuck out his tongue in disbelief and said, "In that case the six chambers of my sisters-in-law will require six trunkloads. What a lot of expense that will entail. As for such mean folk as ourselves, we can hardly afford a single bolt of cotton. The fact that you can arrange to have so many clothes of satin and chiffon made up for you is an indication, Brother, that you have become a real plutocrat."

This remark induced a fit of laughter on the part of Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ying Po-chüeh.

"How is it," asked Ying Po-chüeh, "that during these last few days your boatload of goods from Hang-chou has not yet been seen to arrive? I wonder how the business is going. As for that money that you promised the other day to Li the Third and Huang the Fourth, you agreed that when the money owed you by Hsü the Fourth outside the gate came into your hands, you would use it to make up the sum you promised to turn over to them."

"That boatload of goods," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "seems to have been delayed somewhere or other, and they haven't even sent me a letter about it. It's a real cause for concern. As far as the money for Li the Third and Huang the Fourth is concerned, I have done as you suggested."

Ying Po-chüeh moved his seat closer to that of Hsi-men Ch'ing and took advantage of the occasion to say, "Regarding that matter that Brother Ch'ang the Second besought your help about the other day, you have been so busy since then that he hasn't had a chance to speak to you about it. Brother Ch'ang the Second's landlord has been pressing him so hard for his arrears that he is being driven to distraction. His wife, too, is berating him about it every day, so that he has been reduced to paralysis and doesn't know what to do. Right now, the autumn days are getting colder, and the fur coat he would normally wear is in hock in the pawnshop. Brother, if you are goodhearted about it, as the saying goes:

If you want to help someone, you must do it when they need it the most.¹⁶

That would also spare him the:

Incessant bickering,¹⁷

that his wife subjects him to in their room, day and night. What is more, if he can find a proper house to live in, the figure that he cuts in society will only serve to enhance your prestige. For this reason, Brother Ch'ang the Second has asked me to come here for the sole purpose of beseeching you to come to his assistance as soon as possible."

"I originally promised him that I would do so," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "But, because my trip to the Eastern Capital cost me a lot of silver, I had planned to wait until Manager Han Tao-kuo returned from his excursion before taking care of it. Since he is in need of a house, I will weigh out the silver required for him to buy it if it is now such an urgent matter."

"It's not so much an urgent matter for Brother Ch'ang the Second," said Ying Po-chüeh, "as it is that he can't stand his wife's nagging. That is why he feels compelled to ask you to take care of it as soon as possible."

Hsi-men Ch'ing hesitated for some time before saying, "If that's the case, it won't be all that difficult. Let me ask you, though, how much of a house will suffice for him to live in?"

"The two of them," responded Ying Po-chüeh, "will need a front room opening onto the street, a sitting room for the entertainment of guests, a bedroom, and a kitchen, those four rooms at a minimum. As for the price, it will certainly amount to more than three or four taels of silver. Brother, see if you can't, sooner or later, get together an appropriate amount, and enable him to complete this transaction."

"Today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll give him a few pieces of loose silver to start off with. He can use them to buy himself a coat, purchase some furniture, and take care of his current expenses. After he has located a suitable house for himself, of course I'll weigh out the required amount of silver for him, so that he can complete the transaction. How would that be?"

The two of them thanked him with one voice, saying, "Brother, such good-heartedness is a rare thing."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then called for Shu-t'ung and told him, "Go ask the First Lady for the packet of loose silver in the leather case, and bring it back with you."

Shu-t'ung nodded assent and went off on his errand. Before long he came back out with a packet of silver and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Cadger Ch'ang, "This packet of loose silver contains twelve taels of silver left over from the sealed envelopes containing tips that I took with me on my visit to the grand preceptor's mansion in the Eastern Capital. You take them and use them for your miscellaneous expenses."

He then opened up the packet and showed the contents to Cadger Ch'ang, which consisted entirely of loose lumps of inscribed silver weighing three to five mace apiece. Cadger Ch'ang accepted them, put them in the sleeve of his gown, and bowed his thanks.

"These last few days," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it has not been my intention to delay the fulfillment of my promise. I have only been waiting for you to locate a suitable house, at which time I would complete the transaction with you at one stroke. And you haven't located a house yet. Right now, you should do your best to locate one as soon as possible, and then, when I have the silver in hand, I'll be prepared to weigh it out for you, that's all."

Cadger Ch'ang, once again, expressed his gratitude repeatedly. The three of them sat down as before, and Ying Po-chüeh said, "There are numerous cases among the men of old who:

Hsi-men Ch'ing Comes to the Assistance of Cadger Ch'ang

Disdained wealth and practiced philanthropy,¹⁸ in which, later on, their descendants succeeded in:

Enhancing the height and size of their gates,¹⁹ significantly increasing the estates of their ancestors. Among the stingy, on the other hand, who were only interested in accumulating gold and valuables for themselves, there are many cases in which, later on, their descendants turned out badly, and not even the graves of their ancestors were preserved. From this it is clear that:

The Way of Heaven favors reversion."²⁰

"Money," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is something which:

Likes movement and dislikes inertia.

It will not allow itself to be immured in any one place. And it is designed by Heaven for human use. For every person who accumulates a surplus there will be another who suffers a deficiency. It is very wrong, therefore, merely to pile up wealth and valuables."

There is a poem that testifies to this:

There are those who are not happy unless they can accumulate jade and pile up gold;²¹
They remain unaware that wealth and valuables are merely the roots of catastrophe.
They treasure every single cash as though it were a part of their flesh and blood;
While those who are chivalrous by nature can only laugh at them for their inanity.
They treat each one of their relatives and friends as if they were total strangers;

They preserve a facade, but their hearts are dead, which is certainly regrettable.
One can anticipate that one fine day impermanence, or death, will pay them a visit;
And they will proceed, empty-handed and all alone, to the abode of everlasting night.

As they were speaking, who should appear but Shu-t'ung, who brought out some refreshments for them. When they had finished eating, Cadger Ch'ang thanked his host, stood up to go, and went happily home with the silver tucked in his sleeve.

He had scarcely entered the door, when his wife came noisily out to meet him and berated him in a strident voice, saying:

“When the leaves fall off the phoenix tree,²²

Nothing is left but a trunk of ‘bare sticks.’

You good-for-nothing! You've been gone the whole day, leaving your wife to starve at home. And now you come back with:

A thousand or ten thousand signs of joy.²³

How can you be anything but ashamed of yourself? You don't have a house to call your own, which only elicits the contumely of our neighbors, but you leave it to the ears of your wife to suffer their abuse.”

Cadger Ch'ang did not even open his mouth but waited until his wife had finished her tirade before gently groping the silver out of his sleeve and placing it on the table.

Opening up the packet and gazing at it, he said, “My ‘square-holed brothers’! My ‘square-holed brothers’!²⁴ You are truly:

A priceless treasure, and when I contemplate your shining and jingling qualities:

My whole body turns numb with delight.²⁵

I only wish I could swallow you whole, like a mouthful of water. If you had only come my way a little earlier, I wouldn't have had to put up with all the quarreling this whore has subjected me to.”

When the woman clearly saw that there was a pile of twelve or thirteen taels of silver in the packet, she started forward in her excitement, as though she intended to seize it from the hands of her old man.

“You're congenitally given to abusing your husband,” exclaimed Cadger Ch'ang, “but, no sooner do you see silver in the picture, than you want to cozy up to him. Tomorrow, I'll take this silver to buy a new outfit of clothes for myself, and go live somewhere else, so I won't have to fool around with you anymore.”

Putting a smile on her face, the woman said, “My dear, where did it ever come from, all this silver?”

Cadger Ch'ang did not deign to reply.

“My dear,” the woman went on to say, “no doubt you resent all I've had to say to you. But my only desire has been for your success. Now that you have the silver, we ought to discuss what to do, buy a house for ourselves, and settle down. Wouldn't that be the best thing to do, instead of carrying on like this? As your wife, I haven't been remiss in any way. You can resent me if you like, but it isn't just.”

Cadger Ch'ang, again, did not deign to open his mouth.

The woman continued to chatter away, but, when she noticed that Cadger Ch'ang was not paying any attention to her, she began to feel some compunction about the situation and couldn't help giving way to tears.

When Cadger Ch'ang saw this, he sighed, saying, “For a woman, who:

Neither plows nor weaves,²⁶

you certainly give your old man a hard time!”

At this, the woman wept even more copiously, and the two of them lapsed into silence. There being no one there to admonish them to make up, they simply sat there, sunk in depression.

Cadger Ch'ang with Silver in Hand Lords It over His Wife

Finally, Cadger Ch'ang thought to himself, "It is not easy to be a woman. She has had to put up with a lot of hardship and can hardly be blamed if she resents me for it. Now that I have some silver today, if I don't pay her any attention, people will say that I'm hardhearted. Even His Honor, if he finds out about it, will judge me to be in the wrong."

Turning to the woman with a smile, he said, "I was only having some fun with you. I don't hold anything against you, it's just that you're constantly nagging me. This morning, I couldn't stand it any longer, so I made a point of inviting Brother Ying the Second to join me for three cups of wine in a tavern, and then accompany me on a visit to His Honor's place. Providentially, he happened to be at home and had not gone out drinking anywhere. It was only thanks to the efforts of Brother Ying the Second, who gave his lips and tongue a real workout on my behalf, that I ended up with this silver in hand. And he also elicited a promise from His Honor that when we find a house, he will weigh out the necessary silver in order to close the deal for us. These twelve taels, he told me, were merely an advance that we can use to cover our daily expenses."

"So it turns out that this is really a gift to you from His Honor," the woman said. "We mustn't allow it to be wasted. You must find a winter coat for yourself, in order to fend off the cold."

"That's just what I wanted to discuss with you," said Cadger Ch'ang. "If we use these twelve taels of incised silver to buy a few items of clothing, and a few articles of furniture, once we have a new house to move into, we'll look a little better off. We can't thank His Honor enough for his generosity. On a later day, when we have moved into our new house, we'll have to invite him over for a visit."

"We'll have to wait until the time comes," said the woman. "We can decide what to do then."

Truly:

It has always been true that gratitude for kindness and festering resentment;
Even in a thousand or ten thousand years will never be allowed to gather dust.

After Cadger Ch'ang and his wife had talked things over for a while, the woman asked, "Did you have anything to eat while you were over there?"

"I did have something to eat at His Honor's place," said Cadger Ch'ang. "If you haven't had anything to eat, let's take some of this silver and buy some rice with it."

"Be careful how you keep that packet of silver fastened up," the woman said. "I'll wait for you. Come back right away."

Cadger Ch'ang took a wicker basket and went out onto the street. Before long, when he came back after buying the rice, there was also a large hunk of mutton lying in the basket.

When he came rushing back, laughing out loud, the woman met him in the doorway and said, "This hunk of mutton! What on earth did you buy that for?"

"Just now you were complaining about all the hardships you had suffered," said Cadger Ch'ang with a smile. "Not to mention this bit of mutton, I really ought to have had several oxen slaughtered in order to treat you."

"You heartless louse!" the woman scolded Cadger Ch'ang with a laugh. "Today I'll just store up the resentment in my heart and wait to see how you treat me in the future."

"I can foresee," said Cadger Ch'ang, "that one of these days, though you may plead with me ten thousand times, saying, 'Darling, spare this little whore of yours,' I'll refuse to spare you. Just try your luck and see."

When the woman heard this, she merely laughed while she went out to the well to draw some water.

There and then, the woman cooked up some rice, cut up a bowl of mutton, and placed them on the table, saying, "Come have something to eat, dear."

"I've already eaten at His Honor's place," said Cadger Ch'ang. "I don't want anything. You're as hungry as can be. Just help yourself."

The woman then proceeded to eat it all up by herself, and clear away the utensils, before sending Cadger Ch'ang out to buy the clothes.

Cadger Ch'ang put the silver in his sleeve and headed straight for Main Street, where he looked over the wares in several shops before finding anything that suited him. In the end, he merely bought a blue woman's jacket of Hang-chou chiffon, a green pongee skirt, a pale blue moon-colored blouse of cloud-patterned silk, a red satin jacket, and a skirt of white pongee, five items in all. To match these purchases, he bought for himself a gosling-yellow satin jacket, a long robe of lavender-colored pongee, and several items of coarse cotton clothing. Altogether, he spent six taels and five mace of silver.

Wrapping all of these items up in a single package, he came home carrying it on his back and told the woman to open it up and see what it contained.

The woman promptly opened it up to take a look and then asked, "How much did it cost?"

"I was able to get it all for six taels and five mace of silver," replied Cadger Ch'ang.

"Although they weren't cheap," the woman said, "they were good value for that amount of silver. On the one hand, we should get out a trunk and pack them safely away, while tomorrow we can go and buy some furniture."

That day the woman went about her daily tasks:

As though nothing in Heaven or Earth could make her happier;
while all her customary complaints were:

Relegated to that great sea, the Eastern Ocean.

But no more of this.

To resume our story, after Ying Po-chüeh and Hsi-men Ch'ing had sent Cadger Ch'ang on his way, the two of them continued to sit together in the reception hall as before.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then reopened the conversation, saying, "Though I am merely a military official and am only able to maintain the sort of front that I do, I have managed to become acquainted with quite a few officials serving both inside and outside the capital. And recently I have also been acknowledged as a protégé of the grand preceptor. As a consequence, the number of letters and cards going back and forth has become:

Like a stream of flowing water.

I don't have the spare time to devote to it, so that a good deal of it is not properly dealt with. I would very much like to find a live-in social secretary, to whom I could turn over the task of handling this correspondence for me. It would be very helpful to be spared this expenditure of effort. The only trouble is, I haven't been able to locate anyone with the requisite talent and learning. If you happen to know of such a person, let me know about it. I will undertake to find an empty room to accommodate him and will also provide him with an annual stipend of several taels of silver for the support of his family. If it should turn out to be someone with whom you are on intimate terms, so much the better."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh:

"If you had not spoken, I would not have known.²⁷

If you were looking for any other sort of person, they would be readily available, but this particular sort of person is hard to find. Why is this the case? In the first place, it must be someone with the requisite talent and learning. In the second place, it must be someone of personal integrity, and also someone with whom you can get along. You're better off without anyone who:

Engages in the pros and cons of idle tattle,²⁸ or:

Wiggles his lips and waggles his tongue;²⁹ and, as for persons of mediocre talent and learning, who are old hands at chicanery, what use would you have for them?

"The only person I can think of is the grandson of an old friend of my grandfather's. At present he holds the rank of a licentiate in this subprefecture. He has taken the provincial examinations several times but did not succeed in passing. The talent and learning he has acquired actually make him superior to Pan Ku or Ssu-ma Ch'ien, while, as for his personal integrity, he is in a class with Confucius and Mencius. Because of the long-standing relationship between our families, he is like a brother to me. We are extremely close.

"I remember that when he took the provincial examinations ten years ago, the examining official praised his two essays on public policy to the skies. But, who could have anticipated that there was another candidate whose essays were even better, so that he did not pass. Since then, he has taken the examinations several more times but has been unsuccessful, with the inevitable result that the hair on his head and around his temples has become speckled with white. Right now, he is:

A scholar at large with his books and sword.³⁰

But his family still possesses more than fifteen acres of arable land, and three or four houses, which are fit to live in."

"That ought to be more than enough to maintain his family," remarked Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Why should he be willing to hire himself out as a live-in secretary in someone else's place?"

"The land and houses that he formerly possessed," said Ying Po-ch'üeh, "have all been purchased by more affluent families, so that, right now, he has nothing left but the skin on his two hands."

"So the land that you mentioned has already been sold off," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What does that amount to?"

"True enough, that doesn't amount to anything," said Ying Po-ch'üeh. "But he has a wife who is only about nineteen years old and is exceedingly attractive, as well as two children who are just two or three years old."

"If he's got an attractive wife," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "why should he be willing to take a job away from home?"

"The good news on that front," said Ying Po-ch'üeh, "is that two years ago his wife, who was addicted to extramarital affairs, ran off to the Eastern Capital with someone, and his two children have died of smallpox, so he is the only member of the household left. Of course, he'd be willing to take a job away from home."

"In that case," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you're really doing a job on him. It's all folderol. Tell me, what is his surname?"

"His surname is Shui," said Ying Po-ch'üeh. "His talent and learning are really incomparable. If you were to employ him, Brother, I guarantee that every last one of the poems, lyrics, songs, or rhapsodies that he might compose would serve to augment your stature. When people saw them, they would all say to themselves, 'His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing is certainly possessed of talent and learning.'"

"The first two things you mentioned about him just now," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "turned out to be humbug. I don't believe this humbug of yours. If you happen to remember any compositions of his, recite them for me. If they impress me favorably, I'll invite him to become a member of my household, and set aside a room for him to live in. Since it's only a matter of a single individual, it should be easy to manage. We can just pick an auspicious day and invite him over, that's all."

"I can remember something of a letter he sent me," said Ying Po-ch'üeh, "asking if I could help him find an employer. I recall a few lines of it, which I'll recite for your delectation. To the tune 'Yellow Oriole':

This letter is addressed to Brother Ying.
My thoughts of you since we parted go without saying.
Thanks to your kindness, my whole family is in good health.
The character she and the character kuan,
Combine to mean the post of live-in secretary.³¹
If you hear of such an opening, I will, of course, beseech your help.
If anyone is desirous of a brush sturdy as a beam,
To compose his correspondence,
My brush is capable of engendering clouds and mist."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he started to laugh out loud, saying, "If he were wholeheartedly serious about wanting you to find him an employer, why didn't he send you a regular letter, instead of putting his request into a song, which is not even very well written? It's obvious that his talent and learning are inadequate to the task, and his personal integrity leaves something to be desired."

"You ought not to be so sure of that," said Ying Po-ch'üeh. "It's only because our families have been close to each other for three generations. When I was one or two years old, he was no more than three or four. In those days, when we shared candy and cake, biscuits and fruit, or the like, we didn't even quarrel over them. Later on, when we had both grown up and started to school in order to learn to read and write, the teacher used to say, 'Scholar Ying and Scholar Shui are both as smart as can be and are sure to be successful in their future lives.' And later still, when we took up composition, we would compete in writing essays together, without a trace of jealousy or envy. By day, we walked together, and sat together, and at night, we sometimes even slept together. And when we reached adulthood and donned hairnets, we remained as fast friends as ever. Consequently, the two of us are almost like one person and are fond brothers to each other. For this reason, ignoring convention, he felt free to express his ideas to me in the form of a song."

"When I first saw it, I was also somewhat annoyed. But later, when I thought about it, I concluded that it was only because he was making his appeal to a friend that he presumed to do what he did, and I was no longer annoyed by it. Moreover, that song of his is actually rather cleverly done, though you may not have noticed it. The first line, where he says 'This letter is addressed to Brother Ying,' is the salutation, just like when people write, 'For the perusal of so-and-so.' Isn't that appropriate? The second line, where he says, 'My thoughts of you since we parted go without saying,' is like the conventional amenities about the weather. It is both concise and literary. Is that not appropriate also? The third line reads, 'Thanks to your kindness, my whole family is in good health.' That is simply to say that his family is all right. After that it gets even better."

"What are the fourth and fifth lines intended to convey?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Brother, you may not get it," said Ying Po-ch'üeh, "but this is an example of the word game of breaking characters down into their component parts, which people often find difficult. 'The character she and the character kuan, combine to mean the post of live-in secretary.' That is to say, if they are written together, do they not form the character kuan, meaning the post of live-in secretary? If such a post becomes available, he is anxious that I should recommend him for it, which is why he says, 'If you hear of such an opening, I will, of course, beseech your help.' The line, 'If anyone is desirous of a brush sturdy as a beam,' means that his brush is as sturdy as a beam, and that in handling correspondence, he has but to put his brush to work in order to fill the paper with clouds and mist."

"Brother, if you examine this composition of his, is there so much as a single word that is wasted? With just these few lines, he has succeeded perfectly in putting the feelings in his mind on paper. Isn't that a worthy accomplishment?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing was so affected by Ying Po-chüeh's praise of Licentiate Shui's composition that he was unable to respond further.

All he could do was to say to Ying Po-chüeh, "Since you have been emphasizing all his good points, let me ask you, do you have any serious communications of his? If you can show me one, I'll consider hiring him."

"I do have some examples of lyrics and rhapsodies that he has written at my place," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but I didn't bring any with me to show you. I happen to have memorized a composition of his, however, that is very well written. Let me recite it for you.

When I first donned a scholar's cap, my heart was filled with delight;
How was I to know that today, it is this very cap that has done me in;³²
Others generally manage to wear you for no more than three to five years;
But you have chosen to remain enamored of my head for a good thirty years.
Now that I wish to don an official black silk hat, I pray your indulgence;
I have composed these lines of verse in order to bid Your Honor farewell.
On this occasion it is not to be understood that my feelings are fickle;
It is the white hair that encroaches on my head that I find hard to bear.
This autumn if I fail to pass the examinations with the highest honors;
I will trample my enemy to pieces under my feet and take up husbandry.
It is the year for the triennial provincial examinations,
And the time has come for the results to be publicly announced.
In order to divulge the feelings in my heart,
I hereby lodge a complaint against you, my cap.
With your help I aspired to mount to the blue clouds and thereby bring glory on myself;
Who could have known that now, despite my white hair, you remain true to your old friend.
Alas!
I recall when I first donned a scholar's cap,
"Blue, blue was my student's collar."³³
Thanks to your condescending favor,
I was proud of my newly acquired dignity.
But you did not permit me to gain early success while still a young man;
Nor allow me to remain stooped for long, only to stand upright in the end.
Above, I do not hold a position as senior official or grand master;
Below, as a citizen, I am not a farmer, an artisan, nor a merchant.
Year after year, I dwell in the house of a commoner;
Day after day, I report for duty at the local school.
Whenever the education intendant comes to inspect us,
My heart is filled with nervousness and trepidation.
Whenever it is necessary to entertain superiors,
I am compelled to run around, now east, now west.³⁴
On your account, I spend my lifetime,
In anxiety and perturbation,
Suffering from a multitude of hardships.
During all four seasons of the year,³⁵
In scattered bits and pieces,³⁶
My teacher's salary has remained unpaid.
When I have sued for aid on the grounds of poverty,
I have been allotted five pecks of grain.
At the biannual sacrifices I have received coupons,³⁷
Entitling me to obtain half a pound of meat.
When officials encounter me,
They can't help being irritated.
When yamen runners refer to me,
They designate me an instructor.
Upon the road to the Eastern Capital,
I have accompanied others several times.
Among the prefects in the schoolroom,
I, alone, am the most venerated of all.³⁸
You see that my black boots are both down at the heel,
While my blue scholar's gown is completely threadbare.
Having buried my head in the books for many years,
I cannot completely describe all the hardships and vicissitudes I have suffered.
What hope is there of ever getting a start in life?
I have undergone all of this forsaken solitude and painful suffering for nothing.
Though I have approached all the established figures,
In my entire career, I have yet to gain any advantage from my compositions;
Not having known the benefit of imperial benevolence,
For years on end, I have continued to harbor the hope of conspicuous success.
Alas and alack!
I bemoan this scholar's cap.
If you only look at its shape,
It is something to be proud of.
Vertical behind and horizontal in front,
What sort of an object are you anyway?
With seven fissures and eight holes,
You are truly the root of catastrophe.
Alas!
The cloud-soaring bird has not yet folded its wings;
But the fish with dragon potential has lost its scales.
Have you not heard that:
The bird that has not flown for long,
Once it does, will soar to the clouds;
The bird that has not cried for long,
Once it cries, will startle everyone?³⁹
Early on, I entreated you to help me make a new person of myself;⁴⁰
This is not a case of my abandoning the old in favor of the new.
As a famed exemplar of this culture of ours,
I thought you possessed supernatural powers.
If only from now on we are forever separated,
Then will I be grateful for your magnanimity.
Of these few words and this meager libation,
I would prevail upon you to come and partake.
Your rationale and your destiny are exhausted;
I cannot overstate the urgency of my request.

From this point on, I would bid you farewell.⁴¹

Please take yourself off as soon as possible."⁴²

When Ying Po-chüeh had finished his recitation, Hsi-men Ch'ing clapped his hands and laughed loudly, saying, "Well, Brother Ying the Second, so you really consider this sort of talent and learning the equivalent of that of Pan Ku or Yang Hsiung?"⁴³

"His personal integrity ranks even higher than his talent and learning," said Ying Po-chüeh. "Now let me tell you something of his personal integrity."

"Go ahead and tell me about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Some years ago," said Ying Po-chüeh, "he held a position as live-in secretary in the establishment of Vice Minister Li. The Li household had several tens of maidservants, each and every one of which was attractive and clever. Moreover, there were also a number of page boys, each and every one of which was a good-looking catamite. This Licentiate Shui resided there for four or five years, without getting any improper ideas. But, later on, who would have anticipated that several mischief-making maidservants and page boys, seeing that he put on the airs of a saint, actually devoted themselves, day and night, to tempting him. This Licentiate Shui, who is extremely magnanimous by nature, eventually allowed his resistance to soften so far as to be enticed into an affair, for which his employer drove him out the door. This created quite a stir in the neighborhood, and everyone accused him of immoral conduct.

"The fact is that this Licentiate Shui is actually:

Impervious to the temptations of the flesh.

If you were to employ him in your home, Brother, no matter how many maid-servants and page boys you might have, even if they were to:

Sleep together or share the same quarters,⁴⁴ would this Licentiate Shui resort to disorderly conduct? He would never do so."

"Since he was driven out the door by his previous employer," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "there must definitely be something not quite right about him. Even though you and I are on the best of terms, I am not prepared to accept this recommendation of yours. The other day, a friend of my colleague Hsia Yenling, the venerable gentleman Ni P'eng, mentioned that he was acquainted with a fellow licentiate surnamed Wen. I'll wait until he comes to see me before deciding what to do."

ABBOT TAO SOLICITS FUNDS TO REPAIR

THE TEMPLE OF ETERNAL FELICITY;

NUN HSÜEH ENJOINS PAYING FOR

THE DISTRIBUTION OF THE DHĀRANĪ SUTRA

If one's basic nature is perfected,¹ one can comprehend the Way;
Turning over a new leaf, one may jump free of the entangling net.
Disciplining oneself to achieve dhyāna is not an easy thing to do;
Refining oneself in order to achieve no-birth is no ordinary task.
Let the clear and the turgid alternate as the wheel of dharma turns;
Break open the kalpas, so that one may travel either east or west.
One may wander free and easy for myriads of aeons without number;
One's single ray of divine light² will forever illuminate the void.³

THE STORY GOES that in Tung-p'ing prefecture of Shantung province, there was in former times a Ch'an Buddhist temple called the Temple of Eternal Felicity. It was erected in the second year of the P'u-t'ung reign period,⁴ during the reign of Emperor Wu of the Liang dynasty,⁵ and its founder was the venerable patriarch Wan-hui.⁶

Why do you suppose he was called the venerable patriarch Wan-hui? It was because, when the old master was only six or seven years old, he had an elder brother who had joined the army and was stationed on the frontier. Since:

The normal communication of news was difficult,⁷

They did not know whether he was alive or dead.⁸

For this reason, his aged mother could not get concern for her eldest son out of her mind and constantly wept about the house.

Suddenly one day, the child questioned his mother, saying, "Mother, at a time like this:

The world is at perfect peace,⁹ and your children are not troubling you. Though we have nothing to eat but meal after meal of millet, we are able to get by. Why is it, then, that you are constantly giving way to tears? Tell me about it Mother, and perhaps I will be able to share the burden of your sorrow with you."

"As a little child," his aged mother replied, "you do not yet comprehend the sorrows of your elders. During the four or five years since your father died, and your elder brother was dispatched to the frontier to serve as a senior officer, he has not sent a single letter home. I don't know whether he is dead or alive, or whether he exists or not. How can I ever get it off my mind?"

As she spoke, she started to cry again.

"Fortunately," the child responded, "if that's all it is, what's the difficulty about it? Mother, if you'll just tell me where my elder brother is stationed right now, I, his younger brother, will simply go there, sooner or later find my elder brother, get a letter from him, and come home to report back to you. Wouldn't that be a good idea?"

The old lady, crying on the one hand, and laughing on the other, said, "What a crazy simpleton you are! To take up the question of where your elder brother is located, if it were a trip of no more than a hundred or two hundred li, you might be able to make it. But he's somewhere in Liao-tung, more than ten thousand li from here. Even a stalwart young man, making the best possible time, would take four or five months to get there. I'm laughing because a child like you could hardly be expected to make such a trip."

"Aha!" said the child. "If it's only Liao-tung where he is, it's not as though he were up in the sky, or anything like that. I'm going to set out, find my elder brother, and come right back."

Lo and behold, he proceeded to fasten on his sandals, adjust his long gown, bow to his mother, and disappear in a cloud of dust. The old lady, finding that:

Though she might call after him, he did not respond;

Though she might pursue him, she could not catch up, became even more depressed than before.

Among her neighbors in the locality, there were women, both old and young, who:

Rubbing shoulders and nudging backs,

Providing soup and supplying water,
Praising here and faultfinding there,¹⁰ came forward to comfort her in her distress.

Some among them endeavored to reassure her, saying, "How could the child have gone very far? Sooner or later, before long, he is bound to return."

As a result, the old lady allowed the tears flowing from her two eyes to dry up and sat down in a state of depression. After a while:

The red sun began to set in the west.¹¹
While, as for her:

Neighbors to the east and the west,¹²
each and every one of them:
Heated her soup and cooked her rice, or Mounted her k'ang and shut the gate.

The old lady continued to:

Stick out her head and crane her neck,¹³ while the two pupils of her eyes were habitually directed outside, as though she only wished she could follow in his footsteps. Lo and behold, at this juncture, as she gazed into the distance, she saw the figure of a youngster emerging from the darkening shadows.

At this, the old lady exclaimed:

"Thanks to Heaven and thanks to Earth, and thanks to:

The light of the sun, moon, and stars,¹⁴
if this is really my youngest child coming, my resolution:

To fast and maintain a vegetarian diet, will not have been in vain."

Lo and behold, before she knew it, the venerable patriarch Wan-hui knelt down in front of her and said, "Mother, before you have even gone to sleep on the k'ang, I have been to Liao-tung, found my elder brother, and brought back a family letter indicating that all is well with him."

At this, the old lady laughed and said, "My child, it's a good thing you haven't actually gone, leaving your old mother behind to worry about you. But you really oughtn't to indulge in such a whopper in order to fool your old mother. Since when is it possible to travel a distance of ten thousand li and back between the morning and evening of a single day?"

"Mother," the child responded, "can it really be that you don't believe me?"

He then proceeded straightaway to put down his clothes bag and take out the family letter indicating that all was well with his elder brother, and, sure enough, it turned out to be in his elder brother's handwriting. He also took out an undershirt that he was bringing back to be laundered, which had been hand-stitched by the old lady herself, so that she could identify it as authentic:

Without the slightest possibility of error.¹⁵
This event created quite a stir in the neighborhood, and he came to be referred to as Wan-hui, or "The one who returned from a journey of ten thousand li." Later, when he had:

Abandoned lay life to take up a religious vocation, he became known as the Venerable Wan-hui. To be sure, it turned out that:

His prowess and virtue were lofty and marvelous,
His superhuman powers were both broad and great.¹⁶

On one occasion, during an audience before Shih Hu, the emperor of the Later Chao dynasty,¹⁷ he demonstrated his prowess by swallowing two pints of iron needles.¹⁸ On another occasion, in the audience hall of Emperor Wu of the Liang dynasty, he extracted three relics from the crown of his head. That is why the Ch'an Buddhist temple called the Temple of Eternal Felicity was established by imperial decree on behalf of the venerable patriarch Wan-hui, and dedicated to the perpetuation of his memory. There is no knowing how much money was expended on this project. Truly:

The divine monk was born into this world with vast supernatural powers;
He was highly regarded by the sage ruler whose generosity was profound.

Who would have thought that:

The years and months resemble shuttles;¹⁹
The times change and circumstances differ.²⁰

Lo and behold, in due course, the venerable patriarch Wan-hui:

Returned to Heaven, having achieved parinirvana, and those monks of superior attainments in his entourage, who:

Still retained their skin and flesh, one by one, passed away. Eventually the temple fell into the hands of a bunch of shiftless monks who repudiated the monastic code of conduct known as Pai-chang ch'ing-kuei, or Pai-chang's Rules of Purity,²¹ maintaining mistresses, drinking distilled spirits, and engaging in every kind of forbidden activity. Even going so far as incitement to homosexual vengery, there was no conduct in which they refused to indulge. But they ended up falling victim to crooked swindlers and profiteers who provided them with illicit liquor at inflated prices. When they were unable to pay their debts, it was not long before they started to pawn their cassocks, and hock their bells and chimes. They tried to sell the rafters from the main hall of the temple, but nobody wanted them, so they were reduced to burning them for fuel, and even bartered the bricks and tiles of the structure for liquor. Exposed to:

The drizzling rain and blustering wind, the Buddhist idols began to tumble down, leaving the premises in:

A state of utter bleakness and desolation,²² with the result that those who had been wont to burn incense there ceased to come. And, as for the former patrons and disciples, and those who had sponsored religious ceremonies or services for the salvation of the departed, it was just like:

Kuan Yü, the God of War, trying to peddle bean curd:

Not even a ghost would venture to come to the door.²³

What had been the site of:

Sacred rites performed to bell and drum, was suddenly transformed into a place of:

Desolate mists and withered vegetation.²⁴

Before anyone knew it, thirty or forty years had elapsed, and there was no one prepared to:

Deal with the destruction or renovate the ruins.

It so happens that in this temple there was an Abbot Tao-chien. He was originally a native of western India who so admired the splendor of the Middle Kingdom that he formed the wish to make a pilgrimage to that exalted place. Traversing the River of Flowing Sands, the Sea of Stars, and the basin of the Kuan River, he traveled for eight or nine years before finally reaching Chinese territory. Wending his way forward, he finally reached the region of Shantung and chose to stick his staff into the soil on the grounds of this dilapidated temple.

He meditated for nine years with his face to the wall,²⁵

Without saying anything or uttering so much as a word.²⁶

Truly:

The Buddhist dharma originally dispenses with the impediment of written words;
The fruits of ritual performance are only won in the practice of meditation.

Suddenly one day, a thought occurred to him, and he said to himself, "Even a temple of these dimensions has been allowed to fall into such a state of dilapidation. If one contemplates these shaven-pated donkeys, with their:

Muddled heads and uncouth brains,

all they are capable of is:

Drinking wine and devouring food.

Is it not a pity that they have taken this sanctuary of an ancient Buddha and reduced it to the barest ruins? If only someone could be induced to come up with:

A single brick or half a tile,

in order to:

Resurrect its former grandeur.

I remember that a man of yore put it very well when he said about a certain place:

Its men are superlative and its territory is numinous.²⁷

Now that things have come to the present pass:

If I don't take responsibility,

Who will take responsibility?

If I don't stick my neck out,

Who will stick his neck out?

Moreover, nowadays in this region of Shantung there is a prominent official named Hsi-men Ch'ing, who holds a post in the Embroidered-Uniform Guard.

His family property runs into the tens of thousands,²⁸

His wealth is similar to that of princes and nobles.

There is scarcely anything that his household does not possess. The other day, when he was seeing off Censor Ts'ai Yün, he chose this spot at which to provide a farewell libation for him. Because he noticed that the temple was in a dilapidated state, he expressed a desire to:

Contribute some money as a charitable donation, for the purpose of:

Rebuilding and refurbishing the original edifice.

At the time, although I didn't say anything definite, something in the way of a plan began to develop in my mind. Now today, if I should only prove able to induce that donor to:

Take responsibility for promoting the idea,

I am sure that, sooner or later, my expectations may be realized. But I will have to arrange to pay him a visit myself."

At this juncture, he proceeded to summon his:

Dharma heirs and disciples, and had them:

Strike the bells, and

Beat the drums,

in order to convene the entire assembly, after which he ascended the hall and announced this idea of his. How was this abbot dressed?
Behold:

The Ch'an cassock that envelops his body is dyed bloodred;
The two rings that dangle from his ears are made of gold.
The metal staff he holds in his hand is as bright as a mirror;
The hundred and eight pearls of his rosary shine like the sun.
He reveals the golden cords that line the way to enlightenment;

And inspires even ordinary men to awaken from their dreams.
With bushy eyebrows, jet-black hair, and eyes like bronze bells;
He is reputed to be a venerable sage monk from the Western Heaven.

When the abbot had finished his announcement, he told an acolyte to bring him:

The four treasures of the writer's studio,²⁹ whereupon he ground the fragrant ink known as "ambergis balm,"³⁰ moistened and his "rat's whisker brush,"³¹ spread out a sheet of stationery with "black thread columns,"³² and proceeded to draft a petition, in which he started out by explaining:

The background of the matter from beginning to end,³³ and ended by urging the recipients to:

Donate money and create good fortune for themselves.

His calligraphy was such that:

Every line was straight, and Every character was clear.

Truly, this worthy abbot was an avatar of an ancient Buddha or bodhisattva.

At this juncture, he took his leave of the assembly, put on his Ch'an sandals, donned a hooded cloak and bamboo hat, and betook himself straight to Hsimen Ch'ing's residence.

To resume our story, after Hsi-men Ch'ing had said goodbye to Ying Pochüeh, he headed back toward the rear compound, shedding his outer garments at the summerhouse on the way, and went straight into Wu Yüeh-niang's room, where he told her about Ying Pochüeh's recommendation of Licentiate Shui.

He then went on to say, "The other day, after my trip to the Eastern Capital, all of those relatives and friends of ours were kind enough to come and share a drink with me. Now we can hardly avoid arranging a little party for them in order to reciprocate. Since I happen to be at leisure today, with no other obligations, we might as well take care of this matter."

There and then, he instructed Tai-an to take a basket, go to the marketplace, and buy some fresh fruits in season, pork, mutton, fish, salted and preserved chicken and goose, and other foodstuffs. When he had finished with these instructions, he sent page boys off in different directions to invite the guests.

He then took Yüeh-niang by the hand, and the two of them went to Li P'ing-erh's quarters in order to see Kuan-ko. Li P'ing-erh welcomed Yüeh-niang and Hsi-men Ch'ing with an ingratiating smile.

"His mother has come to see the child," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Li P'ing-erh told the wet nurse to bring Kuan-ko out, and they observed that his eyebrows were straggly, and he looked just as though he had been molded out of a lump of flour. Smiling happily, he crawled right into Yüeh-niang's arms.

Yüeh-niang took him in hand and embraced him, saying, "My child, how clever you are. When you grow up you're sure to be as smart as can be."

She then addressed him again, saying, "When you grow up, my child, how are you going to look after your old mother?"

To this Li P'ing-erh responded, "Mother, how can you say such a thing? If our son should grow up to adulthood, and succeed in obtaining:

An official post or even half of one,³⁴

the honors bestowed upon his family as a consequence would start at the top. You would surely be the first person to be granted the privilege of wearing:

The phoenix cap and roseate shawl,³⁵ and he would be in an excellent position to look after his old mother."

Hsi-men Ch'ing picked up on this, saying, "My son, when you grow up, you must strive to obtain a position as a celestial official in the civil bureaucracy, rather than following in the footsteps of your old man, and serving in the western ranks of the military bureaucracy, in which, though you may achieve some success, you will never be fully respected."

As they were speaking, they were unaware that P'an Chin-lien was eavesdropping outside the room. Before she knew it:

Anger flared up in her heart, and she started to curse, saying, "Why you shameless, stinking whore, with your empty pretensions! So you think you're the only one that can raise a child successfully, do you? He hasn't even lived through three rainy seasons or four summer solstices yet, let alone survived to the age of fourteen or fifteen, passed through the gate of puberty, or started to attend school and learn to read. He's still as fragile as a bubble, subsisting here in the company of King Yama. How can anyone foresee that he will become an official, or that official honors will be bestowed on the venerable matriarch? And as for that crazy louse of a jailbird, that shameless good-for-nothing of ours, how can he expect him to become a civil official rather than following in his footsteps?"

Just as she was grumbling and muttering away, cursing on the one hand, and expressing her annoyance on the other, who should appear but Tai-an, who came waltzing in and addressed her, saying, "Fifth Lady, where is Father?"

"You crazy, sharp-beaked louse of a jailbird!" Chin-lien cursed him. "Who knows where that so-called Father of yours may be? And what would he be doing coming to my quarters anyway? He's already got a grand lady with a patent of nobility inscribed on patterned damask, a venerable noblewoman, ready to wait upon him with:

Eight culinary delicacies in five tripods.³⁶

So what are you asking me for?"

Tai-an, who realized that he was barking up the wrong tree, simply said, "You're right," and headed off in the direction of the Sixth Lady's quarters.

When he arrived in front of the door to her room, he coughed discreetly and addressed Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Master Ying the Second is in the reception hall."

"I just saw Master Ying the Second off a little while ago," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "So what's he up to now?"

"Father, you'd better go find out for yourself," said Tai-an.

Hsi-men Ch'ing felt compelled to abandon Wu Yüeh-niang and Li P'ingerh, stopped by the summerhouse to put on his outer garments, and went out to the front compound to receive Ying Po-chüeh.

Just as he was about to interrogate him, it transpired that the venerable abbot Tao-chien arrived at his gate to seek a subscription and called out in a loud voice, "Amita Buddha! Is this the gate to the residence of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing? Would one of you responsible servitors announce my arrival? Just say that if you wish to:

Support your cassia-like sons, and Protect your orchid-like grandsons,

So that:

Those for whom you seek good fortune obtain good fortune,
And those for whom you seek long life obtain long life, the venerable abbot Tao-chien from the Eastern Capital has come to seek an interview."

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing was a man who was accustomed to squandering silver and spending money, and he had only recently acquired an heir in the person of Kuan-ko, so he was exceedingly pleased to hear this and wished to perform some charitable deeds for the benefit of his infant son. Since his servants were quite aware of this, they did not:

Respond angrily or make difficulties, but went inside and reported the visitor's arrival to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Have him come in. I'll see him," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Lo and behold, the servants:

Covering three steps with every two,³⁷
made haste to invite the abbot inside, as respectfully as though they were dealing with a living Buddha.

The abbot proceeded directly to the elaborately furnished reception room, where he saluted his host by pressing his hands together in front of his chest and bowing to him in the Buddhist fashion, saying, "I am a native of western India who, in the course of my peregrinations, has visited the Eastern Capital, Pien-liang, and has chosen to stick my staff into the soil on the grounds of the Ch'an Buddhist temple called the Temple of Eternal Felicity, where:

I meditated for nine years with my face to the wall,
And labored to transmit the mind-seal of the Buddha.

Because:

The halls of the sanctuary are falling down,
And the temple is in a state of dilapidation, it has occurred to me that as a disciple of the Buddha, it is appropriate that I should:

Exert myself on the Buddha's behalf.

Were I not to do so, on whose person should the responsibility devolve? For this reason, I have formed a resolution. On a prior occasion, when my venerable benefactor chose to come there in order to provide a farewell libation for some gentlemen, you expressed regret that the temple was in such a dilapidated state, and also exhibited:

A good conscience and admirable intentions, by volunteering to take some responsibility for its maintenance. At that time, the various Buddhas and bodhisattvas authenticated the covenant. I recollect that in the Buddhist sutras it is well said that if pious men and pious women contribute alms for the refurbishment of Buddhist effigies, it will ensure that they will be recompensed when their:

Cassia-like sons and orchid-like grandsons,³⁸

are born with:

Well-proportioned and good-looking features,³⁹ and in days to come:

Achieve early success in the examinations,

so that, in turn, their:

Sons are privileged and their wives ennobled.⁴⁰

It is for this reason that I have chosen to knock at your exalted gate. It matters not whether it be five hundred or a thousand taels. I merely beseech my venerable benefactor to:

Open the subscription book and reveal your intentions,

In order to realize the ripening of these good fruits."

He then proceeded to open up an embroidered wrapper, take out the subscription book with its accompanying petition, and proffer them to Hsi-men Ch'ing with both hands. Who could have anticipated that the preceding speech had already had such an effect on Hsi-men Ch'ing that his heart was moved. Before he knew it:

As though nothing in Heaven or Earth could make him happier, he had accepted the petition and the subscription book, and told a page boy to fetch some tea.

When he opened the petition, he saw that it read as follows:

I respectfully submit that:

The white horse bearing sutras⁴¹ introduced the religion of symbols into China;

Chu Fa-lan and Ma-t'anga explicated the Dharma and founded the Buddhist sect.⁴²

Of the living beings in the entire realm,⁴³

None fail to confess their allegiance⁴⁴ to the Buddhist patriarchs.

Everywhere within the three chiliocosms,

There are found Buddhist temples that are elaborately decorated,⁴⁵

But if one observes the dilapidated rubble of this establishment,

How can it be considered a famous temple in a scenic location?⁴⁶

If one does not compassionately contribute alms for its restoration,

How can the votaries of Buddha be described as charitable to others?
Now with regard to this Ch'an Temple of Eternal Felicity:
It is the sanctuary of an ancient Buddha,
A blessed place dedicated to religious practice.
Erected in the time of Emperor Wu of the Liang dynasty,
It was founded by the ancestral patriarch Wan-hui.
Magnificent in scale,
It resembled the Jetavana Park,⁴⁷
The grounds of which were paved with gold.⁴⁸
Exquisitely sculpted,
It was like the Jetavana Vihara,
The steps of which were made of white jade.
Its lofty chambers grazed the void,
The aroma of its sandalwood extending beyond the nine heavens;
Its layered base covered the ground,
The Buddha's Hall able to accommodate a thousand Ch'an monks.
Its two wings were majestic,
Consisting entirely of resplendent halls and purple buildings.⁴⁹
Its corridors were immaculate,
Truly, even more magnificent than those of the grotto heavens.
At that time, when the bells and drums sounded,
Everyone said it was a Buddhist kingdom within the human world;
Verily, the serried ranks of black-robed monks,
Gave the impression of a human paradise within our mundane realm.
Who could foresee that, during the passage of the everlasting years,⁵⁰
In the blink of an eye, times would change and circumstances alter?
Uncouth monks indulged in drunkenness and wreaked havoc,
Utterly ignoring the Rules of Purity.
Empty-headed lay workers were indolent and coveted sleep,
Refusing to sweep out the premises.
Eventually the temple was deserted,
No longer attracting any disciples.
Finally it became so desolate that,
Those who looked up to it were few.
Moreover, it became infested with birds and rodents;
How could it withstand the beating of wind and rain?
The buildings were dilapidated,
One and then two, two and then three,
Until they could not be maintained.
The walls began to disintegrate,
Day after day, and year after year,
But there was nobody to rebuild them.
Vermilion latticework partitions,
Were used to heat wine or heat tea.
Armloads of rafters and railings,
Were bartered for salt or for rice.
Wind has assailed the arhats until the gold is all washed away;
Rain has fallen upon the effigy of Amitayus reducing it to dust.
Alas! The brilliance of golds and greens,
Has one day turned into overgrown jungle.
Though success may eventuate in disaster,⁵¹
The nadir will be followed by the zenith.⁵²
Fortunately, the zealous devotion of Abbot Tao is such that,
He cannot bear to see the temple of the Brahman prince collapse.
He has sworn a noble-minded vow,
To canvass all potential donors,
In the hope that they will all exhibit benevolence,
By uniformly displaying a compassionate disposition.
Rafters and pillars, beams and columns,
Without regard to their dimensions,⁵³
When they are given, will be inscribed prominently with the names of their donors;
Silver bullion, cloth or paper currency,
No matter how munificent or meager,
Once in the till, will be recorded with the donors' names in the subscription book.
Relying upon the awesome efficacy of the Buddhist patriarchs,
Fortune, emolument, and longevity,
Will be yours for ever and ever,
Even for a hundred or a thousand years.
Thanks to the clear discernment of the guardian spirits,
Your fathers, sons, and grandsons,
Each and every one of them,
Will obtain high emolument and office.
Your posterity will proliferate.⁵⁴
Engendering three locust and five cassia trees.⁵⁵
Your forecourts will be imposing,
Refulgent with golden walls and hills of coins.
Everything that you exert yourself to pursue,
Will turn out auspiciously just as you wish.⁵⁶
When you are presented with the text of this petition,
May each of you overcome the parsimony in your hearts.
Respectfully petitioned.

When he had finished reading the petition, Hsi-men Ch'ing straightened up the pages of the fascicle, put them back in their brocaded case, fastened it by inserting the pins into their clasps, further secured it by wrapping the attached brocade ribbon around it, and then:

Respectfully and reverentially,⁵⁷ placed it on the table.

Folding his hands in front of him, he addressed the abbot, saying, "There is no reason for me to deceive you. Though my family may not amount to much, I do possess property worth several tens of thousands. Although merely a military official, I am not unacquainted with men of contemporary renown. Who could have anticipated that even at my age I should remain without an heir? Though there are five or six women in my household, I had remained worried about this and had determined to perform some charitable deeds, when, last year, my sixth consort gave birth to a son, thereby consummating my myriad desires. Then, by chance, the need to see off a friend of mine brought me to your exalted quarters, where I noticed that the temple buildings were dilapidated, and I formed a resolution to donate some money for their restoration. Since my venerable preceptor has condescended to approach me on this matter, how could I presume to refuse.”

Taking a fine rabbit-hair brush in hand, Hsi-men Ch'ing was just hesitating over what to contribute, when Ying Po-chüeh said to him, “Brother, since you have formed this good-hearted resolution to make a pledge on my nephew's behalf, why don't you undertake to:

Accomplish the whole task singlehandedly?

It wouldn't be that much of a commitment for you.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing, while still holding the brush in his hand, laughed, saying, “My resources are limited! My resources are limited!”

“At the very least you ought to contribute a thousand taels,” said Ying Po-chüeh.

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed again, saying, “My resources are limited! My resources are limited!”

At this point, the abbot spoke up, saying, “With all due respect, venerable benefactor, I don't wish to be intrusive, but it is our Buddhist practice to let people bestow alms as they see fit, rather than making demands upon them that are difficult to fulfill. Your Honor should feel free to contribute only as much as you wish. If there are relatives or friends besides yourself that might be potential contributors, I hope that you will be good enough to recommend this cause to them.”

“My venerable preceptor is most understanding,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing. “It would not do to contribute too little.”

So saying, he wrote himself down for five hundred taels and then laid his rabbit-hair brush aside, while the abbot expressed his gratitude by pressing his palms together in front of his chest and bowing to him in the Buddhist fashion.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then went on to say, “The palace eunuchs and eunuch directors around here, as well as the granary heads, and patrolling inspectors from the local prefectures and districts, are all on good terms with me. In the days to come, I'll take the subscription book around to them and ask them to put down their names. No matter whether they put themselves down for three hundred, two hundred, one hundred, or fifty taels, I can guarantee that this good work of my venerable preceptor will be successfully completed.”

That day, he detained the abbot for a vegetarian meal, before seeing him off at the gate. Truly:

Acts of compassion and good works are the stock in trade of influential families;

Preserving good fortune and dispelling disaster are the considerations of parents.

There is a poem on this subject of charitable donations:

The Buddhist dharma is not very complicated, it merely resides in the heart;
The planting of melons or planting of fruit is what constitutes its basis.
As for pearls and jade, amber, and other such valuables and rarities;
Who is able to take them with him when he comes to confront King Yama?
Those who accumulate good deeds are content even if they live in poverty;
Powerful families that accumulate property throw their money away in vain.
If it were possible to purchase longevity by the expending of one's wealth;
The wicked dictator Tung Cho⁵⁸ might well have lived until the present day.

Hsi-men Ch'ing Subscribes a Sum for the Temple's Repair

To resume our story, as soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing had seen off the abbot, he returned to the reception hall, sat down with Ying Po-chüeh, and said, "Brother, I was just planning to send someone to invite you over. You've arrived in the nick of time. The other day, after my trip to the Eastern Capital, all of my relatives and friends were kind enough to come and share a drink with me. Today I have sent a servant to buy the necessary provisions, so that your sister-in-law and I may hold a little party for them in order to reciprocate. I wanted you to be here to help keep them company. I could scarcely have anticipated the arrival of this abbot, whose visit has consumed a good deal of time."

"He seems to be a very fine cleric," said Ying Po-chüeh. "No doubt he is really someone of virtuous attainments. In the course of his conversation with you, even my heart was sufficiently moved to make me a benefactor."

"Brother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "since when did you become a benefactor? When did you inscribe your name in the subscription book?"

Ying Po-chüeh laughed and said, "So! Do you mean to say that my intervention was not the act of a benefactor? Brother, you are not familiar with the Buddhist sutras. In the Buddhist sutras the greatest weight is placed on giving of the heart, which is followed in importance by giving of the dharma, and then giving of property. Do you mean to say that my:

Urging from the sidelines,⁵⁹ did not constitute a giving of the heart?"

"Brother," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "in your case I fear that:

The words are mouthed but the heart isn't in it."

The two of them clapped their hands and had a good laugh over this.

Ying Po-chüeh then went on to say, "I am content to wait here until the guests come. If you have anything important to take care of, Brother, you might as well go and discuss it with my sister-in-law."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, took leave of Ying Po-chüeh and returned to the inner courtyard.

It so happened that P'an Chin-lien:

Mumbling and muttering to herself,

Feeling listless and discontented,⁶⁰ had fallen victim, before she knew it, to a compulsive desire to sleep. After sneezing a couple of times, she had gone into her room, fallen onto her ivory bedstead, and promptly fallen asleep. Li P'ing-erh, for her part, concerned as she was about her child's crying, was sitting in her quarters, together with the wet nurse and her maidservants, looking after Kuan-ko and trying to get him to laugh. Only Wu Yüeh-niang and Sun Hsüeh-o, together with two servants, were in the rear compound preparing a meal.

Hsi-men Ch'ing went up to them, sat down, and proceeded to give Yüeh-niang a detailed account of how Abbot Tao-chien had come to solicit funds for the repair of the temple, and how he had seen fit to enter his name in the subscription book. He also related how Ying Po-chüeh had made a joke out of the matter, and they all had a laugh over it:

As though nothing in Heaven or Earth could make them happier.

Now it so happened that Wu Yüeh-niang was basically a serious person, and she was moved on this occasion:

Neither hurriedly nor hastily,

Without thought or meditation, to say a few words that affected Hsi-men Ch'ing like:

The insertion of a needle in the cranium.⁶¹

Truly:

A worthy wife will admonish her husband as often as the cock crows;

Her intimate words will regularly convey doses of therapeutic advice.

Just what were the words that she addressed to him?

"Brother," said Yüeh-niang, "you've had the great good luck to sire a son and have also developed the virtuous intention to:

Extensively contract good affinities.⁶²

How can this be anything but an earnest of good fortune for our entire family? The only thing is, I fear that your virtuous intentions are not many, and your evil intentions have not been completely eliminated. Brother, in days to come, it would be a good idea if you would engage in fewer of these meaningless casual liaisons, and eschew the petty deeds that suggest you are:

Covetous of wealth and given to lust.⁶³

If you were to do a few good deeds in secret, it would benefit the little one."

"Mother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing with a laugh, "you're expressing your jealousy again. As the saying goes:

Even Heaven and Earth are characterized as yin and yang;

It is only natural that male and female should mate.

Those who engage in secret trysts and illicit affairs in this life are all persons whose:

Fates were ordained in a previous life.⁶⁴

Their names were entered in:

The register of amorous affinities,⁶⁵ and they are merely fulfilling their fates in this life. You don't mean to say that they are merely acting on impetuous and reckless impulse, do you? I've heard it said of the Jetavana Park, in the western realm of the Buddhist patriarch himself, that it was only acquired after:

The grounds were paved with gold; and that even in the Ten Courts of the Underworld,⁶⁶ something in the way of paper money is required if one is to survive. As long as I expend this property of mine in the doing of extensive good works, even if I were to rape Ch'ango, fornicate with the Weaving Maid, kidnap Hsü Fei-ch'ung,⁶⁷ or abduct the daughter of the Queen Mother of the West, it would do nothing to diminish the Heaven-splashing wealth and distinction that I now possess."

Yüeh-niang laughed, saying, "Brother, you're just like:

The dog who devours hot shit;

Taking it to be fragrant and sweet.

Once you get the taste of fresh blood between your teeth;

How can your carnivorous nature ever be altered?"

Just as they were laughing over this, who should appear but Nun Wang, bringing Nun Hsüeh along with her, who barged in carrying a box, flew forward to salute Yüeh-niang, and also kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Your Honor, we're fortunate to have found you at home. Since we parted the other day, I've been preoccupied with various paltry matters that have prevented me from coming to look in on you. But I haven't been able to get you out of my mind, so today I've brought Nun Hsüeh along with me to pay you a visit."

It so happens that this Nun Hsüeh had not left home to take up a religious vocation in her early years. In her youth she had married a husband who lived across the street from the Kuang-ch'eng Monastery and peddled steamed wheat cakes for a living. Who could have anticipated that, earnings from his business being meager, Nun Hsüeh, finding herself in this:

Unsatisfactory predicament,⁶⁸
should have resorted to:

Bandyng words and wagging her tongue,⁶⁹

with the monks and acolytes in the monastery.

Exchanging looks with eyes and eyebrows,

Approving this and disapproving that,⁷⁰

she managed to work these monks up into such a state that each and every one of them developed a stiff erection in his groin. Taking advantage of her husband's absence from the house, while:

Anticipating tea or recovering from wine, she contrived to seduce some four, five, or six of them. They would constantly drop by and present her with baked wheat cakes, stuffed pastries, steamed dumplings, or chestnuts. Some of them would even give her the fees they earned for their religious services to enable her to buy flowers, while others would donate the fabric they received as payment for celebrating the ritual Destruction of Hell for her to make footbindings out of. Her husband remained oblivious to all this, and when, sometime later, he contracted an illness and died, because she was so intimately acquainted with the Buddhist establishment she opted to take the tonsure and become a nun. As such, she spent her time frequenting the homes of the gentry in the endeavor to corner the market for the recitation of Buddhist sutras and litanies of repentance. There were also good-for-nothing women who hankered after illicit affairs and engaged her to smuggle monks into their homes, for whom she acted as a procuress, which turned out to be a lucrative trade.

When she learned that Hsi-men Ch'ing's household was extremely wealthy and observed that he had a plethora of concubines and serving maids at his disposal, she thought she could contrive to reap a profit from this situation and took to frequenting his house accordingly. Hsi-men Ch'ing, for his part, was unaware that:

The three female professionals and the six dames,⁷¹ are persons whom people should do everything in their power to prevent from frequenting their homes. Truly:

Originally, her conduct was that of an unlicensed prostitute.
Setting up shop as a Buddhist monk or preceptor,
She dresses up accordingly, and recites the name of Amitābha.
Every time she opens her mouth, she speaks of the way to the Western Paradise.
Wrapping her head in a length of cloth,
Draping her body in a long gown,
And girdling herself with a yellow sash,
Early and late, she loiters by the gate or lingers beside the door.
She regards relieving others of their gold and silver as acceptable conduct;
While, in the final analysis, in her heart she is utterly benighted.
Any way you look at it, she is scarcely a decent nun.
How many fine reputations have been besmirched by her?⁷²

There is also another song that puts it very well:

Buddhist nuns, of course, are known for their shiny bald heads.
Enticing monks into their quarters, they are busy night after night.
When three shiny knobs congregate,
They resemble a master and his two disciples.
But what are they doing rubbing their cymbals together in bed?⁷³

When Nun Hsüeh had taken a seat, she opened the little box, saying, "We have no way of adequately expressing our respect for you, but we have brought some fruits that were offered to the Buddha by our benefactors, as a makeshift way of presenting you with something fresh."

"If you wish to visit us," said Yüeh-niang, "simply come and visit us. What need is there for you to go to all this trouble?"

It so happened that P'an Chin-lien had awoken from her nap and heard people talking outside. Thinking that it was merely a continuation of what had been going on before, she went outside to see what was up. She saw that Li P'ing-erh was in her quarters playing with her child. When the latter found out that Nun Wang was here, she wanted to have a talk with her about doing something for the protection of Kuan-ko, so she went back to Yüeh-niang's room together with Chin-lien. After everyone had greeted each other, they all sat down.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, realizing that Li P'ing-erh had not heard about it, repeated the story of how Abbot Tao-chien had come to solicit a subscription, and how he had signed the subscription book and agreed to make a donation, in the hope of acquiring good fortune for Kuan-ko. Who could have anticipated that this would have the effect of annoying P'an Chin-lien so much that she took herself off in a puff of smoke, muttering to herself as she went.

At this juncture, Nun Hsüeh stood up, pressed her palms together in front of her chest, and exclaimed, "Buddha be praised! As long as Your Honor has:

The benign intention of creating good fortune,
there is no doubt but that you will enjoy:

A lifetime of a thousand years,
beget:

Five sons and two daughters,⁷⁴
and remain:

United with your seven children.⁷⁵

But there is another opportunity I would like to recommend to you, venerable sir. This instance of karmic cause and effect costs very little to initiate, yet it will:

Procure immeasurable good fortune.⁷⁶
So, venerable benefactor! If you were to perform this act of merit, even the deeds of the venerable Gautama Buddha when he:

Practiced austerities in the Himalayas,⁷⁷ or of the honorable Kāśyapa when he:

Spread his hair to cover the ground,⁷⁸ or of the second Ch'an patriarch Hui-k'o⁷⁹ when he:

Plunged from a cliff to feed a tiger,⁸⁰ or of the venerable Anāpindika⁸¹ when he:

Paved the entire grounds with gold,⁸² would not equal this act of merit on your part.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this and said, “Reverend Sister, pray remain seated and tell me in detail just what this meritorious deed might be, that I may accede to your suggestion.”

Nun Hsüeh then said, “Our Buddhist patriarchs have bequeathed to us the text of the Dhāraṇī Sutra in one scroll, that is solely devoted to exhorting us to seek the way to the Pure Land of the Western Paradise. The Buddha has told us that the Third Dhyāna Heaven, the Fourth Dhyāna Heaven, the Thirty-third Heaven, the Tusita Heaven, the Grand Veil Heaven, and the Imperfect Heaven are all places to which one cannot expect to gain immediate admission whenever one wants. The only such place is the Western Paradise presided over by Amitābha. There are no seasons of spring, summer, autumn, or winter there; no frigid winds or summer heat. Rather, one always enjoys:

The temperate weather,⁸³
of the three months of spring. Moreover, there are no distinctions between husbands and wives, or men and women there. One is reborn:

In the Pool of the Seven Treasures,⁸⁴
On the Terrace of the Golden Lotus.”⁸⁵

“How large is that lotus blossom?” asked Hsi-men Ch'ing. “If one were reborn on top of it and were struck by a gust of wind, would one not be in danger of tumbling off and falling into the pond?”

“My good sir,” said Nun Hsüeh, “you still don't understand. Let me explain it to you on the basis of what the scripture says. The Buddhists call a distance of five hundred li a yojana.⁸⁶ That lotus blossom is really something. It is very large, very large; in fact, five hundred yojanas in diameter. When one is reborn there:

Precious garb is furnished to order;
Fine repasts are provided by Heaven;

in addition to which:

Songbirds harmonize with each other, sounding just like the reeds of a panpipe. Truly, it is a wondrous realm. Only because:

The ordinary man with fleshly eyes,⁸⁷
Does not realize where he is going,
And lacks both reverence and faith, the Buddhist patriarch chose to promulgate this sutra, urging people to:

Devotedly recite the Buddha's name,⁸⁸
And be reborn in the western realm, that they might behold the Buddha Amitābha himself. From that time on, from one age to the next, even unto a hundred, a thousand, or a myriad ages, they will never again fall subject to the wheel of transmigration. The Buddhist patriarch put it very well when he said, ‘Anyone who recites this sutra, arranges to have this sutra printed, or copies this sutra, and thus persuades a single person, or a thousand, or a myriad persons to recite this sutra, will thereby:

Procure immeasurable good fortune.’

Moreover, included in this sutra there are sacred incantations for the protection of male offspring. All families that give birth to boys and girls must devote themselves to this in order to insure that:

Their growth and upbringing will both be easy,
and that:

Mishap may be avoided and good fortune assured.

Right now, the printing blocks for this sutra already exist. All that is needed is for someone to take care of their printing and distribution. Venerable sir, all you need to do is to pay for the labor and materials required to produce a print run of several thousand copies, have them properly bound, and distributed in all ten directions. The merit accruing to such an act would be great indeed.”

“That would not be difficult,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing. “But I don't know how many sheets of paper would be required for the reproduction of this sutra, or the cost of having it bound and printed. Only on the basis of a detailed estimate would it be appropriate for me to proceed.”

“Venerable sir,” said Nun Hsüeh, “you're being unreasonable. How can you say such a thing, or demand a detailed estimate? All you need to do is to give the sutra printing establishment an advance of nine taels of silver; tell them to print several thousand, or several tens of thousands, of copies; and promise to settle accounts with them by paying a lump sum for the cost of labor and paper after the binding has been completed. That's all there is to it. What need is there for such a thing as a detailed estimate?”

Just as they were in the thick of their discussion, lo and behold, Ch'en Ching-chi had something to say to Hsi-men Ch'ing and had been looking for him for some time without finding him. He asked Tai-an where he was and was told that he was in Yüeh-niang's quarters. As he made his way past the summerhouse, as luck would have it, he ran into P'an Chin-lien, who had been leaning on the balustrade sniggering to herself. When she suddenly lifted her head and saw that it was Ch'en Ching-chi, she reacted just like:

A cat upon catching sight of some fresh seafood:
Her only thought was to gobble it up immediately.

Before she knew it, the depression she had been suffering from all day changed into:

P'an Chin-lien and Ch'en Ching-chi Enjoy a Furtive Tryst

The genial atmosphere of a spring breeze.⁸⁹

The two of them, taking advantage of the fact that there was no one about, fell to holding hands and snuggling up against each other, puckering up their lips and sucking each other's tongues, carrying on in the most disgusting way for some time. Because they were afraid that Hsi-men Ch'ing might come out and catch them at it, they were unable to consummate the matter that really counted. Their two pairs of eyes were like those of rats on catching sight of a cat:

Looking left and glancing right,⁹⁰
forever on the lookout. Their tryst having proven abortive, they ended up scurrying their separate ways in a puff of smoke.

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing had done listening to Nun Hsüeh's spiel, his heart was moved imperceptibly to a benign intent.

Calling for Tai-an, he had him fetch his card case, opened it with the little key attached to his handkerchief, and got out a sealed packet of silver, consisting of precisely thirty taels of the highest grade of incised silver stamped with the mark of the Sung-chiang mint, which he handed over to Nun Hsüeh and Nun Wang, saying, "The two of you should go together to the sutra printing establishment of your choice and have them print five thousand copies of this sutra for me. When the job is finished, I will settle accounts with them, and pay whatever remains due."

While they were still speaking, who should appear but Shu-t'ung, who came in hurriedly to report, "The guests whom you have invited have all arrived."

Needless to say, this group consisted of Wu K'ai, Hua Tzu-yu, Hsieh Hsita, Ch'ang Shih-chieh, the whole bunch of them in fact, all of whom arrived together, properly attired for the occasion. Hsi-men Ch'ing hurriedly straightened his clothing, went outside to greet them, and ushered them into the reception hall. Tables had already been set up there, with an appropriate array of appetizers.

Wu K'ai was invited to assume the place of honor, after which the rest of them:

Segregating themselves by order of precedence, and Indicating their relative degrees of seniority, all proceeded to sit down in their places. Whereupon, whether salted, preserved, fried, or stewed, unlimited quantities of fish and meat, roast chicken, roast duck, and fresh fruits in season were all brought out together. Hsi-men Ch'ing also ordered that Ma-ku wine should be opened up and heated for their consumption.

Behold:

When drinking wine with one's bosom friends,⁹¹

Demeanor and deportment are often forgotten.

Some play at guess-fingers;

Some beat the drum, while Others pass the flower;⁹²

Two out of three moves are bluffs.

Ballads are performed,

Dramatic arias are sung.

Those telling of breeze and moonlight speak of how,

Tu Fu and Ho Chih-chang⁹³ appreciated the spring season.⁹⁴

Those showing off their book learning also recall how,

Su Shih and Huang T'ing-chien roamed below the Red Cliff.⁹⁵

Those playing pitch-pot want to make the variations known as,

Regular Geese in Flight,

Irregular Geese in Flight, or

The Eight Immortals Cross the Sea.⁹⁶

Those playing at dice want to throw the combinations known as,

The Regular Cavalry,

The Irregular Cavalry,⁹⁷ or

Loaches Entering a Clump of Caltrops.⁹⁸

Those who lose a forfeit of wine,

Must drain their cups to the last drop;

Even if it induces them to,

Collapse like a jade pinnacle.⁹⁹

Those who are the winners at dice,

Must hang up congratulatory red banners;

Would anyone permit them to,

Wear their caps upside down?¹⁰⁰

Inexhaustible,

Are the scenes on the Stage of Youthful Festivity;

Indescribable,

Are the days and months in the Land of Drunkenness.¹⁰¹

Truly:

The autumn moon and the spring flowers¹⁰² are to be found everywhere;

Occasions for enjoyment and happy events¹⁰³ tend to occur then as well.

If one fails during one's hundred years to be drunk a thousand times;

All the hustle and bustle of one's life will simply amount to nothing.

Chapter 58

INSPIRED BY A FIT OF JEALOUSY

CHIN-LIEN BEATS CH'TU-CHÜ;

BEGGING CURED PORK THE MIRROR POLISHER

TELLS A SOB STORY

All alone within the embroidered bed curtains, her thoughts are subdued;
A myriad reasons for new melancholy beset her,
both by day and by night.
A solitary goose calls after its mates, as it crosses the autumn frontier;
A distracting cricket bemoans its sorrows, as the moon hovers in the eaves.
Having lost her way en route to Blue Bridge,¹ she despairs of the red cord;²
Without anybody to share her golden boudoir, she lets down the green blind.
Her fate can be compared to the bamboos that grow along the Hsiang River;
That are to this day speckled with the tears shed by those nymphs of old.³

THE STORY GOES that on that day Hsi-men Ch'ing continued drinking wine with his friends and relatives in the front reception hall until he became stinking drunk, after which he made his way toward Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters in the rear compound. Sun Hsüeh-o herself was in the kitchen at the time, overseeing the cleaning up of the utensils. When she heard that Hsi-men Ch'ing was headed for her place, she hastened back to it:

Covering two steps with every one.

The blind entertainer Big Sister Yü had been sitting on the k'ang in her quarters, and she hustled her off to spend the night with Yü-hsiao and Hsiao-yü in the room with the k'ang in Yüeh-niang's quarters.

It so happens that, like the other women in the rear compound, Sun Hsüeh-o occupied quarters consisting of three compartments, one well-lighted parlor and two less well-lighted inner rooms, one of which was furnished with a bed, and the other with a k'ang. Hsi-men Ch'ing had not ventured into her quarters for more than a year. When she realized that he had come to see her today, on the one hand, she hastened forward to help Hsimen Ch'ing off with his clothes and provided a chair in the center of the parlor for him to sit on, while on the other hand, she wiped off the cool bamboo bed mat in her room, proceeded to:

Light incense and wash her private parts, and then went back out to serve Hsi-men Ch'ing some tea. When they were finished with the tea, she helped him into her room and onto the bed, took off his boots, unfastened his girdle, and saw to it that he was resting comfortably. Concerning that evening there is nothing more to relate.

The next day was the twenty-eighth, the actual date of Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday. They had just finished burning some paper money in honor of the occasion when, lo and behold, who should appear but Hu Hsiu, a young man employed by Han Tao-kuo, who arrived at the front gate, dismounted, and had the attendants announce his arrival to Hsi-men Ch'ing. Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered that he be ushered into the reception hall, where, after Hu Hsiu had kowtowed to him, he inquired about the whereabouts of the boatload of goods.

Hu Hsiu then proceeded to hand him a letter with a statement of account and told him how Uncle Han Tao-kuo had managed to purchase a cargo of ten thousand taels worth of silk goods in Hang-chou, how they had now gotten as far as the customs station in Lin-ch'ing but lacked sufficient silver to pay the customs duty, and how only after paying the duty would they be able to transship the merchandise and transport it into the city.

On the one hand, when Hsi-men Ch'ing had read the letter with the statement of account he was delighted and ordered Ch'i-t'ung, "See to it that some food is provided for Hu Hsiu to eat."

On the other hand, he directed Hu Hsiu to go over to kinsman Ch'iao Hung's place and report the news to him. It was not long before Hu Hsiu finished his meal and went off on this errand.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then went inside and reported to Yüeh-niang, thus and so, saying, "Manager Han Tao-kuo's boatload of goods has reached Lin-ch'ing, and he has sent his young man, Hu Hsiu, to deliver a letter with a statement of account. Right now, we'll have to sweep out the place across the street, store the goods there, find a manager to take care of it, construct an underground storehouse, and open up a shop for business."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she said, "You'd better start looking for someone right away. It's not exactly early days yet, that would allow you to take your time about it."

"Right now I'm just waiting for Brother Ying the Second to come by," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I plan to take up the matter with him, and get him to find someone as quickly as possible."

In due course, when Ying Po-chüeh showed up, Hsi-men Ch'ing joined him in the reception hall and said, "Manager Han Tao-kuo's boatload of goods from Hang-chou has arrived, but I am in need of a manager to take charge of selling the merchandise."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "you are to be congratulated. Not only is today your birthday, but your boatload of goods has arrived. You are sure to reap a tenfold profit in this enterprise, since this is a case of:

One happy event occurring on top of another.

Brother, if it's a sales manager you want, that's no problem. I know someone who is a friend of mine because:

When fathers associate, their sons are acquainted.

He was originally a salesperson in the silk trade who has been down on his luck for several years and is sitting idle at home. This year he is forty-some years old, truly, a man in the prime of life. That he has a good eye for judging the quality of silver goes without saying. He is proficient at writing and arithmetic, and a good hand at business transactions. This person's surname is Kan, his given name is Jun, and his courtesy name is Ch'u-shen. He is currently living in Stonebridge Alley and resides in a house of his own."

"If he is agreeable," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "ask him to come see me tomorrow."

As they were speaking, who should appear but Li Ming, Wu Hui, and Cheng Feng, all three of them, who prostrated themselves on the ground and kowtowed before getting up and standing to one side. Before long the tumblers and musicians all arrived, and preparations were made to feed them in an antechamber. Tables were set up and they were fed, along with Li Ming, Wu Hui, and Cheng Feng.

Who should appear at this juncture but the adjutant on duty, with a summons in hand, who came back and reported, "Among the singing girls that I was sent to summon, only Cheng Ai-yüeh is not coming. The madam of her establishment said that she had made her preparations and was all set to come when she was commandeered by a servant from the household of the distaff relative of the imperial family, Wang the Second, who carried her off to perform there. Thus, I was only able to summon Ch'i Hsiang-erh, Tung Chiaorh, and Hung the Fourth, who have all gotten themselves ready and will be here before long."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard that she was not coming, he said, "What nonsense! Why should she not come?"

He then called over Cheng Feng and asked him, "How is it that your younger sister, when I have called for her services, has refused to come? Is it really true that she has been commandeered by the household of Wang the Second?"

Cheng Feng knelt down in front of him and said, "I live apart from her and don't know anything about it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "You may think that if she's gone off to Wang the Second's place to sing, that's that. No doubt you assume that, in that case, I won't be able to get hold of her."

He then called for Tai-an and, when he came forward, ordered him, "Take two orderlies with you, and one of my calling cards, and go to the residence of those distaff relatives of the imperial family surnamed Wang. When you see His Honor Wang the Second, tell him that I have invited some people for a drinking party, and that I engaged the services of Cheng Ai-yüeh for the occasion some two or three days ago and, whatever the case may be, would be obliged if he would let her come and fulfill her engagement. Should any objections be made to this, have her put in chains, along with the madam of her establishment, and lock them up in my gatehouse. How provoking can you get! Does she think that if she plays hard to get, I'll let it go at that?"

He then turned to Cheng Feng, and said, "You go along with him."

Cheng Feng did not dare to refuse and, going outside, appealed to Tai-an, saying, "Brother, when we get there you go on in, while I wait for you outside. If it is really true that His Honor Wang the Second sent for her, I imagine she may not have completed her preparations and gone over there yet. I'd be much indebted to you, Brother, if she hasn't left yet, if you'd contrive some way of persuading her to make the best of it and come along with us."

"If she's actually gone to Wang the Second's place," said Tai-an, "I'll take Father's calling card and try to get her. If she's still hiding out at home, on the other hand, you should go inside and tell her mother that she had better get herself ready and come along with us. If I put in a good word for her on your behalf, Father will let it go at that. You people don't seem to understand his temperament. He engaged her for this occasion while at His Honor Hsia Yen-ling's place the other day. If she failed to come, it's no wonder that he should be annoyed."

Cheng Feng, on the one hand, set off for the Cheng Family Establishment to investigate the situation, while Tai-an, with the two orderlies and the adjutant, followed after him.

To resume our story, after Hsi-men Ch'ing had sent Tai-an and Cheng Feng off on this errand, he turned to Ying Po-chüeh, and said, "How provoking can this little whore be? She's willing enough to sing at other people's places, but when I engage her services, she refuses to come."

"The little baggage!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "What does she understand? She doesn't yet know what you're capable of."

"I noticed at that drinking party," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that she had a way with words. I engaged her to come here and sing for a couple of days as a means of testing her. And she comes up with such a provoking response."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "these four painted faces that you've selected to perform today are conspicuous for the way in which they:

Stand out among their kind.

There are not any better to be found."

"You haven't even seen Ai-yüeh, have you?" said Li Ming.

"The last time I joined your master for a drink at her place," said Ying Pochüeh, "she was still a child. I haven't seen her for the last several years, so I don't know how she's developed."

"This little painted face," said Li Ming, "may have a good enough figure, but she's altogether too preoccupied with dolling herself up. Although she may be capable of singing a song, she can't do it even half as well as Kueichieh. What kind of a place does she think Father's is that she should be so presumptuous as not to show up? Were she to come, it could only redound to her advantage. How can she be so:

Oblivious to the true value of things?"⁴

Who should appear at this juncture but Hu Hsiu, who came back and reported, "I've been to Master Ch'iao Hung's place, and he says that he will await your instructions."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then instructed Ch'en Ching-chi, "Go back to the rear compound and get fifty taels of silver; have Shu-t'ung write a letter and stamp it with my seal; and depute an adjutant to set out early tomorrow morning together with Hu Hsiu and deliver it to His Honor Ch'ien Lung-yeh at the Lin-ch'ing customs station, requesting that, so far as the customs duties are concerned, he should:

Look upon the matter with favorable eyes."

In no time at all Ch'en Ching-chi fetched a packet of silver and turned it over to Hu Hsiu.

"I'm going to Uncle Han Tao-kuo's house to spend the night," reported Hu Hsiu.

He then took possession of the letter and customs statement, and left with the adjutant early the next morning. But no more of this.

Suddenly the sound of orderlies shouting to clear the way became audible, and P'ing-an came in to report, "Eunuch Director Liu and Eunuch Director Hsüeh have arrived."

Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly donned his official cap and girdle and went out to welcome them into the main reception hall. After they had exchanged the customary amenities, he invited them to the summerhouse, where they divested themselves of their python robes and sat down on two folding chairs that had been set out in the place of honor at the head of the chamber, while Ying Po-chüeh joined Hsi-men Ch'ing at the foot of the chamber in playing the role of hosts.

"Who is this gentleman here?" Eunuch Director Hsüeh inquired.

"You met him once before, last year," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He is your pupil's old friend Ying the Second."

"So it's that Mr. Ying who is so given to making a joke out of everything, is it?" said Eunuch Director Hsüeh.

Ying Po-chüeh bowed in his direction and said, "So you still remember, do you, sir? Your humble servant is that very one."

In no time at all tea was served and duly consumed.

Who should appear at this juncture but P'ing-an, who came in and reported, "His Honor Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command has sent a servant with a card indicating that he has another party to attend today and will consequently arrive a bit late. He says that you should start without him. There is no need to wait."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished reading the card, he said, "I understand."

"Your Honor Hsi-men," said Eunuch Director Hsüeh, "who is it that's coming late today?"

"Chou Hsiu has another party to attend," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He has sent someone to say that we should go ahead and not wait for him, since he fears he may be a little late."

"Since he's sent someone to inform you," said Eunuch Director Hsüeh, "we might as well leave a place for him and proceed."

At this juncture, two page boys made their way to the upper end of the chamber and stood one to either side of the guests of honor, cooling them with their fans.

As the conversation proceeded, Wang Ching came in with two calling cards and announced that the two licentiates had arrived. Hsi-men Ch'ing, upon glancing at the cards and seeing that one of them read, "Your devoted servant Ni P'eng," and the other, "Wen Pi-ku," realized that Licentiate Ni had come with the friend and fellow student whom he had recommended to him, and he hastened out to welcome them.

He saw that each of them was attired in the cap and gown of a scholar. Having ushered them inside, he did not bother to inspect Licentiate Ni but, turning his attention to Wen Pi-ku, or Pedant Wen, observed that he was not more than forty years old, was possessed of:

Bright eyes and white teeth,⁵

A three-forked beard,

An uninhibited demeanor,⁶ and

An elegant carriage.

If you don't know what he might be capable of,

You must observe what he does and does not do.

There are a few lines that describe him very well:

Though possessed of an unbridled talent,⁷

He is given to visiting unsavory places.

Having stumbled in his pursuit of success,

His heroic ambitions have turned to ashes.

His property having been allowed to dribble away,⁸

His spirit of nobility⁹ was the first thing to go.¹⁰

His literary efforts and Confucian principles,

Have all been handed back to Confucius himself.

He has taken the task of supporting the ruler and benefiting the people,

As well as the desire to glorify his ancestors and elevate his relatives,

And relegated them, in their entirety, to that great sea, the Eastern Ocean.

Concealing his light and following the crowd,¹¹

His only concern is for his own advantage.¹²

Conforming indifferently to square and round,¹³

He no longer takes shame to be significant.

Affecting both a high hat and a broad belt,

He acts as though no one else were present.¹⁴

In company his speeches are long and lofty,
But in his breast he harbors nothing at all.
For three years he has answered the roll call,
But failed to pass the entrance examination;
The cassia in the moon will forever remain beyond his reach.
Among convivial companions he enjoys his cups,
Undisturbed by his withdrawal from the world;
He is content to dwell as a recluse within his cliffside cave.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ushered his guests into the reception hall where they saluted each other, upon which they each presented him with the customary book and kerchief in honor of his birthday.

After they had bowed to each other and sat down in the positions of guest and host, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "I have long been an admirer of the venerable Master Wen's great talents. May I venture to enquire as to your distinguished courtesy name?"

Licentiate Wen replied, "Your pupil's given name is Pi-ku, my informal name is Jih-hsin, and my courtesy name is K'uei-hsüan."

"Venerable Master K'uei-hsüan," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "may I also ask in which government school you are enrolled, and what classic you specialize in?"

"Though your pupil is deficient in talent," Licentiate Wen replied, "I am enrolled in the prefectural school and am engaged in a rudimentary study of the I-ching, or Book of Changes. I have long been an admirer of your household's great reputation but have not presumed to pay you a visit. Only because, the other day, my fellow student Ni P'eng brought up the subject of your surpassing virtue, have I ventured to ascend your hall in order to pay my respects."

"You do me too much honor," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Since you have taken the initiative in calling upon me, venerable sir, your pupil will not fail to return the favor when time allows. The fact is that your pupil, being but a military official, is too uncouth to comprehend the literary niceties and stands in need of someone qualified to handle his social correspondence for him. Because, some time ago, when visiting the home of a colleague of mine, I encountered the venerable gentleman, Ni P'eng, who praised you, venerable sir, for your great talent and surpassing virtue, I resolved to pay you a visit and seek your instruction. How could I have anticipated that you would condescend to drop in on me, and present me with such a handsome gift to boot?"

I will never be able to thank you enough."

"Your pupil," responded Licentiate Wen, "is possessed of but:

Paltry talent and meager virtue.

I am unworthy of such extravagant praise."

When they had finished their tea, Hsi-men Ch'ing invited them to the summerhouse, where Eunuch Director Hsüeh and Eunuch Director Liu were already seated.

"Pray invite the two venerable gentlemen to come in and divest themselves of their formal clothes," said Eunuch Director Hsüeh.

Hsi-men Ch'ing accordingly invited them to loosen their blue gowns. Once inside, they were as deferential as could be, before sitting down, one on either side, with lowered heads.

As they were chatting, Hsi-men Ch'ing's brother-in-law Wu K'ai and Battalion Commander Fan Hsün arrived, exchanged greetings with the company, and sat down.

Before long, Tai-an, along with some fellow servants and Cheng Feng, came in and reported that the four singing girls engaged for the occasion had all been summoned.

Hsi-men Ch'ing asked, "Was she at Imperial Relative Wang's place or not?"

"I had to go to Imperial Relative Wang's place to call for her," said Tai-an, "but she had not made any preparations to leave. It was only when I threatened to truss up the madam of her place and have her locked up that she became flustered and consented to get into her sedan chair and come along with the others."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then went outside and stood on the stylobate of the reception hall in order to observe the four singing girls as they came in together. Thereupon, each of them:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze,
Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying,
Just as though inserting a taper in its holder, proceeded to kowtow to him.

Cheng Ai-yüeh was wearing a purple gauze blouse over a white gauze drawnwork skirt. On her head:

A phoenix hairpin is half askew,
The jewels in her chignon tinkle.¹⁵
Her slender waist is lissome,¹⁶
Resembling the lithe branches of the willow;
Her flowery face is pleasing,
With the voluptuousness of the lotus blossom.

Truly:

The myriad forms of her seductiveness¹⁷ are nowhere to be bought;
Even at a thousand taels for one night¹⁸ her like cannot be found.¹⁹

Hsi-men Ch'ing, addressing himself to Cheng Ai-yüeh, said, "I engaged you for this occasion, so why did you fail to come? How provoking can you get? No doubt you thought I would be unable to get hold of you."

Cheng Ai-yüeh stood up after kowtowing to him, without saying a word in response, and merely smiled as she joined her companions in trooping off toward the rear compound. Upon arriving there, and kowtowing to Yüeh-niang and the rest of the company, they noticed that Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh were already in attendance.

After greeting them with a bow, they remarked, "The two of you are here early."

"We haven't been home for the last two days," Li Kuei-chieh said.

She then went on to ask, "How come the four of you are so late?"

"It was Sister Cheng Ai-yüeh who prevented us from coming any earlier," said Tung Chiao-erh. "We were all ready and waiting for her, but she refused to start out."

Cheng Ai-yüeh merely covered her face with her fan and smiled, without saying a word.

Yüeh-niang then asked, "Whose establishment does this young lady belong to?"

"You may not know her," Tung Chiao-erh explained, "but she's the younger sister of Cheng Ai-hsiang. It's not even half a year since she was deflowered."

"She does indeed have a nice figure," said Yüeh-niang.

Tea was ordered for them to drink, and a table was set up for the purpose.

Meanwhile, P'an Chin-lien amused herself by lifting up Cheng Ai-yüeh's skirt and displaying her feet, saying as she did so, "It seems that you denizens of the quarter favor straight pointed toes to your shoes, rather than the turned up tips that we outsiders prefer. The shoes we outsiders wear have level soles, while you denizens of the quarter prefer high heels."

Yüeh-niang turned to her sister-in-law, Wu K'ai's wife, and said, "Just see how she insists on playing the role of the superior know-it-all. Why should she concern herself with such things?"

A little later, Chin-lien pulled a stickpin with a dangling goldfish out of Cheng Ai-yüeh's hairdo and asked her, "Where did you have this particular piece made?"

"It was designed by one of the silversmiths in the quarter," replied Cheng Ai-yüeh.

Before long, tea was served, and Yüeh-niang suggested that Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh join the other four in partaking of the tea.

In no time at all, the six singing girls finished their tea, and Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh said to Tung Chiao-erh and the others, "Why don't you come and take a stroll in the garden with us?"

"We'll come join you," said Tung Chiao-erh, "after making another visit in the rear compound."

Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh then followed P'an Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou out through the ceremonial gate that separated the front and rear compounds and into the garden. Because there were people in the large summer-house, they did not go that way, but, skirting it, enjoyed the flowery vegetation for a while and then went into Li P'ing-erh's quarters to see Kuan-ko.

Kuan-ko was feeling somewhat out of sorts. He had awakened from a dream, crying from fright, and would not allow himself to be breast-fed. Li P'ing-erh was in the room, looking after him, and had not come out. When she saw that Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh, along with Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien, had come in, she hastily invited them to sit down.

"Is little brother asleep?" Li Kuei-chieh asked.

"He's been crying for some time," said Li P'ing-erh. "Only after I put him down facing the interior of the bed just now, has he fallen asleep."

Meng Yü-lou said, "The First Lady told you to send for Dame Liu to take a look at him. Why don't you send a page boy right now to summon her?"

"Today is Father's birthday," said Li P'ing-erh. "I'll send for her tomorrow."

As they were talking, they saw the four singing-girls, along with Hsi-men Ta-chieh and Hsiao-yü, come in.

"So this is where you all are," said Hsi-men Ta-chieh. "We've been looking for you in the garden."

"Since there are male guests being entertained in the garden," said Meng Yü-lou, "we didn't feel it right to linger there, but just took a look, and then came over here."

Li Kuei-chieh asked Hung the Fourth, "What were the four of you doing in the rear compound that delayed you in getting here for so long?"

"We were drinking tea in the Fourth Lady's quarters in the rear compound," explained Hung the Fourth, "and have been visiting there all this time."

When P'an Chin-lien heard this, she smiled meaningfully at Meng Yü-lou and Li P'ing-erh and said to Hung the Fourth, "Who told you to call her the Fourth Lady?"

"She asked us into her quarters for some tea," said Tung Chiao-erh. "When one of us enquired of her, saying, 'We haven't previously had the opportunity to kowtow to you, so we don't know which lady you are,' she replied, 'I am your Fourth Lady.'"

"Why the shameless concubine!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "If other people choose to address you that way, it's all right, I suppose. But whoever heard of anyone referring to herself as the Fourth Lady? Who is there in this entire household who deigns to show you any favor, or considers you to count for anything? Who is there who refers to you as the Fourth Lady? Merely because our husband spent a night in your room, you think that:

Having obtained some pigments,

You're ready to start up a dyer's establishment.

If it weren't for the fact that Sister-in-law Wu was staying overnight in the First Lady's room, Li Kuei-chieh was staying in the Second Lady's room, Aunt Yang was staying in the Third Lady's room, Wu Yin-erh was staying in Li P'ing-erh's room, and I had Old Mrs. P'an in my room, it never would have occurred to him to go into your room."

"You haven't even seen everything that happened," said Meng Yü-lou. "This morning, after sending Father off to the front compound, she made quite a spectacle of herself in the courtyard:

Summoning this one and calling for that."²⁰

"As the saying goes," said Chin-lien:

"Slaves should never be indulged, and Children ought not to be humored."

She then proceeded to interrogate Hsiao-yü, saying, "I hear that your master told your mistress that she really ought to find a maidservant for her. Last night when he went into her quarters and saw that she hadn't finished cleaning things up, that little whore put on quite a show, saying to your master, 'I didn't have the spare time yesterday to put the room in order, and now you've seen fit to come spend the night here at my place.' To which your master responded, 'That's not a problem. Tomorrow, I'll tell your mistress to find a maidservant for you.' Is that really what happened?"

"I don't know," said Hsiao-yü. "No doubt it was something that Yü-hsiao overheard."

Chin-lien explained to Li Kuei-chieh, "Except when there are visitors in each of our quarters, Father doesn't ordinarily go into her place in the rear compound. No doubt we may appear to be disparaging her behind her back, but the fact of the matter is that she is so:

Ignorant of the ways of the world,²¹ that she is constantly given to harming other people with that tongue of hers, so that the rest of us are not ordinarily on speaking terms with her."

As they were speaking, Hsiu-ch'un came in with some tea, and each person was served a cup of tea, flavored with fruit kernels.

While they were drinking their tea, all of a sudden, in the front compound:

Drums and music began to sound,
as Director-in-Chief Ching Chung and the other guests all arrived together. As soon as they had been seated and served with wine, Tai-an came to call for the four singing girls, and they duly trooped off to the front compound. Ch'iao Hung did not attend the party that day.

First there was a show by the tumblers, and vaudeville acts, while the musicians:

Played wind and percussion instruments and sang.

Then, after the ensemble dances were finished, a comic farce of the genre known as hsiao-lo yüan-pen was performed. The chef then came in and presented the first course, along with soup and rice.

Who should appear at this juncture but Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i, who came in wearing his official cap and girdle. Hsi-men Ch'ing got up to welcome him into the chamber, where, after they had exchanged the customary amenities, Dr. Jen ordered his attendants to reach into his felt bag and extract a handkerchief embroidered with the character for long life, in which were wrapped two mace of silver, as a birthday gift for Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Only yesterday," he said, "did Han Ming-ch'uan mention to me that today is your birthday. Please excuse your pupil for his tardiness."

"How could I presume to put you to the trouble of mounting your equipage on my behalf," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "And many thanks for your lavish gift. I am much obliged to you for the efficacious prescriptions you have provided in the past."

When they had finished saluting each other, Dr. Jen wanted to offer his host a drink, but Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "There is no need for that. The salutation you offered me just now is sufficient."

After Dr. Jen had divested himself of his outer garments, he was offered a seat at the fourth table setting on the left side, next to that of Wu K'ai. Soup and rice were served to him, and platters of viands were also provided for his servitors. Dr. Jen thanked Hsi-men Ch'ing for his hospitality, directed his servitors to take the food provided for them outside, and then sat down.

After the four singing girls had lined up to one side, struck up their instruments, and sung a birthday song in celebration of the occasion, Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered them to join the company and divide up the job of serving the guests with wine.

The performers at the foot of the chamber then came forward to where Eunuch Director Liu and Eunuch Director Hsüeh were sitting and presented them with the program, from which they selected the tsa-chü drama entitled Han Hsiang-tzu tu Ch'en Pan-chieh sheng-hsien hui (Han Hsiang-tzu induces Ch'en Pan-chieh to ascend to the realm of the immortals).²²

Only one scene of this drama had been performed when they heard the sound of orderlies shouting to clear the way gradually approach, and P'ing-an came in to announce that His Honor Commandant Chou Hsiu had arrived. Hsi-men Ch'ing put on his official cap and girdle and went out to welcome him. Before even exchanging formal greetings with him, he suggested to his guest that he divest himself of his formal outer garments.

"I have not come for any other reason," said Chou Hsiu, "than to offer my brother Ssu-ch'üan²³ a cup of wine."

Eunuch Director Hsüeh came forward at this point and said, "Your Honor Chou, there is no need to offer him a cup of wine. It will suffice to exchange salutations with him."

The two of them bowed to each other, after which Chou Hsiu went on to say, "Your pupil has arrived late. Forgive me. Forgive me."

Only after running through the customary amenities did Chou Hsiu divest himself of his outer garments, loosen his girdle, and salute the assembled guests. A goblet and chopsticks were provided for him at the third place setting on the left, after which he was supplied with soup and rice, and a new main course was served. In the presence of the gathering, two platters of snacks, two platters of baked meats, and two bottles of wine were provided for each of the servitors who had accompanied Chou Hsiu to tend the horses.

Chou Hsiu raised his hand in acknowledgment and thanked his host, saying, "You are too generous."

Only after calling in his attendants to take the proffered viands outside did he consent to sit down in his place, whereupon Eunuch Director Liu and Eunuch Director Hsüeh each toasted him with a large bumper of wine.

The festivities lasted until:

Drinking vessels and game tallies lay helter-skelter,
accompanied by:

Song and dance and wind and string instruments,
Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade.

Truly:

The dancing continued till the moon in the pavilion amid the willows hung low;
The singing went on until the breeze underneath the peach-blossom fans expired.²⁴

The party continued until evening, when Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i, because he lived outside the city gate, was the first to leave.

As Hsi-men Ch'ing saw him off, Dr. Jen asked him, "Is your venerable consort's ailment any better?"

"My humble housemate did feel appreciably better after taking your excellent prescription," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but during the last few days, for some reason or other, she is once again somewhat indisposed. I hope that you will come by another day, venerable sir, in order to examine her."

When they had finished speaking, Dr. Jen said goodbye, mounted his horse, and went his way. Subsequently, Licentiate Ni P'eng and Licentiate Wen Pi-ku also got up to go.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing's repeated urgings that they should stay a little longer proved unsuccessful, he saw them out to the front gate, where he said to Wen Pi-ku, "On another day, I will pay you a visit to seek your instruction. Across the street from my humble abode, I have prepared a studio in which you may reside, venerable sir, along with your dependents, if that is convenient. Each month I will respectfully offer you a stipend to provide for your sustenance."

"I am much indebted to you for your gracious appreciation," said Licentiate Wen.

"I will never be able to thank you enough."

"This is an example, venerable sir," said Licentiate Ni, "of your civilized endeavor to support this culture of ours."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had seen the two licentiates on their way, he continued drinking with his guests until late at night before the party broke up. The four singing girls had returned to Yüeh-niang's apartment, where they sang for the entertainment of Yüeh-niang, Wu K'ai's wife, Aunt Yang, and the others. Hsi-men Ch'ing remained in the front compound, where he asked Wu K'ai and Ying Po-chüeh to remain so they could sit down again and resume their drinking. They looked on as the musicians were supplied with food and wine, after consuming which they departed. The utensils from the party were all cleared away, and the fresh fruit and left over comestibles were divided up among the servants.

At this point, new saucers of delicacies were called for from the rear compound, and Li Ming, Wu Hui, and Cheng Feng played their instruments and sang for their entertainment, after which they were rewarded with large goblets of wine.

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "at this feast that you put on in celebration of your illustrious birthday, everyone had a good time."

"This day," said Li Ming, "His Honor Hsüeh and His Honor Liu expended a good deal in the way of gratuities. And later, when they saw Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh come out, they provided each of them with a packet as well. The only thing is, His Honor Hsüeh, being younger than His Honor Liu, is more given to mischief."

It was not long before Hua-tung brought out the new saucers of delicacies. These consisted of candied deep-fried sweetmeats, hazelnut and pine nut kernels, red caltrops and snowy lotus roots, lotus seeds and water chestnuts, butterfat "abalone shell" sweets, candied plums frosted with crystallized sugar, rose-flavored pastries, and the like.

When Ying Po-chüeh set eyes on the two varieties of butterfat "abalone shell" sweets, one pure white and the other pink in color, and both of them flecked with gold, he selected one for himself and popped it into his mouth, whereupon:

Sweet dew suffused his heart, and

It melted on entering his mouth.

"These are really delicious!" he exclaimed.

"My son," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it's only appropriate that you should like them. Your Sixth Lady made them with her own hands."

"I see, they're a product of my daughter's filial sentiments," laughed Ying Po-chüeh.

Turning to Wu K'ai, he went on to say, "Venerable Brother-in-law, you must have one of these."

Whereupon, he selected one of them and put it into Wu K'ai's mouth. He also called Li Ming, Wu Hui, and Cheng Feng before him, and rewarded one to each of them.

As the drinking continued, Ying Po-chüeh turned to Tai-an, and said, "You go back to the rear compound and tell those four little whores to come out here. If they don't wish to oblige me, that's that, but they really ought to sing something for our venerable brother-in-law. If we wait any longer, they'll be ready to go home. They've scarcely earned their pay today, having sung no more than two song suites for us. We ought not to let them off so easily."

Tai-an did not stir from his place but said, "I've already called for them. They're in the rear compound, entertaining Sister-in-law Wu and the other ladies. They'll be here presently."

"You lousy little oily mouth!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "Since when did you go back there. You can't fool me."

He then called up Wang Ching and said, "You go."

Wang Ching, also, refused to budge.

"Since I see that none of you are willing to go," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I'll go myself."

Thereupon, he started out toward the rear compound.

"You'd better not go in there," said Tai-an. "There's a dog in the rear compound who's really fierce. He's likely to bite you in the thigh."

"If I'm bitten," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I'll end up recuperating on your mother's k'ang."

Tai-an went back to the rear compound. After some time had elapsed, they became aware of a whiff of fragrance, accompanied by the sound of laughter, and the four painted faces came out, with their kerchiefs wrapped around their heads.

When Ying Po-chüeh saw them, he said, "My children, whoever taught you to be so disingenuous? If you've already put your headgear on, it looks as though you think you're on the way out. You're certainly bent on having an easy time of it, hoping to get away without singing a single song for us. At the very least, the charge for your services, including the fare for your sedan chair, is four candareens of silver. That would suffice to buy a picul and seven or eight pecks of unhusked red rice, enough to feed you, your madam, and the entire staff of your establishment, great and small, for a month."

"Brother," said Tung Chiao-erh, "if you think our expenses for food and clothing are so low, you might as well become a licensed entertainer yourself."

"Your Honor," said Hung the Fourth, "by this time it must be almost the second watch of the night. You ought to let us go."

"Tomorrow," said Ch'i Hsiang-erh, "we have to get up early in order to attend a funeral outside the city gate."

"Whose funeral is that?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"It's someone from that household the door of which opens practically under our eaves," said Ch'i Hsiang-erh.

"Do you mean to say that it's someone from the household of Wang the Third?" said Ying Po-chüeh. "The other day, when you got into trouble on his account, it was only thanks to His Honor's intervention on behalf of Li Kuei-chieh that you, too, were spared. This time:

The sparrow is no longer in that nest.²⁵

That's all there is to it."

"Why you crazy old oily mouth!" exclaimed Ch'i Hsiang-erh. "You're delirious. What nonsense you talk."

"You may scoff at me for being old," responded Ying Po-chüeh, "but what part of me is old?"

Though only half functional,

I'd have no trouble handling the likes of you four little whores."

"Brother," laughed Hung the Fourth, "as I see it, your ball-handling is not that great. All you can do is brag about it."

"My child," said Ying Po-chüeh, "when it comes to that:

I pay only what the performance is worth."

He then went on to say, "That lousy little whore from the Cheng Family Establishment seems to have gorged herself with the candied effigies of the Five Ancients,²⁶ thrones and all. Her mouth is so stuffed she can't get a word out. She has a distracted look about her. I dare say she's preoccupied with the thought of some customer back home."

"After listening to your braggadocio just now," said Tung Chiao-erh, "she's a little skittish about what may ensue."

"Skittish or not," said Ying Po-chüeh, "each of you must get your instruments out and sing a song suite for us. After that, you can go. I won't try to keep you."

"That's enough," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Two of you can serve us with wine, while the other two sing a song suite for him."

"Sister Cheng Ai-yüeh and I will sing for you then," said Ch'i Hsiang-erh.

At this, Cheng Ai-yüeh took up her p'i-p'a, and Ch'i Hsiang-erh her psaltery, as they seated themselves on a folding bench. Thereupon, the two of them:

Deftly extended their slender fingers,

Gently strummed the silken strings,

Opened their ruby lips,

Exposed their white teeth,

Interpreted the melodious tunes, and Displayed their coquettish voices, as they sang the song suite in the Yüeh-tiao mode, starting with the tune "Fighting Quails," that begins with the words:

Had you but gone by night and returned at dawn,²⁷

Your affair could have been as everlasting as Heaven and as enduring as Earth.²⁸

During the performance, Tung Chiao-erh served wine to Wu K'ai, and Hung the Fourth served wine to Ying Po-chüeh. As the party continued:

Exchanging cups as they drank,

Hugging the turquoise and cuddling the red,

Blue-green sleeves were raised assiduously,²⁹

Golden goblets were filled to overflowing.³⁰

Truly:

In the morning he attends feasts in Golden Valley,

In the evening he favors beauties in ornate houses.

But do not consider these to be occasions for joy,

Time's flowing light only chases the sunset clouds.³¹

On this occasion, after:

Three rounds of wine had been consumed; and

Two suites of songs had been performed, the four singing girls were allowed to go. Hsi-men Ch'ing still urged his brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, to stay a while and instructed Ch'un-hung to come forward and sing him a southern song. After which, he ordered Ch'i-t'ung to get a horse ready and take a lantern with which to see his brother-in-law home.

"Brother-in-law," said Wu K'ai, "there's no need for you to provide a horse. I'll just walk home together with Brother Ying the Second. It's gotten rather late."

"There's no reason for you to refuse," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "But in that case, I'll still have Ch'i-t'ung take a lantern and see you to your home."

Thereupon, after a song suite had been performed, Wu K'ai and Ying Pochüeh got up and took their leave, saying, "We've imposed egregiously on your hospitality."

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw them off as far as the front gate, where he said to Ying Po-chüeh, "Tomorrow, whatever else you do, make sure to contact that manager Kan Jun that you recommended, and have him come to see me, so we can sign a contract. I've already agreed with my kinsman Ch'iao Hung to get the house over there ready, so that we can unload the merchandise within the next couple of days."

"Brother," responded Ying Po-chüeh, "there's no need for you to instruct me. I know what to do."

So saying, he took his leave and departed together with Wu K'ai, while Ch'i-t'ung lighted them on their way with a lantern.

Along the way, Wu K'ai asked him, "What house is that which my brother-in-law spoke of getting ready just now?"

Ying Po-chüeh then told him the whole story of how Han Tao-kuo's boatload of goods had arrived, how Hsi-men Ch'ing was in need of someone to take charge of selling the merchandise, how he intended to open a silk goods shop, how he was getting the house across the street ready for that purpose, and how he had asked him to recommend a manager to whom he could entrust the enterprise.

"When do you suppose they will open for business?" asked Wu K'ai. "We relatives and friends must surely not fail to provide artificial flowers, red bunting, and boxes of candied fruit in celebration of the occasion."

Before long, they emerged onto Main Street and arrived at the mouth of the little alley on which Ying Po-chüeh lived.

Wu K'ai told Ch'i-t'ung, "Take the lantern and see your uncle Ying the Second to his home."

Ying Po-chüeh demurred, saying, "Ch'i-t'ung, you see Brother-in-law Wu to his home. I don't need a lantern. My place is just inside the alley."

So saying, they said goodbye to each other and went their separate ways, with Ch'i-t'ung escorting Wu K'ai.

Hsi-men Ch'ing took care of paying Li Ming and company the fees for their performance, locked the gate, went back to Yüeh-niang's room in the rear compound, and retired for the night.

The next day, sure enough, Ying Po-chüeh brought Kan Jun over, dressed in black livery, to meet Hsi-men Ch'ing. After discussing business with him for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing called for Ts'ui Pen and sent him to confer with Ch'iao Hung about getting the house ready for the unloading of the merchandise, and the construction of an underground storehouse and shop front, so that they could settle on a date for the opening of the business.

Ch'iao Hung said to Ts'ui Pen, "In the future, with regard to all things, great and small, I am content to let our kinsman decide. There is no need to consult me about it any further."

Thereupon, Hsi-men Ch'ing signed a contract with Kan Jun, which established Ying Po-chüeh as his guarantor, and determined that as far as the profits of the enterprise were concerned, Hsi-men Ch'ing was entitled to 50 percent, and Ch'iao Hung to 30 percent, with the remainder to be divided evenly among Han Tao-kuo, Kan Jun, and Ts'ui Pen. It was also decided that they should lay in the necessary bricks, tiles, lumber, and stone, proceed with the construction of an underground storehouse and shop front, and design a plaque for the door of the establishment, so that when the cartloads of merchandise arrived, they would be prepared to accommodate them.

Space in the rear was also set aside as a studio in which Licentiate Wen Pi-ku could reside as his private tutor, or social secretary, who would take responsibility for dealing with his employer's correspondence with his peers, in return for a stipend of three taels of silver per month, and appropriate gifts on festival occasions. It was also arranged that Hua-t'ung would wait on him for half of every evening, in order to provide for his food and drink, and fetch water for his inkstone, and, if he should go out to visit his friends, accompany him in order to carry his card case. It was also expected that when Hsi-men Ch'ing entertained guests he would be invited to help keep them company as they drank their wine, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

On the same day, Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday being over, Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i was invited to come examine Li P'ing-erh and prescribe appropriate medications for her, while Hsi-men Ch'ing dealt with the alterations being made to the house across the street. Aunt Yang was the first to go home, but Li Kueichieh and Wu Yin-erh had not yet done so. Wu Yüeh-niang purchased some crabs for three mace of silver and had them cooked at noontime, when she invited Sister-in-law Wu, Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, and the rest to enjoy them in the courtyard of the rear compound, where they gathered round to consume them. While they were still eating, Dame Liu, whom Yüeh-niang had engaged to come and see Kuan-ko, arrived, and, after she had been served with tea, Li P'ing-erh accompanied her to her quarters in the front compound.

"Little brother has suffered from a fright," said Dame Liu, "and is rejecting his milk."

She provided several doses of medicine, after which Yüeh-niang gave her three mace of silver and sent her on her way.

Meanwhile, Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien, together with Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, set up a small table under the flower arbor, covered it with a strip of felt, and amused themselves by playing dominoes for forfeits of wine. Whoever lost a hand had to consume a large cup of wine. Sun Hsüeh-o lost seven or eight times to the others and had to down as many cups of wine. Consequently, she did not dare to continue playing and, after sitting a while longer, took herself off. Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was engaged in overseeing the preparations in the house across the street, was drinking there along with Ying Po-chüeh, Ts'ui Pen, and his new manager, Kan Jun, and sent a page boy back home to fetch some food for them. This threw Sun Hsüeh-o into such a state of consternation that she felt compelled to bustle off to the kitchen to take care of it, leaving Li Chiao-erh to take her place in the game of dominoes.

At this point, Chin-lien said to Wu Yin-erh and Li Kuei-chieh, "Why don't you sing us that song suite celebrating the evening of the seventh day of the seventh month."

Thereupon, accompanying themselves on the p'i-p'a, they sang the song suite in the Shang mode that begins with a song to the tune "A Gathering of Worthy Guests":

Summer is just beginning to recede, as the star Antares gradually moves toward the west.
The handle of the Dipper is moving toward the Northern Palace.

A single leaf of the phoenix tree³² flutters down,
And everywhere a hint of autumn can be detected.

The evening clouds float idly as the stridulation of the cicadas resounds;
The nighttime breeze is gentle as the coruscating fireflies begin to fly.
On the Celestial Stairs the coolness of the night is as clear as water;

Most appropriately, paintings of the Maggie Bridge³³ are suspended on high.

In golden basins five sprouts are planted;³⁴

In alabaster towers banquets are prepared.³⁵

That day the sisterhood of womenfolk continued drinking until evening, when Yüeh-niang filled their gift boxes and saw Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh off on their way home.

P'an Chin-lien was completely inebriated by the time she returned to her quarters. Because she observed the frequency with which Hsi-men Ch'ing chose to spend the night in Li P'ing-erh's quarters, and that he had once again invited Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to come and examine her that very morning, her heart was filled with rancor. She was also aware that her rival's child was not well.

As she entered her courtyard:

As providence would have it, amid the dark shadows, she stepped into a pile of dog shit with one of her feet. As soon as she got inside, she had Ch'un-mei light a lamp to examine the damage and saw that the entire vamp of her brand new scarlet silk shoe had been soiled. Immediately, she:

Pricked up her willow brows,

Opened wide her starry eyes,³⁶ called for Ch'un-mei to bring a lantern, locked the postern gate, picked up a big stick, and proceeded indiscriminately to beat the offending dog, beating him until he howled outlandishly.

Li P'ing-erh, in her adjacent quarters, sent Ying-ch'un over to say, "My mistress says to tell you that the baby has just taken Dame Liu's medicine and fallen asleep, and asks that the Fifth Lady refrain from beating the dog any longer."

Chin-lien sat down and had nothing to say for some time, after which, she beat the dog a little more, opened the gate, and let him out. She then turned her attention to finding fault with Ch'iu-chü. When she examined her shoe, she was:

Angry on the left, and Angry on the right.

Calling Ch'iu-chü before her, she said, "If you consider the matter, by this time of day, the dog ought to have been let out. What were you keeping him in here for, anyway? I suppose, slave that you are, he serves you as a clandestine lover. By not letting him out, you caused him to leave his shit all over the place, so that by stepping into it, this brand new pair of shoes of mine, which, including today, I haven't worn for more than three or four days, is all covered with shit. You knew I would be coming home and should have lit a lantern and come out to meet me. How can you expect to get away with:

Pretending to be both deaf and dumb,³⁷
and playing the fool this way?"

"I told her some time ago," said Ch'un-mei, "you ought to take advantage of the fact that Mother isn't home yet to feed him and put him out in the back courtyard. But she pretended to be deaf and paid me no attention at all, even giving me a dirty look."

"There you are!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "The lousy, audacious, death-defying slave! How is it that she's so reluctant to get her ass in motion? I'm aware that you think you're the boss around here. As they say, you're such a hardened convict that a beating no longer means anything to you."

Thereupon, she called her up in front of her and told Ch'un-mei to bring a lamp over so she could see better, saying as she did so, "Just look at the filth on my shoe. It's a shoe that I just made, and one that I really liked, and now it's been ruined by a slave like you."

Having tricked her into lowering her head in order to see better, she took up the shoe by its heel lift and slapped her right in the face several times with the sole. She hit her so hard that Ch'iu-chü's lips were broken, and, rubbing away the blood with her hand, she stepped out of reach.

"You lousy slave!" the woman cursed at her. "Trying to get away, are you?"

"Drag her over here, and make her kneel down," she said to Ch'un-mei. "Fetch the riding crop, and strip off her clothing for me. I'll give her a good thirty strokes with the whip before I'm through. Merely grabbing hold of her and giving her a few random strokes will hardly do the job."

Ch'un-mei accordingly stripped off Ch'iu-chü's clothing. The woman then told Ch'un-mei to tie her hands, after which she swung the riding crop into the air, and the strokes of the whip began to fall on Ch'iu-chü like rain. She whipped the slave girl until she:

P'an Chin-lien Beats a Dog at the Expense of a Human Being

Howled like a stuck pig.

In the adjacent quarters, Kuan-ko had just closed his eyes in sleep when he was startled back awake, and Li P'ing-erh once again sent Hsiu-ch'un over to say, "My mistress respectfully requests that the Fifth Lady let Ch'iu-chü off for now, and stop whipping her. She's afraid that the commotion will startle the baby awake."

When Old Mrs. P'an, who was lying on the k'ang in the inner room, heard Chin-lien whipping Ch'iu-chü until she screamed, she hastily crawled to her feet and admonished her from the sidelines, but Chin-lien paid no attention.

Later, when she saw that Li P'ing-erh had sent Hsiu-ch'un over to plead with her, she stepped forward and attempted to pry the whip from her daughter's hand, saying, "My child, spare her a few strokes. You've annoyed the young lady next door into complaining. I'm afraid you may frighten the baby.

You may break off a switch to beat the donkey,

So long as you don't injure the redbud tree."³⁸

When Chin-lien, who was already in a state of rage, heard her mother admonish her with these words, it was just as though a torch had been applied to her heart.

In an instant her whole face was purple.

Giving her a shove with one hand, she very nearly knocked Old Mrs. P'an down.

"You crazy old baggage!" she cried. "What do you know about it? Get out of my way and sit down somewhere. It's none of your business. What the fuck are you trying to admonish me for? What's all this about the redbud tree, and taking a switch to the donkey? Whose side are you on, anyway, with this two-faced interference of yours?"

"Why you lousy death-bound short-life!" expostulated Old Mrs. P'an. "How can you call me two-faced? I come to visit you in the hope of picking up a few morsels of cold food, and you treat me as roughly as this!"

"Tomorrow," said Chin-lien, "you can just squeeze your old cunt between your legs and take it out of here, for all I care. It's not as though any one in this house would dare to:

Stew me in a pot and eat me."

When Old Mrs. P'an heard the way in which her own daughter defied her, she went back into the inner room, and gave way to:

Sobbing and wailing,³⁹

while the woman continued to whip Ch'iu-chü. She gave her a good twenty or thirty strokes with the riding crop and then finished her off with ten crisscross strokes of the cane. She beat her until:

The skin was broken and the flesh was split, before letting her up. She also used her sharp fingernails to gouge the cheeks of her face until they were a bloody mess.

All Li P'ing-erh, in her adjacent quarters, could do was to cover the baby's ears with both hands, while tears of distress rolled down her cheeks.

Though she dared to be angry,

She dared not speak.

Who could have anticipated that on that day, when Hsi-men Ch'ing's drinking party in the house across the street broke up, he went straight to Meng Yü-lou's quarters and spent the night.

The next day, Commandant Chou Hsiu invited him to a belated drinking party in honor of his birthday, so he was not at home.

Li P'ing-erh observed that, though Kuan-ko had taken Dame Liu's medicine, it had produced no visible effect, and that the fright he had been subjected to during the night had caused his eyeballs to roll up and remain dangling there out of sight. Because Nun Hsüeh and Nun Wang were about to go home that day, she took a pair of silver lions that were used to hold her bedspread in place from her room and went to see Yüeh-niang, proposing that Nun Hsüeh be commissioned to arrange the printing of copies of the Fo-tinghsin t'o-lo ching (Dhāranī sutra of the Buddha's essence),⁴⁰ in time for the Mid-Autumn Festival on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, so that they could be distributed at the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak.

Nun Hsüeh was about to take them, and go on her way, when Meng Yü-lou spoke up from one side, saying, "Reverend, hold on a minute. First Lady, you ought to send a page boy to call in Pen the Fourth so he can weigh these lions and determine what they're worth, and then accompany her to the sutra printing shop and settle on the number of copies to be printed, the cost per copy, the amount we're willing to contribute, and the date by which the job will be done. That's the right way to do it. If you send Reverend Hsüeh off to do it all by herself, how can we be sure that she will be able to handle it correctly?"

"What you say is right," said Yüeh-niang.

She then dispatched Lai-an, saying, "Go see if Pen the Fourth is at home or not, and get him to come here."

Lai-an went straight off on this errand, and, before long, Pen the Fourth showed up and bowed to Yüeh-niang and the others. When he put the two silver lions on the scale, they turned out to weigh forty-one taels and five mace.

Yüeh-niang then instructed him, "Accompany Reverend Hsüeh to the sutra printing shop and request them to print the appropriate number of copies."

Chin-lien thereupon said to Meng Yü-lou, "Why don't we see the two reverends off, and, while we're at it, we can drop in on Hsi-men Ta-chieh and see if she is still in her room making shoes."

The two of them then took each other by the hand and set off for the front compound, while Pen the Fourth, along with Lai-an, accompanied Nun Hsüeh and Nun Wang on their way to the sutra printing shop.

When P'an Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou arrived in front of the main reception hall, they saw that Hsi-men Ta-chieh was sitting under the eaves at the door of her anteroom on the east side of the courtyard, with her sewing basket, engaged in stitching a shoe. Chin-lien picked it up to take a look and saw that the upper was made of sand-green Lu-chou silk.

"Young lady," said Meng Yü-lou, "you really ought not to use this red chain stitching. The fact is, it would be more dignified to use blue thread. And, when the time comes, you can attach a scarlet heel lift."

"I already have a pair with scarlet heel lifts," said Hsi-men Ta-chieh. "For this pair, I intend to use blue heel lifts. That's why I'm chain stitching this one with scarlet thread."

After Chin-lien had looked over her handiwork, the three of them sat down on the stylobate of the reception hall, and Meng Yü-lou asked Hsi-men Tachieh, "Is your husband in your room, or not?"

"He's had a couple of cups of wine, I don't know where," said Hsi-men Tachieh, "and he's sleeping it off in the room."

Meng Yü-lou then said to Chin-lien, "Just now, if I hadn't intervened from the sidelines, that muddleheaded baggage, Sister Li, would simply have turned her silver over to the nuns in order to get some copies of a sutra printed. The sutra might never have been printed, and, legless crab of a creature that she is, if they chose to hide out in some prominent household, where would she ever find them? Luckily, after I intervened, Pen the Fourth was summoned to accompany them."

"Look here," said Chin-lien. "If I were asked to do it, where such a wealthy sister is concerned, if I didn't make something out of it, I'd be a fool. It would be no more than:

Plucking a single hair from the body of an ox.

If your child is not fated to live, quite aside from donating sutras, if you were to donate the entire realm, with its:

Myriad leagues of rivers and mountains,⁴¹

it would be of no avail. Truly:

Though you may have money enough to worship the Northern Dipper,

Who is able to buy a guarantee that nothing untoward will happen?

Right now, in this room of hers, she carries on like the magistrate who:

Authorizes himself alone to ignite fires,

But won't let the rest of us light lamps.⁴²

Young lady, listen to what I'm saying. You're not an outsider.

She's painted herself so white that she won't take on any other color.

You think that you alone can get away with being:

So flippant in your hundred ways.

At the crack of dawn, she inveigles our husband into calling in the doctor to examine her. Well, she can do what she wants because she knows that we won't dare to interfere.

"Whenever she's in front of other people, she is forever protesting her own virtue. 'I'm not in the mood for it,' she says. 'Father is constantly coming into my quarters, pretending that he only wants to see the baby, and then pestering me to sleep with him. Who can be bothered? I end up having to urge him to go and sleep in someone else's quarters.' In front of us, she puts on such a show of virtue, while behind our backs, she engages in bad-mouthing us. And our eldest sister insists on paying heed to her one-sided words.

"If you claim not to be competing with the rest of us for his favors, how is it that the other day, when our husband did not come into your room, you sent your maidservant out to the postern gate to waylay him, allegedly to see the baby? And then, because you were taking medicine, you actually went so far as to arrange for him to spend the night in the other room with Wu Yinerh, thereby showing just how clever you are at getting your husband to like you. And our eldest sister has nothing to say about it.

"Last night, when I came back to my room, I soiled my shoe by stepping into a pile of dog shit, and when I beat the maidservant and drove the dog out, she got upset and sent her maidservant over to complain that I was frightening her baby. My mother, the old baggage, who didn't understand the situation, having scrounged something to eat from her in the past, elected to play the role of her lackey, and admonished me by saying:

'You may break off a switch to beat the donkey,

So long as you don't injure the redbud tree.'

I was already annoyed at her:

Simpleminded officiousness, so, when she continued to argue with me, I told her off in no uncertain terms, and, today, she has gone home in a huff.

"Her departure caused me to say to her, 'His household does not feel over-burdened by such poor relatives as yourself, and will not feel diminished without you. If you're so quick to lose your temper, in the future, you might just as well stay away. If you're afraid that someone in this house might:

Stew me in a pot and eat me,

just let me handle it for myself.'"

"What an ill-bred offspring you are!" laughed Meng Yü-lou. "How can you talk that way to your own mother?"

"That's not it at all," said Chin-lien. "What really annoys me is the fact that:

She may be a brown cat, but she's got a black tail.

She's so two-faced about things, always taking the other person's side, on the principle that:

If you've eaten a bowl and a half of someone's food,

You're obligated to do whatever they want you to do.⁴³

If she manages to pick up so much as a sweet date from someone, she'll sing her praises a thousand times, if not ten thousand times. From the very outset, once she'd borne this child, she has manipulated our husband to such effect that it's just as though he's taken root in her place. He treats her the same way he would if she had been formally raised to the status of legitimate wife, while she can hardly wait for the chance to trample the rest of us into the mud.

"But today, thanks to the fact that:

Heaven also has eyes,⁴⁴ your child has fallen ill. As I have said all along:

The sun may be at high noon,

But the time will come when it will pass its zenith."⁴⁵

As they were speaking, who should appear but Pen the Fourth and Lai-an, who had been to the sutra printing shop to hand over the silver lions and had returned to report to Yüeh-niang. When they saw that Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh were sitting on the stylobate of the reception hall, they came to a halt outside the ceremonial gate, hesitating to come inside.

Lai-an stepped forward and said, "Ladies, get out of the way if you please. Pen the Fourth is here."

"You crazy jailbird!" said Chin-lien. "Tell him to go ahead in. It's not as though we've never seen him before."

When Lai-an repeated this to him, Pen the Fourth lowered his head and went straight back to the rear compound, where he reported to Yüeh-niang and Li P'ing-erh, saying, "I took the aforementioned silver lions, weighing forty-one taels and five mace, and, in the presence of the two nuns, turned them over to Chai Ching-erh, or Sutra Chai, the proprietor of the sutra printing shop. He agreed to print five hundred copies of the Dhāranī sutra with damask bindings, for five candareens apiece, and a thousand copies with plain silk bindings, for three candareens apiece, which comes to a total of fifty-five taels of silver. In addition to the forty-one taels and five mace which he has already accepted, he is still due thirteen taels and five mace, in return for which, he promises to deliver the sutras on the morning of the fourteenth."

Li P'ing-erh promptly went back to her quarters and returned with a silver incense burner, which, when she had Pen the Fourth put it on the scale, turned out to weigh fifteen taels.

"You take it to him," said Li P'ing-erh, "and keep the surplus over what he is due in order to cover your expenses when the sutras are distributed at the temple fair on the fifteenth. That way you won't have to come and ask me for anything more."

Pen the Fourth, thereupon, took the incense burner and headed out the door, while Yüeh-niang told Lai-an to see him out.

"Brother Four," said Li P'ing-erh, "I'm much indebted to you."

Pen the Fourth bowed deferentially and said, "How could I presume?"

He then went back to the front compound, where Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou once again called him to a halt and asked him, "Did you turn the silver lions over to the sutra printing shop?"

"It's all been properly settled," said Pen the Fourth. "They agreed to print one thousand five hundred copies of the sutra for a fee of fifty-five taels of silver. In addition to the forty-one taels and five mace that they have already received, the Sixth Lady, just now, has provided this silver incense burner."

Meng Yü-lou and Chin-lien looked it over but had nothing to say, after which Pen the Fourth continued on his way home.

Turning to Chin-lien, Meng Yü-lou said, "Sister Li in carrying on this way is simply wasting her money. If he is really destined to be your child, even a blow with a cudgel would not kill him. If he is not destined to be your child, no matter what you do in the way of donating sutras and creating effigies, it will not preserve him. She puts too much faith in these nuns, who are capable of anything. Just now, if I hadn't intervened, she would have simply turned these things over to them to take away. It was better to send someone from our household to accompany them, wasn't it?"

"Even if they made something out of the transaction," said Chin-lien, "it wouldn't amount to much."

The two of them chatted for a while and then stood up.

"Let's go out to the front gate," proposed Chin-lien.

She then went on to ask Hsi-men Ta-chieh, "Will you go out with us?"

"I won't go," Hsi-men Ta-chieh replied.

P'an Chin-lien then took Meng Yü-lou by the hand, and the two of them went and stood just inside the main gate.

They then asked P'ing-an, "Have the renovations in the house across the street been completed yet?"

"By this time?" said P'ing-an. "Yesterday, Father was over there supervising the work, and the place has been properly swept out. The merchandise is going to be temporarily stored on the upper floor of the building in the rear. Yesterday he had the yin-yang master come to preside over the ceremony of breaking ground. They are constructing a three-roomed underground storehouse beneath the building in order to store the silk goods and are opening up an eighteen-foot-wide frontage of three rooms in a row, to serve as the shop front. Artisans have been engaged to repaint and varnish the interior, pave the floor, and put up shelving, so that they can open for business next month."

Meng Yü-lou went on to inquire, "Have the dependents of that secretary, Licentiate Wen, moved in yet, or not?"

"They moved in yesterday," said P'ing-an. "And this morning Father directed that the summer bedstead in storage in the rear compound should be allocated to them, and that two tables and four chairs should be moved over for them to sit on."

"Did you happen to notice what his wife looked like?" asked Chin-lien.

"She was sitting in a sedan chair in the dark shadows," said P'ing-an. "Nobody got a good look at her."

As they were speaking, what should they hear in the distance but the ssu-lang-lang sound made by an old gentleman as he came along shaking the distinctive mirror polisher's clapper by means of which he alerted housewives to his presence.

"The mirror polisher is coming this way," said Chin-lien.

She then said to P'ing-an, "You call him to a halt so that he can polish our mirrors for us. My mirrors, these last few days, have gotten tarnished. I told you, jailbird that you are, to be on the lookout for him, but you haven't done anything about it. And now, how does it happen that we haven't been standing out here any time at all, and the mirror polisher shows up?"

P'ing-an, accordingly, called the mirror polisher to a halt. The old man set down his load of equipment, and, seeing that there were two women standing just inside the gate, stepped forward to salute each of them with a bow and then stood to one side.

Chin-lien then asked Meng Yü-lou, "If you're planning to have your mirrors polished too, why not have the page boy bring them out as well, so we can have them all polished at the same time?"

Thereupon, she directed Lai-an, "Go to my quarters, and get your sister Ch'un-mei to find my large face mirror, my two small mirrors, and also the large rectangular dressing mirror; then bring them all out here so that he can give them a good polishing."

Meng Yü-lou instructed Lai-an, "Go to my quarters, and get Lan-hsiang to find my mirrors, so you can bring them out to me."

Lai-an had not been gone for long, when he came out, carrying eight mirrors in all, the ordinary mirrors, large and small, in his two hands, and the rectangular dressing mirror hugged against his breast.

"You lousy little piece!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "You can't handle them all. You should have made two trips out of it. How can you manage to bring them all out at once this way? If you should happen to dent one of my mirrors, what then?"

"I haven't seen this large mirror of yours before," said Meng Yü-lou. "Where did it come from?"

"Someone left it at the pawnshop," said Chin-lien. "I like it because it's so bright. I've put it in my room and use it to look at myself both day and night."

She then went on to say, "Only three of these mirrors actually belong to me."

"And only two of them, one large and one small, are mine," said Meng Yü-lou.

"Then who do these other two belong to?" asked Chin-lien.

"Those two belong to sister Ch'un-mei," said Lai-an. "She sent them out in the hope that he would be able to polish them too."

"The lousy little piece!" said Chin-lien. "She leaves her own mirrors hidden away, unused, while picking up my mirrors to look at herself all the time. No wonder they've gotten so tarnished."

All eight mirrors, large and small, were turned over to the old mirror polisher, who was told to polish away. Thereupon, he fastened them to his workbench, applied mercury to their surfaces, and, in less time than it takes to eat a meal, polished them until they:

Shone brightly enough to dazzle the eyes.⁴⁶

When Chin-lien picked one up and examined her flowery countenance, it was like gazing into:

A stretch of limpid autumn water.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

When the lotus blossom and the caltrop-patterned mirror confront each other,
The breeze blows, the countenance is disturbed, and the image becomes blurred.
Exposed to the limpid autumn water of her gaze, the lotus blossom reveals itself, Resembling the appearance of the Goddess Ch'ang-o in the Palace of the Moon.
With turquoise sleeves she wipes away the dust, as the frosty tarnish recedes,
When she breathes upon it with her ruby lips, the azure clouds thicken.

If, in their flight, the powdered butterflies come to impinge upon it,
One will believe that the blossom's fragrance resides in the picture.

When the old mirror polisher, in no time at all, finished polishing the mirrors, he turned them over to the women to look over, and they, in turn, entrusted them to Lai-an to take back inside and put away. Meng Yü-lou told P'ing-an to ask manager Fu Ming, who was tending counter in the shop, for fifty candareens to give to the mirror polisher. That oldster took the money in one hand but remained standing where he was, without leaving.

P'an Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou Patronize a Mirror Polisher

Meng Yü-lou told P'ing-an to ask the old man, "Why aren't you going? No doubt you think the money is insufficient."

Before they knew it, with a gush, the tears began to flow from his eyes, as he started to weep.

"My mistress wants to know why you are so distressed," said P'ing-an.

"There is no reason to deceive you, Brother," said the old man. "I have led a futile existence for sixty years. Early on, I was left with a son by my first wife, who is now twenty-one years old and is not yet married. All he does is scrounge around like a dog looking for garbage, rather than trying to make a living. I have to go out every day and labor for the money with which to support him, while he, on the other hand:

Is not the sort to abide by his lot, and is constantly gambling with the knockabouts on the street. The other day, he got himself into trouble and was trussed up with his companions and taken before the commandant's yamen, where he was arraigned for petty larceny, and given twenty strokes with the heavy bamboo. When he came home, he took all of his stepmother's skirts and jackets and pawned them, which upset his stepmother so much that she came down with convulsions and was confined to her bed for half a month. When I said a few words of criticism to him, he simply took off and stopped coming home, so that I now spend every day looking for him, but so far without success. I'm tempted to vent my spleen by giving up on trying to find him at all, but I'm already an old man, and he is my only son, so that, in the future, I would have no one to support me in my old age. But if he were at home, and I saw that he was not turning out to be a decent human being, that would only upset me further. The way things are, he's simply my karmic encumbrance, and all I can do about it is to:

Suffer injustice and harbor resentment, with no place to lodge a complaint. That's why:

The tears flow from my wounded heart."⁴⁷

Meng Yü-lou said to P'ing-an, "You ask him, 'How old is your second wife this year?'"

"This year she has led a futile existence for fifty-four years," said the old man. "She has neither a son nor daughter of her own, and, now that she has just recovered somewhat from her convulsions, I lack the means to properly nurture her. She has her heart set on a chunk of cured pork, and I have spent the last two or three days scouring through ten or more streets and alleys but have been unable to find any. It's really enough to make one sigh in despair."

"That's no problem," said Meng Yü-lou with a smile. "I've got a chunk of cured pork in a drawer in my quarters."

She then said to Lai-an, "You go speak to Lan-hsiang about it. There are also two leftover scones. Get her to give them to you as well."

Chin-lien then called to the old man, asking him, "Does your old lady eat millet gruel, or not?"

"Why wouldn't she eat it?" said the old man. "That would be just the thing for her."

Chin-lien then called over Lai-an and said, "Tell Ch'un-mei to measure out two pints of that new millet that my mother brought the other day, and also bring out two pickled cucumbers, to give to his old lady to eat."

Lai-an had not been gone for long when he brought out half a leg of cured pork, two scones, two pints of millet, and two pickled cucumbers and called out, "Come over here, old man. You're in luck. If your old lady isn't craving these things because of illness, no doubt she's recuperating from childbirth and feels the need for a 'heart stabilizing potion.'"⁴⁸

The old man promptly received these things with both hands, stowed them in his load, bowed to Meng Yü-lou and Chin-lien, and then, shouldering his burden and shaking his clapper, proceeded nonchalantly on his way.

"You two ladies," remarked P'ing-an, "ought not to have given him all those things. The old oily mouth has contrived to cheat you out of them. His old lady is a go-between, whom I happened to notice walking by on this very street just yesterday. Since when is she convalescing at home?"

"You lousy jailbird!" said Chin-lien. "Why didn't you tell us any earlier?"

"Leave it alone," said P'ing-an. "Let him have his piece of luck. It was just a coincidence that you two ladies had come out, called him to a halt, and patronized him with all those things."

Truly:

Having nothing better to do, they came out and idled at the gateway,
Just as the old codger happened to come by shaking his clapper.
Not only can even the most trivial things be of help to people,
But if you lack the affinity, a drop of water will prove hard to get.

Chapter 59

HSI-MEN CH'ING DASHES "SNOW LION" TO DEATH;

LI P'ING-ERH CRIES OUT IN PAIN FOR KUAN-KO

As the sun sets, the rivers flow, returning ever from west to east;
So long as the glory of spring is not over,
 the willows will endure.
In the temple of the Goddess of Witch's Mountain,¹ they bend to hold the rain;
Before the gate of Sung Yü's residence,
 they flutter in the wind.
There is no comparing the color of elm pods to their blue-green hues;
One is profoundly moved by the way they set off the red of the apricot blossoms.
On the Pa River in Han-nan there are a thousand or ten thousand willow trees;²
How many travelers have plucked their branches as they said their farewells?³

THE STORY GOES that Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien were still standing at the front gate after sending the mirror polisher on his way, when they suddenly saw a man coming toward them from the east, wearing a large hat and eye shades, and riding a mule. He rode at a fast clip right up to the gateway and dismounted, which sent the two women scurrying inside. When he took off his eye shades, it turned out to be Han Tao-kuo reporting back home.

"Have the cartloads of merchandise arrived, or not?" P'ing-an hastily inquired.

"They're already inside the city," replied Han Tao-kuo. "I've come to ask Father where to unload them."

"Father isn't at home," said P'ing-an. "He's attending a party at the residence of His Honor Chou Hsiu. Space has already been prepared for the merchandise to be unloaded on the second floor of the building across the street. Please go ahead inside."

Before long, Ch'en Ching-chi came out and accompanied Han Tao-kuo to the rear compound, where he reported to Yüeh-niang and then came back outside to the reception hall, brushed the dust of the journey off his clothes, and asked Wang Ching to take his baggage and wallet home for him. Yüeh-niang meanwhile sent something out for him to eat.

It was not long before the cartloads of merchandise arrived. Ch'en Ching-chi took the keys and opened the door to the building across the street, whereupon the carriers who had been hired to unload the carts took their tallies and carried the merchandise, one box at a time, to unload on the second floor of the building. There were ten large cartloads of silk goods, as well as some wine and rice for the use of the family, so the unloading process lasted right up till lamplighting time. Ts'ui Pen also assisted by supervising the completion of the unloading, checking to see that the numbers tallied, locking the door, sealing it with a strip of paper, paying off the carriers, and seeing them off the premises.

While this was going on, Tai-an had gone to Commandant Chou Hsiu's residence to report the news to Hsi-men Ch'ing. When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard that the goods were being unloaded at home, he drank several more cups of wine before leaving and arrived home somewhat after lamplighting time. Han Tao-kuo was sitting in the reception hall waiting for him and gave him a complete recital of the events of the trip, from beginning to end, both going and coming.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked him, "When the letter I sent to His Honor Ch'ien Lung-yeh was delivered, did he respond favorably to my request, or not?"

"Thanks entirely to your letter to His Honor Ch'ien Lung-yeh," replied Han Tao-kuo, "we saved a good deal in the way of customs duties. By treating two crates as one, I got away with reporting no more than two-thirds of the merchandise, which I also passed off as consisting merely of tea leaves and mirabilite for the making of incense. As a result, when it came time to compute the charges, for all ten large cartloads of goods we were only assessed thirty taels and five mace of silver in the way of customs duties. And when His Honor accepted the affidavit, he did not send any customs officers to inspect the merchandise but merely waved the cartloads of goods on their way."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he was utterly delighted and said, "In the future we must purchase a substantial gift to thank His Honor Ch'ien Lung-yeh for his pains."

Thereupon, he ordered Ch'en Ching-chi to keep company with Han Tao-kuo and Ts'ui Pen and also had some food sent out from the rear compound, so that they could have a drink together before breaking up and going home.

When Wang Liu-erh heard that Han Tao-kuo had returned, and that Wang Ching had brought his baggage and wallet home for him, she promptly took charge of the luggage and asked, "So your brother-in-law is back, is he?"

"Brother-in-law is supervising the unloading of the goods," said Wang Ching, "and is waiting to see Father before coming home."

The woman told her maidservants Ch'un-hsiang and Chin-erh to prepare some good tea and good food for the occasion. That night, when Han Tao-kuo finally returned home, he paid his respects before the family shrine, took off his traveling clothes, and washed his face, before husband and wife exchanged accounts of the events that had transpired during their separation. Han Tao-kuo told his wife how pleased he was with the way his business had gone, and his wife observed how heavy and ponderous the silver in his wallet felt.

When she asked him about it, he said, "I also picked up some two or three hundred taels worth of goods, including wine and rice, for myself. I've unloaded it in the shop across the street, and we can sell it off for silver at our leisure."

His wife was utterly delighted by this and went on to say, "I've also heard Wang Ching report that His Honor has found someone named Kan Jun to act as sales manager, and that we will divide a share of the profits with him and Ts'ui Pen, which is good news. I hear that the shop is slated to open for business next month."

"He may have engaged someone to act as sales manager here," said Han Tao-kuo, "but someone will still be needed down south to set up an office and take charge of purchasing at that end. I think His Honor is almost certain to appoint me to that post."

"You've got a good eye for evaluating merchandise," said his wife. "It's always been true that:

The abler you are, the more is demanded of you.⁴

Look you, if you weren't good at this business, would His Honor entrust it to you? As the saying goes:

Unless you are prepared to exert yourself to the utmost;

You will never make any money off the men of this world.⁵

It will probably entail your being away from home for three years. But if you're reluctant to go, I'll speak to His Honor and have him send Kan Jun and Laipao to take care of the outside business, and let you stay at home as the sales manager. That ought to do it."

"I'm already habituated to being away from home," said Han Tao-kuo. "Let's leave it at that."

"There you are," said his wife. "As far as you're concerned:

When the physiognomist has lost his touch,

It's all one whether he stays home or not."

When they had finished speaking, she served some wine, and the two of them, husband and wife, drank several cups to celebrate their reunion, after which, they cleared up the utensils and went to bed. That night, they:

Indulged in pleasure without restraint,

but there is no need to describe this in detail.

The next day was the first day of the eighth month. Han Tao-kuo arrived early, and Hsi-men Ch'ing had him join Ts'ui Pen and Kan Jun in supervising the provision of the necessary bricks, tiles, lumber, and stone for the construction of the underground storehouse. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing, having already overseen the unloading of the merchandise, and having nothing to occupy him at home, suddenly bethought himself that he would like to pay a visit to the house of Cheng Ai-yüeh. With this end in view, he surreptitiously sent Tai-an to deliver three taels of silver and a set of silk clothing to her. When the madam of the Cheng family bordello heard that His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing was coming to engage the services of one of her girls, she felt:

Just as though he had fallen from Heaven.

Making haste to take charge of the presents, she blurted out to Tai-an, "Express my utmost gratitude to His Honor, and tell him that both of my girls will await him here, and urge him to drop in as soon as possible."

Tai-an went back home and reported this to Hsi-men Ch'ing in his studio. Early that afternoon, Hsi-men Ch'ing directed Tai-an to prepare a wickerwork sedan chair for him. He then donned a Tung-p'o hat on his head, a long gown of jet moiré with a muted mandarin square woven inconspicuously into the fabric, and white-soled black boots.

He first went to the house across the street and watched the progress on the construction of the underground storehouse for a while, after which he stood up, took his seat in the wickerwork sedan chair, and let down the speckled bamboo blinds. He arranged for Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an to accompany him, left Wang Ching at home, taking only Ch'un-hung to carry his dispatch case, and headed straight for Cheng Ai-yüeh's establishment in the licensed quarter. Truly:

The Weaving Maid, positioned at her loom, adjusts the fragrant silk;
Injecting his hand, he manages to tear off a bolt of the snowy fabric.
Not satisfied to seek the ford leading to the Peach Blossom Spring;
He prefers to come to the Moon Grotto for a liaison with Ch'ang-o.⁶

To resume our story, Cheng Ai-hsiang, sporting on her head a chignon enclosed in a fret of silver filigree with plum-blossom-shaped ornaments, fastened in place all round with gold filigree pins; made up in such a way as to enhance her:

Powdered face and glossy hair,

Flowery visage and moon-like features;⁷

wearing a blouse of pale lavender silk above, and a beige skirt below; upon seeing Hsi-men Ch'ing arrive, stood just inside the open upper half of the doorway⁸ with a broad smile on her face, ushered him inside to the parlor, and saluted him with a bow.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down and instructed the page boy Ch'in-t'ung, "Take the sedan chair home with you now, and come back to get me with a horse this evening."

Ch'in-t'ung accordingly went home with the sedan chair. But no more of this. Hsi-men Ch'ing kept only Tai-an and Ch'un-hung to wait upon him.

After some time, the madam came out to pay her respects and said, "The other day, at your place, my girl put you to a lot of trouble. No doubt Your Honor was bored silly at home and has simply come here in search of diversion. What need was there for you to worry about sending any gifts? But, many thanks for the clothing you have provided for my girl."

"When I engaged her services for that day," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "why didn't she come? Is it that you only recognize the household of that distaff relative of the imperial family, Wang the Second?"

"We are still upset," explained the madam, "that Tung Chiao-erh and Li Kuei-chieh failed to inform us that it was Your Honor's birthday that their services were being engaged for. They each had presents for the occasion, while only my girl had not prepared anything. If I had known it was your birthday, I certainly would never have agreed to let her go perform at Wang the Second's place but would have had her go to Your Honor's residence first, despite the fact that the engagement for her to sing at Your Honor's place was made later. My girl was just getting herself ready to start out when someone from Wang the Second's household showed up and proposed to make off with her costume bag. Right after that, Your Honor sent someone here, along with her elder brother Cheng Feng, who said, 'If you don't go to his place, His Honor will be moved to anger.' This threw me into such a fluster that I hustled my girl out the back door and into her sedan chair behind the back of the servant from the Wang household."

"The other day," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "while I was attending a party at the residence of His Honor Hsia Yen-ling, I engaged her services. If she had failed to show up for the occasion, needless to say, I would have been annoyed. How is it that on that day she conducted herself:

Without saying anything or uttering so much as a word,

Conveying the clear impression that she was not happy?⁹

Really, how do you account for it?"

"The little baggage!" responded the madam. "Ever since she was deflowered, she has been reluctant to go out and perform in public. When she found herself in Your Honor's residence and saw all the people there, who knows how frightened she may have been? Ever since she was a child, she has been sparing of words and has been spoiled enough to get away with it. Look how late in the day it is already, and she has just gotten up. I pressed her several times, saying, 'His Honor is coming today, you ought to get up and get yourself ready,' but she paid me no heed and continued to lie in bed to this hour."

Before long, a maidservant brought in some tea, and Cheng Ai-hsiang came forward to serve it.

When they had finished the tea, the madam said, "Will Your Honor please come into the interior and have a seat."

It so happens that Cheng Ai-hsiang's establishment consisted of a twenty-four-foot-wide frontage opening onto the street and five interior courtyards, receding along a vertical axis. Just inside the hanging screen, there was a fence of woven bamboo splints, behind which there was an eighteen-foot-wide courtyard, with four anterooms ranged along either side. The main suite at the far end of the courtyard consisted of three compartments, one well-lighted parlor, and two less well-lighted inner rooms, and was the dwelling place of Cheng Ai-yüeh. The quarters in which her elder sister Cheng Aihsiang lived were located further back, in the fourth courtyard.

Hsi-men Ch'ing observed that:

The screens and lattices were redolent of incense.

As he entered the parlor, he saw that there was a hanging scroll depicting Kuan-yin of the Ocean Tides in the place of honor on the facing wall, while on the walls to either side there were hung four scrolls depicting beautiful women in the four seasons, spring, summer, autumn, and winter, inscribed with the poetic lines:

Concerned for the flowers, one rises early in spring.
Enamored of the moon, one goes to sleep late at night.
Scooping up water, one finds the moon in one's hands.
Fondling the flowers, fragrance infuses one's clothes.¹⁰

Above everything was suspended a couplet that read:

Rolling up the blind, one invites the moon to look in;

Tuning the cithara, one waits for the clouds to enter.

At the head of the room there were arrayed four Tung-p'o chairs,¹¹ and on either side were placed two wide benches finished with translucent varnish of the kind used in the making of zithers.¹² Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down and saw that there was a plaque over the room inscribed with three characters in formal script designating it as "The Moon-loving Studio."

After he had waited for what seemed like half a day, he suddenly became aware of the rustle of the portiere as Cheng Ai-yüeh came in. She was not wearing a fret but had done up her hair in a casual "bag of silk" chignon in the Hang-chou style. Her raven locks were combed in such a way as to set off their blackness and glossiness. Two tufts of hair were allowed to escape at either temple. Her cloudy locks were piled up in disarray, suggesting a range of effects from light mist to dense fog, and were further enhanced with judiciously placed gold-flecked trinkets, and plum-blossom-shaped ornaments with kingfisher feather inlays, fastened in place all round with gold filigree pins neatly stuck into the hair behind her temples.

A phoenix hairpin was half askew.

Her ears were adorned with pendant amethyst earrings. Above, she wore a blouse, fit for an immortal, of pale lavender silk that opened down the middle. Below, she wore a skirt of purple chiffon, decorated with turquoise figures:

Beneath which there peeked out a pair of tiny shoes,

The points of which bore the beaks of red phoenixes.

On her breast there was suspended a necklace of sculpted jade stones that tinkled when she moved. On her face she wore three turquoise beauty patches that served to enhance the lotus blossom of her painted face. All around her:

There floated a fragrant aura;¹³

serving to set off:

Her willowlike slender waist.¹⁴

Truly:

If she is not the image of a portrait of Kuan-yin by Wu Tao-tzu;¹⁵

She must be the subject of a painting of a beauty by Mao Yen-shou.¹⁶

After having faced in his direction and:

Neither correctly nor precisely, made a bow to Hsi-men Ch'ing, she concealed her powdered face behind a gold-flecked fan and sat down next to him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Focused his eyes on her with a fixed stare, and felt that she appeared even more stunning than when he had seen her for the first time. Involuntarily:

His heart was agitated and his eyes disturbed, to such an extent that:

He was unable to control himself.

Before long, a maidservant brought in another serving of tea, at which the painted face:

Lightly flaunted her silken sleeves,

Slightly exposed her slender fingers, brought a cup of tea over to him, brushed away a few drops of water from the rim of the cup, and presented it to Hsi-men Ch'ing with both hands. After this, she and Cheng Ai-hsiang each took a cup for themselves and kept him company as they drank it together. When the tea was finished, and the cups and raised saucers had been taken away, they suggested that he loosen his outer garments and take a seat in the inner room.

Hsi-men Ch'ing called Tai-an to come forward, help him off with his black silk outer garment, and put it on a chair for him; after which he entered into the painted face's bedroom. Behold:

Because the green windows were curtained with white gauze,

The pale moonlight barely invaded them;

Because the brocade hangings were exposed to the night light,

They glowed with an auspicious luster.¹⁷

Inside the room there was a black lacquer bedstead with incised gold ornamentation:

The curtains of which were of embroidered brocade;

The coverlet of which concealed a patterned quilt.

To one side there was a low table of carved red lacquer, and a small Po-shan incense burner,¹⁸

From which the aroma of aloeswood and sandalwood assailed the nostrils.¹⁹

On the wall there hung a brocade bag that held a "Tinkling Spring" zither;²⁰

In a silver vase there were displayed blossoms of "Purple Shoots" camellia.²¹

In front of the bed there stood two low chairs with embroidered cushions;

Beside which there hung a pair of brocaded curtains of mermaid silk.

Upon a mica screen, was depicted a landscape in varying shades of ink;

On a shelf of the nuptial couch, was a pile of ancient and modern books.²²

When Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down, he felt that:

An exotic aroma invaded his person;²³

As refined and elegant as could be.²⁴

It was just what is conventionally described as:

A grotto palace of spirits and immortals,²⁵

A destination inaccessible to human feet.²⁶

As they engaged each other in conversation,

While laughing and joking with each other, who should they see but a maidservant, who came in and set up a small table, on which she laid out four small turquoise saucers containing exquisitely prepared julienned vegetables, shredded celery, minced and marinated sturgeon, phoenix entrails and puree. After this, she brought out two servings of:

Perfectly round,

Like the bright moon,

Thin as paper,

White as snow,

Fragrant, sweet, and delectable,

Butterfat and honey,

Sesame, pepper, and salt flavored,

Thin lotus-blossom pancakes.

Cheng Ai-hsiang and Cheng Ai-yüeh then proceeded with their own hands to make selections of the various shredded meats and vegetables, wrap them in the pancakes into spring rolls, place them in small gilded saucers, and present them to Hsi-men Ch'ing to eat. To one side, cups of gold-inlaid cloisonné were filled with strong cinnamon and osmanthus flavored tea.

Before long, after the two sisters had joined him in consuming the spring rolls, and the utensils had been put away, and the table wiped off, a madder red strip of felt was placed over a bed table, a set of thirty-two ivory dominoes was extracted from a sandalwood box decorated with carved lacquer, and the two of them proceeded to play dominoes with Hsi-men Ch'ing. In due course, Hsi-men Ch'ing melded the combinations known as "Heaven and Earth Separated"²⁷ and "Ten Pricks with a Sword,"²⁸ Cheng Ai-hsiang melded the combinations known as "Earth"²⁹ and "Flowers Blossom and Butterflies Fill the Branches,"³⁰ and Cheng Ai-yüeh melded the combinations known as "Man"³¹ and "Mounts a Ladder to Gaze at the Moon."³²

After a while, they put the dominoes away, and wine was served. Behold:

Platters are piled with exotic fruits,

The wine overflows with golden ripples.

The table was spread with goose, duck, chicken feet, fried dragon, and roasted phoenix.

The scarce fruits were:

Seldom seen in this world;³³

The rare repast was:

Unmatched in Heaven itself.³⁴

Truly:

Their dancing waylays the bright moon into shining on the pleasure-houses of Ch'in;
 Their singing diverts the moving clouds into hovering atop the bordellos of Ch'u.³⁵
 In mandarin duck goblets,
 And turquoise wine cups,
 They drink the jade hued liquids,
 And carnelian nectars of the gods.

The two sisters plied him with wine and then positioned themselves to one side, where Cheng Ai-hsiang, with:

 The bridges on her psaltery ranged like wild geese,
 Gently strummed the silken strings.

Thereupon, with Cheng Ai-hsiang playing the psaltery, and Cheng Ai-yüeh playing the p'i-p'a, they sang the song suite, beginning with the tune "A Happy Event Is Imminent," that opens with the words:

 Insistently he comes into my mind.³⁶

Truly:

 When words emerge from the mouth of a beauty,³⁷

 They have a timbre that causes rocks to split and lingers around the rafters.

When they had finished singing, another twelve saucers of assorted nuts and other delicacies were served, and the two sisters:

 Moving their seats closer together,³⁸ got out a dicebox with twenty dice and fell to playing "Competing for the Red"³⁹ and guess-fingers with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After they had been drinking for some time, Cheng Ai-hsiang, alleging that she had to go to the bathroom, disappeared, leaving Cheng Ai-yüeh alone to continue drinking with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

To begin with, Hsi-men Ch'ing reached into his sleeve and pulled out a white satin handkerchief with a double-patterned border, to one end of which was attached a chatelaine with three pendant charms, including a toothpick, and, to the other end, a cylindrical gold pillbox.

Cheng Ai-yüeh assumed that it contained breath-sweetening lozenges and wanted to open it, but Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "It doesn't contain breath-sweetening lozenges, but a restorative medication that I use every day. My breath-sweetening lozenges are not kept there but are wrapped in a paper packet."

Thereupon, he reached into his sleeve, pulled out a packet of cinnamon-flavored breath-sweetening lozenges, and handed it to her.

Cheng Ai-yüeh, who was still unsatisfied, stuck out her hand to grope inside his other sleeve and discovered a purple crepe handkerchief, with a low-grade gold toothpick attached to it, which she held in her hand to admire, saying, "I've noticed that Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh both have handkerchiefs like this. So it was you they got them from."

"They were part of my boatload of goods that just arrived from Yang-chou," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If they didn't get them from me, who else could they have gotten them from? If you like it, you can have it, and tomorrow I'll send another like it to your sister."

When they had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing swallowed a dose of the medication in his cylindrical pillbox, washed it down with a cupful of wine, and took the painted face onto his lap. The two of them then passed the same cup back and forth between them as they drank and sucked each other's tongues.

There was no length to which they would not go.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then stuck out his hand and proceeded to fondle her fragrant breasts, which were:

 Tight and squeezey, and as smooth as sesame seed glutinous rice dumplings. Opening up her blouse to take a look at them, he saw that they were:

 Pale and fragrant, and as lustrous as jade. After he had played with them for some time, his:

 Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused, and the organ that lay between his loins abruptly sprang to life. Loosening his pant strings, he suggested that she grasp it with her slender fingers.

When the painted face saw how long and thick it was, she was so perturbed she stuck her tongue out in fear and, putting her arms around Hsi-men Ch'ing's neck, said, "My darling, since this is our first tryst, please bear with me, and only insert it halfway. If you stick it all in, it will be the death of me. That must have been an aphrodisiac you took to make it as big as this. Otherwise, how on earth could you ever have produced anything so monstrous, deep red, and purple? It's really enough to give one the creeps."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed and said, "My child, get down on your knees and suck it for me."

"What's the hurry?" said Cheng Ai-yüeh. "After all:

 There are as many days ahead of us as there are leaves on the trees.

This is our first tryst today.

 We are newly acquainted and hardly know each other.⁴⁰

If you come again, I'll suck it for you."

When they had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing sought to take his pleasure with her.

"Do you not want any more wine?" asked Cheng Ai-yüeh.

"I've had enough," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Let's go to bed."

Cheng Ai-yüeh then called for a maidservant to move the table at which they had been drinking out of the way and help Hsi-men Ch'ing off with his boots, while she went inside to relieve herself and wash her private parts. When Hsi-men Ch'ing's boots had been removed, he rewarded the maidservant with a piece of silver, after which, he got into bed while the maidservant lit some incense and put it in the burner.

After a while, the woman came back into the room and asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Would you like some tea, or not?"

To which Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, "I don't want any."

She then closed the door to the room, let down the satin chiffon bed curtains, put a handkerchief under the bedding, took off her clothes, and got into bed. The two of them then proceeded to cavort like:

Mandarin ducks upon the pillow,
Water birds under the coverlet.

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that when the painted face took off her clothes, her skin was delicate and fine, and her vagina was clean and devoid of pubic hair, as soft and delectable as a white steamed bun. When he embraced her waist, it was hardly a handful. In truth, she was just like:

Soft jade and warm incense;⁴¹
Not to be bought for a thousand pieces of gold.⁴²

Hsi-men Ch'ing Exposes His Organ and Startles Cheng Ai-yüeh

Thereupon, he wrapped her two fresh, white, tender legs, like bars of silver, around his waist, fastened the clasp on his organ, and plunged it into the heart of the flower. His turtle head was proud and large, so that, even with moistening and reaming, it was some time before the knob of his glans was submerged. Cheng Ai-yüeh knitted her brows together and gripped the pillow with both hands, finding her distress hard to bear.

Her starry eyes grew dim and she pled with him, "Pray spare your Cheng Ai-yüeh today."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then hoisted her two golden lotuses over his shoulders and devoted himself to retracting and thrusting:

Unable to contain his pleasure.⁴³

Truly, it is a case of:

When spring touches the apricot and peach trees, their new buds burst into red flower;
When the breeze plays among the willow fronds, they are made to bend their green waists.⁴⁴
There is a poem about the flowering crab apple that testifies to this:

Bearing raindrops, shrouded in mist, this sapling is remarkable;
Beguiling in stance, it appears to be unable to support itself.
Its red reminds one of the matchless blooms of the West Park;⁴⁵
In spring it wins first place among the flowers of Ho-yang.⁴⁶
Its gaudy coloring inspires comparison with that of Master Cheng;⁴⁷
The skill demonstrated belies analogy with the work of Wang Wei.⁴⁸
Replete with feeling, it deliberately keeps its heart in check;
Holding onto the east wind to prevent it from returning home.⁴⁹

On this occasion, Hsi-men Ch'ing dallied with Cheng Ai-yüeh until the third watch before going home.

The next day, Wu Yüeh-niang, after seeing him off to the yamen, remained seated in the master suite along with Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li Chiao-erh. Who should appear at this juncture but Tai-an, who came in to fetch a gift box for bolts of fabric and the like, in which to deliver the birthday presents for Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, consisting of four varieties of fresh delicacies, a jug of wine, and a bolt of brocade.

Yüeh-niang took advantage of the occasion to ask Tai-an, "Whose place was it that your father took a sedan chair to go drinking at yesterday and remained drinking so late before coming home? I imagine he must have gone to Han Tao-kuo's house to look in on that wife of his. You lousy jailbird! It seems that you keep me in the dark all the time, while abetting him in these tricks behind my back."

"That's not the case," said Tai-an. "After all, her husband has come home. How could Father do anything like that?"

"If he didn't go there," said Yüeh-niang, "where did he go?"

Tai-an did not reply but merely smiled, picked up the gift box, and went off to deliver the presents.

"Mother," said Chin-lien, "there's no point in your asking that lousy jailbird anything. He'll never tell you the truth. But I've heard that that southern page boy also accompanied Father on his expedition yesterday. The thing to do is to call in that southern page boy and ask him about it."

She then proceeded to summon Ch'un-hung into their presence.

"When you accompanied your father's sedan chair yesterday," said Chin-lien, "whose place did he go drinking at? If you tell the truth, we'll leave it at that. But if you fail to tell the truth, the First Lady will see that you get a beating on the spot."

Ch'un-hung knelt down and said, "Mother, don't beat me. I'll tell you all about it, that's all. Your servant, along with Tai-an and Brother Ch'in-t'ung, the three of us, accompanied Father in going through a great gateway, after which we traversed several streets and alleys and came to a house with a door, inlaid with a sawtooth pattern, only the lower half of which was closed, inside which there stood a lady who was all made up in a flashy fashion."

When Chin-lien heard this, she laughed, saying, "The jailbird! He doesn't even recognize the horizontal half-doors of the licensed quarter, and he refers to a painted face as a lady."

"And what did that lady look like?" Chin-lien went on to ask. "Did you recognize her or not?"

"I didn't recognize her," said Ch'un-hung. "She looked like a veritable Bodhisattva and was wearing a fret on her head just like the ones you ladies wear. When we went inside, an old crone with white hair came out and saluted Father with a bow, after which we were invited into the interior, which was protected by a fence of woven bamboo splints. Once inside, another young lady appeared, who was not wearing a fret, but had a silver salver face, shaped like a melon-seed, and whose lips were daubed with red. She kept Father company while he drank."

"And where were you allowed to sit all this time?" asked Chin-lien.

"Tai-an, Brother Ch'in-t'ung, and I," replied Ch'un-hung, "were entertained in the room of the old crone, who provided us with wine and pork dumplings, and kept us company as we consumed them."

This caused Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou to laugh without restraint.

They then went on to ask, "Did you recognize this lady, or not?"

"It seemed to me that she has performed at our place," replied Ch'un-hung.

"Then it must have been Li Kuei-chieh," laughed Meng Yü-lou.

"So it seems that's where he snuck off to," said Yüeh-niang.

"Our establishment doesn't have horizontal half-doors," said Li Kuei-chieh. "And it doesn't have a fence woven of bamboo splints either."

"I fear you may not know about it," said Chin-lien. "Perhaps your place has recently put in horizontal half-doors."

After they had interrogated Ch'un-hung for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing came home from the yamen and then set out for the residence of Hsia Yen-ling to celebrate his birthday.

To resume our story, P'an Chin-lien kept a white long-haired leonine cat in her quarters, whose entire body was pure white, except for a streak of tortoiseshell-patterned black fur on its forehead. It was named "Coal in the Snow"⁵⁰ and was also called "Snow Lion," and it could pick up handkerchiefs and fans in its mouth. When Hsi-men Ch'ing was not in her quarters, the woman would go to sleep with the cat cuddled in her arms underneath the quilt, and it never soiled her garments with urine or feces. When the woman ate, it would often perch on her shoulder and allow her to feed it.

When summoned, it would come;

When dismissed, it would go.⁵¹

The woman commonly referred to it as "Snow Bandit." Its daily diet consisted, not of calves' liver or dried fish, but of half a pound of raw meat, as a result of which, it was as fat and sturdy as could be, and its fur was so thick you could hide an egg in it. She was extremely fond of it and petted it on her lap all day long, but not with benevolent intent. Knowing that Li P'ing-erh's child, Kuan-ko, had previously shown a fondness for cats, she would frequently, when no one else was around, wrap the meat in a piece of red silk and encourage the cat to pounce on it, tear it open, and eat it.

This was one of those occasions on which:

Something was destined to happen.

Kuan-ko had not been feeling very well. For some days he had been taking the medications prescribed by Dame Liu, and he felt a little better. Li P'ingerh had dressed him in a shirt of red chiffon and put him on a little sleeping mat on the k'ang in the outer room to play. Ying-ch'un was looking after him, while the wet nurse was holding a bowl in her hand and eating to one side. Unexpectedly, this "Snow Lion" from Chin-lien's quarters, which had been perched on the bedrail, upon seeing Kuan-ko lying on the k'ang dressed in a red shirt and fidgeting as he played, was reminded of the way in which its meat was customarily prepared for it, and suddenly pounced down onto Kuan-ko's body and tore at him with its claws.

All that could be heard was:

The sound of a gurgling cry, as Kuan-ko choked up and then fell silent, while his hands and feet went into convulsions. This threw the wet nurse into such consternation that she dropped her rice bowl, picked Kuan-ko up and cuddled him on her lap, while devoting herself to prophylactic spitting, in the endeavor to exorcise the fright. Meanwhile the cat continued to claw at him until Ying-ch'un drove it out of the room. Ju-i expected that the child would merely undergo a fit of convulsions, and then be all right, but who could have anticipated that they went on continuously, one fit being succeeded by another.

Li P'ing-erh was back in the rear compound at the time, so Ju-i sent Yingch'un there to fetch her, saying, "Little brother is unwell and is suffering from convulsions. Mother had better come quickly."

Nothing might have happened if Li P'ing-erh had not heard this, but having heard it, truly:

The shock affected all six of her vital organs, including liver and lungs;

The fright damaged the three bristles and seven apertures of her heart.⁵²

Yüeh-niang also was thrown into such consternation that:

Covering two steps with every one,

she too rushed straight to Li P'ing-erh's quarters. What they found when they got there was that the convulsions had caused the child's eyeballs to roll straight up so that their black pupils were completely invisible, white foam was dribbling from his mouth, he was making inarticulate sounds like the chirping of a young chick, and his hands and feet were moving spasmodically. Li P'ing-erh no sooner saw this than she felt as though her heart were being lacerated with a knife.

Hastily picking him up and holding him in her arms, she brushed her cheek against his mouth and wept loudly, saying, "My little child, you were doing fine when I went out. Why should you have gone into convulsions?"

Ying-ch'un and the wet nurse then told her all about how he had been frightened by the cat from the Fifth Lady's quarters.

Li P'ing-erh wept all the more, saying, "My little child, you have simply failed to live up to the expectations of your father and mother. And today, there's no gainsaying the fact that there's no other road for you to take."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she said not a word, but sent for Chin-lien and interrogated her, saying, "They say that it was the cat from your quarters that frightened the child."

"Who says so?" demanded Chin-lien.

Yüeh-niang indicated that it was the wet nurse and Ying-ch'un who had said so.

"Just look at the goggle-eyed way the old woman is staring at me," said Chin-lien. "My cat is happily asleep in my room, isn't it. You're talking nonsense. How could it have frightened the child? You'd better not try to blame it on me:

Snitching only those melons whose stems are soft.⁵³

It seems that only the inhabitants of my quarters are fit to be taken advantage of."

"What was her cat doing in this room?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"It constantly comes over here to play," said Ying-ch'un.

Chin-lien picked up where she left off, saying, "It's a good thing you said that. If it's constantly over here, why hadn't it scratched him before, instead of picking on this particular day to start scratching him? You slavey! You're just following in her footsteps, what with your:

Knitted brows and staring eyes, and your:

Ridiculous blatherskite.

Take it easy, will you! There's no call for you to:

Pull your bow all the way taut,⁵⁴ like that. I guess we're just doomed to be out of favor."

Whereupon, she took herself off to her quarters in a huff.

Gentle reader take note: As the saying goes:

Flowering branches, beneath their leaves, conceal their thorns;

How can one know for sure the human heart contains no poison?⁵⁵

This P'an Chin-lien, having been aware for some time that ever since Li P'ingerh had borne Kuan-ko, Hsi-men Ch'ing had been:

Obedient to her every whim,

that:

Whatever she asked for, she received tenfold, and that every day she was:

Contending in beauty and competing for favor.⁵⁶ had developed feelings of jealousy and anger in her heart over this favoritism. On this day, therefore, she had deliberately set this secret plot in motion, training her cat for the purpose, out of a desire to frighten her rival's child to death, and thereby diminish Li P'ing-erh's favor, and cause Hsi-men Ch'ing to resume his intimacy with her. It was just like the way in which, in ancient times, T'u-an Ku trained his dog, Shen-ao, with the intent to murder the grand councilor, Chao Tun.⁵⁷ Truly:

Azure Heaven, in its profundity,⁵⁸ cannot be deceived;⁵⁹
Before intentions are even formed it is aware of them.⁶⁰
Say not that timely retribution seems not to occur;
From ancient times until today⁶¹ who has been spared?⁶²

When Yüeh-niang and the rest of them saw that the child was continuing to suffer from convulsions, on the one hand, they decocted some ginger extract and poured it into his mouth, while, on the other hand, they sent Laian off to summon Dame Liu as quickly as possible.

Before long, Dame Liu showed up, examined his pulse, and then, stamping her feet in frustration, said, "This time the fright he has been subjected to is serious. It has resulted in a case of tetany, which is difficult to cure."

She urgently directed them to prepare a decoction of bog rush, field mint, and honeysuckle, after which she pulled out a bolus of gold foil and dissolved it in a cup of the decoction. The baby's jaws were tightly closed, but Yüeh-niang promptly extracted a gold pin from her hair and pried his mouth open with it in order to pour the decoction into his mouth.

"If this proves effective," said Dame Liu, "that will be that. But, if it does not, as I've already told you, Madame, we'll have to resort to moxabustion at several points before there will be any hope of recovery."

"Who would be willing to take responsibility for that?" said Yüeh-niang. "We'll have to wait until his father gets home, and consult with him about it. Otherwise, if we go ahead with the moxabustion on our own, he's likely to raise a hue and cry when he gets home."

"First Lady, his life is at stake," said Li P'ing-erh. "If we wait till he gets home, it may be too late. If his father should get abusive about it, I'm willing to take the heat."

"It's your child, after all" said Yüeh-niang. "Proceed with the moxabustion if you like. I won't presume to take a stand on the issue."

Thereupon, Dame Liu proceeded to apply moxabustion to the glabella between his eyebrows, the nape of his neck, the wrists of his two hands, and his precordium, five points in all, after which he was put down to sleep. The child, who was:

Both torpid and comatose,⁶³
slept right up until the time when Hsi-men Ch'ing returned home that evening, without waking up.

When Dame Liu saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come home, she took the five mace of silver that Yüeh-niang paid her for her services and disappeared through the enclosed passageway in a puff of smoke.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived back in the master suite, Yüeh-niang told him how the child had fallen ill and suffered from convulsions. He immediately went out to the front compound to see for himself and observed that Li P'ing-erh's eyes were red with weeping.

"What caused the child to go into convulsions?" he asked.

Li P'ing-erh's eyes brimmed over with tears, but she did not have a word to say. When he asked the maidservant and the wet nurse, they did not dare to reply. When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw the spots on Kuan-ko's hands where the skin had been torn off, and the scars that the moxabustion had left on the other parts of his body, he became furious and strode back to the rear compound to question Yüeh-niang about it. Yüeh-niang felt unable to conceal the facts and told him how the cat from Chin-lien's quarters had frightened the child.

"Dame Liu had no sooner examined him," she explained, "than she said that it was an extreme case of tetany, that if we did not resort to acupuncture and moxabustion it was doubtful if he would recover, and that if we waited until you got home, it might be too late. His mother decided in favor of moxabustion, and it was applied to five points on the child's body, after which he was put down to sleep. It's been half a day now, and he hasn't yet waked up."

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them:

The spirits of his Three Corpses became agitated;
The breaths of his Five Viscera ascended to Heaven.⁶⁴ Anger flared up in his heart, and Malice accrued in his gall.

Heading straight for P'an Chin-lien's quarters:

Without permitting any further explanation, he sought out the cat and, dangling it by one foot, strode out to the veranda, took aim at the stone stylobate, swung the cat up into the air, and dashed it against it. All that could be heard was:

A single resounding report,
at which:

The contents of its brain burst into ten thousand peach blossoms;⁶⁵
Its mouthful of teeth were reduced to scattered fragments of jade.⁶⁶

Truly:

No longer able in the world of light to capture rats or mice,
It reverts to the abode of the dead to become a fox fairy.⁶⁷

When P'an Chin-lien saw that he had taken her cat out and dashed it to death, she sat on her k'ang:

Without turning so much as a hair, and waited until he had vacated her quarters, muttering to herself, as she cursed him, saying, "You lousy death-defying ruffian! If you had only dragged me out and killed me, it would have been more heroic of you. Did the cat really get in the way of your shit-eating business so much that you felt compelled to barge in here, like a madman, and dash it to death? When it comes before the authorities in the nether world, it's likely to demand your life in compensation. What are you so exercised about? You'll come to a bad end, you lousy fickle ruffian!"

Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to Li P'ing-erh's quarters and berated the wet nurse and Ying-ch'un, saying, "I instructed you to take special care of the child. How could you have allowed the cat to frighten it so, and even claw the skin off its hands? And how could you have had such confidence in that old whore, Dame Liu, as to allow her to subject him to such a course of moxabustion, for no good reason? If he recovers, that will be that; but if he doesn't, I'll have that old whore dragged off to the yamen and subjected to a finger-squeezing or two."

"Look you," expostulated Li P'ing-erh, "the child's life was at stake, and yet you carry on this way. After all, compassion is a prerequisite for medical practitioners. She was as concerned for his welfare as anyone."

From that time on, all Li P'ing-erh could do was to hope for the child's recovery. Unexpectedly, however, the effect of the moxabustion had been to internalize the disorder so that it became a case of chronic mild convulsions of the stomach and intestines, and the discharge of both urine and feces. The stools that he extruded were variegated in color, his eyes opened and closed irregularly, he remained torpid and comatose all day long, and he would not allow himself to be breast-fed.

Li P'ing-erh became panicked about the situation. Everywhere she could think of:

The gods were besought and diviners consulted,
but the results of these prognostications were all:

Ominous and inauspicious.⁶⁸

Yüeh-niang, behind Hsi-men Ch'ing's back, once again invited Dame Liu to come and perform a shamanistic dance on behalf of Kuan-ko. She also invited a licensed pediatrician to come and examine him.

He recommended that they try a powdered nasal decongestant on him, saying, "If it causes him to sneeze when insufflated into his nostrils, he may recover; but if no mucus is dislodged, all you can do is keep vigil over him and hope that the good deeds you have done in secret will avail."

Thereupon, they insufflated the powder into his nostrils, but he remained:

Insensibly oblivious.⁶⁹

without so much as a sneeze. As a result, Li P'ing-erh kept vigil over him day and night, even more assiduously than before, while:

Weeping and sniffing unceasingly, and even reducing her food and drink to a minimum.

As the fifteenth day of the eighth month gradually approached, Yüeh-niang, on account of Kuan-ko's indisposition, decided to abandon the celebration of her own birthday. Even those relatives who had sent presents to her were not invited for the occasion. The only people in the house to keep her company were Sister-in-law Wu, Aunt Yang, and the abbess of Kuan-yin Nunnery.

Meanwhile, Nun Hsüeh and Nun Wang were engaged in a dispute over the division of the profits they had reaped on the money Li P'ing-erh had provided to the sutra printing shop and were hurling angry accusations at each other.

On the fourteenth, Pen the Fourth and Nun Hsüeh went to the shop to demand the promised delivery, and all fifteen hundred copies of the sutra were carried back to the house. Li P'ing-erh also donated a string of cash for the purchase of paper money, incense, and candles. Early on the morning of the fifteenth, Pen the Fourth accompanied Ch'en Ching-chi to the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak to present the incense and paper money and oversee the disposition of the sutras, all of which were duly distributed, and then came back to report to Li P'ing-erh.

The family of Ch'iao Hung sent Auntie K'ung over every day to see how Kuan-ko was doing and also recommended a pediatrician named Dr. Pao, who came to examine him and said, "This is a case in which the baleful star Tiao-k'o, or Condoler, has been offended. No cure is possible."

Li P'ing-erh gave him five mace of silver and sent him on his way. When she tried to pour the medication he had prescribed into Kuan-ko's mouth, he rejected it and spit it up. Keeping his eyes closed, he cried out in such a manner that the edges of his teeth chattered against each other. Li P'ing-erh:

Without taking the trouble to undress,⁷⁰ held him on her lap day and night, weeping the while, so that:

Her tears never dried.

Hsi-men Ch'ing also abstained from all social engagements, coming in to see the child every day as soon as he arrived home from the yamen.

At this time, one day in the final decade of the eighth month, Li P'ing-erh was lying on her bed, holding Kuan-ko in her arms, while a silver lamp burned on the table. The maidservants and the wet nurse were all fast asleep. Observing that:

The window was illuminated by moonlight,⁷¹

While the clepsydra dripped interminably, and that her child was comatose, and:

Oblivious to human affairs,⁷²

she felt for some time as though:

Her sorrow-laden bowels were tied in a myriad knots,⁷³

While her fears of separation took a thousand forms.

Truly:

When one confronts happy events, one's spirits are exhilarated;⁷⁴

When melancholy invades one's bowels, one is prone to nod off.⁷⁵

Behold:

The silver river shines resplendent;⁷⁶

The jade clepsydra drips unendingly.⁷⁷

The bright moon penetrates the window, blazing with cold light;

The cool breeze infiltrates the door, blowing its night breath.

The cries of the wild geese resonate,
Disturbing the dreams of men of talent who sleep alone.
The chirring of crickets is desolate,
Embittering the feelings of beauties in solitary slumber.
The watch-marking drums on the watchtower,
Before a single watch is done with, sound a new one;
The laundry bats in an adjacent courtyard,
Before a thousand blows are finished, strike up another.
Before painted eaves, the ding-donging of the wind chimes,
Causes wellborn young ladies to break their hearts;
On silver lampstands, the glimmering of the lamplight,
Succeeds merely in illuminating the beauty's sighs.
Her sole concern is with the welfare of her child;
Who could foresee that sorrow comes often in a dream.⁷⁸

At this juncture, Li P'ing-erh was lying on her bed:

Seemingly asleep yet not asleep,⁷⁹

when she dreamed that Hua Tzu-hsü came in the front door, dressed entirely in white, and looking just as he did while still alive.

When he caught sight of Li P'ing-erh, he condemned her in a harsh voice, saying, "You lousy wanton whore! How could you have misappropriated my property and turned it over to Hsi-men Ch'ing? Right now I'm on my way to lodge a formal complaint against you."

Li P'ing-erh grasped the sleeve of his garment with one hand and pled with him, saying, "Good Brother, pray forgive me."

But Hua Tzu-hsü broke loose, causing her to:

Wake up with a jerk,⁸⁰

revealing it to be but:

A dream of the Southern Branch.⁸¹

When she woke up, what she was grasping in her hand was the sleeve of Kuan-ko's garment.

After gasping several times, she said, "How strange! How strange!"

When she listened, she heard the watchman striking the third quarter of the third watch. Li P'ing-erh was so disturbed that:

Her whole body broke into a cold sweat,⁸² and her hair stood on end.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing came into her quarters the next day, she told him about her dream.

"Who knows where he has gone after his death," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "This is just a case of your:

Remembering your former situation in a dream.

Just set your mind at rest, and pay no attention to it. There's no reason for you to be upset. Under the circumstances, I'll send a page boy with a sedan chair to fetch Wu Yin-erh, so she can keep you company at night. And I'll summon Old Mother Feng to come and wait on the two of you."

Tai-an, accordingly, went to the licensed quarter and brought Wu Yin-erh back with him. Even before the sun began to set in the west, Kuan-ko, whom the wet nurse was holding on her lap, began to breathe irregularly.

This threw the wet nurse into such consternation that she called to Li P'ing-erh, saying, "You'd better come and see. The black pupils of Little Brother's eyes have rolled out of sight, and in his mouth, he is:

Only breathing out, but Not breathing in."⁸³

Li P'ing-erh came over, embraced the child in her arms, began to cry, and called out to the maidservant, saying, "Quickly, go and fetch Father. Tell him that the child is about to stop breathing."

It so happened that, just at this juncture, Ch'ang Shih-chieh had come to visit Hsi-men Ch'ing in order to tell him that he had found the house he was looking for, that it had a twelve-foot-wide frontage and a second floor, making four rooms in all, both large and small, and that the price was only thirty-five taels of silver.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard the news from the interior that Kuan-ko was in serious condition, he sent Ch'ang Shih-chieh on his way, saying, "I won't bother to see you off. I'll send someone with the silver to go look at the house with you another day."

He then urgently made his way to Li P'ing-erh's quarters. Yüeh-niang and the others, including Wu Yin-erh and Sister-in-law Wu, were all in the bedroom looking at the child, who was breathing only irregularly, clasped in his mother's arms. Hsi-men Ch'ing could not bear to see it and went into the parlor, where he sat down on a chair, giving vent to:

Long sighs and short breaths.⁸⁴

As for Kuan-ko, after less time than it would take to drink half a cup of tea:

Alas and alack;

He stopped breathing and died.

At the time it was 4:00 PM on the twenty-third day of the eighth month. He had lived a scant one year and two months.

All the members of the household, from top to bottom, started to cry out loud, while Li P'ing-erh:

Grasping her ears and scratching her cheeks,⁸⁵
in consternation, threw herself on the floor and wept until she fainted away.

It was some time before she recovered consciousness, whereupon she embraced Kuan-ko and gave vent to loud weeping, saying, "My child, have you no saving star? You've broken my heart. It would have been better if I could have died with you. I also am:

Not long for this world."⁸⁶

My darling, you're abandoning me to my fate, forsaking me only too cruelly."

The wet nurse, Ju-i, and Ying-ch'un, who were in attendance upon her, also wept until they were:

Unable to speak, and

Unable to move.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, ordered the page boys to clean out an anteroom on the west side of the front courtyard, and set up two wide benches in it, intending to have the child, along with his bedding, carried out there for his laying out. But Li P'ing-erh placed herself over the child's body, hugging it in both arms, and was unwilling to relinquish it.

She continued to protest, again and again, crying out, "My heartless enemy, who lacks a saving star! My darling son! You've ripped my innards out and taken them with you. You've forsaken me, so that all the pains I've taken on your behalf have been in vain.

I've suffered everything for nothing.⁸⁷

I'll never be able to see you again, my darling!"

Yüeh-niang and the others wept with her for a while and tried to admonish her to look after herself without success.

Hsi-men Ch'ing came over and, seeing that she had scratched the skin open on her face and rolled on the floor until her:

Jeweled chignon had been disheveled,⁸⁸

Leaving her raven locks in disarray, said, "Think of him as an alien rascal. Seeing that:

He is not fated to be our child, we have raised him in vain. Since he was fated to die an early death:

Weep for him a couple of times and forget it.⁸⁹

Why continue crying that way?

You can't cry him back to life again.⁹⁰

Your health is more important. I want to have him carried out now so that I can send a page boy to summon the yin-yang master to come and assess his situation. What time was it that he died?"

"It was around 4:00 o'clock," said Yüeh-niang.

"Just as I suggested before," said Meng Yü-lou, "he was sure to wait for that time before slipping away. He was born at 4:00 PM, and he died at 4:00 PM; and even the dates are the same. Both events occurred on the twenty-third. Only the months were different. He lived exactly a round one year and two months."

When Li P'ing-erh observed that the page boys were waiting on either side to take him away, she wept again, saying, "What need is there to carry him out so hastily? First Lady, reach out your hand and feel him. His body is still warm."

Then she cried out, saying, "My son! How can I bear to let you go? You're treating me too cruelly!"

She then threw herself down on the floor once again and gave vent to her tears. There is a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testifies to this:

I utter a single cry,
"Oh Azure Heaven,
How can you so ruin my life?"
I call out, "My darling boy,
If only with this one cry,
I could get you to respond.

It is all due to an earlier affinity from a previous life,⁹¹
In which incarnation I must have owed you a love debt that I have failed to repay.

And now it transpires that, in this life in this world,⁹²
The tears I shed over you will never come to an end."

Every day I have been on tenterhooks,
Doing everything I could think of.

From the very beginning, I have never done anything to hurt or to harm anyone else.
"Azure Heaven, how can you so fail to keep your eyes open?"

"It's not that you and I had no affinity,
It must simply be that I am fated to be unlucky.

Your abandonment of me has left me on the ground on all fours;⁹³

The fallen tree no longer provides shade.⁹⁴

I am reduced to trying to dip up water with a bamboo basket;⁹⁵
All my labors are in vain."

I call out, "My heartbreaking darling boy,
I am more than willing to travel with you along the road to the shades."

At this juncture, after Li P'ing-erh had wept for a while, Kuan-ko was carried out to the anteroom on the west side of the front courtyard for his laying out.

Yüeh-niang consulted with Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "We also ought to send word to our kinfolk, and to the abbess at the Kuan-yin Nunnery."

"We can send word to the abbess tomorrow morning," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

On the one hand, he sent Tai-an to convey the news to the members of Ch'iao Hung's household, and, on the other, he sent someone to invite Yinyang Master Hsü to come and interpret his divinatory texts about Kuan-ko's fate. In addition, he produced ten taels of silver and gave them to Pen the Fourth, instructing him to go immediately to acquire a set of deal planks and have artisans construct a little coffin out of them as quickly as possible, so that it would be ready for the encoffining.

No sooner was the news conveyed to Ch'iao Hung's household than his wife set out in a sedan chair to offer her condolences, and she began to weep as soon as she came in the door. Yüeh-niang and the others joined her in lamenting grievously for some time and told her about the preceding events. Before long, it was announced that Yin-yang Master Hsü had arrived.

After surveying the situation, he said, "So the child passed away at exactly 4:00 PM."

Yüeh-niang instructed him to proceed with consulting the *Black Book*⁹⁶ about his fate.

Master Hsü:

Calculated on the joints of his fingers, consulted his esoteric yin-yang texts for a while, and pronounced:

The eight characters that determine the child's horoscope indicate that he was born at 4:00 PM on the twenty-third day of the sixth month in the ping-shen year of the Cheng-ho reign period; and died at 4:00 PM on the twenty-third day of the eighth month of the ting-yu year of the same reign period. The fact that his death took place during a ting-yu month on a jen-tzu day indicates a conflict between the celestial stems and earthly branches that portends a double bereavement. The members of his immediate family should abstain from crying, although relatives by marriage need not do so. On the day of the encoffining ceremony, it would be auspicious if people born in the year of the snake, the year of the dragon, the year of the rat, and the year of the hare would stay out of the way. Moreover, the Black Book says that those who die on a jen-tzu day are governed by the zodiacal palace Precious Vase⁹⁷ above, which corresponds to the area of Shantung below. In his former life, he was the scion of a family named Ts'ai in Yen-chou. Relying on his influence, he seized other people's property, drank away his inheritance, failed to revere Heaven and Earth as well as his six relations, became implicated in a criminal offense, caught a chill, was confined to his bed for some time, and died in his own filth. In this life, while still an infant, he became epileptic, and, ten days ago, he was frightened out of his wits by a domestic animal. Moreover, because the Earth Spirit and Year God⁹⁸ were offended, his soul was extracted from his body, resulting in a premature death. He will be reborn as the scion of a family named Wang in Cheng-chou, will rise to the rank of battalion commander, and will live to the age of sixty-seven before dying.

A little later, after once again consulting his Black Book, Master Hsü enquired, "Your Honor, do you wish to remove his body from the premises for either burial or cremation tomorrow?"

"How can we send him away tomorrow?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Sutras will need to be recited for him on the third day, and we will escort him out to the family graveyard for burial on the fifth day."

"The twenty-seventh is a ping-ch'en day," said Master Hsü. "The horoscopes of the entire family will not create any conflicts on that day. It would be appropriate for the interment to take place at 12:00 noon."

When Master Hsü had finished interpreting his texts, and they began to prepare for the encoffining, it was already the third watch at night. Li P'ingerh, weeping as she went, returned to her quarters to fetch his little Taoist robe, his Taoist cap, his shoes and stockings, etc., and put them into the coffin with him. The "longevity nails" were driven into the lid of the casket, and all the members of the household, from top to bottom, wept for a while, after which the yin-yang master was sent on his way.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing was too busy to go to the yamen. When Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling heard the news, he came to offer his condolences after the morning session of the court was over and presented the customary consolatory contribution to the funeral expenses. Hsi-men Ch'ing also sent someone to inform Abbot Wu of the Taoist Temple of the Jade Emperor and arranged for eight monks from the Buddhist Temple of Kindness Required to come and recite sutras on the third day. Abbot Wu of the Taoist temple and the household of Ch'iao Hung each contributed the cost of a table with portions of the three sacrificial animals, the cow, the sheep, and the pig, for the funeral oblation.

On the third day, Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, Mr. Shen, the husband of Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, Mr. Han, the husband of Meng Yü-lou's elder sister, from outside the city gate, and Hua the Elder all contributed offertory tables of the three sacrificial animals and came to burn paper money. Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Licentiate Wen, Ch'ang Shih-chieh, Han Tao-kuo, Kan Jun, Pen Ti-ch'uan, Li Chih, and Huang the Fourth all clubbed together to make a joint contribution and came to keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company during the overnight wake. When the monks had been sent on their way, a troupe of puppeteers was engaged to entertain the company. After the ritual sacrifice before Kuan-ko's spirit tablet had been performed, Hsi-men Ch'ing presided over a feast for his guests in the large reception hall. On the day in question, the three houses of Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, and Cheng Ai-yüeh in the licensed quarter also sent people to bring gifts and burn paper money in honor of the occasion.

Li P'ing-erh, in her grieving over Kuan-ko, grew sallow by the day and was disinclined to take either tea or nourishment. Whenever the subject came up, she gave herself over to weeping and sniffing until her voice grew hoarse. Hsi-men Ch'ing was afraid that in her grief for her child she might resort to the foolish way out of suicide, so he gave orders that during the day the wet nurse, maidservants, and Wu Yin-erh should keep her company:

Without ever leaving her side.⁹⁹

As for the evening hours, Hsi-men Ch'ing spent three successive nights in her room, trying as best he could to comfort her in her distress.

Nun Hsüeh also kept evening vigil with her, reciting the Surangama Sutra,¹⁰⁰ and a spell for dispelling enmity, and urging her to cease her weeping.

"As it is well said in the sutras," she remarked:

"The head is altered and the face replaced, as the wheel of transmigration turns;

It is unavailing to consider what awaits you in the predestined life to come.¹⁰¹

In the life to come:

He is not fated to be your child.

He is your:

Enemy or creditor,¹⁰²

from a previous existence, who has been reborn in order to seek restitution by defrauding you of your property. He may die in his first year, he may die in his second year, he may die in his third, sixth, or ninth year.

In the space of a single day and a single night,¹⁰³

Men die and are reborn by the tens of thousands.¹⁰⁴

As it is well said in the Dhāraṇī Sutra:

In former days there was a woman who constantly adhered to the Fo-ting-hsin t'o-lo ching,¹⁰⁵ and made offerings to the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin every day without fail, but who, three incarnations ago, had poisoned someone to death. This enemy of hers had never departed from her side but sought a means by which he might accomplish his revenge by committing matricide. Thus he was reincarnated in her body and so squeezed his mother's entrails that when the time came for her to give birth, the parturition was so difficult that her life was imperiled.¹⁰⁶ On emerging from the womb, he was appropriately well formed, but in less than two years he died. His mother was stricken with grief, and, giving vent to loud lamentation, threw her child into the river. Three times in a row, he was reincarnated in his mother's womb and sought a means by which he might terminate his mother's life. The third time, he was reincarnated in his mother's womb as before and did his best to squeeze his mother's entrails, in order to imperil her life,¹⁰⁷ causing her to faint away and cry out during childbirth, only to emerge from the womb as handsome as could be, with all his features intact. But, once again, in less than two years he died. When his mother saw this, she could not help weeping out loud, "What sort of evil karma has resulted in this?" As before, she took her child right up to the river bank but hesitated for some time, unable to bear the thought of abandoning him. Her grief so moved the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin that she transformed herself into the guise of a monk, dressed in his patched cassock, came straight to the river bank, and addressed the woman, saying, "There is no need for you to weep. This is not your child, but your enemy from three incarnations ago. He has been reincarnated three times, seeking to gain revenge by killing his mother, but has been unable to do so. It is because you have constantly recited the Fo-ting-hsin t'o-lo ching, and made offerings to the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin without fail, that he has been prevented from killing you. If you wish to see this enemy of yours, just look in the direction to which I point.” When she had done speaking, she used her superhuman powers to point with her finger, at which the child was transformed into the guise of a yaksha, standing in the water, who said to her, “Because you murdered me, I have come with the intent to exact revenge. However, because your heart is set on supreme enlightenment, and you constantly adhere to the Fo-ting-hsin t'o-lo ching, good devas have protected you day and night, so that I have been unable to kill you. I have now been converted by the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin and, from now on, will forever cease to be your enemy.” When he had finished speaking, he plunged into the water and disappeared. The woman, as two streams of tears crisscrossed her face,¹⁰⁸ paid obeisance to the bodhisattva, went home, and devoted herself even more fervently to good works. In the end, she lived to the age of ninety-six before dying and was transformed by reincarnation from a woman into a man.¹⁰⁹

Although it may be inappropriate for me to say so, this son of yours must surely have been:

An enemy of yours from a previous existence,¹¹⁰ who was reborn in order to seek restitution and wished to do you bodily harm. It is only because of your meritorious deeds in making offerings and adhering to the doctrine, as well as donating the cost of reproducing fifteen hundred copies of this sutra, that he was unable to kill you. Now that he has left your side, it is only when you give birth to another child in the future that it will truly be your own child.”

When Li P'ing-erh heard this, in the end:

Her love affinity was not broken, so that, every time the subject came up, she wept and sniffled unceasingly.

In no time at all, five days passed by. On the morning of the twenty-seventh, eight young professional mourners were hired, who were dressed in black robes with white caps. The coffin was encased in crimson lacquer ornamented with gold tracery and was accompanied in the funeral procession by a heraldic pennant and cloud-adorned baldachin, replete with the artificial floral embellishments known as “jade plum blossoms” and “snowy willows,”¹¹¹ and preceded by a crimson banner inscribed with the words, “Casket of the Eldest Son of the Hsi-men Family.” Abbot Wu of the Temple of the Jade Emperor also sent twelve black-robed young Taoist acolytes to recite the Sheng-shen yü-chang (Jade Stanzas of the Vitalizing Spirits)¹¹² during the procession, and perform sacred music on the way to the funeral.

The relatives and friends of the family, dressed in white mourning-clothes, all accompanied Hsi-men Ch'ing in the funeral procession. It was only after they had walked as far as the east end of Main Street and were approaching the city gate that they got onto their mounts for the rest of the journey. Hsimen Ch'ing feared that Li P'ing-erh would be overcome by grief if she went to the grave site, so he forbade her to go. Only Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, in five sedan chairs, accompanied Ch'iao Hung's wife, Wu K'ai's wife, Li Kuei-chieh, Cheng Aiyüeh, and Wu Shun-ch'en's wife, Third Sister Cheng, to the family graveyard. Sun Hsüeh-o, Wu Yin-erh, and Nun Hsüeh were left at home to keep Li P'ing-erh company.

When Li P'ing-erh realized that she would not be allowed to go and saw the coffin starting on its way, she accompanied it as far as the front gate.

Approaching the coffin, she broke into loud lamentation, crying out again and again, “My ungrateful son, who will never come home again!”

She continued crying out this way until her voice broke, upon which, without knowing what she was doing, she fell down underneath the gateway:

Breaking the skin on her powdered forehead, and Scattering her gold hairpins on the ground.¹¹³

This threw Wu Yin-erh and Sun Hsüeh-o into such consternation that they came forward to help her to her feet and persuaded her to return inside. When she arrived back in her quarters and saw that the k'ang was desolately empty, and that only the toy clapper-drum decorated with the portrait of the God of Longevity that her child had been accustomed to play with was still hanging on the bedstead, she was reminded of him and couldn't help crying out again.

Li P'ing-erh on Seeing the Clapper-Drum Grieves for Kuan-ko

There is a full-length song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testifies to this:

When I come into the room,
 Quiet reigns on all sides,
 And I can't help sighing quietly.
 When I think of my darling boy,
 I weep until the energy in my vitals is completely exhausted.
 "I remember how, in giving birth to you,
 I suffered a thousand trials and a myriad tribulations."¹¹⁴
 Not to mention the nights when I moved you to the dry spots while I occupied the wet,¹¹⁵
 All the livelong day, I was preoccupied with looking after you.
 It is aggravating enough to break my heart,
 That you and I should end up as antagonists.
 I really expected that as you developed you would stand up for me,
 That we would remain together for a long time.
 Who could have known that Heaven should be so blind,
 As to bring what was left of your life to an end;
 Leaving me betwixt and between,
 Unable to reach the village ahead,
 Or make it back to the inn behind?"¹¹⁶
 I am aware that before long I am doomed,
 To end up underneath the Yellow Springs.
 The two of us, mother and son, are reduced to,
 Reposing together in the Gateway to the Shades.¹¹⁷
 I call out, "My darling sweetheart,

It is because you lacked karmic affinity in your past life, that this life of yours has been cut short."

Wu Yin-erh, who was standing by her side, took her hand and endeavored to comfort her, saying, "Mother, try not to cry. Little Brother has already forsaken you. You can hardly cry him back to life again. You must assume the responsibility for dealing with your own distress. You mustn't simply give way to your grief."

"After all, you're still:

In the springtime of your youth,"¹¹⁸ said Sun Hsüeh-o. "Surely there is no reason to fear that you won't be able to have another child in the future. But hereabouts:

Walls have cracks,

Fences have ears,

so we've got to be careful what we say. As far as she's concerned:

Those who devote their every thought to scheming,

Only end up bringing calamity on their own heads.¹¹⁹

Who doesn't know that she resented the fact that you gave birth to this child? If she really is responsible for doing him in, surely, in the life to come, since:

Every act brings its own retribution,¹²⁰

he will demand her life in return. Who knows how many times she has done her best to bury the rest of us alive? She is never content unless she is able to monopolize the attentions of our husband. But if he chooses to spend the night in anyone else's room, she gets:

So angry she scarcely cares whether she is dead or alive.

Fortunately you are all aware that in the past our husband seldom ventured into my place in the rear compound. But when he happened to do so on one occasion recently, you all saw the way in which she was all of a heap engaging in chitter-chatter at my expense with those singing girls behind my back. Does she think she can simply:

Wrap it up in a paper bag?

I may not say anything about it, but every day, I'm going to keep my eyes peeled where she's concerned. Who knows what sort of a bad end that whore will come to in the future?"

"That's enough of that," said Li P'ing-erh. "Though I'm still here, I've contracted an ailment that is likely to kill me, if not today, then some day soon. I can't contend with her any longer. Let her do as she pleases."

As she was speaking, who should appear but the wet nurse Ju-i, who came forward and knelt down before her, saying in a tearful voice, "I have something to say that I hardly dare mention to you, Mother. The fact that Little Brother has died is also a misfortune for me. I'm afraid that in the days to come Father and the First Lady will dismiss me. My husband is dead, and I'll have nowhere to go."

When Li P'ing-erh heard what she had to say, she felt a pang of sympathy in her heart and thought to herself, "As long as I've got that dear enemy of mine around, I might as well make use of him. I can't imagine he would threaten such a thing."

"You crazy woman," she said to her, "you can relax on that score. Although the child is dead, I'm not dead yet. And even if I should die tomorrow, you've served me well, and I'll see to it that no one will show you the gate. In the future, if the First Lady should give birth to a son or a daughter, you would be able to take over the nursing of the child, just as you've been doing for me. So what are you so agitated about?"

Only then was Ju-i content to say no more about it.

After some time had elapsed, Li P'ing-erh, once again, was overcome by her grief and broke into tears. To the same tune as before:

Yearning for my darling boy,

I yearn for you until,

I am all topsy-turvy.¹²¹

Gazing after my darling boy,

Unless it be in dreams, you will no longer appear.

During the day, when I see your things I am distressed,¹²²

As though a knife were disemboweling me;

And at night, when I awake from sleep I no longer find you,

Safely embraced in my arms.

I can't prevent the pearly tears from falling from my eyes.

No longer will you lie playing on my ornate bed with its gold tracery;

No longer will you let me lift you in my hands and induce you to smile;

No longer will you come and cuddle up against my breast.

You have managed to inflict a stab wound in my ardently beating heart.

I have suffered in vain on your behalf,

And it has all proven to be effort expended for nothing.

Though you may have satisfied the wishes of another,

You have left me with no future in sight.

Sun Hsüeh-o and Wu Yin-erh remained by her side and attempted to console her, saying, "You really ought to have something to eat, rather than merely continuing to cry this way."

Hsiu-ch'un went to the rear compound and brought some food back for her, setting it out on a table and helping her to eat. But Li P'ing-erh could hardly swallow anything and, after eating only half a bowl, put it down and refused to eat anything more.

Meanwhile, Hsi-men Ch'ing, at the family graveyard, asked Yin-yang Master Hsü to determine the proper geomantic orientation of the grave and then had Kuan-ko buried next to the grave site of his first wife, née Ch'en, so that she could hold the infant in her arms, as it were. That day Ch'iao Hung and the other relatives all assembled at the grave side and offered sacrifices, after which they were entertained in the newly erected summerhouse, where they enjoyed a libation for the rest of the day.

When the funeral party arrived home, Li P'ing-erh kowtowed to Yüeh-niang, Ch'iao Hung's wife, and Sister-in-law Wu and, weeping as she did so, addressed herself to Ch'iao Hung's wife, saying, "My kinswoman, who could be compared to me in raising such an unlucky child, who has died before his time? Now that he has died, your daughter will be a virgin widow, and all that you have done turns out to have been:

Labor expended in vain.¹²³
Please don't hold it against me."

"Kinswoman, how can you say such a thing?" protested Ch'iao Hung's wife. "Every child has a predetermined number of years to live. Who can be sure of what the future holds in store? As the saying goes:

A betrothal, once made, should not be altered.¹²⁴
And moreover, Kinswoman, you are not old. There is no reason to worry about not being able to have children and grandchildren in the future. You must take it easy, Kinswoman, and not distress yourself so."

When she had finished speaking, she took her leave and went home.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, in the front reception hall, arranged for Yin-yang Master Hsü to scatter ashes around the premises to prevent the soul of the departed from coming back, and to paste pollution-dispelling spells on all the doors, which read:

The baleful spirit of the departed is thirty feet high and is headed in a northeasterly direction. If it encounters the Wandering Day Spirit, it will be forced to return and be unable to escape. If it is executed, all will be well. Relatives of the departed need not avoid the site.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then brought out a bolt of muslin and two taels of silver with which to thank Master Hsü for his services and then escorted him to the gate.

That evening, he went to Li P'ing-erh's quarters and slept with her. During the night, he said everything he could think of to comfort her. He noticed that Kuan-ko's playthings were still in evidence and, fearing that Li P'ing-erh would be distressed on seeing them, ordered Ying-ch'un to take them all back to the rear compound. Truly:

Thinking of her darling boy, she weeps both by day and by night;
Her heart feels lacerated¹²⁵ so much that her life hangs by a thread.
Of the ten thousand things that create grief in this human world;
Nothing exceeds the severance of death and separation of the living.¹²⁶

Chapter 60

LI P'ING-ERH BECOMES ILL

BECAUSE OF SUPPRESSED ANGER;

HSI-MEN CH'ING'S SILK GOODS STORE

OPENS FOR BUSINESS

The marriage affinity bound with red cord¹ is over, without hope of renewal;
When one's luck runs out for no good reason,² whom does one presume to blame?
Her lingering tears, alarmed at the advent of autumn, fall with the leaves;
Her alienated soul, trailing after the moon, is slow to approach the window.
As the metallic autumn wind brushes her face,
she yearns for her son;
When the jade candle burns itself to ashes,
her doleful tears fall.
Even if her viscera should be fashioned out of iron or stone;
Though unable to engender sorrow, yet they would engender sorrow.

THE STORY GOES that on that day Sun Hsüeh-o and Wu Yin-erh stayed by her side and endeavored to comfort Li P'ing-erh for some time, thus and so, before returning to the rear compound.

When P'an Chin-lien saw that the child was no more, and that Li P'ing-erh had lost her son to death, every day she plucked up her spirits and expressed her gratification in a hundred different ways.

Pointing at one of the maidservants, she railed away at Li P'ing-erh by indirection, saying, "You lousy whore! As I have said all along:

The sun may be at high noon,
But the time will come when it will pass its zenith.
When the turtledove has dropped its egg:
It has no recourse but to pout.³
When the bench's back is broken:
You have nothing left to lean on.
Like Dame Wang who sold her grindstone:
You've no way to grind your axe anymore.
Like the old procuress whose painted face has died:
You've nothing more to hope for.

How do you like it, now that you're no better off than I am?"

Li P'ing-erh, in her adjacent quarters, overheard all this invective but did not dare say anything in response. All she could do was to shed tears behind Chin-lien's back. Suffering from this:

Suppressed anger and suppressed resentment,
on top of her accumulated vexation and sorrow; gradually:
Her heart and spirit were disoriented, and
Her dreaming soul turned topsy-turvy.⁴

With every day her intake of tea and food diminished.

The day after the funeral party returned from the graveyard after burying Kuan-ko, Wu Yin-erh went back to her establishment, and Old Mother Feng brought in a twelve-year-old maidservant, whom she sold to Sun Hsüeh-o for five taels of silver, and whose name was changed to Ts'ui-erh. But no more of this.

As for Li P'ing-erh, in the first place, because she was longing for her child, and in the second place, because she was afflicted with suppressed rage, her former ailment reappeared, and, as before, her menses flowed unceasingly from her lower body. Hsi-men Ch'ing invited Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to come and examine her and obtained a prescription from him, but when she took it, it was about as effectual as if she had:

Attempted to irrigate a stone with water.⁵
The more of his medication she took, the worse the hemorrhaging became. In the space of less than half a month:
Her countenance lost color,

Her flesh became emaciated,⁶ and her radiant good looks were no longer what they used to be. Truly:
 Her flesh and bones shrunk to no more than a handful;
 How could she hope to sustain such a load of sorrow?⁷
 One day, in the first decade of the ninth month, when:
 The weather becomes threatening, and
 The autumn wind begins to sough,
 Li P'ing-erh was sleeping by herself at night.
 The pillow was cold within her silver bedstead,
 The moonlight flooded her gauze-covered window.

Li P'ing-erh Dreams of Hua Tzu-hsü Demanding Her Life

She couldn't help thinking of her child and gave herself over to prolonged sighs.

Seemingly asleep yet not asleep, she became indistinctly aware of the noise made by someone tapping on the window frame. Li P'ing-erh called to her maidservants, but they were both fast asleep and did not respond. Consequently, she got out of bed herself:

Scuffed around with her slippers on backwards, Tried to put her brocaded gown on upside down, opened the door to the room, and went outside to see who was there. She seemed to see Hua Tzu-hsü, holding Kuan-ko in his arms, and calling out that he had found a new abode, and that she should join him in going there to live. Li P'ing-erh was not yet ready to relinquish Hsi-men Ch'ing and refused to go with him, but she reached out with both hands to embrace the child, at which Hua Tzu-hsü gave her a shove that knocked her to the ground, causing her to:

Wake up with a jerk,
revealing it to be but:

A dream of the Southern Branch.
She was so frightened that:

Her entire body broke into a cold sweat,⁸ and she gave way to:

Sobbing and wailing,
continuing to cry until dawn. Truly:

In possessing emotions we are surely all alike, but
To be fixated on appearances is to delude oneself.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Slender, slender, is the new moon as it shines on the silver screen;
While the woman in the secluded boudoir is about to break her heart.
Regretting ever more that romantic ardor is often not sufficient;
She is increasingly aware that affection may be the root of sorrow.⁹

At that time, Lai-pao's boatload of goods from Nanking also arrived, and he sent the young employee Wang Hsien ahead to get the silver for the cartage fee. Hsi-men Ch'ing wrote a letter and deputed his young employee Jung Hai to take it, together with a hundred taels of silver, and the customary gifts of mutton, wine, and satin brocade, to the secretary of the Ministry of Revenue in charge of the Lin-ch'ing customs station, requesting that, so far as the customs duties were concerned, he should:

Look upon the matter with favorable eyes.

Meanwhile, at home, the preparations for the new shop were completed, and he selected the fourth day of the ninth month for the grand opening. On that very day, the goods were unloaded, consisting of twenty large cartloads, including personal baggage.

On the day in question, the relatives and friends who brought boxes of candied fruit and congratulatory red banners to celebrate the occasion numbered more than thirty persons, and Ch'iao Hung engaged twelve musicians, as well as acrobats, to perform for the company. On Hsi-men Ch'ing's part, the three boy actors, Li Ming, Wu Hui, and Cheng Ch'un, were engaged to play their musical instruments and sing. The managers, Kan Jun and Han Tao-kuo, worked behind the counter, selling the merchandise, one of them taking charge of the cash, and the other bargaining with the customers, while Ts'ui Pen was responsible for handling the goods. Whoever showed up, whether they were businessmen or customers, were ushered inside and offered two cups of wine.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was dressed in a crimson robe and his official cap and girdle, had finished the ceremony of burning paper money, and his friends and relatives had all presented their boxes of candied fruit and toasted him with a drink, fifteen banquet tables were set up in the rear reception hall, replete with the customary:

Five appetizers, five dishes,
Three soups and five courses;

a new round of drinks was served, and, as the guests took their places:

Drums and music resounded to the heavens.

That day, the household of Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling sent someone to deliver a present and the customary red bunting in honor of the occasion, and Hsi-men Ch'ing sent the messenger back with a gift in return. Among those present were Ch'iao Hung, Wu K'ai, Wu the Second, Hua Tzuyu, Brother-in-law Shen, Han Ming-ch'uan, Abbot Wu, Licentiate Ni P'eng, Licentiate Wen Pi-ku, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and Ch'ang Shih-chieh.

With regard to the latter, it so happens that, in recent days, Hsi-men Ch'ing had given him fifty taels of silver, of which he had spent thirty-five taels for the mortgage on a house, while setting aside fifteen taels as the capital with which to open a small general store in his home, which enabled him to make ends meet. But no more of this.

On the present occasion, he had joined the others in making a contribution toward the cost of the celebration and had come along with them to congratulate Hsi-men Ch'ing. In addition, there were Li Chih, Huang the Fourth, Fu Ming, and the other entrepreneurs and managers, along with the neighbors in the area, all of whom filled the seats at the banquet tables. The three boy actors came before the feast and performed a song suite in the Nan-lü mode, beginning with the tune "Red Jacket," the first line of which was:

Hsi-men Ch'ing's Silk Goods Store Opens for Business

When primordial chaos first engendered the supreme ultimate,¹⁰ etc., etc. It was not long before:

Five rounds of wine had been consumed; and

Three main courses had been served.

By the time that the musicians below the hall had done performing, and the acrobatics and vaudeville acts were concluded, atop the banquet tables:

Drinking vessels and game tallies lay helter-skelter.

On that day, Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta outdid themselves in raising large goblets, as they:

Passed their winecups back and forth.

The drinking continued until sunset before the party broke up.

Hsi-men Ch'ing asked Wu K'ai, Brother-in-law Shen, Licentiate Ni, Wen Pi-ku, Ying Po-chüeh, and Hsieh Hsi-ta to remain, and new tables were set up for another round of drinks. On that day when the new shop opened for business, the managers did a quick job of reckoning the accounts and found that they had sold more than five hundred taels worth of goods, which delighted Hsi-men Ch'ing no end. After the shop closed that evening, he invited Manager Kan Jun, Han Tao-kuo, Fu Ming, Ts'ui Pen, Pen the Fourth, and Ch'en Ching-chi to join the party. After the musicians had performed for some time, they were allowed to go home, and only the three boy actors were retained to entertain the company.

Ying Po-chüeh, who had been drinking all day, was already inebriated and came out to the front compound to relieve himself. On the way, he called over Li Ming and asked him, "Whose place is that boy actor with the clear-cut appearance and his hair done up in a topknot from?"

"Do you mean to say you don't know, Master Two?" said Li Ming. Then, discreetly covering his mouth with his hand, he said, "He's Cheng Feng's younger brother. The other day, when Father was in the licensed quarter drinking at their establishment, he engaged the services of his elder sister Cheng Ai-yüeh."

"Really?" exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. "No wonder, the other day, she contributed toward the burning of the paper money, and attended the funeral ceremony."

Thereupon, rejoining the party, he said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Brother, you are once again to be congratulated. You've managed to pick up another little brother-in-law."

"You crazy dog!" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Don't talk such nonsense."

He then called over Wang Ching and said to him, "Pour Master Two another large cup of wine."

Turning to Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh said, "Venerable Brother-in-law, what do you think? I'm being fined this goblet of wine for no stated reason."

"You dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'm fining you for:

Violating protocol by speaking out of turn."

Ying Po-chüeh lowered his head to consider this and then laughed, saying, "It doesn't matter. I'll drink it. I'll drink it. After all:

It's not going to kill me."

He then went on to say, "But I've never been able to abide drinking wine without a song to accompany it. Only if you get Cheng Ch'un to come up here and sing a song for me, will I go along with it."

At this, the three boy actors all came forward and offered to play their instruments and sing.

Ying Po-chüeh dismissed Li Ming and Wu Hui, saying, "I don't want the two of you. I only want Cheng Ch'un to provide a solo accompaniment on the psaltery, and sing a short song, to help me get down the wine."

"Cheng Ch'un," said Hsieh Hsi-ta, "come over here and do as Master Two says."

"I've already explained the rules to Beggar Ying," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"For every song, he must down a goblet of wine."

Thereupon, Tai-an proceeded to fetch two large silver goblets and place them in front of Ying Po-chüeh, while Cheng Ch'un:

Gently strummed the silver psaltery, and sang in a low voice a song to the tune "Clear River Prelude":

A young lady of fifteen or sixteen,
Sees a pair of butterflies playing together.
Leaning against the wall with her fragrant shoulder,
Her slender fingers brush away her tears.
She calls out, "Maid servant,
Chase them away to fly somewhere else."¹¹

When Cheng Ch'un had finished singing this song, he invited his auditor to have a drink, and no sooner did Ying Po-chüeh down it, than Tai-an poured out another cup for him. Cheng Ch'un then proceeded to sing another song to the same tune:

Skirting the carved balustrade, he catches sight of her,
Leaning against the rose-leaved raspberry trellis.
Coily adjusting her phoenix hairpin,
She says nothing of last night's events,
But, smiling ingratiatingly,
Plucks a blossom and tosses it at him.¹²

When Ying Po-chüeh had finished drinking his cup of wine, he made haste to push the responsibility for continuing onto Hsieh Hsi-ta, saying, "That's enough. I can't handle any more. I can't handle any more. These two large goblets have done me in."

"You clever beggar!" exclaimed Hsieh Hsi-ta. "When you can't handle any more, you try to push the responsibility onto me. Do you take me to be a pushover of an encunted southerner like that wife of yours?"

"Clever beggar, is it!" responded Ying Po-chüeh. "If I become a senior official someday in the future, you'll be in line to take my place with her."

"You dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If you ever get an official post, it will only be that of a ceremonial dancer."

"My clever child!" laughed Ying Po-chüeh. "If I ever become a ceremonial dancer, I'll cede the position of senior official to you, that's all."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this and ordered Tai-an, "Give this lousy beggar a whack with the slapstick."

Hsieh Hsi-ta surreptitiously gave him a sounding rap on the head, saying, "You beggar! The venerable Licentiate Wen is here, and yet you continue to spout such rubbish."

"The venerable Mr. Wen," said Ying Po-chüeh, "is a man of culture, who doesn't concern himself with such trivial affairs."

"You two gentlemen," said Licentiate Wen, "are obviously on good terms with our venerable host. If one were really to prohibit this kind of badinage at a drinking party, it wouldn't be any fun. When pleasure resides in the heart, it is appropriate that it find external expression, and before one knows it, one finds oneself:

Miming it with one's hands, and Dancing it with one's feet,¹³

just like this."

Among those present, Brother-in-law Shen turned to Hsi-men Ch'ing and said, "Brother-in-law, this is not the way to do it. Why don't you invite your senior brother-in-law Wu K'ai to take charge of the situation by choosing a game of forfeits. The outcome could be determined by throwing dice, by playing at guess-fingers, or by playing cards; or it could be by reciting poems, lyrics, songs, or rhapsodies; or playing the game of 'thimble-stitching' in which lines of verse are joined together by beginning each new line with the last word of the preceding one;¹⁴ or even by reciting tongue twisters. Whoever fails at his task would have to drink a cup of wine as a forfeit. That would be more evenhanded, and less likely to create disputes."

"Brother-in-law, your suggestion is just the thing," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, and he proceeded to pour a cup of wine and present it to Wu K'ai to initiate the proceedings.

Wu K'ai picked up the dice box and said, "I'll start things off then, and if I get anything wrong, I'll pay the penalty by drinking a cup of wine. I'll begin with only a single die, after which I'll use a pair. If I throw a number that corresponds to those in any of the following lines, I'll pay the forfeit.

- 1: Amid the hundred myriads of men, the white flag is furled.
- 2: As for the heroes under Heaven, few men recognize them.
- 3: The Prince of Ch'in has executed Generalissimo Yü;
- 4: Having curled him for not providing a horse for him to ride.
- 5: This so frightened me that I lack the mouth to respond.
- 6: The seething crowds on the street remove his clothes.
- 7: The black-clad lictors haven't any white hair on their heads.
- 8: After splitting up the corpse, they leave their knives behind.
- 9: There is a bolus of good medicine, but no one wants a dab of it.
- 10: A thousand years of accomplishment is negated with a single stroke."¹⁵

When Wu K'ai had finished throwing the dice, two of his throws corresponded to the numbers in the lines, and he drank the penalty cups of wine accordingly.

It was then the turn of Brother-in-law Shen to call the game, and he said, "I will throw a pair of dice six times, and if I throw a number that corresponds to those in any of the following lines, I'll pay the forfeit

The image of Heaven is a double six; the image of Earth is a pair of twos;
The image of Man is conveyed by the red pair of ones and the double four.
A double three suggests Witch's Mountain; a double five evokes plum blossoms;
Few indeed are those who really understand the import of these symbols."

When he played, one of his throws resulted in a red double four, and he drank his cup of wine accordingly. He then turned the dice box over to Licentiate Wen.

"Your pupil will propose a game," said Licentiate Wen. "For each of the six numbers I will name an appropriate flower, and follow it with a line from the Four Books,¹⁶ that begins with the last character of the flower named above.

- 1: Spot of Red.¹⁷ 'The red plum blossom confronts the white plum blossom.'¹⁸
- 2: Double-headed Lotus. 'Amid the ripples, mandarin ducks play.'¹⁹
- 3: Willow of the Three Springs. 'Under the willow one does not adjust one's hat.'²⁰
- 4: Principal Graduate's Red.²¹ 'Red and violet coloured silks were not used for informal dress.'²²
- 5: Wintersweet Blossom. 'Blossoms brush against sword pendants as the stars begin to sink.'²³
- 6: Sky Full of Stars.²⁴ 'The stars and other heavenly bodies are so distant.'²⁵

Licentiate Wen was only required to drink one cup of wine, after which it was the turn of Ying Po-chüeh to call the game.

"Your humble servant can hardly recognize a single character," said Ying Po-chüeh, "so I'll recite a tongue twister:

A hurrying-scurrying housewife,
Holding a basket of soybeans in her left hand,
And a sack of cotton in her right hand,
Was only intent upon forging ahead,
When she ran into a yellow and white spotted dog,
Which took a bite out of the sack of cotton.
At which the hurrying-scurrying housewife,
Put down the basket of soybeans in her right hand,
And tried to beat off the yellow and white spotted dog.
But I don't know whether her hand overcame the dog,
Or whether the dog overcame her hand."

"You god-damned louse!" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing derisively. "You'll bust your gut coming up with such nonsense. Who would ever undertake to beat off a dog with his hand without getting bitten for his pains?"

"Who would have anyone take on a dog without a stick in hand?" said Ying Po-chüeh. "I'm in the same boat as:

The beggar who has misplaced his stick:
I have to confront the rancor of a dog."²⁶

"Your Honor," said Hsieh Hsi-ta. "Notice how the beggar has acknowledged his own downfall by describing himself as a beggar."

"He ought to be made to drink a penalty cup," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "His effort is hardly up to snuff. Hsieh Hsi-ta, it's your turn now."

"This tongue twister of mine is better than his," said Hsieh Hsi-ta. "If I don't get it right, I'll drink a penalty cup.

On top of the wall there is a broken tile.
Below the wall there is a mule.
The broken tile falls down,
And lands on the mule.
I don't know whether the broken tile wounded the mule,

Or whether the mule stamped the broken tile to pieces.”

“You ridiculed my tongue twister as inferior,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “as though this broken tile of yours were any better. That wife of yours, Sister Liu, may be a mule, and I may be a broken tile, but the two of us are as well matched as a broken millstone and a lame donkey.”

“As for that wife of yours, née Tu,” said Hsieh Hsi-ta, “old whore of a southern hag that she is, she’s just like a handful of black beans, fit only to feed to a pig. Even a dog would turn up his nose at her.”

The two of them sparred verbally with each other for a while, after which each of them was made to drink a cup of wine.

It was then the turn of Manager Fu Ming, who said, “I’ll call a game current on the rivers and lakes. If I throw a number that corresponds to those in any of the following lines, I’ll pay the forfeit. I’ll begin with a single die, and later switch to a pair.

Aboard a single boat with a pair of oars,
Three men row out into a waterway in the Province of the Four Rivers.
Employing the five notes and six semitones,²⁷
Seven men sing together a song about the Eight Taoist Immortals.
The nine times ten days of springtime²⁸ are all equally enjoyed.
During the eleventh and twelfth months we celebrate primal harmony.”²⁹

When he had done, none of his throws corresponded to the numbers in the lines that he recited.

“None of the other games proposed have come up to this game of Manager Fu’s,” opined Wu K’ai. “It’s more appropriate to the occasion than any of the others.”

“In that case,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “he ought to drink a ‘Cup of Peace,’ rather than a penalty cup.”

Thereupon, he got up from his place, poured out a cup, and gave it to Fu Ming to drink, after which he said, “It’s now the turn of Manager Han.”

“Since Your Honor is present,” said Han Tao-kuo, “how could I presume to precede you?”

“After all of you have done,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “I’ll call a game of my own.”

Thereupon, Han Tao-kuo said, “I propose a game in which the first line must contain the name of a flying fowl, the second line the name of a fruit, the third line the name of a domino, and the fourth line the name of an official, all of which must be strung together in such a way as to make some kind of sense. If I throw a number that corresponds to that in any of the following six quatrains, I’ll drink a penalty cup in front of the company.

From up in the sky there flies down an immortal crane,
Which alights in the garden and eats a fresh peach.
But it ends up being apprehended by a solitary goose,
And then taken to be presented to an education-intendant.

From up in the sky there flies down a sparrow hawk,
Which alights in the garden and eats a red cherry.
But it ends up being apprehended by a pair of nuns,
And then taken to be presented to a senior official.

From up in the sky there flies down an aged stork,
Which alights in the garden and eats water chestnuts.
But it ends up being apprehended by ‘The Three Bonds,’
And taken to be presented to an assistant prefect.

From up in the sky there flies down a turtledove,
Which alights in the garden and eats a pomegranate.
But it ends up being apprehended by a red foursome,
And taken to be presented to a noble marquis.

From up in the sky there flies down a golden pheasant,
Which alights in the garden and eats bitter bamboo.
But it ends up being apprehended by the Five Peaks,
And taken to be presented to an imperial minister.

From up in the sky there flies down a pelican,
Which alights in the garden and eats an apple.
But it ends up being apprehended by the six spots,
And taken to be presented to a record keeper.”

When he had finished with his game, it was the turn of Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“I’ll just make four throws,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “and if any of them correspond to the numbers in any line of the following quatrain, I’ll drink a penalty cup

All six mouths convey a single touch of glowing sunset clouds,
Not to mention the colors of spring displayed by plum blossoms.
I elect to embrace red Hung-niang and give her a kiss,
Leaving the double-named Ying-ying to grieve by herself.”

When he recited the line about the red Hung-niang, sure enough he threw a red four.

When Ying Po-chüeh saw this, he said, “Brother, this coming winter you are bound to be promoted to a higher office. This throw of a lucky red four indicates an impending cause for celebration.”

Thereupon, he poured out a large cup of wine and gave it to Hsi-men Ch’ing to drink, while, at the same time, summoning the three boy actors, Li Ming and company, to play and sing for their entertainment in honor of the occasion. The party continued until the late watches of the night before breaking up.

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw the boy actors off and then looked on as the servants cleared things away. He gave directions that Han Tao-kuo, Kan Jun, Ts'ui Pen, and Lai-pao should take turns staying overnight in the newly opened shop, and he admonished them to be careful who they let into the house, after which, he returned to his own residence across the street. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

To resume our story, the next day Ying Po-ch'üeh brought Li Chih and Huang the Fourth with him to turn over some of the silver they owed Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"On this occasion," they reported, "we only received a payment from the authorities of one thousand four hundred and fifty or sixty taels, which is not enough to meet all our obligations. So we have only been able to set aside these three hundred fifty taels of silver toward the payment of our debt to Your Honor. When we receive the next payment from the authorities, we should be able to pay off what is left of our obligation to you and will not dare to be remiss."

Ying Po-ch'üeh, from the sidelines, also put in a good word on their behalf. Hsi-men Ch'ing accordingly took the proffered silver and directed Ch'en Ching-chi to bring the steelyard and weigh it out properly, after which he sent Li Chih and Huang the Fourth on their way. The silver remained lying on the table.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then said to Ying Po-ch'üeh, "Brother Ch'ang the Second tells me that he has found the house he has been looking for, consisting of four rooms in all, front and back, and that the owner is willing to sell it for only thirty-five taels of silver.³⁰ When he came to speak to me about it, it happened to be just the time when I learned that the illness of my little boy was at a crisis stage, and I was too flustered to deal with it and sent him away. I don't know whether he has mentioned this to you or not."

"He did speak to me about it," said Ying Po-ch'üeh, "and I said to him, 'You approached him at a bad time. His son was in critical condition, and he was all flustered about it. How could he have spared the attention to listen to what you had to say? You ought to hold the owner off until I have a chance to speak to our elder brother about it.'"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he said, "That's all right then. You have something to eat, and then I'll entrust you with a sealed packet of fifty taels of silver. Today is an auspicious day for an undertaking of this kind. You can take this money and go with him to close the deal on the house, and tell him to use what is left over to open a limited-capital business in the front of his new house. The income he can realize every month ought to be enough for the two of them to get by on."

"This is a case of Brother's condescending to help him out in a scrape," said Ying Po-ch'üeh.

Before long, a table was set up, and a meal was laid out upon it.

Hsi-men Ch'ing partook of the repast with him and then said, "I won't detain you any longer. You can take the silver, and take care of this job for me."

"You ought to depute one of your servants to accompany me in delivering this silver," said Ying Po-ch'üeh.

"Don't talk such rot!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All you have to do is put it in your sleeve and get on with it."

"It's not that," said Ying Po-ch'üeh. "It's just that today I've got another little obligation to take care of. The fact of the matter is, Brother, that today is the birthday of my cousin Tu the Third, and when I sent a present to him this morning, he sent a servant back to invite me over for a visit this afternoon. So I won't be able to report back to you on the completion of my errand. If you send a servant to accompany me, after the deal on the house is closed, I can send him back to report to you."

When he had finished explaining the situation, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "In that case, I'll have Wang Ching go with you."

He then summoned Wang Ching, and he set out with Ying Po-ch'üeh for the home of Ch'ang Shih-chieh. Ch'ang Shih-chieh was at home, and when he saw that Ying Po-ch'üeh had come, he invited him to come in and have a seat.

Ying Po-ch'üeh accordingly brought out the silver and showed it to Ch'ang Shih-chieh, saying, "His Honor, thus and thus, asked me to go with you today in order to close the deal on your house. But I don't have much free time because I've been invited for a drink by my cousin Tu the Third. Right now, as soon as I've finished with this business of yours, I'll have to go. That's why His Honor's servant has come with me. Once the deal on the house is concluded, I won't be able to report back to His Honor, but his servant will be able to report back to him instead."

"Quick. Bring some tea," Ch'ang Shih-chieh called out to his wife, and then he remarked, "Who could there be as magnanimous as our elder brother?"

As soon as they had finished their tea, he contacted the housing agent, and they set out together for New Market Street to weigh out the silver for the seller of the house, and draw up the deed of ownership. Ying Po-ch'üeh then told Wang Ching to take the deed and go home and show it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, and he confirmed to Ch'ang Shih-chieh that he was authorized to hold on to the remaining silver. Having done so, he took leave of Ch'ang Shih-chieh and went off to his engagement at the home of Tu the Third. When Hsi-men Ch'ing had looked over the deed for the house, he sent Wang Ching to give it back to Ch'ang Shih-chieh to keep. But no more of this. Truly:

If you seek help from someone, you must do it from a man of mettle;

If you want to help someone, you must do it when he needs it the most.³¹

Everything else among the myriad possibilities must be adjudged inferior;³²

But who is there who understands that secret acts of virtue are the best?

Truly:

The three luminaries cast shadows, but who can catch them;

The ten thousand things have no roots, they just arise of themselves.³³

Chapter 61

HAN TAO-KUO PREPARES AN ENTERTAINMENT FOR HSI-MEN CH'ING; LI P'ING-ERH PAINFULLY OBSERVES THE DOUBLE YANG FESTIVAL

Last year on the Double Yang Festival
my sorrow knew no limit;
When the memory arises in my mind I am ever more brokenhearted.
The autumn colors and the setting sun are both pallid and wan;
My tear-traces and my lonely thoughts are equally desolating.
The migrating geese fly in formation
but bear me no letter;
The yellow chrysanthemums lack feeling but are still fragrant.
I am all too aware that recently I have become quite emaciated;
And often gaze into the phoenix mirror to examine my features.¹

THE STORY GOES that one day in the evening, when Han Tao-kuo's job in the silk goods store was over, he went home and slept until the middle of the night, when his wife, Wang Liu-erh, opened a discussion with him.

"You and I have been patronized by him," she said. "And, on this occasion, we have made so much money out of it. Don't you think we should throw a party and invite him over for a visit? Not to mention the fact that he has just lost a child, and we ought to help him recover from his depression; it will hardly cost us a great deal to entertain him for half a day. Not only will it put us on a better footing with him, but our young employee, who will probably be headed south any day now, will observe that we are on more intimate terms with our employer than anyone else."

"I've been thinking along the same lines," said Han Tao-kuo. "Tomorrow is the fifth, which is an unlucky day.² But on the sixth we can hire a cook to prepare a feast, and engage the services of two singing girls. If we write out a formal invitation, I can go to his residence to deliver it in person, and invite His Honor to come for a visit and let us help him dispel his melancholy. In the evening I'll go to spend the night in the shop."

"What's the point of engaging any singing girls for no good reason?" said Wang Liu-erh. "I'm afraid, after he's had something to drink, he may want to come into this room here for a visit, and they'll be in the way. There's a girl named Second Sister Shen who frequents the house of Yüeh the Third next door. She's a young woman, dresses stylishly, and can sing the songs that are popular these days. We ought to arrange for her to come sing for us. Then, in the evening, when the drinking is over, if His Honor comes back into this room, I can simply send her next door."

"That's a good suggestion," said Han Tao-kuo.

Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, Han Tao-kuo went to the shop, where he asked Licentiate Wen Pi-ku to write out an invitation for him, and then went across the street to see Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After greeting him with a bow, he said, "If Your Honor doesn't have any other engagements tomorrow, we've prepared a cup of watery wine at our place and would like to invite Your Honor, if you have nothing else to do, to deign to visit with us for a while in the hope of dissipating your melancholy."

He then handed the invitation to him.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had read it, he said, "Why should you have put yourself to so much trouble? It happens that I have no other engagements tomorrow, so, after I come back from the yamen, I'll come to your place."

Han Tao-kuo took leave of him and went out the gate and over to the shop, where he carried on his business as usual.

The next morning, he took out some silver, gave it to his young employee, Hu Hsiu, and told him to take a basket and go out onto the street to buy some chicken feet, goose and duck, fresh fish, and other comestibles appropriate for a drinking party; and engaged a cook to take care of preparing the food in his home. He also sent a page boy ahead of time to hire a sedan chair and go to fetch Second Sister Shen. Wang Liu-erh, for her part, along with her maidservants, prepared a supply of:

Fine tea and fine water, swept out the parlor, dusted the chairs and tables, and awaited Hsi-men Ch'ing's arrival.

She waited until the afternoon, when Ch'in-t'ung came to deliver a jug of grape wine. Only after that did Hsi-men Ch'ing show up, riding in an open sedan chair, accompanied by Tai-an and Wang Ching. When he arrived at the door and alighted from his sedan chair, he was wearing a "loyal and tranquil hat"³ on his head, a long gown of jet moiré, and white-soled boots.

Han Tao-kuo ushered him into the parlor and, after exchanging the customary amenities, said, "We are most grateful to Your Honor for the wine you have bestowed upon us."

At the upper end of the room there was placed a single folding chair, upon which Hsi-men Ch'ing took his seat.

Before long, Wang Liu-erh came out, dressed in formal attire. On her head she wore a fret of silver filigree and a kingfisher blue crepe headband with purpled gold-spangled edging, held in place all around with gold-encrusted cricket-shaped stickpins. She was wearing a white blouse of Hang-chou chiffon that opened down the middle, with a vest of jade-colored moiré, over a gosling-yellow drawnwork skirt. On her feet she wore shoes of raven-black iridescent silk with high heels and gold-spangled toes. From her ears dangled a pair of clove-shaped pendant earrings. It was evident that she had taken pains to adorn herself as elegantly as possible.

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder, she kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing four times and then went back to the rear of the house to see to the tea.

Before long, Wang Ching came out carrying two teacups in raised saucers of red lacquer with gold tracery, containing tea steeped with osmanthus and cured green soybeans, further enhanced with eight precious ingredients. Han Tao-kuo first took one of the cups and, raising it up respectfully, presented it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, after which he took the other cup for himself and sat down to one side in order to keep him company. When they had finished drinking it, Wang Ching came in and took away the teacups.

Han Tao-kuo then initiated the conversation by saying, "Thanks to Your Honor's patronage:

My obligations to you are so great, they cannot be described. I have been away from home for some time, during which you have favored my insignificant wife with your attentions and promoted Wang Ching to the position of a servant in your household.

My gratitude for your kindness is not shallow.⁴

Today, in consultation with my wife, although we have nothing adequate to express our filial respect, we have prepared a cup of watery wine and invited Your Honor for a visit. The other day, when our little brother passed away, although I was able to be there, my wife, because she was suffering from a cold, was unable to come to your residence to offer her condolences and feared that you might be annoyed with us. Today we have invited you over in the hope that we may be able to help dispel your grief, on the one hand, and that you may forgive our negligence, on the other."

"It doesn't amount to anything," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I fear I've put the two of you to a lot of trouble."

As he spoke, what should he see but Wang Liu-erh, who sat down on a low stool by his side and, turning to Han Tao-kuo, said, "Have you mentioned it to His Honor, or not?"

"No, I haven't mentioned it to him yet," said Han Tao-kuo.

"What is it?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"He thought that today we should engage the services of two girls from the licensed quarter to entertain Your Honor," she explained. "But we were afraid that Your Honor might not find them satisfactory, so we didn't venture to do so. However, there is a girl surnamed Shen, who goes by the name Second Sister Shen, who frequents the house of Yüeh the Third next door. Her repertory includes every kind of currently popular song, both long and short, and she can even perform shu-lo, or recitatives.⁵ When I visited your residence on a former occasion, I had a chance to hear that performer named Big Sister Yü, but her singing was only mediocre, not as good as that of Second Sister Shen. For that reason, I've invited her to come sing for Your Honor today, but I don't know what you may think of the idea. If she meets with your approval, you can engage her to come to your residence and entertain your womenfolk. She is constantly busy performing at various houses, so if you wish to engage her services, you should do so several days in advance, and she will not presume to let you down."

"Since you've engaged the girl, that's fine," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Ask her to come out, so I can have a look at her."

At this juncture, Han Tao-kuo said to Tai-an, "Why don't you go over and help His Honor off with his formal clothes."

Meanwhile, a table was set up for their repast, and Hu Hsiu brought in the appetizers to go with their wine, which consisted of preserved duck, dried shrimp, seafood, spareribs, and the like.

Thereupon, Wang Liu-erh, who had opened the wine and heated it, stood to one side with flagon in hand, while Han Tao-kuo first proffered a cup to Hsi-men Ch'ing and then sat down to preside over the feast. Only after this was Second Sister Shen summoned into their presence.

Hsi-men Ch'ing opened his eyes wide and took a good look at her.

Her cloudy locks were enclosed in a lofty chignon,⁶

Held in place with a modest selection of ornaments,

And an inconspicuous display of combs and hairpins.

Underneath her green blouse and crimson skirt,

Appeared the upturned points of her golden lotuses;

Atop her peach-colored cheeks and painted face,

There were depicted a pair of delicate spring peaks.

A pair of lapis lazuli pendant earrings dangled beneath her ears;
Silver teeth, as white as glutinous rice,
gleamed between her lips.

Facing in his direction:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze,
she kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing four times.

"Please stand up," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "May I ask how old you are at present?"

"I'm twenty years old," said Second Sister Shen.

"And how many songs are there in your repertory?" he went on to ask.

"I have committed to memory any number of songs and song suites," replied Second Sister Shen.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then directed Han Tao-kuo to provide her with a seat at their side. Second Sister Shen came forward and bowed once again before venturing to sit down.

She started out by taking up her psaltery and performing the song suite that begins with the tune "Decorous and Pretty," the first line of which is:

Just now I was enjoying myself in the Autumn Fragrance Pavilion.⁷

When she had finished, a course of soup and rice was consumed and was replaced with another course, whereupon she went on to perform the song suite that begins with the tune "Powdery Butterflies," the first line of which is:

Five thousand rebel troops.⁸

By the time she finished, the wine had run out, and Hsi-men Ch'ing directed a servant to take away her psaltery and hand her the p'i-p'a, saying, "Have her sing a few current popular songs for me."

Second Sister Shen, who was only too happy to show off the fact that she was:

A practiced performer and an accomplished singer,
thereupon:

Lightly flaunted her silken sleeves,
Gently strummed the silken strings,

and:

Commencing to sing in full voice, with her instrument tuned to a low pitch, performed a song to a medley version of the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope":

For some time now,
I have not met my lover face-to-face.
My innermost feelings,
Are hard to deliver, hard to transmit.
But, in my heart, I sincerely yearn for you.
On my account, you are totally preoccupied.
In our relations with each other,
We make no distinctions between us.⁹
Our promises to be as faithful as the hills and seas,
Are fixed firmly in our minds.
You are just like a reincarnation of Ts'ui Ying-ying.¹⁰
But, unfortunately, I am not in that temple in P'u-tung.¹¹
I could not help myself after once having caught sight of your amorous glance.
Come!
Your jade features evoke an air of spring.
Your flowery countenance is beyond compare.
Once having heard the sound of your seductive voice,
I try to penetrate the eastern wall with my gaze,
And tire of loitering in the western bower.

To the same tune:

As for my loved one,
The two of us are totally preoccupied.
What obsesses me is that we are unable,
To exchange looks with eyes and eyebrows.
Once you departed, I have only my lonely pillow.
The pillow is cold, the coverlet remains;
Alone I confront my jasper-inlaid zither.
My sick body is like a stick of kindling,¹²
My waist has become emaciated.
I realize that it is difficult for you to leave your mother's side,

But this waiting only makes my heart feel the more inebriated.
I am all on tenterhooks as I keep company with this unfeeling lamp.
Come!
On hearing the sound of the wind rustling the bamboo,
I assume that my loved one has come,
And hastily step out of my study.
But it is only the gentle swaying of the flower shadows,¹³
In the moonlight that is as limpid as water.¹⁴

When she had finished singing these two songs to the tune “Sheep on the Mountain Slope,” there was a call for something to drink, and Han Tao-kuo asked his wife to prepare some more wine.

After filling a cup to the brim and offering it to Hsi-men Ch’ing, he then went on to say, “Second Sister Shen, you know some more good songs to the tune ‘Shrouding the Southern Branch.’ Why don’t you sing a couple of them for His Honor?”

Second Sister Shen then switched modes and sang a song to the tune “Shrouding the Southern Branch”:

When we first met,
That girl of my dreams,
Was in the springtime of her youth,
no more than twenty.
Her raven locks took shape as two black clouds;
Fragrant red defined a single daub of ruby lips.¹⁵
Her cheeks were like glowing peaches or tender bamboo shoots.
If she had been born into painted bowers or orchid-scented halls,¹⁶
She would surely have been fated to be a lady.
Alas, she has ended up in the licensed quarter,
Serving in a low-grade occupation.
If she were only able to marry out of her profession,
It would certainly be better than abandoning the old to welcome the new.¹⁷

To the same tune:

When we first met,
That captivating wench,
With her moonlike face and flowerlike countenance,¹⁸ was a rare commodity in the demimonde.
The handful of her slender waist deserved a painting;
Her clever disposition was altogether inimitable.
My only regret is that I did not meet her sooner.
My only wish is that at the festive board,
before the flowing cup,
We might sip wine and croon softly,¹⁹ locked in each others’ arms;
Each glance conveying true devotion,
Every look satisfying our hunger.
Though it should provide but half a moment of gratification,
It would suffice to dissipate melancholy and dispel sorrow.

As Hsi-men Ch’ing listened to these two songs to the tune “Shrouding the Southern Branch,” he was reminded of his first visit to Cheng Ai-yüeh, and his heart was filled with delight. He was also impressed by the fact that his hosts had engaged a performer who understood music so well.

Wang Liu-erh, standing at his side, filled another cup of wine to the brim and offered it to him with an ingratiating smile, saying, “Father, enjoy the wine at your leisure. This sample of what Second Sister Shen can do is just a drop in the bucket. She knows a great many more songs than this. In the future, when you have the time, you can send a sedan chair for her, and let her entertain your womenfolk.”

She then went on to say, “As for that singer that I’ve run into at your residence?”

“That would be Big Sister Yü,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “She has been performing at my place for quite some years now.”

“I guarantee,” pronounced Wang Liu-erh, “that if Second Sister Shen were to sing at your place, she would be certain to outperform her. Father, if you wish to engage her services at some future date, let me know beforehand, and I can send a servant to pick her up with a sedan chair and deliver her to your residence.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing then said, “Second Sister Shen, if I were to send someone for you on the Double Yang Festival, would you be able to come or not?”

“Your Honor,” said Second Sister Shen, “how can you talk that way? You have but to call for me, and I would hardly dare to turn you down.”

When Hsi-men Ch’ing saw that she had a way with words, he was utterly delighted.

Not long afterwards, while they were:

Exchanging cups as they drank,

Wang Liu-erh began to feel that they were not able to express themselves freely in her presence, so, after having her perform several more song suites, she quietly said to Han Tao-kuo, "Get our servant Chao-ti to escort her over to Yüeh the Third's place for the night."

As she was about to go, and respectfully took her leave of Hsi-men Ch'ing, he groped a packet containing three mace of silver out of his sleeve and gave it to her with which to buy replacement strings for her instruments. Second Sister Shen hastily responded:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze, by kowtowing to him in order to express her gratitude.

Hsi-men Ch'ing reminded her of their agreement, saying, "On the eighth, I'll send someone to fetch you."

"Father," said Wang Liu-erh, "just send Wang Ching to speak to me about it, and I'll send my servant after her."

Second Sister Shen then bade farewell to Han Tao-kuo and his wife and, with Chao-ti escorting her, went next door. When Han Tao-kuo had seen Second Sister Shen on her way, and informed his wife of the fact, he went off himself to spend the night at the shop, leaving his wife to keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company.

When they had played dice and continued drinking for a while, they began to hunger after each other. Hsi-men Ch'ing, on the pretext of the need to relieve himself, went into the woman's bedroom, where the two of them proceeded to lock the door and enjoy themselves. Wang Ching, thereupon, took the lamps and candles out to the side room in the front courtyard, where he fell to drinking with Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung.

Meanwhile, at some point in the evening, the young man, Hu Hsiu, had gone back to the kitchen and stolen a few cups too many of wine. After the hired cook had been dismissed, he went into the anteroom for the display of Buddhist effigies and ancestral tablets that was adjacent to Wang Liu-erh's bedroom, put a mat down on the floor, and went to sleep. After sleeping there for a while, he got back to his feet.

It so happened that there was only a board partition between the room where he was and the bedroom next door. All of a sudden, he heard the woman in the other room making a commotion. Hu Hsiu noticed that there was lamplight visible through a crack in the partition and assumed that Hsi-men Ch'ing had left, and that Han Tao-kuo was in the bedroom sleeping with his wife. Surreptitiously extracting a hairpin from his head, he used it to poke a hole in the paper that had been pasted over the crack and proceeded to peek through it. He saw that the other room was brightly lit with lamps and candles, and that, unexpectedly, it was Hsi-men Ch'ing who was there with the woman, and that they were just in the thick of things.

Clearly and distinctly,²⁰

he could see that the woman's two legs were suspended by her foot bindings from the top of the bed, and that Hsi-men Ch'ing was wearing only a satin jacket on the upper part of his body, while the lower part was completely exposed. The two of them were busy on the edge of the bed, where:

One comes, the other goes;

One moves, the other rests.²¹

As he slammed away at her:

The reiterated sounds reverberated loudly.

Everything conceivable in the way of:

Obscene noises and lascivious words,²² issued from her mouth as the two of them struggled to make themselves one.

After a while, he heard the woman say, "My own daddy! If you want to burn moxa on this whore of yours, you can burn me wherever you like. This whore of yours would not presume to stop you. After all, the body of this whore of yours is yours to command. What is there to worry about?"

"My only fear is that your husband might object," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"That cuckold!" the woman said. "How could he muster the:

Seven heads and eight galls, to object to anything you did? Who does he depend on for his livelihood, after all?"

"Since you're so irrevocably committed to me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "after I've made enough silver off the existing consignment of goods, I'll send him, along with Lai-pao, for a long sojourn in the south, where he can set up an office and act as my purchasing agent. I've got Manager Kan Jun here at home to take care of sales, so all I lack is a buyer to take charge of acquiring the merchandise at that end."

"After he's come back from this second trip of his," said the woman, "send him off again by all means. What's the point of keeping him idle at home? He says himself that he's habituated to being away from home and would be happy to go on the road. He's been acquainted with life on the rivers and lakes since his childhood, and there's little he doesn't know about business and merchandising. If you choose to patronize him, that would be just fine. And when he returns, I'll find another bedmate for him. I don't need him anymore now that I've committed myself completely to you. You can stick him anywhere you want as far as I'm concerned. If anything I say is false, may the worthless body of this whore of yours rot completely away!"

"My child," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "there's no need for you to swear oaths like that."

Who would have thought that every last thing that occurred between the two of them was so clearly overheard by Hu Hsiu that he might well have ejaculated:

"Is it not delightful?"

Earlier that evening, while Han Tao-kuo was still at home, he had been unable to find Hu Hsiu and assumed that he had gone to the shop to sleep. When he arrived at the silk goods store and asked about it, the young employees, Wang Hsien and Jung Hai, said that he had not come there. Han Tao-kuo, thereupon, returned home, called for someone to open the door, and looked everywhere for Hu Hsiu, without finding him, though he noticed that Wang Ching was drinking with Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung in the front courtyard. When Hu Hsiu, recognizing his voice, realized that he had come home, he hastily lay down again on the mat and pretended to be asleep. In due course, Han Tao-kuo, having lit a lamp and made his way into the Buddhist chapel, found Hu Hsiu lying on the floor, where he was snoring loudly through his nostrils.

Kicking him awake with his foot, he cursed him, saying, "You lousy wild dog of a condemned jailbird! Why aren't you up and about? I assumed that you had already gone to the shop to sleep, but it turns out that you were here all the time, happily sacked out. Get up, and come along with me."

Hu Hsiu, thereupon, got to his feet, made a show of rubbing his eyes, and pretended to be stupefied with drink as he followed Han Tao-kuo back to the shop.

Meanwhile, Hsi-men Ch'ing's bout with the woman continued for nearly two hours before coming to a conclusion. In the process, he burnt moxa on the middle of Wang Liu-erh's chest, the top of her mons veneris, and her tail-bone, three places in all.²³ The woman finally got up, put on her clothes, called for a maidservant to dish up some water, and washed her hands. Thereupon:

More warmed wine was served, and Further dainties were provided, as they continued to engage each other in flirtatious conversation.

Only after drinking a few more cups of wine did Hsi-men Ch'ing mount his horse and set off for home, attended by Tai-an, Wang Ching, and Ch'in-t'ung. By the time they arrived, it was already the second watch of the night, and Hsi-men Ch'ing went into Li P'ing-erh's quarters.

Li P'ing-erh was lying in her bed, and when she saw how drunk he was when he came in, she asked him, "Whose place have you been drinking at today?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing explained at length how, "Han Tao-kuo and his wife invited me to their place out of a desire to help dispel my depression over the loss of our child. With this end in view, they engaged the services of a professional female singer named Second Sister Shen, who's still a young woman, and really knows how to sing. In fact, she's better than Big Sister Yü. Tomorrow, on the eve of the Double Yang Festival, I'm going to send a servant with a sedan chair to bring her here so she can sing for all of you for a day or two, and help relieve your depression. Even though you may remain heartsick about it, you oughtn't to let it preoccupy your attention to such an extent."

When he had finished speaking, he wanted to call for Ying-ch'un to help him off with his clothes so he could sleep with Li P'ing-erh, but she said, "Don't you suggest any such thing. I am hemorrhaging all the time down below, and my maidservant is engaged in preparing my medicine over the fire. You go and spend the night in someone else's room. Haven't you noticed what a fine state I'm in all day long? I've hardly got a breath of life left in me, and you still want to pester me this way."

"My darling," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I can't do without you. What would you have me do?"

Li P'ing-erh gave him a sidelong glance and laughed, saying, "Who would believe that:

Specious mouth and throwaway tongue, of yours? Do you expect me to believe that when I die in the near future, you won't be able to do without me?"

"In any case," she went on to say, "you can wait until I'm feeling better before coming to spend the night with me. It won't be any too late then."

After sitting with her a while longer, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "That's enough of that! Since you don't want me to stay here, I'll go over and spend the night with P'an the Sixth."

Hsi-men Ch'ing While Drunk Burns Moxa on a Mons Veneris

"That's right," said Li P'ing-erh, "you go ahead and do that! It will spare you the need to sacrifice your desires. After all, she's burning up waiting for you over there, like:

A fire within a fire.²⁴

Why should you neglect her by insisting upon barging into my place to pester me?"

"If that's the way you're going to talk about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I won't go."

"I was only kidding," said Li P'ing-erh with a smile. "You go ahead and go."

With that, she succeeded in sending Hsi-men Ch'ing on his way.

Li P'ing-erh then got up and sat on the edge of the bed, while Ying-ch'un helped her to take her medicine. As she took up the medicine, she couldn't prevent a cascade of tears from pouring, with a gush, over her fragrant cheeks, and she gave vent to a long sigh before downing the cup of medicine. Truly:

The unlimited tribulations that produced the sorrow in her heart,²⁵

Were all turned over to the yellow oriole to express in its cries.

We will say no more, at present, about how Li P'ing-erh took her medicine and lay down to sleep, but return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing. When he arrived at the quarters of P'an Chin-lien, she had just told Ch'un-mei to cover the lamp and had gotten into bed to go to sleep.

Unexpectedly, Hsi-men Ch'ing pushed open the door and came in, saying, "My child, I see you've already gone to bed."

"Well, what a surprise!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "What wind has blown you into this room of mine?"

"And whose place have you been drinking at today?" she went on to ask.

"Manager Han Tao-kuo," Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "upon coming back from his trip to the South, and seeing that I had lost my child, on the one hand, in order to help relieve my depression, and, on the other hand, to express his gratitude for my patronage in sending him on this expedition, invited me over to his place for a visit."

"While he was abroad," remarked Chin-lien, "you certainly took advantage of the opportunity to patronize his wife."

"You're talking about the household of my own manager," protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "How could there be any such thing?"

"Where the household of an employee is concerned," pronounced Chin-lien, "there could well be just such a thing. I suppose you've kept a cord wrapped around your waist, lest you might be tempted to violate that boundary! You think you can be up to your tricks, while keeping me in the dark, do you? I know all about it, and I'm fed up with you, to boot. During the celebration of your birthday, that lousy whore showed up here, didn't she? You had surreptitiously slipped her one of Li P'ing-erh's pins in the shape of the character for long life.

You may be a brown cat, but you've got a black tail.

By so doing, you enabled her to wear it here in order to show off where she stood. The First Lady, Meng the Third, and the whole household all noticed it. And when I interrogated her about it, her face turned crimson. Didn't she tell you about it? So today you found your way over there again, did you? Lousy, shameless, good-for-nothing that you are! The painted faces available to you in your own household aren't enough for you, are they? Instead, who knows why, you're taken by that overgrown pumpkin head of a long-faced whore. What with her:

Phony eyebrows and bogus airs,²⁶ her temples adorned with long spit curls, the garish red color with which she daubs her lips, so her mouth looks like nothing so much as a bloody cunt, she's a fine woman indeed, nothing but a lanky, rosewood-complexioned, swarthy whore! I can't imagine what you see in her. No wonder you've taken that cuckold's brother-in-law, Wang Ching, under your wing, so you can use him to carry messages back and forth between you, early or late."

Hsi-men Ch'ing adamantly refused to acknowledge anything, but simply laughed, saying, "You crazy little slave! All you do is talk nonsense. How could any such thing have occurred? Today it was her husband who entertained me. She didn't even put in an appearance."

"You think you can fool me with that sort of talk, do you?" the woman said. "Who doesn't know that her husband is an open cuckold:

Grazing sheep on the one hand, while

Gathering kindling on the other?

He's simply turning his wife over to you as a means of getting a hand on your business and making money for himself out of it. You simpleminded good-for-nothing! You might just as well be:

Listening for the report of a blunderbuss being fired forty li away."

Upon noticing that Hsi-men Ch'ing had taken off his outer clothes and was sitting on the edge of the bed, the woman stuck her hand out, pulled open his trousers, and groped out his organ, which was limp and flaccid, and still had a clasp fastened around it.

"There you go again," she said. "You're just like:

A preserved duck that's been put into the pot to stew:

Its body has turned soft, but its beak is as hard as ever.

The mute testimony is there for all to see.²⁷

You ruffian! You've been fooling around with that whore all day before coming home, so that your organ is:

As soft as driveling snot and thick as gravy, yet you remain as hard-mouthed as ever. You can swear all you like. I'll get Ch'un-mei to bring a bottle of cold water, and if you dare drink it, I'll acknowledge that you've got guts. If you stop to consider it:

This salt is just as salty;

This vinegar just as sour.

When a bald man puts a hairnet on his head;

There's no need to brush it any further.

Enough is enough! If one were to believe what you say, you could seduce every woman in the world and get away with it. What a lousy shameless article you are! You're just a big good-for-nothing with too much fire in your eyes. It's a good thing you're a man. If you were a woman, you'd be:

Laid by every man in the street, and Fucked by every guy in the alley.²⁸

You're in the same class as an itinerant shoemaker;

Wherever two hides meet you'll cobble them together."²⁹

These few lines of invective reduced Hsi-men Ch'ing to staring with wide-open eyes, as he made his way onto the bed. He then told Ch'un-mei to heat some distilled spirits for him, took a pill out of his cylindrical gold pillbox, put it in his mouth, and swallowed it.

Lying face up on the pillow, he then said to the woman, "My child, get down on your knees and suck your daddy off. If you can get it to stand up, it will be your good fortune."

The woman made a show of distaste, saying, "That filthy thing! You've been boring into that whore's hole with it, and now you want me to suck it off for you. That really shows how much you care for me!"

"You crazy little whore!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All you ever do is talk nonsense. I never did any such thing."

"If you never did any such thing," the woman said, "you'll have to swear an oath on that fleshy body of yours before you can get me to believe it."

After bantering back and forth for a while, she tried to get Hsi-men Ch'ing to get out of bed and wash himself off with water, but he refused to get out of bed. The woman then pulled a figured handkerchief out of her sleeve and proceeded to wipe his organ off with it before engulfing it with her ruby lips and sucking it audibly for some time. In no time at all, she had manipulated it until:

Its protuberances swelled and its head sprang up, as it became engorged with rage.

He then positioned himself astride the woman's body and allowed his jade chowrie handle to penetrate her vagina from the rear, while he lifted up her thighs with his two hands, assumed a squatting position, and went to work. As he gave himself over to slamming away at her:

The reiterated sounds reverberated loudly;

In the light cast by the lamp,³⁰

He savored the sight as it went in and out.

The woman knelt by the pillow side and raised her hips in response to his movements for some time. Hsi-men Ch'ing's ardor was still unslaked, so he had the woman turn over and face upwards, while he applied some of the pink aphrodisiac ointment to his organ, and plunged back into her. Taking her pair of feet in his hands, he arched his back and alternately submerged and exposed the knob of his glans, lifting her body into the air as he rammed away at her two or three hundred times.

The woman, finding his assault difficult to withstand, closed her eyes and cried out inarticulately in a trembling voice, "Daddy! On this occasion you'd better take it easy with me. You had no need to use that aphrodisiac."

"You little whore!" Hsi-men Ch'ing blurted out at her. "Are you afraid of me, or not? Will you ever dare to treat me so disrespectfully again?"

"My own daddy!" the woman cried out. "That's enough. If you'll only be a little easier on me, I'll never dare offend you again. Daddy, slow down a bit. You're mussing my hairdo."

The two of them:

Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes, for half the night before tiring out and going to sleep.

To make a long story short, it was not long before the time came for the celebration of the Double Yang Festival.

Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Wu Yüeh-niang, "When Manager Han Tao-kuo invited me to his place the other day, we were entertained by a singer named Second Sister Shen. She is attractive and knows how to sing, as well as how to perform on both the p'i-p'a and the psaltery. I've sent a page boy to fetch her, and when she arrives, I propose that we keep her here for two days, so she can entertain the lot of you."

Thereupon, he ordered that the kitchen staff should prepare the appropriate wine, fruit, and other delicacies, and that in the great summerhouse in the garden, the Hall of Assembled Vistas, a large Eight Immortals table should be set up, and the bamboo blinds let down, so that the entire family could enjoy a feast there, in celebration of the Double Yang Festival.

It was not long before Wang Ching arrived, escorting Second Sister Shen in a sedan chair, and she was ushered into the rear compound, where she kowtowed to Yüeh-niang and the other ladies. Yüeh-niang saw that she was young, and good-looking, and, upon inquiry, was told that she was not able to perform too many song suites, but that when it came to the various kinds of independent songs, such as those to the tunes "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" and "Shrouding the Southern Branch," or recitatives, she could perform a fair number. After she had been provided with tea and something to eat, she sang two song suites for them in the rear compound, after which they adjourned to the garden, where the feast had been prepared.

That day, Hsi-men Ch'ing did not go to the yamen but stayed at home in order to supervise the planting of chrysanthemums. Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Sun Hsüeh-o, as well as Hsi-men Ta-chieh, were all invited to take their places at the table, while Ch'un-mei, Yü-hsiao, Ying-ch'un, and Lan-hsiang stood in attendance at their side to serve the wine. Second Sister Shen also stood by with her p'i-p'a to entertain them. Li P'ing-erh was in her quarters, feeling poorly in her present condition, and had to be asked repeatedly before she made a belated appearance, looking for all the world like a tree that had been felled by the wind. It cost her a considerable effort to pull herself together sufficiently to come out and sit down by Hsi-men Ch'ing. Everyone urged her to drink, but she hardly drank anything at all.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Yüeh-niang, noticing that:

Her face exhibited a worried hue, and

Her eyebrows remained contracted,³¹ said to her, "Sister Li, see if you can't relax. We'll have Second Sister Shen sing a song for you."

"Tell her what song you'd like to hear," said Meng Yü-lou, "so she can sing it for you."

But Li P'ing-erh remained adamantly silent.

As they were drinking, Wang Ching suddenly came in, and said, "Master Ying the Second and Uncle Ch'ang the Second have come."

"Invite Ying the Second and Ch'ang the Second to have a seat in the small summerhouse," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll be there directly."

"Uncle Ch'ang the Second has had a porter deliver two gift boxes, which are sitting outside," reported Wang Ching.

Hsi-men Ch'ing turned to Yüeh-niang and said, "These presents must be intended to express his gratitude for my help in closing the deal on that new house of his."

"We'll have to prepare something for their entertainment," said Yüeh-niang. "We can't let them go without an appropriate response. You go keep them company, while I arrange here to have some refreshments prepared for them."

Before leaving, Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Second Sister Shen, "Whatever you do, see that you sing a good song for the benefit of the Sixth Lady."

He then went straight out toward the front compound.

"I've never seen anything like it," Chin-lien said to Li P'ing-erh. "Why don't you simply mention any song you like so Second Sister Shen can sing it for you? You're disregarding Father's intentions. He invited her here on your account, and you won't even say what you'd like to hear."

At this point, Li P'ing-erh felt pressured to such an extent that she was compelled to comply and, after considering for some time, finally said, "Why don't you sing that song suite that begins with the words:

The purple roads and red lanes,

for us."

"That's no problem," responded Second Sister Shen, "I know it."

Thereupon, picking up her psaltery, she:

Adjusted the bridges ranged like wild geese,

Retuned the icy strings,

and:

Commencing to sing in full voice, performed the song suite that begins with the tune "A Variation on A Sprig of Flowers":

The purple roads and red lanes,
Would be hard for even an expert painter³² to successfully depict.
Eye-catching luxuriance is spread before me like a brocade carpet.
It is as though spring is out of tune with me;
It is not I that am out of tune with spring.
Simply on account of that one I've set my heart on,
When I survey the scene it only augments my sorrow.

To the tune "Wen-chou Song":

The blossoms lie scattered,
The willows are umbrageous,
The butterflies are jaded, the bees bemused, and the orioles tired of singing.
On first waking up,
I had forgotten my longing,
But the relentless twittering of the swallows,
Has stirred up my old resentment,
And only served to reawaken it.
In an endless pitter-patter,³³
My teardrops silently cascade.

To the tune "Spring Fills the Garden":

The tranquil courtyard is secluded;
Unspoken feelings entangle my heart.
The cool pavilions and waterside retreats,³⁴
Are really suitable for feasting and drinking;

Li P'ing-erh While Ill Observes the Double Yang Festival

But I do not see my lover.
 With whom is he sharing a flagon?
 I could resume strumming the silken strings,
 Or choose to pluck the p'î-p'â,
 In order to dispel my melancholy;
 But it seems I am tired of hearing them.³⁵

To the tune "Wen-chou Song":

The pomegranate blossoms are ablaze,
 Like clusters of scarlet brocade.
 Their smokeless flames only succeed in incinerating my heart.
 Bashfully, I move forward,
 Thinking to pluck a blossom,
 But I shilly-shally about wearing it,
 Fearing that my flowery countenance,
 Is no longer what it used to be.
 When I am so lonesome and emaciated,³⁶
 It would not do to stick it in my hair.

To the tune “The Phoenix Tree”:

The leaves of the phoenix tree are flying;
The metallic autumn wind has begun to blow.
As I gradually fall prey to lovesickness,
I feel as though I have fallen into a deep well.
Day after day, the nights grow longer,
But I find it hard to endure my lonely pillow.
Reluctantly I mount the lofty tower,³⁷
In order to watch out for my lover.
It may be that the fickle fellow's heart is out of tune with mine.
Who knows where he may be, where he may be,
Pursuing pleasure and indulging in drink?³⁸

To the tune “Wen-chou Song”:

The chrysanthemums have blossomed,
The cassia flowers lie scattered.
Right now, the dew is chilly, and the wind cold,³⁹ as the autumnal feeling deepens.
Suddenly, outside the window, I hear,
The reiterated cries of a solitary wild goose,
As sorrowful and distressing⁴⁰
as a human lament.
I am most disturbed by the chirping of the crickets,
Under the flowers, beside the steps.
Their constant crick-crick chirp-chirp,⁴¹
Has utterly destroyed my peace of mind.

To the tune “Sands of Silk-washing Creek”:

The wind has grown stronger,
The cold has become frigid.
When lovesick, what one dreads
the most is dusk.
Listless and indifferent,⁴² I confront
my lonely lamp;
Repeatedly scanning the apertures
in the window.
The sound of the bugle is prolonged,
penetrating my ears;
Note after note is like a sob,
difficult to hear.
In my depression, I force myself to pour another cup of wine,
But when it affects my melancholy bosom,
the pearly tears cascade.

To the tune “Wen-chou Song”:

Giving forth long sighs,
Two or three of them,
I lean against the standing screen,
longing for that man.
Single-mindedly, I hope that in my dreams,
We may see each other once again.
In an endless pitter-patter, the snowflakes begin to fall.
The windblown chimes under the eaves,
Intrude upon my dreaming soul;
Their ding-ding dong-dong,
Shatter my peace of mind.

Coda:

On account of my loved one,
My heart is on tenterhooks.
I think of him by day and yearn for him at night,
as my teardrops cascade.
How hateful it is that my talented lover won't even let me see his shadow.⁴³

When the performance was finished, Wu Yüeh-niang said, “Sister Li, why don't you have a cup of this nice sweet wine?”

Li P'ing-erh, who was reluctant to refuse a request from Yüeh-niang, picked up her cup and swallowed a mouthful, before putting it back down again. She made an effort to continue sitting with the rest of the company, but, before long, she felt a surge of hot blood hemorrhaging from her lower body and had to return to her quarters. We will say no more, for the moment, about how the womenfolk entertained themselves, but return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When he arrived at the small summerhouse, the Kingfisher Pavilion, he found that Ying Po-chüeh and Ch'ang Shih-chieh were standing beneath the Juniper Hedge admiring the chrysanthemums. It so happens that, on either side of the Juniper Hedge, there were arranged a total of twenty pots containing famous varieties of chrysanthemums, each of which was more than seven feet high. These included specimens of Great Crimson Robes, Principal Graduate Reds, Purple Robes with Gold Girdles, White Powdered Hsi-shih,⁴⁴ Yellow Powdered Hsi-shih, Skies Full of Stars, Drunken Yang Kuei-fei,⁴⁵ Jade Peonies, Goose Feather Chrysanthemums, Mandarin Duck Chrysanthemums, and the like.⁴⁶

When Hsi-men Ch'ing came out, the two men stepped forward and bowed to him, after which Ch'ang Shih-chieh told the porter to bring in the two gift boxes.

Upon seeing them, Hsi-men Ch'ing asked, "What's all this?"

"Brother Ch'ang the Second," explained Ying Po-chüeh, "out of gratitude for your generosity in enabling him to close the deal on his new house, and having no other way to repay you, has asked his wife to prepare these fresh stuffed crabs, and these two smoked roast ducks, and invited me to join him in paying you a visit."

"Brother Ch'ang the Second," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "what need was there for you to go to all this trouble? Your wife is still recuperating from her illness, and you have placed this additional burden upon her."

"That's exactly what I told him," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but he said that if he presented you with anything else, he feared you might not appreciate it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing told one of his attendants to open the boxes so they could have a look. There were forty large crabs, the shells of which had been scoured out and stuffed with crab meat, coated with a mixture of pepper, ginger, minced garlic, and starch, deep-fried in sesame oil, and flavored with soy sauce and vinegar, which rendered them fragrant and delectable. In addition, there were two oven-smoked ducks from the licensed quarter that had been roasted until they were succulent.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had examined them, he told Ch'un-hung and Wang Ching to take them inside, and to reward the porter with fifty cash. He then expressed his thanks to Ch'ang Shih-chieh, at which point, Ch'in-t'ung lifted aside the portiere and invited them to come into the Kingfisher Pavilion and sit down.

Ying Po-chüeh could not stop lavishing praise upon the chrysanthemums and inquired, "Brother, where did you get them?"

"It was Eunuch Director Liu," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the manager of the Imperial Brickyard, that sent me these twenty pots of chrysanthemums."

"Including the pots?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"Yes, he sent everything to me, including the pots," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"The flowers are nothing out of the ordinary," opined Ying Po-chüeh, "but these pots are double-banded wide-mouthed flowerpots, manufactured from the finest clay in the imperial kilns, and are both long-lasting and water-repellent. They are made from clay that has been strained through silken sieves and kneaded under foot until it becomes a thick paste, just like that used in the firing of the finest quality of bricks in Su-chou.⁴⁷ Where could one go to find articles of this quality these days?"

After Ying Po-chüeh had fulsomely praised them for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered that tea be served and, while they were drinking it, went on to ask, "When is Brother Ch'ang the Second going to move into his new house?"

"He moved in only three days after the silver was paid over," said Ying Po-chüeh. "The previous occupants had already located another place and moved out within two or three days. Yesterday being an auspicious day for such undertakings, he laid in some miscellaneous merchandise and opened his shop for business. Sister-in-law Ch'ang's younger brother is tending the store for him, and keeping track of the silver."

"We must get together soon, and purchase some congratulatory gifts," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "We don't want too many people to be involved. We'll also invite Hsieh Hsi-ta; just the three or four of you. I'll have the refreshments prepared at my place and carried over there, so it won't cost Brother Ch'ang the Second anything at all. I'll engage the services of two singing girls so we can throw a housewarming party for him, and give ourselves over to enjoyment the whole day."

"I thought of inviting you over for a visit," said Ch'ang Shih-chieh, "but, after giving it some thought, did not presume to do so. The place is too cramped, and I feared you might feel imposed upon."

"Don't talk such rot!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "We don't intend to put you to any trouble. I'll send a page boy over right now to invite Hsieh Hsi-ta to join us, so we can tell him about it."

Then, turning to Ch'in-t'ung, he said, "Quickly, go and invite Master Hsieh over here."

"Brother," Ying Po-chüeh went on to ask, "which two singing girls do you plan to engage for this occasion?"

"I'll call upon Cheng Ai-yüeh and Hung the Fourth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing with a laugh. "Hung the Fourth can provide a drumbeat of accompaniment, while Cheng Ai-yüeh sings slow-tempoed songs to the tune 'Sheep on the Mountain Slope.'"

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "what kind of a man are you, that you should have been patronizing Cheng Ai-yüeh without saying a word to me about it? How was I to know? As far as the breeze and the moonlight are concerned, how does she compare to Li Kuei-chieh?"

"Why:

'She's two under full four words!'"⁴⁸ replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Then why is it," said Ying Po-chüeh, "that, the other day, at your birthday party, she had hardly a word to say and pretended to be so demure? She's just a lousy, stiff-necked, sycophantic little whore!"

"When I go to see her again, sometime soon," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll take you along with me. Your mother, Ai-yüeh, can play a good game of backgammon, and you can play a couple of games with her."

"If I go with you," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I'll give that little whore a hard time. You mustn't spoil her."

"You perverted dog!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You'd better not do anything to antagonize her."

As they were speaking, Hsieh Hsi-ta arrived, bowed to the company, and sat down.

"Brother Ch'ang the Second," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing, "thus and so, has acquired a new house for himself and has already moved in, without letting us know anything about it. Each of us ought to contribute something, whatever we can afford, so that it won't cost him anything, and I'll have some refreshments prepared at my place and carried over to his residence by a page boy, and also engage the services of two singing girls, so we can enjoy ourselves for a day. What do you think?"

"Brother," said Hsieh Hsi-ta, "just tell each of us what you think we should come up with, and we'll send it over to your place, that's all there is to it. Who else will be involved?"

"There won't be anyone else," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "just the three or four of us. Two mace of silver apiece ought to suffice."

"If too many people are involved," explained Ying Po-chüeh, "he won't have room for us at his place."

As they were speaking, Ch'in-t'ung came in and reported, "Brother-in-law Wu K'ai has arrived."

"Tell Brother-in-law Wu to come in here and sit down," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Before long Wu K'ai came into the studio, where he first bowed to the other three guests, and then sat down, after exchanging the customary amenities with Hsi-men Ch'ing. A page boy provided another serving of tea, and they drank it together.

Wu K'ai then stood up and said, "May I ask my brother-in-law to accompany me back to the rear compound so I can have a word with him?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly ushered Wu K'ai back to the rear compound, and into Wu Yüeh-niang's parlor. Yüeh-niang herself was still in the summer-house drinking wine and listening to the singing with the other women of the household. When she heard a page boy say that her elder brother had come, and that her husband was chatting with him in the rear compound, she got up and went back to the master suite. Upon seeing her elder brother, she greeted him with a bow and ordered Hsiao-yü to provide a serving of tea.

Wu K'ai pulled ten taels of silver out of his sleeve and handed it to Yüeh-niang, saying, "Yesterday, I received only three ingots of silver from the prefectural office. If my brother-in-law will accept these ten taels of silver for the time being, I will pay back the remainder of what I owe him on another occasion."

"Brother-in-law," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "there is no need to worry about it. Go ahead and spend it. What's the hurry?"

"I feared I might inconvenience my brother-in-law if I delayed," said Wu K'ai.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then went on to ask, "Is the repair work on the granary nearing completion?"

"It will be another month before it is done," said Wu K'ai.

"When the work is finished," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the office of the provincial regional inspector is sure to offer you a reward of some kind."

"This year's evaluation of military personnel is impending," said Wu K'ai. "I hope that my brother-in-law will continue to support me by speaking up on my behalf to the regional inspector."

"As far as that matter is concerned," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can leave it to me."

When their conversation was over, Yüeh-niang said, "Will my elder brother not go back up front for a visit?"

"I'd better go," said Wu K'ai. "I fear those three gentlemen have some business to discuss."

"Not at all," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Brother Ch'ang the Second recently borrowed several taels of silver from me with which to buy a house of modest dimensions. He has already moved into it, and today he has brought some gifts to thank me for my help. In this festival season, I have asked them to stay for a visit. I didn't know that my brother-in-law would turn up, but you've arrived in the nick of time."

Thereupon, he ushered Wu K'ai back to the front compound in order to join the party, and Yüeh-niang promptly told the staff in the kitchen to send the refreshments up front. Ch'in-t'ung and Wang Ching had already finished setting up an Eight Immortals table, and they now brought out the appetizers, nuts, and wine. Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered the storehouse to be opened, and a jug of the chrysanthemum wine that had been given to him by Hsia Yen-ling brought out for them. When they opened it, it turned out to be of a clear beryl-green color and exuded a pungent fragrance. Before straining it, they mixed it with a bottle of cold water, in order to reduce the sharpness of its flavor. After doing so, they poured it through a cheesecloth sieve, and when it had been strained, it turned out to be both mellow and delicious, superior to grape wine in these respects.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had Wang Ching fill a small gold goblet with it and offer it first to Wu K'ai to taste. After this, Ying Po-chüeh and the rest all tasted it:

Expressing the most fulsome admiration.

Before long, in:

Large platters and large bowls,

the appetizers and delicacies were brought in, filling the surface of the table. First there were two platters of steamed, rose-flavored, stuffed, glutinous rice cakes, to be dipped in white granulated sugar. The company made short work of them, grabbing them up while they were still hot. Only after that were the stuffed crabs brought out, along with two platters of roast duck.

Ying Po-chüeh offered a crab to Wu K'ai, and Hsieh Hsi-ta remarked, "I don't know how these were ever done to make them so flavorful, crisp, and delicious."

"They were sent over here from Brother Ch'ang the Second's place," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I have led a futile existence for fifty-one years," said Wu K'ai, "without knowing that crabs could be prepared in such a way. They really are delicious."

"Have our sisters-in-law in the rear compound had a chance to taste them?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"They've all had some," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"It's really put Sister-in-law Ch'ang to the test," remarked Ying Po-chüeh, "to demonstrate such culinary skill."

Ch'ang Shih-chieh laughed at this, saying, "My humble wife was only afraid that she had not made things tasty enough, and that you gentlemen would laugh at her."

When all the crabs had been eaten, the attendants came forward to replenish the wine, and Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ch'un-hung and Shu-t'ung to come up beside them and take turns entertaining them with southern-style songs.

At this point, Ying Po-chüeh suddenly noticed the sound of singing, accompanied by a psaltery, emanating from the great summerhouse and inquired, "Brother, is Li Kuei-chieh here today? If not, who is responsible for this music?"

"You keep listening," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and see if you think it's her, or not."

"If it's not Li Kuei-chieh," said Ying Po-chüeh, "it must be Wu Yin-erh."

"You beggar!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All you ever do is talk blind nonsense. It's actually a professional female singer."

"Is it Big Sister Yü, then?" said Ying Po-chüeh.

"No, it's not her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "This one is called Second Sister Shen. She's young, has a good figure, and really knows how to sing."

"Really," said Ying Po-chüeh. "If she's as good as all that, why don't you drag her out here so we can have a look at her, and get her to sing something for us?"

"Today being a holiday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've engaged her to come and help the ladies of the household celebrate the Double Yang Festival. It would take the ears of a dog like you to pick her out."

"My senses are as sharp as those of Thousand Li Eyes and Wind-borne Ears,"⁴⁹ said Ying Po-chüeh.

"If a bee so much as buzzes forty li away,

I can make it out."

The two of them continued chaffing each other for a while, after which Ying Po-chüeh said, "Brother, whatever you do, call her out here, so we can have a look at her. The rest of us may not matter, but you really ought to have her sing a song for your senior brother-in-law here. Enough is enough. Don't be so stubborn about it."

Unable to resist these importunities any longer, Hsi-men Ch'ing dispatched Wang Ching to bring Second Sister Shen out so she could sing something for Brother-in-law Wu K'ai. Before long, Second Sister Shen duly appeared, kowtowed to the company, and, after standing up again, sat down to one side on a folding chair that had been provided for her.

"Second Sister Shen," said Ying Po-chüeh, "may I ask how old you are?"

"I was born in the year of the ox," said Second Sister Shen, "so I'm twenty years old."

"And how many songs are there in your repertory?" he went on to ask.

"Accompanying myself with the p'i-p'a or the psaltery," said Second Sister Shen, "I can perform any number of songs and song suites."

"If you know as many as all that," said Ying Po-chüeh, "it ought to suffice."

"Second Sister Shen," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "take your p'i-p'a and perform a few current popular songs for us. We don't want to burden you unduly. I hear that you can perform the piece called "The Four Dreams and Eight Nothings." Why don't you sing that for Brother-in-law Wu here?"

He then directed Wang Ching and Shu-t'ung to replenish the wine. Whereupon, Second Sister Shen:

Gently strummed the silken strings,

Lightly parted her sandalwood lips,⁵⁰ and sang the set of songs to the tune "Lo River Lament":

Morbidly my indisposition grows worse;
When will it ever melt away?

I long for him in spring, yearn for him in summer, and do the same in autumn and winter.

With a breastful of sorrow,⁵¹ I complain to the Lord of Heaven.

If Heaven possesses consciousness,
Why doesn't it show some kindness?

No matter how much kindness I show,
it comes to nothing;

No matter how much feeling I show,
it comes to nothing.

It all amounts to a Dream of the Southern Branch.⁵²

He is in the East, I in the West;
When will we ever meet again?

Little by little, I fill the sheets of flowered paper, and seal them again and again.

I entrust these missives to the fish and wild geese as messengers,

But they are not trustworthy,
And fail to deliver my letters.

No matter how much I dote on him,
it comes to nothing;

No matter how much I resent him,

it comes to nothing.
 It all amounts to a Dream of Witch's Mountain.⁵³
 My kindness evaporates like the morning breeze;
 Leaving me languorous and depressed.
 The way he carries on, he fails to finish that which he begins.
 His promises to be as faithful as the hills and seas are no more than wind in my ears.
 Does he not remember, in days of old,
 How ardently he expressed his love?
 No matter how much I may repine,
 it comes to nothing;
 No matter how infatuated I may be,
 it comes to nothing.
 It all amounts to only a Dream of a Butterfly.⁵⁴
 My brightness resembles stupidity;
 I have fallen into his trap.⁵⁵
 In silence, all I can do is to secretly let my pearly tears well up.
 Who would have thought that his mouth and heart were not in agreement?
 My heart has been true to him,⁵⁶
 While he has played tricks on me.
 No matter whether I gain the advantage,
 it comes to nothing;
 No matter whether I lose the advantage,
 it comes to nothing.
 It all amounts to a Dream of Radiant Terrace.⁵⁷

We will say no more at present about the singing and drinking in the front compound.

To resume our story, when Li P'ing-erh got back to her room and sat down on the commode, the blood from her lower body flowed out as copiously as urine, and in no time at all, she started to black out. When she tried to get up and pull up her skirts, she suddenly suffered a spell of vertigo and fell face forward onto the ground. Luckily Ying-ch'un was at her side and was able to break her fall, but she had broken the skin on her forehead. Ying-ch'un and the wet nurse helped her onto the k'ang, but for some time she was:

Oblivious to human affairs.

This threw Ying-ch'un into a panic, and she immediately told Hsiu-ch'un, "Quickly, go tell the First Lady what has happened."

Hsiu-ch'un went to the scene of the party and reported to Yüeh-niang and the others, "My mistress has fallen down in a faint in her quarters."

Yüeh-niang abruptly left the party and, accompanied by the other womenfolk, hastened on her way to assess the situation. They found Ying-ch'un and the wet nurse holding her up in a sitting position on the k'ang, but she remained:

Oblivious to human affairs.

"She seemed all right when she came back to her quarters," said Yüeh-niang. "What actually happened to bring her to this pass?"

Ying-ch'un took the lid off the commode and showed the contents to Yüeh-niang, which gave her quite a start.

"I fear," she said, "it must be the wine she drank just now that has brought on this copious flow of blood."

"But she hardly drank anything at all," both Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien exclaimed together.

Only some time after they had administered a decoction of bog rush and ginger to her did she gradually come back to her senses and recover her ability to speak.

"Sister Li," asked Yüeh-niang, "what happened to you?"

"It wasn't anything much," said Li P'ing-erh. "I sat down on the commode, but when I got up and started to pull up my skirts, a black patch appeared before my eyes and, before I knew it:

Heaven and Earth began to spin around,⁵⁸ and I couldn't help falling down."

Yüeh-niang said, "I think I'd better send Lai-an to invite Father to come in here so we can explain the situation to him, and get him to send for Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to come take a look at you."

Li P'ing-erh objected to sending for Hsi-men Ch'ing and said, "What's the need for:

Such a great show of consternation?

It will only disrupt his drinking party."

"Make up her bed then," Yüeh-niang said to Ying-ch'un, "and put your mistress to sleep."

Under the circumstances, Yüeh-niang had no wish to continue drinking, so she ordered that the utensils be cleared away, and they all went back to the rear compound.

Hsi-men Ch'ing continued to entertain Brother-in-law Wu K'ai and the others until evening, before returning to the master suite, where Yüeh-niang told him about Li P'ing-erh's fainting fit. Hsi-men Ch'ing hastily made his way back up front to see how she was and found Li P'ing-erh lying on the k'ang, with her face as sallow as wax.

Tugging at Hsi-men Ch'ing's sleeve, she started to weep, and when he asked her what it was about, Li P'ing-erh said, "When I went back to my room and sat down on the commode, somehow or other, I don't know why, the blood started to flow from my lower body, just as copiously as urine, and, before I knew it, a black patch appeared before my eyes. When I got up and started to pull up my skirts:

Heaven and Earth began to spin around, and I fell down, no longer conscious of anything.”

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that a strip of the cuticle on her forehead had been broken open by the fall, he said, “Where were your maidservants? Why weren't they looking after you? How did they let you fall down and wound your face that way?”

“Luckily,” said Li P'ing-erh, “my senior maidservant was standing by and tried to break my fall. Together with the wet nurse, they were able to help me up. Otherwise, who knows how much worse a fall I might have taken?”

“Early tomorrow morning,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “I'll send a page boy to ask Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to come and have a look at you.”

That night he slept in the bed across the room from where Li P'ing-erh was lying.

The next morning, he did not go to the yamen but sent Ch'in-t'ung, riding on a mule, to fetch Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i, who did not arrive until noontime. Hsi-men Ch'ing first shared a serving of tea with him in the main reception hall and then sent a page boy inside to announce the doctor's arrival. Li P'ing-erh spruced up her quarters, lit some incense, and then invited Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to come in.

After palpating her pulse, he came back out to the reception hall and said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, “Your venerable consort's pulse is significantly more sluggish than it was the last time I examined her.

Her seven feelings have been wounded.⁵⁹

The inflammation created by the element fire in her liver and lungs is excessive, with the result that the element wood is in the ascendant and the element earth is deficient, causing an abnormal circulation of her overheated blood. The resultant flooding is like the collapse of a mountain and cannot be regulated. Send your servant back to inquire. If the blood she has hemorrhaged is purple in color, her condition may be treated successfully. If it is bright red in color, it is fresh blood. In that case, if the medicine I prescribe abates the bleeding somewhat, there is hope. If not, it will be difficult to treat.”

“I beseech you, venerable sir,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “to take care in determining the dosage of the medications you prescribe. Your pupil will see that you are handsomely rewarded.”

“What kind of talk is that?” said Dr. Jen. “You and I are on familiar terms with each other, as well as being mutual friends of Han Ming-ch'uan. Your pupil:

Will not fail to do his utmost on your behalf.”⁶⁰

After hosting another serving of tea, Hsi-men Ch'ing saw his guest out the door, immediately after which, he prepared a bolt of Hang-chou chiffon and two taels of silver and sent Ch'in-t'ung off with them to fetch the prescribed medication. It turned out to be a decoction for restoring the spleen, but when Li P'ing-erh took a dose of it after it had been heated, her hemorrhaging continued unabated.

Hsi-men Ch'ing became even more flustered than before and also invited Dr. Hu, who resided at the entrance to Main Street, to come and see her.

Dr. Hu said, “Anger has disrupted her blood vessels, causing an inflammation in her uterus.”

He also prescribed a medication for her condition, but when she took it, it was no more efficacious than:

A stone sunk in the vast sea.

When Yüeh-niang realized that Hsi-men Ch'ing was preoccupied with consulting physicians in the front compound, she decided to keep Second Sister Shen for one night only, after which, she gave her five mace of silver, a vest of cloud-patterned damask, and some other trinkets, which she put into a gift box, and then sent her off in a sedan chair.

Hua Tzu-yu, who had been a guest at the party in celebration of the opening of Hsi-men Ch'ing's new silk goods store, upon hearing that Li P'ing-erh was unwell, had his wife purchase two gifts and go to pay her a visit. When she observed how emaciated and sallow she had become, and that her appearance was:

No longer what it used to be,⁶¹

the two of them had a good cry together in her room. After her visit, Yüeh-niang invited her to tea in the rear compound.

Han Tao-kuo, for his part, said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, “There is a Dr. Chao living outside the East Gate, who specializes in female disorders. He is adept at palpating the pulse and is an excellent diagnostician. Some years ago, when my wife was suffering from irregular menstruation, it was he who treated her. If Your Honor will send someone to invite him to come and examine the Sixth Lady, I am sure her condition will improve.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, sent Ch'in-t'ung⁶² and Wang Ching, the two of them riding tandem on a mule, to go outside the city gate and extend an invitation to Dr. Chao.

Hsi-men Ch'ing also invited Ying Po-chüeh to join him for a consultation in the anteroom in the front courtyard, saying, “My sixth consort has become seriously ill. What am I to do about it?”

Ying Po-chüeh expressed surprise, saying, “I understood that my sister-in-law's ailment was somewhat better. Why has it taken a turn for the worse?”

“Ever since her young son died,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “she has been suffering from depression, which has resulted in a recurrence of her former ailment. Yesterday, in celebration of the Double Yang Festival, I proposed to invite Second Sister Shen, so that the women of the household could dispel their melancholy and have some fun together. She hardly drank anything at all on that occasion, but who would have expected that, no sooner had she returned to her quarters than she had a relapse, began to feel faint, and fell to the ground, breaking the skin on her face? I invited Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to examine her, and he said that her pulse was more sluggish than before; but when she took the medication he prescribed, the flow of blood became more copious than ever.”

“Brother,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “when you invited Dr. Hu to examine her, what did he say?”

Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, "Dr. Hu said that anger had disrupted her blood vessels, but when she took the medication he prescribed, it produced no visible effect. Today, Han Tao-kuo recommended a certain Dr. Chao Lung-kang, who resides outside the city gate and is a specialist in female disorders. I have sent two page boys after him, and they have been gone for some time already. I'm as upset as can be about it. Simply because of what happened to the child, she is so preoccupied by it, day and night, that it has given rise to this ailment. She's just a woman after all and doesn't know how to put it behind her. No matter how much you admonish her, she doesn't pay any attention. I'm:

At a loss for what to do next."

As they were speaking, P'ing-an came in and reported, "Your kinsman Ch'iao Hung has come."

Hsi-men Ch'ing ushered him into the reception hall, where, after exchanging the customary amenities, they sat down together.

"I have heard," said Ch'iao Hung, "that my kinswoman, your Sixth Lady, is unwell. Yesterday, when my nephew, Ts'ui Pen, came home, he suggested that my wife should come pay her a visit."

"It's true," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "For some time now, ever since our young son died, she has been suffering from depression. She had a physical indisposition to begin with, and this only served to exacerbate it. I appreciate your concern."

"Have you had anyone in to examine her?" asked Ch'iao Hung.

"She has been taking the medication prescribed by Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and yesterday I also asked Dr. Hu from Main Street to examine her, but when she took the medication he prescribed, it only made her condition worse. Today, I have also sent for Dr. Chao Lung-kang, a specialist in female disorders who lives outside the city gate."

"The medical practitioner Old Man Ho," said Ch'iao Hung, "who lives outside the gate of the district yamen, is equally proficient at prescriptions, both great and small, and palpation of the pulse. His son, Ho Ch'un-ch'üan, has also recently set up practice as a licensed physician. Why don't you invite him to come and examine my kinswoman?"

"If he's as good as all that," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll wait until my servants have brought Dr. Chao Lung-kang to palpate her pulse, and see what he has to say. It won't be too late to invite Dr. Ho after that."

"Kinsman," said Ch'iao Hung, "in my ignorant view, the best thing to do would be to invite Old Man Ho to examine my kinswoman now and offer his diagnosis, after which you can have him sit in an antechamber. Then, after your servants have brought Dr. Chao Lung-kang here from outside the city gate to take her pulse, you can see what he has to say, and then get the two physicians to discuss it together, in the hope of ascertaining the origin of the ailment. If they can agree upon an appropriate prescription after that, it is unlikely to prove ineffective."

"Kinsman," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "what you say makes sense."

He then turned to Tai-an and said, "Take my card and go with Ch'iao T'ung to invite the medical practitioner Old Man Ho who lives outside the gate of the district yamen to come here."

Tai-an and Ch'iao T'ung nodded in assent and departed on this errand. Hsi-men Ch'ing then invited Ying Po-chüeh to join them in the reception hall, where, after greeting Ch'iao Hung, he sat down with them for a cup of tea. It was not long before Old Man Ho arrived, came in the gate, bowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'iao Hung, and was ushered to a seat in the place of honor.

Raising his hand in greeting, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "It is some years since I have seen you, venerable sir, and your appearance is more impressive than ever, with your gray beard and white hair."

"And your distinguished son has been most successful in his career," chimed in Ch'iao Hung.

"The fact is," said Old Man Ho, "that he is so busy with his social responsibilities at the district yamen that he scarcely has time for anything else. It is my aged self who most often has to go out to examine the sick."

"For someone as old as you are, venerable sir," said Ying Po-chüeh, "you seem to be in remarkably good health."

"As of now," said Old Man Ho, "I have led a futile existence for eighty years."

When they had finished running through these amenities, tea was served, after which, a page boy was dispatched to let Li P'ing-erh know that the doctor was coming. Before long, he was invited into her quarters, where he approached her bed in order to palpate her pulse. She had been propped up into a sitting position on the k'ang, with the fragrant clouds of her hair concealing her bosom, and exhibited an extremely emaciated appearance. Behold:

Her face is the hue of gilded paper,⁶³

Her body is thin as a bar of silver.

By degrees her good looks have diminished;

Imperceptibly her radiance has wasted away.

Her breast is tight with anger;

For days on end, neither water nor rice has moistened her lips.

Her five viscera are congested;

All day long, it is difficult for pills to get down to her stomach.

With a constant din, the hollows of her ears resound with the sound of chimes;

Nebulously, as her eyesight becomes darker,

she seems to see fireflies flying.

Her six pulses are weak and sluggish;⁶⁴
The Assessor of the Eastern Peak has come to take away her life.
Her numinous soul is drifting hazily;
The Buddha of the Western Realm has called her to accompany him.
The baleful stars Death Knell and Condoler⁶⁵ have already visited her;
Even the famous physician Pien Ch'üeh of Lu⁶⁶ would find himself stumped.⁶⁷

When Old Man Ho had finished palpating her pulse, he came outside to the reception hall and said to Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'iao Hung, "This lady's ailment originated from semen invading her menstrual blood vessels, after which she became afflicted with suppressed anger. When her anger and her blood came into conflict with each other, it resulted in copious hemorrhaging. Think carefully back to the time when her ailment began and see if this diagnosis is correct or not."

"Venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how would you suggest that it be treated?"

As they were discussing the situation, it was suddenly reported that Ch'in-t'ung and Wang Ching had arrived back from outside the city gate with Dr. Chao.

"Who might that be?" asked Old Man Ho.

"It is another doctor who was recommended to me by my manager," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If you, venerable sir, will pretend to ignorance of the matter until after he comes back out from examining her pulse, the two of you can then discuss it together in the hope of agreeing upon an appropriate prescription."

Before long, he came in from outside, and Hsi-men Ch'ing, after exchanging greetings with him, introduced him to the others. The two venerable gentlemen, Old Man Ho and Ch'iao Hung, were seated in the center in the position of honor, the newcomer was offered a seat on the left, Ying Po-chüeh was seated on the right, while Hsi-men Ch'ing occupied the position of host. Lai-an brought in a serving of tea, and, after they had drunk it, took away the teacups in their raised saucers.

The newcomer then said, "May I ask what are the names of you two venerable gentlemen?"

Ch'iao Hung replied, "One of us is surnamed Ho and the other is surnamed Ch'iao."

"And my surname is Ying," said Ying Po-chüeh. "May I venture to ask, sir, what is your distinguished name; where do you reside; and what is your profession?"

"Unworthy as I am," the newcomer replied, "the dwelling of your humble servant is located outside the East Gate, on the First Alley, beyond the Temple of the Second Scion (Erh-lang Shen), across the Three Bends Bridge, in the Quarter of the Four Wells.⁶⁸ I am none other than the celebrated Chao the Quack and have practiced medicine all my life. My paternal grandfather was an administrative assistant in the Imperial Academy of Medicine, and my father is currently serving as a medical officer in the mansion of the Prince of Ju.⁶⁹ For three successive generations we have devoted ourselves to the study of the medical arts. Every day I pore over the works of Wang Shu-ho,⁷⁰ Li Kao,⁷¹ and Wu-t'ing-tzu,⁷² as well as such texts as the Yao-hsing fu (Rhapsody on the properties of drugs),⁷³ Huang-ti nei-ching su-wen (Essential questions regarding the Yellow Emperor's inner classic [of medicine]),⁷⁴ Nan-ching (The classic of difficult issues),⁷⁵ Huo-jen shu (The book on preserving human life),⁷⁶ Tan-hsi tsuan-yao (Essential teachings of Chu Chen-heng),⁷⁷ Tan-hsi hsin-fa (Quintessential methods of Chu Chen-heng),⁷⁸ Chieh-ku lao mai-chüeh (Chang Yüan-su's [commentary on Wang Shu-ho's] secrets of pulse diagnosis),⁷⁹ Chia-chien shih-san fang (Thirteen alternative prescriptions),⁸⁰ Ch'ien-chin fang (Prescriptions worth a thousand pieces of gold),⁸¹ Ch'i-hsiao liang-fang (Beneficial prescriptions of unusual efficacy),⁸² Shou-yü shen-fang (Divine prescriptions for the realm of longevity),⁸³ and Hai-shang fang (Over-seas panaceas [from the Isles of the Blest]).⁸⁴

There is no text I have not perused,⁸⁵

There is not a text I have not read.

In prescribing, I use the life-giving methods stored in my breast;

In pulse-taking, I clearly comprehend the secrets under my fingers.

The six conditions and the four seasons,
Produce differences in the manifestations of the Yin and the Yang.

The seven outer and eight inner pulses,
Determine whether blockage or repulsion cause sinking or floating.

As for the symptoms of wind, vacuity,
 cold, and fever,

I have mastered them all without exception.⁸⁶

With regard to thready, swollen, hollow, and stony pulses,

There are none I do not totally understand.
With my awkward mouth and clumsy lips,⁸⁷
I may fail to explain myself in detail;
But I have composed a few lines of verse,
Which will lay out the general outline.

They go as follows:

I'm a doctor whose surname is Chao,
At my gate people constantly clamor.
I sport placards and rattle my bell,⁸⁸
With no genuine article⁸⁹ to peddle.
In healing, I abjure the best nostrums,
In pulse taking, say what comes to mind.
Incompetent at pharmacology and medicine,
I'm inept even at relieving constipation.
For headaches I use tightened headbands,
For eye ailments I rely on moxabustion.
For heart trouble I recommend surgery,
For deafness I would advise acupuncture.
For money I'm prepared to do anything,
I'm out for profit rather than results.
Those who consult me are less likely to be fortunate than unfortunate;⁹⁰
Wherever I appear there is likely to be weeping rather than laughter.

Truly:

Motivated only one half by benevolence and one half by self-interest;
From of old, the pursuit of medicine is like the pursuit of immortality."⁹¹

When the company had heard him out, they all laughed uproariously.

Old Man Ho then asked him, "Did you acquire your expertise professionally, or acquire your expertise extra-professionally?"

Dr. Chao said, "What do you mean by the expressions 'acquire your expertise professionally,' or 'acquire your expertise extra-professionally'?"

"If you acquired your expertise professionally," responded Old Man Ho, "you learned the proper techniques of pulse diagnosis from the example set by your father. If you acquired your expertise extra-professionally, you can do no more than:

Ascertain the symptoms and prescribe accordingly, that's all."

"Venerable sir," said Dr. Chao, "you don't understand. As the authorities of yore have stated:

Inspection, auscultation, interrogation, and palpation, are the techniques that show a physician to be:

Divine, sagely, craftsmanlike, or skilled."⁹²

Since I have acquired my expertise professionally through three successive generations, I know that in addition to first inquiring about the symptoms and then examining the pulse, I must scrutinize the patient's coloration; just as the practitioners of the Tzu-p'ing school of fortune-telling⁹³ combine it with the astrological school of the Five Planets, and also resort to palmistry and physiognomy, in order to make sure that their predictions are reliable and unlikely to be incorrect."

"In that case," said Old Man Ho, "Please go inside and examine the patient."

Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon told Ch'in-t'ung to go back and tell them that they were coming, and that he had also arranged for a visit by Dr. Chao.

Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing escorted Dr. Chao into Li P'ing-erh's quarters. Li P'ing-erh, who had just lain down for a rest, was propped up into a sitting position once again, supported by her pillow and bedding.

Dr. Chao first palpated the pulse on her left wrist, and then that on her right, after which he said, "Venerable lady, please lift up your head so I can examine your coloration."

Li P'ing-erh actually lifted up her head, upon which, Dr. Chao said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Your Honor, ask your venerable lady who I am."

Hsi-men Ch'ing accordingly asked Li P'ing-erh, "Who do you think this gentleman is?"

Li P'ing-erh raised her head to take a look at him, and then said in a low voice, "I imagine he must be a doctor."

"Your Honor," said Dr. Chao, "there is nothing to worry about. She is unlikely to die since she is able to recognize people."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this, and said, "Dr. Chao, do your best to examine her, and I will see that you are amply rewarded."

After examining her for some time, Dr. Chao said, "As for this ailment of your venerable lady's, pray don't take it amiss if I say so, but, after scrutinizing her coloration and palpating her pulse, I conclude that if it is not an externally contracted intestinal fever, it is an internally contracted miscellaneous disorder, and that if it did not develop postpartum, it must have done so prior to conception.”

“That’s not what it is,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “Please be good enough to make another careful appraisal.”⁹⁴

“I venture to say,” said Dr. Chao, “that it is a depression brought on by a dietary disorder resulting from overindulgence in food and drink.”

“For days on end,” responded Hsi-men Ch’ing, “she has hardly eaten any food at all.”

“Perhaps it is a case of jaundice,” opined Dr. Chao.

“That’s not the case,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“If that’s not the case,” said Dr. Chao, “why is it that her face is so yellow?”

He then went on to say, “No doubt it is a case of spleen vacuity diarrhea.”

“It is not a case of diarrhea,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“If it is not diarrhea, what can it be?” said Dr. Chao. “How can it be an ailment that one is at a loss to identify?”

After sitting in thought for some time, he said, “I’ve finally thought of something. If it isn’t a case of swelling of the lymph nodes in the groin caused by venereal disease, it must be a case of irregular menstruation.”

“Since she’s a woman,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “it’s unlikely to be a case of swelling of the lymph nodes in the groin caused by venereal disease. But your suggestion that it might be a case of irregular menstruation is a little more reasonable.”

“Amitābha be praised!” exclaimed Dr. Chao. “Somehow or other your humble servant has finally gotten something right.”

“What kind of irregular menstruation might it be?” asked Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“If it is not due to debility arising from amenorrhea,” opined Dr. Chao, “it must be a case of metrorrhagia like the collapse of a mountain.”

“To tell you the truth, sir,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “my spouse, thus and so, has been experiencing incessant hemorrhaging from her lower body, which has caused her figure to become emaciated. If you know of any fast-acting prescription that you can make up and give her to take, I will see that you are amply rewarded.”

“That’s no problem,” said Dr. Chao. “I do possess such a prescription. After we return to the front reception hall, I will write it out, so you can have it made up.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing then proceeded to accompany him back to the front reception hall. Ch’iao Hung and Old Man Ho were still there and asked him what he thought the origin of the ailment was.

“As I see it,” said Dr. Chao, “it is only a case of menstrual flooding.”

“What medicine would you use to treat it?” asked Old Man Ho.

“I’ve got a marvelous prescription,” said Dr. Chao, “which contains a number of different ingredients. If she takes it, I can guarantee her recovery. Let me describe it for you.” To the tune “Slavey Chu”:

Take Radix Glycyrrhizae, Radix Euphorbiae, and Sal Ammoniacum, Veratri Radix et Rhizoma, Crotonus Semen,
and Daphnes Genkwa Flos;
Emulsify Arsenicum Trioxidum with fresh
Rhizoma Pinelliae,
Use Radix Aconiti, Semen Pruni Armeniacae, and Semen Cannabis;
Combine all of these ingredients together;
Work them into a pill using honey mixed with Bulbus Allii Fistulosi,
And take it early in the morning with a draft of distilled spirits.⁹⁵

“To treat her with drugs such as these,” said Old Man Ho, “would only be to medicate her to death.”

Dr. Chao responded, “It has always been true that:

Toxic medications may be bitter to the taste but beneficial for an illness.”⁹⁶

After all:

To bring the case to an early clear-cut conclusion,

Is superior to letting things drag on interminably.”

“This rascal is talking nothing but nonsense!” exclaimed Hsi-men Ch’ing. “Have the servants throw him out of here.”

“Since your own manager recommended and vouched for him,” said Ch’iao Hung, “you can hardly send the doctor off empty-handed.”

“To comply with your suggestion,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “I’ll have someone in the shop up front weigh out two mace of silver for him and send him on his way.”

Dr. Chao, accordingly, took the two mace of silver and headed for home:

His one mind hastening like an arrow;

His two legs racing as though flying.⁹⁷

When Hsi-men Ch’ing saw that Dr. Chao was out of the way, he said to Ch’iao Hung, “This man turned out to be an ignoramus.”

“Though I did not venture to say so just now,” said Old Man Ho, “this fellow is well-known outside the East Gate as Chao the Quack. All he knows how to do is:

Sport placards and rattle his bell, on the streets, attempting to con the passersby. What does he know about pulse diagnosis or the etiology of disorders?"

"As for this ailment of your venerable lady's," he went on to say, "when I get home, I'll make up a couple of prescriptions for her in the hope that they will do the trick. After she has taken them, if her hemorrhaging is reduced, and her chest feels more comfortable, it will be expedient to prescribe further medication. I am afraid, however, that if the hemorrhaging does not stop, and her appetite does not improve, her condition will prove difficult to treat."

When he had finished speaking, he got up to go. Hsi-men Ch'ing sealed one tael of silver in a packet and sent Tai-an, with a gift box in hand, to pick up the prescribed medications. That evening they were administered to Li P'ing-erh, but they produced not the slightest change in her condition.

"You ought to be sparing in the medications you give her," said Wu Yüeh-niang. "She has already stopped eating and drinking, so what is there left in her stomach? If you insist on continuing to medicate her, it is likely to exhaust her vitality. Formerly, that Immortal Wu predicted that during her twenty-seventh year she would suffer a bloody catastrophe, and this just happens to be her twenty-seventh year. You ought to send someone to look for that Immortal Wu, and have him prognosticate on her behalf to see what the categories 'emolument' and 'horse' in her horoscope forebode for her."⁹⁸ If her fate should prove to be in conflict with some baleful star, he might be able to either avert the calamity or protect her against it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, accordingly, sent a servant with his calling card in hand to the mansion of Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command to inquire as to the whereabouts of Immortal Wu.

The servant was told, "Immortal Wu is an itinerant priest who wanders like a cloud. His comings and goings are uncertain. When he comes here, he generally stays in the Temple of the Tutelary God south of the city. This year, in the fourth month, he left on a pilgrimage to Mount Wu-tang."⁹⁹ If you want someone to calculate a fortune, there is a Master Huang, who resides outside the Chen-wu Temple, who is good at calculating them. He charges only three mace of silver per calculation but will not make house calls. He can interpret the events of a lifetime, from beginning to end, as clearly as though he were seeing them with his own eyes."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, consequently, sent Ch'en Ching-chi, with three mace of silver, to seek out Master Huang's dwelling outside the Chen-wu Temple in the northern quarter of the city. He found a poster pasted on Master Huang's door, that read:

Calculations concerning Anterior Heaven

based on the Changes;

The charge for each prognostication is three mace of silver.

Ch'en Ching-chi went inside, bowed respectfully, proffered the stipulated fee, and said, "I have someone's fortune that I would like to trouble you to calculate, sir."

He then told him the eight characters that determined Li P'ing-erh's horoscope, as well as the facts that she was a female, that she was currently in her twenty-seventh year, and that she was born at noon on the fifteenth day of the first month.

Master Huang performed some calculations on his abacus and then said, "This female's horoscope indicates that she was born in a hsin-wei year, in a keng-yin month, on a hsin-mao day, during the hour jen-wu, which calls for analysis of the horoscopic category 'seal ribbon.'¹⁰⁰ The first of her 'decennial periods of fate' began in her fourth year and was designated by the combination chi-wei, the second began in her fourteenth year and was designated by the combination wu-wu, the third began in her twenty-fourth year and was designated by the combination ting-ssu, the fourth will begin in her thirty-fourth year and be designated by the combination ping-ch'en. This year of her horoscope is a ting-yu year, which means that she will suffer from 'matched shoulders,' because the stem of this year, which corresponds to the element metal, will be injured by the stem of her day of birth, which corresponds to the element fire. During this year the planet Ketu¹⁰¹ impinges on her fate, and it is also in conflict with the baleful stars known as Death Knell and the Five Devils, which will make trouble for her. Now Ketu is a dark star, the image of which resembles a tangle of threads without a head, the shape of which changes incessantly. If someone's decennial period of fate collides with it, it is likely to portend something ominous,¹⁰² such as the development of disease. It indicates that in the first, second, and third, or the seventh, or ninth months a medical calamity may occur, involving the loss of property, the untimely death of a child, the scheming of petty people, and the spreading of malicious gossip,¹⁰³ intended to inflict material damage. If it is the horoscope of a female, it is very unpropitious. The judgment reads:

During this year when the planet Ketu encroaches,
Her destiny is like propelling a boat on dry land,¹⁰⁴
Causing the head of the household to knit his brows.
In quietude, hesitating over the best thing to do,
In idleness, given over to sorrow without respite;
If you want to know why his woman is so afflicted,
And as unlikely to endure as a tangle of threads:
Ponder the events before conception and postpartum.¹⁰⁵

Her fortune reads:

Aside from the fact that she entered into wedlock rather late,
It is also true that she lost her parents early on in life.
Her fragrant features and alluring beauty have bloomed of late,

Everything that she desired seemed to be there for the asking.
But no sooner was she happily wed than the dragon appeared,
And the congenial union of the sheep was menaced by the tiger.¹⁰⁶
Sadly, when emotions are at their height feelings are lost,
When her fate enters the year of the cock¹⁰⁷
the leaves will fall."

When Master Huang had copied this information out, he sealed it and entrusted it to Ch'en Ching-chi to take home with him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was sitting together with Ying Po-chüeh and Licentiate Wen Pi-ku when Ch'en Ching-chi came back with the copied fortune, and he took it back to the rear compound to explicate for Wu Yüeh-niang's benefit. It was apparent that the fortune was:

More likely to be unfortunate than fortunate.¹⁰⁸

Nothing might have happened if Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard about this, but having heard about it:

His brows became tightly knit, as though secured by a triple-spring lock;
His belly became overburdened, as though with ten thousand bushels of woe.¹⁰⁹

Truly:

The lofty and eminent in their youth
meet with calamity;
While the clever and the intelligent suffer in poverty.
The year, month, day, and hour of birth determine it all;
However calculated, events are controlled by fate rather than man.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Chapter 62

TAOIST MASTER P'AN PERFORMS AN EXORCISM ON THE LANTERN ALTAR; HSI-MEN CH'ING LAMENTS EGREGIOUSLY ON BEHALF OF LI P'ING-ERH

Whether one's conduct is false or true is known only to oneself;
The causes of disaster or good fortune are not to be sought elsewhere.¹
Good and evil acts inevitably bring their appropriate results;
The only question being whether they come early or come late.²
When one reexamines at one's leisure the deeds of one's lifetime,³
And ruminates in quietude about what one has done during the day,⁴
If one consistently practices rectitude with one's whole heart,
It is natural that Heaven's principles will not let one down.⁵

THE STORY GOES that when Hsi-men Ch'ing observed that the prescriptions Li P'ing-erh took, and the medical attention she received, were completely ineffectual; and that though:

The gods were besought and diviners consulted,
the results of these prognostications were all:

Ominous and inauspicious,
he was:

At a loss for what to do next.

Initially, Li P'ing-erh still endeavored as best she could to comb her hair and wash her face, and she was still able to get off the k'ang by herself in order to sit on the commode. But afterwards, gradually:

Her intake of food and drink diminished,⁶

Her figure became increasingly emaciated,⁷ and the hemorrhaging from her lower body continued unabated. It did not take long for a woman as pretty as a flower to become so weak and emaciated that she did not bear looking at. She was no longer able to get off the k'ang to perform her natural functions, but simply lay on a pad that had been covered with a layer of absorbent grass paper. Fearing that anyone coming in might be offended by the foul odor, she had her maidservants keep incense burning in the room. Hsi-men Ch'ing, on observing that her arms were as thin as bars of silver, wept as he kept watch over her in her room and only went to the yamen every other day.

"My brother," protested Li P'ing-erh, "you really ought to report to the yamen, rather than letting my situation interfere with your responsibilities. My condition doesn't really matter. The only problem is the hemorrhaging down below. If it would only stop, I could open my mouth to eat and drink again, and should be all right. You're a man and can't afford to tie yourself down keeping vigil in somebody's room like this."

"My sister," wept Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I can't bear to relinquish you in my heart."

"Don't be a fool," said Li P'ing-erh. "If I don't die, that's that. But if I'm going to die, what can you do to prevent it?"

"I've been wanting to tell you, but haven't told you yet," she went on to say, "that whenever I'm alone in the room, I'm afraid. It seems, though vague and indistinct, that there is someone there in front of me. I constantly dream of him at night, looking just as he did when he was still alive:

Brandishing knives and flourishing weapons, in the attempt to pick a quarrel with me, while holding the child in his arms. When I try to take the child, he pushes me roughly away. He says that he has purchased another house where he now is and demands over and over again that I should go join him there. But I've been reluctant to tell you about it."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he said:

"A person's death is like the extinction of a lamp."⁸

During these several years, who knows where he has gone? This is all due to the fact that you have been ill for so long and have lost so much blood from hemorrhaging below. I doubt the existence of any such things as evil spirits or demons, or the ghosts of kinfolk or unrelated persons, bent on troubling you. But tomorrow I will send someone to Abbot Wu's temple to get a couple of written spells, and paste them on the door of your room. That way we can determine whether there are any evil influences at work, or not."

Before he had even finished speaking, he headed toward the front of the compound and deputed Tai-an to take a mount and ride to the Temple of the Jade Emperor in order to get the spells. When Tai-an got out onto the street, he ran into Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta and dismounted to speak to them.

"Is your master at home?" they inquired.

"Father is at home," reported Tai-an.

"And where are you off to?" they went on to ask.

"I'm on my way to the Temple of the Jade Emperor to pick up some written spells," said Tai-an.

Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta then proceeded to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place, where Ying Po-chüeh said, "Hsieh Hsi-ta has heard that our sister-in-law is unwell, which gave him quite a start; so we have come to ask after her health."

"She's been a little better the last couple of days," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but I can tell you, her body has become so emaciated she is scarcely recognizable, which has left me entirely at a loss for what to do in any direction. Her child is dead, but why not leave it at that? All she does is cry all night long, and it is this excess of grief that has brought on her illness. If you try to talk her out of it, she won't pay you any attention, which leaves me completely at a loss for what to do next."

"Brother," asked Ying Po-chüeh, "what have you sent Tai-an to the temple for?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing told them all about how Li P'ing-erh was afraid whenever she was alone in her room. "She fears that there are evil influences at work, so I have sent the page boy to ask Abbot Wu for a couple of written spells which can be pasted up in her room with a view to suppressing them."

"Brother," said Hsieh Hsi-ta, "this is a result of the fact that my sister-in-law's vital spirits are at a low ebb. I doubt if there are any such things as evil spirits or demons involved."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "if it's evil spirits that you want to dispel, that's no problem. Taoist Master P'an from the Temple of the Five Peaks outside the city gate is trained in the Five Thunder Rites of the Celestial Heart Sect⁹ and is very adept at exorcising evil influences. He is popularly known as Demon-catcher P'an and constantly relieves people with his potions. Brother, if you will invite him to come here, he can examine my sister-in-law's room to see if there are any evil spirits lurking there. If there are, he will know it. If you then ask him to treat her ailment, he will be able to do so."

"After I get the written spells from Abbot Wu," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we can ascertain where he lives, and, if necessary, you can ride on a donkey with my page boy to invite him here."

"That's no problem," said Ying Po-chüeh. "I'm happy to go. And if Heaven takes pity on her so that my sister-in-law recovers, I'd be willing to kowtow every step of the way, if necessary."

After they had talked for a while, Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta, having finished their tea, stood up and went about their business.

When Tai-an returned with the written spells, they were pasted up in the sickroom, but that evening, Li P'ing-erh was still afraid and said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Just now the deceased one, together with two other men, came to apprehend me, but when they saw you coming in, they hid themselves out of the way."

"You shouldn't believe in such evil spirits," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but it doesn't matter. Yesterday Brother Ying the Second remarked that these hallucinations are the result of your emaciated state. He said that outside the city gate, at the Temple of the Five Peaks, there is a Taoist Master P'an who is good at curing ailments with his potions, and also at exorcising evil spirits. Tomorrow morning I'll ask Brother Ying the Second to go invite him to come and see you. If there are any evil influences at work, we can get him to dispel them."

"My brother," said Li P'ing-erh, "get him to come as soon as possible. That wretch was angry when he went away just now. He's likely to come back to get me tomorrow. Send someone after the Taoist master as quickly as you can."

"If you're afraid," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll send a page boy with a sedan chair to bring Wu Yin-erh here to keep you company for a few days."

Li P'ing-erh shook her head, and said, "Don't impose on her. I'm afraid it would interfere with her business at home."

"How would it be," asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if I got Old Mother Feng to come and look after you for a couple of days?"

Li P'ing-erh nodded her head in assent. Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Lai-an to summon Old Mother Feng from the house on Lion Street, but she wasn't there, having locked her door and gone out.

Lai-an said to Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," "As soon as she comes back, whatever you do, tell her to come over as quickly as possible. The Sixth Lady at the mansion is calling for her."

Hsi-men Ch'ing also instructed Tai-an, saying, "First thing tomorrow morning you must accompany Ying Po-chüeh to the Temple of the Five Peaks outside the city gate in order to invite Taoist Master P'an to come here." But no more of this.

The next day, who should appear but Nun Wang from the Kuan-yin Nunnery, who came to see Li P'ing-erh, carrying with her a box of nonglutinous rice, twenty large pieces of junket, and a small box of squash and eggplant julienne marinated with ten spices. When Li P'ing-erh saw that she had come, she hastily told Ying-ch'un to help her up into a sitting position to receive her. Nun Wang placed her palms together and saluted her in the Buddhist fashion, after which Li P'ing-erh invited her to take a seat.

"Reverend Wang," said Li P'ing-erh, "ever since you went off to arrange for the printing of that sutra, I haven't seen so much as your shadow. I've been as ill as this, and you haven't even bothered to come and see me."

"Mistress mine," said Nun Wang, "I was completely ignorant of the fact that you were unwell. I only found out about it when the First Lady sent a servant to the Nunnery the other day. And as for the printing of that sutra, you may not know it, but that old whore Nun Hsüeh and I have been engaged in quite a quarrel about it. By arranging for the printing of that sutra on your behalf all I was doing was driving the fish into the net for Nun Hsüeh, who connived with the printer to get a kickback of five taels, while I got off with not so much as a candareen. You may be bent on creating good fortune for yourself, but that old whore, in the future, will end up in the Avici Hell.¹⁰ She has made me so angry that I'm not myself and even forgot to come by for the First Lady's birthday."

"Everyone creates his own karma," said Li P'ing-erh. "Let her do as she pleases. You shouldn't make an issue out of it."

"Who's making an issue out of it?" demanded Nun Wang.

"The First Lady is really annoyed with you," said Li P'ing-erh. "She says that you have even neglected to recite the Shou-sheng ching, or Scripture on Incarnation,¹¹ on her behalf."

"My bodhisattva!" protested Nun Wang. "However remiss I might be, I would never dare to neglect reciting a scripture for her. I have been reciting the Shou-sheng ching at my place for the last month and only finished doing so yesterday. On coming here today, I went first to the rear compound in order to see her and told her about my sense of grievance. When I told her, 'I didn't know that the Sixth Lady was unwell, and don't have anything to offer but this box of nonglutinous rice, some squash and eggplant julienne marinated with ten spices, and several pieces of junket that she can eat with her congee,' the First Lady told Sister Hsiao-yü to bring me here to see you."

When Hsiao-yü had opened the boxes to show her the contents, Li P'ingerh said, "Thank you for your trouble."

"Sister Ying-ch'un," said Nun Wang, "take two pieces of this junket and steam them, so I can look on as your mistress eats them with some congee."

Ying-ch'un accordingly accepted the proffered gifts and put them away.

"Prepare some tea for Reverend Wang to drink," Li P'ing-erh instructed Ying-ch'un.

"I've just had some tea in the First Lady's room in the rear compound," said Nun Wang. "Have her boil up some congee so I can watch you eat it."

Before long, Ying-ch'un set up a table and laid out four varieties of snacks to go with the tea which she provided for Nun Wang. After this, she brought in the congee for Li P'ing-erh to eat. There were a saucer of squash and eggplant julienne served in a sweet sauce and marinated with ten spices, a saucer of junket steamed to a frosty brown, two cups of congee made from the nonglutinous rice, and a pair of miniature ivory chopsticks. Ying-ch'un deployed the chopsticks, while the wet nurse Ju-i stood to one side holding a cup, as they attempted to feed her for some time, but she was only able to swallow two or three mouthfuls of congee, and nibble on some junket, before she shook her head, stopped eating, and told them to take it away.

"For us human beings," said Nun Wang:

It is food and water that sustain our lives.¹²

This is such good congee. Won't you have a little more?"

"What am I to do," said Li P'ing-erh, "if I'm unable to swallow it?"

Ying-ch'un then moved the tea table out of the way. Nun Wang lifted the coverlet aside, and when she saw that the flesh of Li P'ing-erh's body had wasted away to practically nothing, it gave her quite a start.

"Mistress mine!" she exclaimed. "When I left you the last time, you were getting better. Why have you taken such a turn for the worse, and become emaciated to such an extent?"

"She was indeed getting better," said Ju-i. "Her ailment originally began as a result of suppressed anger, and Father invited a doctor to come and examine her. She took the medicines he prescribed every day and was 70 or 80 percent on the way to recovery. But in the eighth month, her baby boy suffered a fright that left him in a bad way. The mistress was worried about him day and night and wore herself out so that she was not even able to get any sleep. Though she hoped against hope that the boy would recover, despite her expectations, he died. She can't help crying all day long, on top of which she is suffering from:

Suppressed anger and suppressed resentment, in her heart. Even someone forged out of iron or stone could hardly be expected to bear up under all these tribulations. It's not surprising that her ailment has taken a turn for the worse. When one is suffering from suppressed anger, it helps to discuss it with someone else, but the mistress won't let anything out. No matter how hard you press her on the subject, she won't say a word about it."

"What does she have to be angry about?" asked Nun Wang. "Your master loves her. The First Lady respects her. Of the five or six other ladies around her, who would actually give her cause for anger?"

"Reverend Wang," said the wet nurse, "are you really unaware of who has upset her?"

Turning to Hsiao-yü, she said, "Step outside and look around to see if the gate is shut, or not."

Even if you only talk along the road,

There may be someone lurking in the grass,

if you don't watch out."

She then went on to say, "It is the Fifth Lady next door who has upset our mistress. The cat from her place scratched the hand of her baby boy so badly that it caused him to go into convulsions. When the master came home, he interrogated her about it, but she refrained from telling him who was to blame. It was only later, after the First Lady had told him what happened, that he dashed the cat to death; but she still refused to acknowledge her guilt and vented her wrath on us. In the eighth month, after the little boy died, she took to:

Pointing at the mulberry tree,
But cursing the locust tree, from her place next door, every day, expressing her gratification in a hundred different ways. Our mistress, in her room here, could hear everything she said perfectly clearly. How could she help being upset? In any case, although she was secretly perturbed, she didn't let the tears show. It's on account of this:

Suppressed anger and suppressed resentment, that she has developed this ailment. Heaven only knows, our mistress is possessed of an admirable disposition.

The good things that take place she keeps to herself,
The bad things that happen she also keeps to herself.

In her relations with her sister wives and concubines, she has never allowed herself to get:

Red in the face with anger.¹³

If she has attractive clothes, she refrains from appearing in them until the others have something comparable to wear. In this entire household there is not a person who has not derived some benefit from their association with her. But, just as I said, despite having benefited from her generosity, there are those who don't have a good word to say for her behind her back."

"Why should they disapprove of her?" asked Nun Wang.

"For example," said Ju-i, "one time Old Mrs. P'an, the Fifth Lady's mother, was here on a visit when it happened that the master wanted to sleep in the Fifth Lady's room, so she came over here to spend the night with our mistress. When she was about to leave, our mistress gave her some shoe uppers, a jacket, and some money, in fact, there is hardly anything she wouldn't have given her, but the Fifth Lady still didn't have a good word to say for her."

When Li P'ing-erh heard this, she was annoyed at Ju-i and said, "Don't be such an old woman. Why should you criticize her for no good reason? I'm already as good as dead. Let her do as she pleases.

Though Heaven does not speak, it is obvious that it is high;
Though Earth does not speak, it is apparent that it is low."¹⁴

"My Lord Buddha!" Nun Wang exclaimed. "Who could have known that you have such a good heart?
Heaven also has eyes, and Looks down from above.

You are sure to accrue benefits therefrom in the future."

"Reverend Wang," said Li P'ing-erh, "what benefits could there be for me? I haven't even been able to save the life of my only child, and now I'm not fated to live any longer myself. Suffering as I am from this ailment in my lower body, even if I were a ghost, I wouldn't be able to take a single step comfortably. I would like to give you some silver, Reverend Wang, in the hope that in the future, after I'm dead, you can arrange to have some nuns regularly recite the Hsüeh-p'en ching, or Blood Pool Sutra,¹⁵ on my behalf. As for this evil karma of mine, there's no telling how much of it I may have accumulated."

"My bodhisattva!" exclaimed Nun Wang. "You are worrying far too much. Just see if you don't get better in the days to come. For someone as good-hearted as you are, the dragon kings and devas are sure to extend their protection."

As they were speaking, Ch'in-t'ung came in and said to Ying-ch'un, "Father has issued instructions that you should straighten up the room. Hua the Elder is about to come in to see how your mistress is. He is sitting outside in the front compound."

Nun Wang then stood up and said, "I'll go back to the rear compound for the time being."

"Reverend Wang," said Li P'ing-erh, "don't go home, but stay and keep me company for a few days. There are other things I want to discuss with you."

"Mistress mine," replied Nun Wang, "I won't go then."

Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing ushered Hua the Elder in for a visit, but Li P'ing-erh remained lying on the k'ang and did not have anything to say.

"I didn't know anything about it," said Hua Tzu-yu, "until yesterday, when a servant from your place came to let me know. Tomorrow your sister-in-law will come to see how you are."

Li P'ing-erh merely responded by saying, "I'm putting you to a lot of trouble," and then turned over so that she was facing in the other direction.

Hua Tzu-yu sat with her for a while and then got up and returned to the front compound, where he said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "When my deceased uncle, the old eunuch director, was serving as grand defender of Kuang-nan, he brought some medicinal notoginseng¹⁶ back with him. Has she taken any of it, or not? No matter what sort of uterine bleeding a woman may suffer from, whether it be flooding or spotting, if five candareen's weight of this medication in powdered form is taken with wine, it will put a stop to it immediately. If my sister-in-law still retains any of this herbal medication, why doesn't she take some of it?"

"She has tried that medication," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The other day, Prefect Hu Shih-wen of Tung-p'ing prefecture came to pay a visit, and we discussed this medical problem. He also suggested a prescription, consisting of carbonized hemp palm fibers and white cockscomb flowers, decocted with wine, but it only stanchd her bleeding for one day, after which the hemorrhaging continued more copiously than ever."

"In that case," said Hua Tzu-yu, "her condition will prove difficult to treat. Brother-in-law, you ought to look into getting a set of coffin boards for her as soon as possible, so they'll be ready when needed. Tomorrow, I'll have your sister-in-law come to see her."

When he had finished speaking, he stood up to go. Despite repeated attempts, Hsi-men Ch'ing could not persuade him to stay any longer, so he said goodbye and departed.

The wet nurse and Ying-ch'un were engaged in replacing the absorbent grass paper under Li P'ing-erh's body, when who should appear but Old Mother Feng, who came forward and saluted them with a bow.

"Old Mother Feng," said Ju-i, "you've been putting on the airs of a grande dame. Why haven't you come to look in on the mistress? Yesterday, Father sent Lai-an to fetch you, but he said you had locked your door and gone off somewhere."

"I can't tell you," said Old Mother Feng, "what a difficult time I've had, what with going to the temple to attend services all day long. I go out first thing in the morning, and then, no matter whether things go well or things go badly, I often don't get home until dark. And then I have to cope with Monk Chang, Monk Li, or Monk Wang."¹⁷

"However do you have the stamina to take on that many monks?" asked Ju-i. "It's a good thing Reverend Wang isn't here to hear you."

When Li P'ing-erh overheard this, she laughed lightly, saying, "This Old Mother never does anything but talk nonsense."

"Old Mother Feng," said Ju-i, "just when you're needed the most, you fail to show up. For the last several days, the mistress has not even swallowed a mouthful of congee, because she's been so depressed at heart. But you no sooner arrive than you induce her to laugh. If you would only consent to look after her for a few days, I'm sure that her ailment would take a turn for the better."

"I guess I'm just the sort of magician needed to fend off disaster for the mistress," said Old Mother Feng.

Everyone had a laugh at this.

Old Mother Feng then felt for Li P'ing-erh's body under the coverlet and said, "Mistress, everything will be all right if you can only get a little better."

She then went on to ask, "Can she get down to sit on the commode by herself?"

"It would be a good thing if she could," said Ying-ch'un. "The last two times she tried it, she struggled to do it and was just able to manage it with our support. For the last two days, however, she has remained on the k'ang. We put absorbent grass paper under her, and change it two or three times a day."

"The fact is," said Ju-i, "that she doesn't have the strength to eat anything much in the way of food, so how can her system withstand the effects of this hemorrhaging?"

As they were speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing came in and, catching sight of Old Mother Feng, said, "Old Feng, you ought to be coming over here to see her all the time. How is it that after you leave you fail to come back?"

"Master," protested the old woman, "how could I fail to come back? The last several days have been the time of year for me to pickle vegetables in the hope of picking up a few candareens. As long as I've got some pickled vegetables in the house, when people bring their karmic encumbrances to me to find places for, I'll have something for them to eat. Otherwise, where would I find the idle money to buy vegetables for them to eat?"

"Why didn't you tell me?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The other day they harvested the vegetables on my country estate. If I turn over the produce from two or three vegetable beds to you, that ought to suffice."

"I'd be much obliged to you once again," said the old woman.

When she had finished speaking, Old Mother Feng went over into an adjacent room. Hsi-men Ch'ing then sat down on the edge of the k'ang, beside which Ying-ch'un was burning some rue incense.

"How are you feeling at heart today?" Hsi-men Ch'ing inquired.

He then went on to ask Ying-ch'un, "Did your mistress eat any congee this morning, or not?"

"She did eat a little better than before," said Ying-ch'un. "Nun Wang brought her some pieces of junket, which I steamed for her, but she only nibbled at them. She was able to swallow no more than two mouthfuls of congee and broth, before she set them aside."

"Just now," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Brother Ying the Second and my page boy went outside the city gate to invite that Taoist Master P'an to come and see you, but he wasn't there. Tomorrow, I'll send Lai-pao on a donkey to go look for him again."

"Send someone after him as soon as possible," said Li P'ing-erh. "No sooner do I close my eyes than that wretch appears to harass me."

"That is only the result of your low spirits," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Just set your mind at rest, and stop imagining him. I'm sure that after we get that Taoist master here to dispel those evil influences for you, and after you've imbibed some of his medicine, you're bound to get better."

"My brother," said Li P'ing-erh, "since I've contracted this awkward illness, there's little chance of my recovery. The best I can hope for is that we might be together again in a life to come. Today, when there's no one else around, I can speak to you freely. I had hoped that I could remain by your side, so that we could share a life together for a number of years, after which, even if we died, we would have had the experience of living together as man and wife. Who could have known that now that I am in my twenty-seventh year, I should first lose my dear adversary of a son, and then have the bad luck to come down with this fatal disorder, and have to abandon you for good? If I am ever to run into you again, it will be in the Gateway to the Shades."

As she spoke, she grasped Hsi-men Ch'ing's hand firmly in her own, while the tears fell from her two eyes, until she choked up and could no longer utter a sound.

Hsi-men Ch'ing also was overcome by grief and wept, saying, "My sister, if you have anything to say, say it."

As the two of them were weeping together in her bedroom, Ch'in-t'ung suddenly came in and said, "An orderly has come to remind you, Master, that tomorrow is the fifteenth day of the month, when you will be expected to participate in the ceremonies of bowing before the imperial tablet, taking the formal roll call, and presiding over the general disposition of pending cases in the yamen. Will you be going, or not? The foreman needs to know so he can attend you.”

“I won’t be able to go tomorrow,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “Take one of my cards and deliver it to His Honor Hsia Yen-ling, so he can take care of bowing before the imperial tablet without me.”

Ch’in-t’ung nodded in assent and went out.

“My brother,” said Li P’ing-erh, “if you do as I wish, you’ll go to the yamen anyway. Don’t let me interfere with your official responsibilities. They’re important. Who knows when I’ll die? It’s early days yet.”

“I’m going to stay at home and keep you company for a few days,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “How could I bear to do otherwise? You must set your mind at rest, and stop worrying so much. Just now, Hua the Elder suggested to me that I look into getting a set of coffin boards for you, with a view to shocking you out of your indisposition. In that case, you’d surely get better.”

Li P’ing-erh nodded in assent and said, “So be it; but you mustn’t let yourself be talked into spending a foolish amount of money. It will suffice if you spend ten taels or so of silver in order to buy me a ready-made coffin, and then bury me beside the grave of your first wife. But don’t have me cremated, if you care about our feelings for each other as man and wife. In that case, both early and late, it will be more convenient for me to partake of whatever offerings are made to the deceased. The members of your household are so numerous, you need to consider what it will take to support them in the future.”

If Hsi-men Ch’ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them, he felt just as though:

A knife were slashing his liver and gall;

A sword were piercing his body and heart.

“My sister,” he said with tears in his eyes, “how can you talk that way? I, Hsi-men Ch’ing, even though I were to become utterly impoverished, would never let you down.”

As they were speaking, Yüeh-niang came in, with a small box of fresh apples in her hand, and said, “Sister Li, my elder brother’s wife has sent these apples for you to eat.”

She then instructed Ying-ch’ün, saying, “Wash these clean, and then cut them into slices with a knife for your mistress to eat.”

“Once again,” said Li P’ing-erh, “I am indebted to your elder brother’s wife for her solicitude on my behalf.”

It did not take long for Ying-ch’ün to peel the apples, cut them into slices, and put them in a bowl, after which, Hsi-men Ch’ing and Yüeh-niang, standing to either side of her, selected a slice to feed to her. They put it into her mouth, but after barely chewing enough of it to get the flavor, she spit it out. Yüeh-niang was afraid that they were tiring her, so she helped her into a supine position, with her face to the wall, and let her go to sleep. Hsi-men Ch’ing and Yüeh-niang then came outside to consult with each other about the situation.

“As for Sister Li,” said Yüeh-niang, “it appears to me that her condition has reached a critical stage. You ought to look into obtaining a set of coffin boards for her as soon as possible, so that they will be available when needed. If you wait until the time for them is at hand, things will be in such an uproar that in scrambling to come up with a decent coffin, you’ll be just like:

A horse trying to catch a rat.¹⁸

That’s no way to handle the business.”

“Today,” responded Hsi-men Ch’ing, “Hua the Elder suggested the same thing. When I mentioned it to her just now, she enjoined me not to spend too much money and said that she would be content with a ready-made coffin. She went on to say, ‘The members of your household are so numerous, you need to consider what it will take to support them in the future.’ Her words have left me sore at heart ever since.”

He then went on to say, “We might as well wait until Taoist Master P’an has come to consider her case before looking out for a coffin.”

“Look here,” said Yüeh-niang, “you don’t know what you’re saying. When a person is so emaciated she hardly retains her human shape, and when her esophagus is so stopped up that she can’t even swallow a spoonful of water, you are still vainly expecting her to get well. We should be prepared for any contingency:

Beating the drum to sound an advance on the one hand,

And waving the flag to signal a retreat on the other.

If she is fortunate enough to recover, we can always donate the coffin to someone else. It won’t cost us anything to speak of.”

“I’ll do as you say,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing.

He then went back to the rear compound with Yüeh-niang and sent a page boy to summon Pen the Fourth.

When Pen the Fourth arrived in the reception hall, he asked him, “Who do you think has the best coffin boards available? I’d like you and my son-in-law to take some silver with you and see if you can find a good set.”

“Battalion Commander Ch’en’s place on Main Street,” said Pen the Fourth, “has recently acquired several sets of good coffin boards.”

“If he’s got good coffin boards available,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, turning to Ch’en Ching-chi, “you go back to the rear compound and ask your mother-in-law for five large silver ingots, so the two of you can go look for a set.”

Before long, Ch’en Ching-chi came back with five silver ingots of fifty taels weight each and then set off on this errand with Pen Ti-ch’uan. They did not return to report on their mission until mid-afternoon.

“What kept you so long?” asked Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“When we went to Battalion Commander Ch’en’s place,” the two of them replied, “we looked at several sets of coffin boards, but they were all of mediocre quality, and the price was not right. On our way home, however, we happened to run into your kinsman Ch'iao Hung in the street, who said that Provincial Graduate Shang has a fine set of coffin boards. They were originally brought back by his father from his tour of duty as prefectural judge of Ch'eng-tu in Szechwan and were intended for his wife. Initially there were two sets of coffin boards from Peach Blossom Cavern,¹⁹ one of which has already been used, so this is the only set remaining. It is a complete set of five boards of different sizes, from which the side walls, bottom, lid, and end pieces can be fashioned,²⁰ and the asking price is 370 taels of silver. Ch'iao Hung went with us to look at these coffin boards, and they turned out to be of incomparably superior quality. Ch'iao Hung bargained over the price with Provincial Graduate Shang for some time, but he was only willing to reduce it by 50 taels. If it were not for the fact that he is planning to go to the capital to participate in the metropolitan examination next year, for which he needs the money, he would not be willing to part with this set of coffin boards. He also indicated that he is taking into consideration the fact that it is our household that wants them. If it were anyone else, he would insist on 350 taels."

"Since it is Ch'iao Hung who is acting as advocate," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we might as well pay out the 320 taels and have them carried here. But see that you do it quietly, without:

Ringing bells and beating drums."

"He has already accepted our 250 taels," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "so we only owe him another 70 taels of silver to close the deal."

He then went back to the rear compound and got Yüeh-niang to give him another 70 taels of "snowflake" silver, after which the two of them left to complete their errand.

At dusk that evening, who should appear but a crowd of idlers, who carried the coffin boards through the gate, wrapped in strips of red felt, put them down in the front courtyard, and unwrapped them for Hsi-men Ch'ing to look at. Sure enough, they turned out to be fine coffin boards. Artisans were promptly engaged to saw them open, and when they did, they exuded a pungent aroma. Each piece was five inches thick, two feet five inches wide, and seven feet five inches long.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's heart was filled with delight, and he showed them off to Ying Po-chüeh, saying, "These coffin boards will pass muster."

Ying Po-chüeh praised them unstintingly, saying, "It could be said that these coffin boards are fated to be hers.

Every object has its rightful owner.

Since my sister-in-law had the good fortune to marry you, Brother, it is only appropriate that she should end up in possession of these coffin boards."

Then, turning to the artisans, he said, "If you only take the pains to do a good job, your employer will reward you with five taels of silver."

"We understand," the artisans replied, and then proceeded, hugger-mugger, to go to work in the front reception hall, working all night to construct the coffin as quickly as possible. But no more of this.

Ying Po-chüeh then enjoined Lai-pao, "Early tomorrow morning, at the fifth watch, you should go to invite Taoist Master P'an. If he is willing to come, you should accompany him back here. This matter will brook no delay."

When he had finished speaking, he continued to keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company that evening in the front reception hall, looking on as the artisans worked on the construction of the coffin. It was not until the first watch that he got up to go home.

"Come back as soon as you can tomorrow morning," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'm afraid that Taoist Master P'an may arrive rather early."

"I understand," responded Ying Po-chüeh, after which he said goodbye and went out the gate.

To resume our story, Old Mother Feng and Nun Wang were keeping Li P'ing-erh company in her room that night, when who should appear but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who came in to see her after the conclave in the front compound broke up and wanted to go to sleep there.

Li P'ing-erh objected to this, saying, "You mustn't think of it. This room is:

Polluted and unclean,²¹ and the two of them are also here. It wouldn't be convenient. You go sleep somewhere else."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that Nun Wang and Old Mother Feng were there, he went over to Chin-lien's quarters next door.

Li P'ing-erh told Ying-ch'un to close the postern gate and secure it with the crossbar, after which she told her to light a lamp, open her trunk, and get out several items of clothing and silver ornaments, and place them beside her.

First of all, she called Nun Wang over, gave her a five-tael ingot of silver, along with a bolt of silk, and said, "After I am dead, whatever you do, you must invite some fellow nuns to join you in recitations of the Blood Pool Sutra on my behalf."

"Mistress mine," expostulated Nun Wang, "you are worrying yourself over much. If Heaven only takes pity on you, you are likely to recover."

"You just put these things away," said Li P'ing-erh, "and don't tell the First Lady that I gave you any silver. Just say that I gave you this bolt of silk to compensate you for arranging the recitations of the sutra."

"I understand what you're saying," said Nun Wang, and she thereupon took possession of both the silver and the silk.

Li P'ing-erh then called over Old Mother Feng, picked up four taels of silver from beside her pillow, along with a white damask jacket, a yellow damask skirt, and a silver comb, and gave them to her, saying, "Old Feng, you're a familiar companion. You have served me from the time I was a child right up until the present time. Now, after I am dead, these articles of clothing and this ornamental comb can serve you as keepsakes, and you can use this silver to defray the cost of a coffin. And don't worry about the house. I'll talk to Father about it, so that you can continue to live there and act as a caretaker on his behalf, as it were. He's not about to evict you or anything like that."

Old Mother Feng accepted the silver and the clothing with one hand and knelt down to kowtow with tears in her eyes, saying, "It seems my luck is running out. As long as you remain alive I can count on you to look out for me. But if:

Anything untoward should happen to you,²²
what will become of me?"

Li P'ing-erh also called over the wet nurse Ju-i and gave her a purple damask jacket, a blue damask skirt, an old satin cloak, two hairpins with gold heads, and a silver cap ornament,²³ saying, "This is in recognition of the fact that you nursed my baby boy. Now, the boy has died, but, as I said, I didn't want you to bind up your breasts as though your job were over. It was my hope that as long as I remained alive, I might have further occasion to use you. Now, unexpectedly, it looks as though I am going to die, but I will talk to your master and the First Lady, and suggest that after my death, if the First Lady gives birth to a son, they should not get rid of you, but allow you to nurse her child. I am giving you these articles of clothing as a keepsake. Please don't take it amiss."

The wet nurse got down on her knees and kowtowed, saying with tears in her eyes, "I had truly hoped that I would be able to serve you to the end. You have never so much as gotten angry with me, or raised your voice to criticize me. It's just my bad luck that the boy died, and that you have contracted this fatal disorder. Please, whatever happens, do tell the First Lady that my husband is dead, and that as long as I live, I hope to be able to continue serving the master and mistress. If I were to leave, where would I go?"

When she had finished speaking, she accepted the clothes and ornaments, kowtowed, and then got up and stood to one side, while wiping the tears from her eyes.

Li P'ing-erh then called over Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un, who knelt down before her while she addressed them, saying, "The two of you have also served me since you were children. Now, after I have died, I won't be able to look after you any more. You both have enough in the way of clothing, so there is no need to give you any, but I will give you these two pairs of gold-headed hairpins, and these two floral ornaments of gold as keepsakes. As my senior maidservant, Ying-ch'un, since Father has already had his way with you, there is no call for you to leave the household. I will ask the First Lady to let you serve in her quarters. As my junior maidservant, Hsiu-ch'un, I'll ask the First Lady to look out for another family for you to serve, lest you be looked askance at for remaining in my quarters, and be subject to criticism by others as a slave without a master. After I'm dead, you may let your true colors show; but if you work for anyone else and affect the:

Coquetry and petulance of a spoiled child, or endeavor to:

Do whatever you like for good or for ill, the way you have been accustomed to do while in my service, no one will tolerate it."

Hsiu-ch'un knelt down on the ground and wept, saying, "Mother, I won't leave here even to save my life."

"Don't be silly," said Li P'ing-erh. "If you remain in these quarters, who will you serve?"

"I will keep vigil over your spirit tablet," said Hsiu-ch'un.

"Even though offerings may be made to my spirit tablet for a while," said Li P'ing-erh, "eventually the day will come when it will be burnt. You'll have no alternative but to leave then."

"I could serve the First Lady along with Ying-ch'un," said Hsiu-ch'un.

"Well, let's leave it at that," said Li P'ing-erh. "I'm afraid Hsiu-ch'un is still somewhat naive in her understanding of things."

After listening to Li P'ing-erh's injunctions, Ying-ch'un took possession of the head ornaments she had been given, while weeping so hard she could not get a word out. Truly:

Tear-filled eyes gaze into tear-filled eyes;
The brokenhearted see off
the brokenhearted.²⁴

That night Li P'ing-erh managed to issue her final injunctions to everyone.

At dawn the next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing came into her room, and Li P'ing-erh asked him, "Have you purchased a coffin for me, or not?"

"The coffin boards were procured yesterday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "They're being made up into a coffin in the front compound right now, with a view to shocking you out of your indisposition. If you recover, we can always donate it to someone else."

"How much silver did you spend on it?" Li P'ing-erh went on to ask. "You shouldn't spend money indiscriminately, or you'll end up with not enough to live on."

"It wasn't much," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I only paid a hundred some taels of silver."

"That's still too much," said Li P'ing-erh. "See that you get it prepared in advance and lay it out for me."

After talking with her for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing went back out to the front compound to watch the progress of the coffin construction.

Who should appear at this juncture but Wu Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh, who came into her room and, seeing that her condition was extremely serious, asked, "Sister Li, how are you feeling?"

Li P'ing-erh grasped Yüeh-niang by the hand and wept, saying, "First Lady, I am not going to recover."

Yüeh-niang wept with her, saying, "Sister Li, if you have anything you want to say, the Second Lady is here with me, you can say it to the two of us."

"What have I got to say?" said Li P'ing-erh. "During these several years that we've been sisters, you've never let me down. I had really hoped to remain together with you until our heads of hair turned white, but, contrary to my expectations, my fate has turned out to be bitter. First, I lost my darling boy, and now, I've been so unfortunate as to come down with this awkward ailment, which is going to be the death of me. After I'm dead, these two maidservants of mine will have no one to look after them. Since Father has already had his way with the senior maidservant, I suggest that she be assigned to your quarters, where she can wait on you. As for the junior maidservant, if you wish to employ her, then keep her. Otherwise, see if you can't arrange a monogamous marriage for her with some humble family, so there will be but:

One husband and a single wife.

That way she won't be subject to criticism as a slave without a master, and it would be a fitting reward for the service she has rendered me. In that case, my mouth and eyes will be content to remain closed after my death. In addition, the wet nurse Ju-i has repeatedly expressed her unwillingness to leave the household. If you consent to do me the favor of assenting to her wishes, it will be an appropriate reward for her service in nursing my child. And in the future, when your own ten months of pregnancy are up, if you bear a son, she can take over the job of breast-feeding him."

"Sister Li," said Yüeh-niang, "you can put your mind to rest about these matters. The two of us will take responsibility for taking care of them. We must:

Prepare for the worst and hope for the best.

If you should end up:

High as the hills or deep as the sea,

I will arrange to have Ying-ch'un work for me, and Hsiu-ch'un work for the Second Lady. The maidservant who is assigned to the Second Lady's quarters at present is not a reliable worker and will have to be gotten rid of sooner or later. I'll have Hsiu-ch'un wait on her instead. As for the wet nurse Ju-i, although you say that she has no place to go, there is no room for her in my quarters. No matter whether I have a child or not, in the future I'll arrange a match for her with one of the servants, so that she can remain in the household as a servant's wife. That ought to take care of it."

Li Chiao-erh then spoke up from the side, saying, "Sister Li, you should stop worrying about these matters. The two of us will take responsibility for them. In the future, after your funeral observances are over, I'll take her into my quarters to wait upon me, and see that she receives preferential treatment."

Li P'ing-erh then told the wet nurse and her two maidservants to come over and kowtow to their two benefactors. Yüeh-niang was unable to control her tears.

Before long, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Sun Hsüeh-o came in to see how she was, and Li P'ing-erh bestowed a few sisterly words that were both kind and just upon each of them, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Later on, after Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and the others had left, leaving Yüeh-niang alone in the room with her, Li P'ing-erh wept quietly and said to her, "Mother, in the future, if you bear a son, be sure to raise him carefully so that he can be the root that perpetuates Father's ancestral line. Don't be as careless as I was and allow yourself to be undone by anyone else."

"Sister," said Yüeh-niang, "I understand what you're saying."

Gentle reader take note: This single sentence had such an effect on Yüeh-niang that, later on, after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, when Chin-lien was no longer permitted to remain in the household, it was all due to her memory of this deathbed remark of Li P'ing-erh's. Truly:

It has always been true that gratitude for kindness and festering resentment;

Even in a thousand or ten thousand years will never be allowed to gather dust.

As they were speaking, who should appear but Ch'in-t'ung, who told them to straighten up the room and burn some incense because Taoist Master P'an from the Temple of the Five Peaks had arrived. Yüeh-niang supervised the maidservants as they cleaned up the room, prepared some clear tea brewed with purified water, and ignited some genuine "hundred-blend" incense.²⁵ Yüeh-niang and the other women then concealed themselves in the bedroom next door in order to eavesdrop on the proceedings.

Before long, whom should they see but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who ushered Taoist Master P'an into Li P'ing-erh's room. What did he look like? Behold:

On his head is a Taoist cap with the Five Peaks wreathed in sunset clouds;

His body is appareled in a short robe of coarse black cotton cloth.

His waist is bound by a girdle woven of varicolored silken thread;

On his back he bears a sword of antique bronze incised with a pine-grain pattern.²⁶

On his two feet he wears a pair of double-looped hemp sandals;

In his hand he holds a five-luminary demon-dispelling fan.²⁷

His eyebrows are peaked,

His two eyes are almond-shaped;

His mouth is foursquare,
Trailing a set of side whiskers.²⁸
His demeanor is awe-inspiring;
His appearance is imposing.
If he is not a roving immortal wandering beyond the clouds,
He must hail from the Isles of the Blest or the Jade Palace.

Lo and behold, as he came in through the postern gate and made his way around the screen-wall, just as he approached Li P'ing-erh's quarters, beneath the stylobate under the veranda, the Taoist master stepped backwards two paces, seemed to be berating someone, and repeated a few occult formulas, before he stepped inside, as the servants pulled the portiere aside, and approached the sickbed. Once there:

He focused his two eyes upon her,
Exerting the wise discernment of their divine vision,
Brandished his sword in one hand,
Performed calculations on the joints of his fingers while pacing the dipper, and Recited an incantation,²⁹
Instantly comprehending the situation.

Going out into the parlor, he proceeded to set up an incense table facing the exterior of the building, and Hsi-men Ch'ing ignited some incense.

After burning some written talismans, Taoist Master P'an cried out in a loud voice, "Divine marshal on duty this day, why have you not yet appeared?"

He then spurted a mouthful of consecrated water out of his mouth, whereupon a strong gust of wind arose, and a yellow-turbaned warrior³⁰ appeared before him. Behold:

His forehead is enveloped in a yellow silk turban;³¹
His body clad in a purple robe of embroidered silk.
A Lion Barbarian girdle³² tightly binds his wolflike waist;
Leopard-skin trousers securely enclose his tigerlike body.
He constantly wanders the highways of the clouds;
He is accustomed to navigating the astral winds.
The grotto heavens and blessed abodes³³
he traverses in an instant;
The sacred peaks, rivers, and Feng-tu
he visits in a snap of the fingers.
If a malevolent dragon wreaks havoc,
He can apprehend it from the bottom of the sea;
If evil sprites should make trouble,
He can smash their mountain lairs and nab them.
Within the halls of the Jade Emperor,
He is known as a talismanic functionary;
Before the carriage of the Northern Dipper,
He holds the title of celestial warrior.³⁴
He is always on duty before the altar to protect the law;
He constantly visits the mundane world to vanquish demons.³⁵
On his breast is suspended the bronze plaque of the Board of Thunder;
In his hand he holds a brilliantly decorated gilded battle-axe.³⁶

That divine marshal stood respectfully beneath the steps and said in a loud voice, "Having summoned me, what would you command me to do?"

Taoist Master P'an said, "The woman, née Li, of the Hsi-men household is unwell, and he has lodged an appeal on her behalf before my altar. I command you to apprehend the local tutelary god, and the six household spirits, in order to ascertain whether there are any evil spirits at work, and hale them before me. This matter will brook no delay."

When he had finished speaking, the spirit disappeared.

In a little while, Taoist Master P'an closed his eyes and changed countenance, sat upright at his place, and rapped his tablet of authority on the surface of the altar table, just as if he were hearing a case in court. It was some time before he stopped and came outside.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ushered him out to the summerhouse in the front compound and asked him what he had ascertained.

"Unfortunately," said Taoist Master P'an, "this woman is being sued in the court of the underworld by someone who suffered an injustice at her hands in a former existence. It is not a case of evil spirits, so they are not subject to apprehension."

"Ritual Master," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is there anything you can do to exorcise the source of the problem?"

"In the case of an:

Enemy or creditor, from a previous existence," said Taoist Master P'an, "it is up to the plaintiff himself. If he is willing to drop the case, it may be dropped; but even the authorities of the underworld cannot force him to do so."

Taoist Master P'an Conjures Up a Yellow-turbaned Warrior

Because he saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was courteous and sincere, he then went on to ask, "How old is your lady?"

"She was born in the year of the sheep," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and is currently in her twenty-seventh year."

"All right then," said Taoist Master P'an, "let me perform a sacrifice at the altar to the star that governs her destiny, and see what happens to the lantern that corresponds to her fate."

"When will you perform the sacrifice?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing. "And what will you need in the way of incense, paper money, and sacrificial offerings?"

"This evening," said Taoist Master P'an, "during the third watch, at midnight, I will delineate the boundaries of the sacred area with white ash, set up a lantern altar, invest it with yellow damask, place the lantern representing the star that governs her date of birth upon it, and make sacrificial offerings of the five grains, dates, and soup, without need of wine or meat. Then I will merely set out twenty-seven lanterns of destiny, corresponding to the years of her age, and cover them with a canopy. Nothing else will be required. While I am officiating at the sacrifice, chickens and dogs must be excluded from the premises, to prevent them from coming in and interfering with the proceedings. During the ceremony, you sir, having observed the appropriate ritual abstentions, should dress yourself in black, and prostrate yourself below the altar."

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw to it that all the suggested preparations were carried out to the letter and did not presume to enter the consecrated area, but remained in his study, where he performed his ablutions, observed the ritual abstentions, and changed into clean clothing. He also asked Ying Po-chüeh to remain with him rather than going home, in order to share a vegetarian repast with Taoist Master P'an.

During the third watch, when the setting up of the lantern altar had been completed, Taoist Master P'an took a seat in lofty isolation at the upper end of the consecrated area. The lantern altar was arrayed before him, with representations of the Green Dragon of the East, the White Tiger of the West, the Red Bird of the South, and the Dark Warrior of the North presiding over the four directions. Above it was suspended a three-tiered canopy, on which were represented the symbols of the twelve constellations correlated with the twelve earthly branches, arranged in a circle. Beneath this were arrayed the twenty-seven lanterns of destiny.

The celebrant began by declaiming the words of a petition, while Hsi-men Ch'ing, dressed in black, prostrated himself beneath the steps. The servants had all been excluded from the area, so that there was no one else present. The area was:

Ablaze with lamps and candles, as the twenty-seven lanterns were simultaneously lighted. Taoist Master P'an, seated upon his ritual throne, let down his hair, brandished his sword, and:

Recited an incantation.

After which, he proceeded to:

Invoke the Dipper,

Imbibe the primordial breath,

Pace the void, and

Perambulate the jasper altar.

Truly:

When three sticks of incense are burnt

the Three Realms unite;

Each command that is issued results in a clap of thunder.

Behold:

In the clear sky, the stars and moon shine brightly,

When all of a sudden,

The earth turns black and the sky darkens.³⁷

The curtains suspended on all four sides of the summerhouse,

Are suddenly swept by a gust of eerie wind.

Truly:

It is not the roaring of tigers,

Nor is it the droning of dragons.³⁸

It appears to penetrate the doors and permeate the curtains;³⁹

It certainly destroys the flowers and scatters the leaves.

It drives the clouds out of the hills;

And sends the rain back to the rivers.

The wild geese are separated from their mates and cry in distress;

The gulls and herons in their startled flocks seek the treetops.
The goddess Ch'ang-o hastens to batten down
her palace in the moon;
The wind-borne Lieh-tzu, high up in space, calls out to be rescued.⁴⁰

In the wake of three powerful gusts of wind, a chill breeze blew in that extinguished every last one of Li P'ing-erh's twenty-seven lanterns of destiny. Only a single flame recovered, by the light of which Taoist Master P'an, seated on his ritual throne, was able to see clearly a figure clothed in white, who came in from outside, accompanied by two black-clad servitors and, holding a document in his hand, proceeded to present it before the altar. When Taoist Master P'an examined it, he saw that it was an arrest warrant issued by the court of the underworld, which bore three official seals.

Startled by this, he descended from his ritual throne and, stepping forward, urged Hsi-men Ch'ing to get to his feet, saying, thus and so, "Sir, please stand up. It seems that, in your lady's case:

One who has offended Heaven, has nowhere else to pray.⁴¹

Her lanterns of destiny have been extinguished. How then is she to be saved? I fear that her end is imminent."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he lowered his head without a word, and his eyes brimmed over with tears.

Weeping, he besought the exorcist, saying, "My only hope, Ritual Master, is that you can do something to save her."

"One's allotted years are hard to evade."

said Taoist Master P'an. "It will be difficult to save her."

He then expressed a desire to depart.

Hsi-men Ch'ing urged him repeatedly to stay, saying, "Wait until daybreak, and you can get an early start."

"We people who have left home to enter the priesthood," said Taoist Master P'an, "are accustomed to:

Hiking through the underbrush and sleeping in the dew;⁴²

Camping in the mountains and stopping over at temples.

It is only natural."

Hsi-men Ch'ing did not press him on the subject any further but ordered his attendants to bring out a bolt of fabric and three taels of silver as compensation for his performance of the ritual.

"I am a practitioner of the ultimate way of August Heaven," said Taoist Master P'an, "and have sworn an oath to Heaven itself that I would not presume to covet worldly wealth. Were I to do so, I would:

Suffer for my culpability."⁴³

Only after demurring repeatedly did he direct his acolyte to accept the fabric in order to make a Taoist robe, and then he prepared to take his leave and depart.

Before doing so, he enjoined Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "This evening, sir, you should observe the taboo against going into the sickroom, lest you bring a catastrophe upon yourself. Beware! Beware!"

Having finished speaking, he was escorted out to the front gate, where he:

Shook his sleeves in disdain and departed.⁴⁴

Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to the summerhouse to oversee the clearing away of the lantern altar. When he understood that there was no saving star to be hoped for, he was profoundly saddened, and when he sat down with Ying Po-chüeh, without his realizing it, his eyes overflowed with tears.

"This is merely an instance of the fact that everyone has a predetermined number of years to live," said Ying Po-chüeh. "When things come to such a pass, no amount of effort will avail. Brother, you should try to worry yourself less about it."

Then, upon hearing the sounding of the fourth watch, he said, "Brother, you are tired. You should get yourself some rest. I will go home for the time being, and come back tomorrow."

"I'll have a page boy get a lantern and see you on your way," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He then ordered Lai-an to fetch a lantern and accompanied them outside, after which he saw to the closing of the gate and came back inside. Hsi-men Ch'ing sat in the study all by himself, with a candle in his hand, feeling deeply disturbed at heart.

All he could do was give vent to long sighs as he thought to himself, "The ritual master warned me not to go into her sickroom, but how can I bear not to do so? Even if it should cost me my life, what of it? I feel the need to keep vigil, and have a word with her."

Thereupon, he went into her room and saw that Li P'ing-erh was lying with her face to the wall.

When she heard Hsi-men Ch'ing come in, she turned over, and said to him, "My brother, why didn't you come in before?"

She then went on to ask, "What did that Taoist master have to say about the lantern ritual?"

"You can relax on that score," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The lanterns did not indicate anything to worry about."

"My brother," said Li P'ing-erh, "you're deceiving me. Just now, that wretch, with two other people in tow, appeared before me once again and troubled me for a while. He said, 'You may have invited a ritual master to come and exorcise me, but my plaint against you has already been approved by the authorities in the underworld. You will not be allowed to escape.' He was angry when he went away and is likely to come back to get me tomorrow."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this:

Two streams of tears crisscrossed his face, and he commenced to weep out loud, saying, "My sister, you should just set your mind at rest, and pay no attention to him. I had really hoped to be able to keep company with you throughout the days to come, but who could have anticipated that you would abandon me and go off this way? I, Hsi-men Ch'ing, would rather suffer the closing of my own mouth and eyes in death, rather than this:

Stomach-turning and gut-wrenching suspense."⁴⁵

Li P'ing-erh put both arms around Hsi-men Ch'ing's neck and gave way to:

Sobbing and wailing.

After weeping grievously for some time, she became too hoarse to cry audibly any longer and said, "My brother, I had hoped that we could:

Share our life together like a double-headed flower.

Hsi-men Ch'ing Weeps Painfully on Behalf of Li P'ing-erh

Who could have anticipated that today I would have to leave you in death? Taking advantage of what time is left before my eyes are closed, I'd like to say a few words to you. Your household wealth is extensive, and you are without paternal relatives to rely on, or anyone to assist you in managing it. You must consider carefully whatever you do, and not give way to the impulse of the moment. And you must not do anything to the detriment of the First Lady or the others. She is feeling poorly in her present condition, and, sooner or later, she may give birth to a child that can serve as a foundation for the perpetuation of your ancestral line, and prevent the dissipation of your property. Moreover, you occupy an official post. From now on, you ought not to go out drinking so often and should endeavor to come home earlier when you do. Your household responsibilities are important. The situation will not be the same as when I was here to admonish you. If I die, who will there be to deter you with bitter-tasting but well-meant advice?"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard these words, he felt just as though:

A knife were slashing his heart and liver, and he wept, saying, "My sister, I understand what you're saying. Don't you worry yourself about me. I, Hsi-men Ch'ing, must have been:

Bereft of affinity and short on fortune, in a former existence, to be:

Unable to remain husband and wife to the end,⁴⁶ with you in this incarnation. It pains me to death! Heaven is destroying me!"

Li P'ing-erh went on to say, "With regard to Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un, I have already spoken to the First Lady about them. In the future, when I am dead, Ying-ch'un can be reassigned to wait on the First Lady. With regard to the junior maidservant, the Second Lady has already agreed to take responsibility for her. She lacks any satisfactory maidservant in her quarters, so she can be deputed to wait on her."

"My sister," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you don't need to instruct me on that score. Once you are dead, who would presume to separate your maidservants? And the wet nurse, also, will not be dismissed. They will all be expected to keep vigil over your spirit tablet."

"What's so important about the spirit tablet?" said Li P'ing-erh. "Once it's been brought home after the funeral, and the fifth of the seven weekly commemorations have been held, it can simply be burned, and that will be the end of it."

"My sister," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "don't you worry about any such thing. So long as I, Hsi-men Ch'ing, am alive, offerings will continue to be made to your spirit tablet."

As their conclave continued, Li P'ing-erh urged him, saying, "You'd better go get some sleep. It's late."

"I'm not going to sleep," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll keep you company here in your room."

"I'm not about to die just yet," said Li P'ing-erh. "This room is contaminated with foul odor, and you'll be bothered by the smoke of the incense. Moreover, it won't be convenient for them to look after me with you here."

Hsi-men Ch'ing had no alternative but to issue instructions to the maidservants to look after their mistress with care, after which, he returned to the master suite in the rear compound and told Yüeh-niang in detail about how the lantern ritual had been of no avail.

"Just now, when I went into her room," he said, "I observed that she could still talk clearly enough. If Heaven will only take pity on her, I imagine she may recover yet. Who knows?"

"The sockets of her eyes have contracted," said Yüeh-niang. "Her lips have dried up, and her ears are burning. How can she be expected to recover? It's only a question of time. This ailment of hers is one that allows her to remain clearheaded and to speak distinctly right up until she stops breathing."

"Ever since she became a member of our household," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "she has never given offense to anyone, high or low. Moreover, she has a most accommodating disposition and never has a bad word to say about anybody. How can I bear to give her up?"

Having said this, he started to weep again, and Yüeh-niang also could not prevent her tears from falling, but we will say no more at present about this colloquy between Hsi-men Ch'ing and Yüeh-niang.

To resume our story, Li P'ing-erh called for Ying-ch'un and the wet nurse and said, "Help me turn over to face the wall, so I can take a nap."

"What time has it gotten to be?" she then went on to ask.

"The cock has not yet crowed," said the wet nurse. "It must be sometime in the fourth watch."

She then said to Ying-ch'un, "Let's replace the absorbent grass paper under her body, help her turn over to face the wall, and cover her with a quilt, so she can get some sleep."

Everybody had been staying up all night without any sleep. Old Mother Feng and Nun Wang finally went to bed behind the latched door in the adjacent room, while Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un put their bedding down on the floor in front of their mistress and lay down to sleep.

They had not been asleep for more than an hour and were still:

In a state of profound slumber, when Ying-ch'un dreamed that Li P'ing-erh got down off the k'ang and gave her a shake, saying, "The two of you look after the house. I'm going away."

She suddenly woke up with a start and saw that the lamp on the table had not yet gone out. When she looked at the bed, her mistress was still lying with her face to the wall, but when she felt with her hand, she found that there was no longer any breath coming out of her mouth. She did not know just when it happened, but:

Alas and alack;

She had stopped breathing and died.

What a pity that the life of such a beautiful woman,

Should turn into only an instance of a spring dream.⁴⁷

Truly:

When King Yama decrees that you will die

during the third watch;
The hour of your death cannot be delayed until the fifth watch.⁴⁸

Ying-ch'un hastily woke everyone up, and they lit lamps and gathered to see what had happened. Sure enough, they observed that she was no longer breathing, and that her body was lying in a pool of blood. In a state of panic, they ran back to the rear compound to inform Hsi-men Ch'ing of the situation.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard that Li P'ing-erh was dead, he and Wu Yüeh-niang hastened to the front compound:

Covering two steps with every one,
and lifted the quilt off her body. Behold:
The color of her face was unchanged;
Her body still retained some warmth;
She had slipped away unobtrusively.

Her body was clothed in nothing but a bodice of red satin.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, disregarding the fact that her body was stained with coagulated blood, embraced her with both arms and kissed her fragrant cheeks, protesting again and again, "My lost sister! My kind and just sister, with your accommodating disposition! How can you abandon me this way? I would rather that I, Hsi-men Ch'ing, had died in your stead. I also am:

Not long for this world.
What have I got left to live for?"

There in her bedroom, he leapt three feet off the ground and started to cry out loud in full voice. Wu Yüeh-niang also wiped away her tears while weeping incessantly. Before long, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Sun Hsüeh-o, and the members of the entire household, high and low, including the maidservants and waiting women, commenced weeping as though they were endeavoring to raise the roof, so that:

The sound of their lamentations shook the earth.⁴⁹

Yüeh-niang said to Li Chiao-erh and Meng Yü-lou, "We don't know just when she died during the night. She doesn't even have an article of clothing on her body."

"I felt her body," said Meng Yü-lou, "and it's still warm. It must not be very long since she departed. If we don't seize the opportunity to put some clothes on her while her limbs are still warm, what are we waiting for?"

Yüeh-niang observed that Hsi-men Ch'ing was reclining face-to-face on top of her body, weeping, and crying out, "Heaven is bent on destroying me, Hsi-men Ch'ing! Sister, during the three years you've been a member of my household, you haven't enjoyed a single good day. I've been the ruination of you."

When Yüeh-niang heard these words, she was somewhat perturbed at heart and said, "What ridiculous palaver!

Weep for her a couple of times and forget it.

Have you no compunction about crying that way face-to-face with a corpse? You run the risk of being contaminated by the foul emanations from her mouth. If she hasn't enjoyed a single good day, who is there who has?

A person's death is like the extinction of a lamp.

Even half a day of borrowed time is not to be had.

If you were able to keep her alive, that would be fine, but when a person's allotted years are up, who can avoid going by this path?"

She then went on to instruct Li Chiao-erh and Meng Yü-lou, "The two of you take the keys and look in the other room for the burial garments that she has prepared in advance, so that we can help each other get them onto her."

She also said, "Sister Six, the two of us had better see if we can straighten up her hair."

Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Yüeh-niang, "Try to select two sets of garments that she was particularly fond of to dress her with."

Yüeh-niang accordingly instructed Li Chiao-erh and Meng Yü-lou, saying, "Look for that newly tailored jacket of scarlet satin brocade, with the willow-yellow brocade skirt; that blouse of lilac-colored, cloud-patterned, figured silk, that she wore earlier this year for our visit to kinsman Ch'iao Hung's place, with the wide trailing skirt of kingfisher-blue; and that newly made up white satin jacket, with the skirt of yellow pongee."

Thereupon, with Ying-ch'un holding a lamp, and Meng Yü-lou holding the keys, they proceeded to open the interior door to the adjacent bedroom and take down the second lacquer chest adorned with gold tracery, which was stored on top of the bedstead with retractable steps and contained newly made up clothing. After opening the lid to the chest, Meng Yü-lou and Li Chiao-erh searched through it for some time and came up with the three outfits of clothing they were looking for, as well as a short, close-fitting purple satin camisole, a petticoat of white pongee, a pair of scarlet underdrawers, a pair of white satin woman's stockings, and a pair of figured ankle leggings. Li Chiao-erh carried these things over to the adjacent room and showed them to Yüeh-niang.

Yüeh-niang was engaged, together with Chin-lien, in arranging Li P'ing-erh's chignon by the light of a lamp. They coiled it securely, wrapped it in a raven-black kerchief, and used four gold hairpins to hold it in place.

Li Chiao-erh then asked, "What-colored shoes should we look for to put on her?"

"Sister," said P'an Chin-lien, "the pair of shoes that she fancied the most was that one made of scarlet brocade, embroidered with the motif of 'A Parrot Plucking a Peach,' with white satin high heels. She hardly wore them more than a couple of times. We might as well try to find that pair to put on her."

"That will never do," said Yüeh-niang. "If she wore those when appearing before the court of the nether world, she'd be condemned to jump into the fiery pit. Look instead for that pair that she wore the other day when she went to her sister-in-law's place outside the city gate, the pair made of purple silk brocade, with high heels, that is also embroidered with the motif of 'A Parrot Plucking a Peach.' That would be a more appropriate pair for us to put on her."

When Li Chiao-erh heard this, she went to look in the four small lacquer chests adorned with gold tracery in which Li P'ing-erh kept her hundred or more pairs of shoes, but, though she went through them all, she failed to find them.

"When Mother wore them," said Ying-ch'un, "she always put them back here. Where could they have gone?"

She then went back to the kitchen to ask Hsiu-ch'un about it.

"I saw Mother wrap them up and put them in the commode on top of which the boxes rest," said Hsiu-ch'un.

When they opened the drawers of the commode, they finally located them, inside another large package of new shoes. The group of them then proceeded, hugger-mugger, to get the corpse properly clothed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then supervised a number of page boys in taking down and rolling up the scrolls of painting and calligraphy in the main reception hall, and creating an enclosed space there with standing screens, to which Li P'ing-erh's body was carried out on the leaf of a door and laid out in state. A brocade mat was placed underneath her body, and it was covered with a paper shroud. A table for her spirit tablet and an incense table were set up, and a vigil lamp was lighted. Two page boys were deputed to serve the spirit of the departed, one of them to strike the chime, and the other to burn paper money. Tai-an was dispatched to fetch Yin-yang Master Hsü as quickly as possible, so he could ascertain the time of her death and interpret his divinatory texts. Once Yüeh-niang had supervised the removal of the articles of clothing needed to dress the corpse, the door to Li P'ing-erh's bedroom was locked. Only the room with the k'ang was left open for the use of the maidservants and waiting women.

When Old Mother Feng saw that her mistress was dead, she wept as though she had:

Three noses from which to drivel,

As well as two eyes to shed tears.

Nun Wang, for her part, murmured monotonously as she recited the Heart Sutra,⁵⁰ the Sutra of the Healing Buddha,⁵¹ the Scripture on Delivery from Enmity,⁵² the rangama Sutra,⁵³ and the Great Compassion Dh ran,⁵⁴ as she besought the Bodhisattva King Who Escorts the Dead to conduct her on the road to the shades.

Meanwhile, in the front reception hall, Hsi-men Ch'ing beat his breast in sorrow, and couldn't help caressing the corpse, as he wept until his voice became hoarse, protesting again and again, without ceasing, "My kind and just sister, with your accommodating disposition."

While everyone was so preoccupied, the cock crowed, and Tai-an came back with Yin-yang Master Hsü, who saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing with the words, "I can see that Your Honor is distressed. At what time was it that your lady died?"

"The precise time is not known," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "At the time she went to sleep the fourth watch had already been sounded, and the people in her quarters were so fatigued that they were all fast asleep, so we don't know exactly when it was that she died."

"Which of your ladies was it?" asked Master Hsü.

"It was my sixth insignificant concubine," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She had developed an awkward ailment that dragged on interminably right up to the present time."

"It doesn't matter," said Master Hsü, who then directed the attendants to light the lamps in the reception hall and lifted aside the paper shroud in order to have a look at her.

Calculating the time on his fingers, he said, "Since we are now precisely two-fifths of the way through the fifth watch, she must have expired during the previous watch, which corresponds to the earthly branch ch'ou, or the ox."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered that a writing brush and inkstone be provided and asked Master Hsü to interpret his divinatory texts.

Master Hsü, by the light of the lamps, opened his black bag, took out an almanac with its perpetual calendar, and consulted it. Having ascertained her maiden name and the eight characters that determined her horoscope, he proceeded to pronounce as follows:

The deceased wife, née Li, of Hsi-men Ch'ing, an officer of the Embroidered-Uniform Guard, was born at noon on the fifteenth day of the first month in the hsin-wei year of the Yüan-yü reign period; and died at 2:00 AM on the seventeenth day of the ninth month of the ting-yü year of the Cheng-ho reign period. The fact that this day of her death is a ping-tzu day of a wu-hsü month indicates a conflict between the celestial stems and earthly branches, which makes it an inauspicious day for any undertaking and portends a double bereavement. The baleful spirit of the departed is ten feet high and is headed in a southwesterly direction. If it encounters the baleful spirit of the Year God,⁵⁵ it will portend a fatal situation. The members of her immediate family should abstain from crying until after they have put on their mourning clothes, when it will not matter. On the day of the encoffining ceremony, people born in the year of the dragon, the year of the tiger, the year of the cock, and the year of the snake should stay out of the way, although relatives by marriage need not do so.

At this point, Wu Yüeh-niang sent Tai-an out to instruct Master Hsü to proceed with consulting the *Black Book*⁵⁶ about what the future might hold in store for her.

Master Hsü, accordingly, consulted his esoteric yin-yang texts and pronounced:

Today is a ping-tzu day, and her death took place during the chi-ch'ou hour, so she is governed by the zodiacal palace Precious Vase⁵⁷ above, which corresponds to the area of Shantung below. In her former life, she was the son of a family named Wang in Pin-chou and was guilty of killing a pregnant ewe. Consequently, in this life she was reborn as a female in the year of the sheep, her nature was gentle and compliant, and she was given to artifice from her earliest years. Both her father and her mother died, and she had no relatives on whom she could depend. Initially, she entered someone's household as a concubine but suffered from the hostility of his legitimate wife. Later, upon acquiring a husband of her own, she found that they were incompatible, and her fate was crossed by the "three penalties" and "six banes."⁵⁸ Although she acquired a distinguished husband in her years of maturity, she suffered from continual ailments, and the "matched shoulders" in her horoscope. She gave birth to a son, but he died prematurely, and her suppressed anger brought on hemorrhaging from her lower body that resulted in her death. Earlier, on the ninth day of this month, her soul left her to be reborn as the daughter of Commander Yüan in the metropolis of Pien-liang, or K'ai-feng prefecture, in Honan province. The difficulties she encounters there imperil her survival, but she will endure to the age of nineteen, when she will marry a wealthy man of much greater age than herself. She will enjoy prosperity during her mature years, and live to the age of forty-one, when she will succumb to a fit of anger and die.

When he had finished his prognostication from the Black Book, the assembled womenfolk all sighed with wonder. Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked Master Hsü to ascertain what would be auspicious days for breaking ground for her tomb, and for the burial ceremony.

"Permit me to ask Your Honor," said Master Hsü, "how long do you intend for her to lie in state?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing wept, saying, "She still looks so vibrantly alive. How can I bear to send her on her way? I'd like to keep her here until after the fifth weekly commemoration."

"There are no appropriate days for burying her in the fifth week," said Master Hsü, "but there are in the fourth week. I would suggest that you break ground for her tomb at noon on the eighth day of the tenth month, which is a ting-yu day; and that the burial ceremony should take place at 10:00 AM on the twelfth, which is a hsin-ch'ou day. The horoscopes of all six members of the family will not create any conflicts on that day."

"All right then," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the funeral procession will set out on the twelfth day of the tenth month, without fail."

Master Hsü, thereupon, wrote out the death certificate and placed it on the body of the deceased, after which, he said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "The encoffining ceremony should take place at 8:00 AM on the nineteenth. Your household will be responsible for making all the necessary preparations."

By the time Master Hsü had been ushered out the gate, the day had already dawned. Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Ch'in-t'ung, riding on a donkey, outside the city gate to invite the attendance of Hua the Elder, after which, he deputed teams of servants to go to the homes of all the other relatives of the family and inform them of Li P'ing-erh's death. He also sent someone to the yamen to request a leave of absence, so he could remain at home to take charge of the funeral arrangements. He sent Tai-an to the shop on Lion Street to obtain twenty bolts of bleached Hsiang-yang ramie and thirty bolts of porous ramie fabric, and he arranged for Tailor Chao to engage the services of a considerable number of tailors, who were put to work in an anteroom on the western side of the front courtyard. They were hired for the purpose of making the marquees and tablecloths that would be required for the funeral, the burial clothes and waistband for the encoffining ceremony, and the blouses and skirts for the womenfolk in their respective chambers. In addition, white T'ang-style caps and long white robes were supplied for each of the page boys and other servants. He also weighed out a hundred taels of silver and entrusted them to Pen the Fourth with the mission of going to the specialty shops outside the city gate and urging them to provide thirty bolts of lustrous hemp fabric and two hundred lengths of yellow damask suitable for the mourning garments of relatives of different degrees of mourning. He then went on to arrange for carpenters to erect a large, thirty-foot-wide, covered structure in the main courtyard.

As Hsi-men Ch'ing contemplated the habits, conduct, and looks of Li P'ingerh, it suddenly occurred to him that he had forgotten to have a portrait of her painted.

Calling over Lai-pao, he asked him, "Where is there a good painter to be found, who is skilled at making portraits? I'd like to find one in order to make a posthumous portrait of her. I had completely forgotten about this matter."

"That Master Han who painted some standing screens for us in the past," said Lai-pao, "was formerly a court painter attached to the Hsüan-ho Academy. He has lost his position there and returned home, but he is an excellent portraitist."⁵⁹

"Where does he live?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Go at once and invite him to come here."

Lai-pao nodded in assent and proceeded to set off on this errand.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had been up all evening without any sleep and had been busy through all five watches of the night, in addition to which, he was suffering from the sorrows of bereavement, so that his spirits were disturbed, and he was out of sorts and resorted to cursing the maidservants and kicking the page boys. As he kept vigil over the dead body of Li P'ing-erh, he couldn't help weeping and howling with grief. Tai-an, who remained at his side, also wept until he could neither weep nor utter a sound. Meanwhile, Wu Yüeh-niang, together with Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and P'an Chin-lien, were behind the curtain, sharing responsibility for directing the maidservants from the various quarters and the servant wives as they went about their tasks.

When she saw the way in which Hsi-men Ch'ing had given himself over to crying until his voice was hoarse, refused the offer of so much as a drink of tea, and was manifestly out of sorts, Wu Yüeh-niang said, "Just look at the ridiculous way he's carrying on! If she's dead, she's dead, and that's that.

You can't cry her back to life again.

Weep for her a couple of times and forget it.

All he seems bent on is stretching out the weeping as long as he can stand it. He hasn't gotten any sleep for two or three nights and hasn't even taken the time to comb his hair or wash his face. He's been busy through all five watches of the night, without so much as a taste of:

Saffron soup or flavored water.⁶⁰

Not even an iron man could take it. If he would only comb his hair and come outside for something to eat, he might be able to keep going; but, slight as he is, if he were to collapse, what would we do?"

"Do you mean to say he hasn't even combed his hair or washed his face?" said Meng Yü-lou.

"It would have been a good start if he had washed his face," said Yüeh-niang, "but, a while ago, when I sent a page boy to ask him to return to the rear compound and wash his face, he kicked him outside. Who would venture to ask him again?"

"Whoever saw the like!" exclaimed Chin-lien, picking up where Yüeh-niang left off. "When I went into the room a while ago to look for some garments, did I not admonish him with the best of intentions, saying, 'Although you may have lost someone, you're only wearing yourself to a frazzle by carrying on this way. If you come and have something to eat in your room before you continue, it won't delay anything.' But he opened his red eyes wide, and cursed me, saying, 'You dog-fucked whore! What business is it of yours?' The fact is that, nowadays, if I'm not to be fucked by the dog, who else is there to fuck me? The unreasonable good-for-nothing! All he does is claim that everyone else is giving him a hard time."

"When she died so suddenly, while still seeming vibrantly alive," said Yüeh-niang, "how could he help being pained? But even if you're pained, you ought to take it easy, rather than letting it all hang out this way. When a person is dead, to caress her lip to lip, without paying any attention to whether or not there are foul emanations from her mouth, and howl with grief that way, is no way to carry on. When I criticized him with a few words, what should he do but come out with the claim that during the last three years she hasn't enjoyed a single good day. As though, every day, she'd been required to:

Carry water and turn the millstone."

"That's not it at all," said Meng Yü-lou. "It's not that Sister Li had anything to complain about. But she has suffered from Father's propensity to sort people differentially into:

Three classes and nine categories."

"If she was able to enjoy her days," said Chin-lien, "it would appear that some people are more privileged than others, when we should all be:

Walking along the same gangplank."

As they were speaking, who should appear but Ch'en Ching-chi, holding nine lengths of watered-silk in his hand, who said, "Father has ordered that you ladies should cut handkerchiefs out of this material for the use of the women in each of your quarters, and that, if anything is left over, it can be used to make skirts for you ladies."

Yüeh-niang took the silk and then said, "Son-in-law, go and invite your father to come in here and have a bite to eat. It's already nearly noon, and he hasn't had so much as a sip of tea."

"I wouldn't dare do that," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "A while ago, when one of the page boys invited him to have something to eat, he kicked him nearly to death. Why should I risk pestering him?"

"If you won't ask him," said Yüeh-niang, "wait until I send someone else to ask him to come and eat."

In a little while, she called over Tai-an and said to him, "Your master hasn't yet had anything to eat but has been crying all day long. You take some food in to him, and take advantage of the presence of Licentiate Wen, to get him to share something with him."

"If you invite Master Ying the Second and Master Hsieh to come over," said Tai-an, "and wait until after they get here to send someone in with the food, I guarantee that it won't take more than a few words on their part to get him to eat."

"You filthy-mouthed jailbird!" exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "You're just like a:

Tapeworm in his belly.

We womenfolk of his are no match for you. How can you be so sure that only if those two come over will he consent to eat anything?"

"You ladies don't understand," said Tai-an. "Those two are Father's closest friends. At drinking parties, large or small, he is never without them. If Father consumes three mace worth of refreshments, they will have three mace worth, and if Father is content with two mace worth, they will settle for two. No matter how upset Father may be, they have but to say a few words before:

His eyebrows blossom and his eyes light up."⁶¹

They continued talking for a while, until Ch'i-t'ung showed up with Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta.

The two of them, upon their arrival, no sooner came in the door than they prostrated themselves on the ground in front of Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet and wept for some time, repeating, over and over again, the words, "My kind and just sister-in-law."

This provoked both P'an Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou into cursing them, saying, "The lousy oily mouthed jailbirds! Do they suggest that none of the rest of us are kind or just?"

When the two of them had finished their weeping, they got to their feet, and Hsi-men Ch'ing returned their salutation.

The two of them commenced to weep all over again, saying, "Brother, it is most distressing, most distressing."

They were then ushered into the anteroom, where they exchanged greetings with Licentiate Wen and sat down.

Ying Po-chüeh was the first to speak, asking, "When did our sister-in-law die?"

"She stopped breathing at two o'clock in the morning," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"It was already past the fourth watch when I got home," said Ying Po-chüeh. "When my wife asked how she was, I said, 'All we can do is hope that the good deeds she has done in secret will avail. Sister-in-law's illness is already in its final stages.' Who would have thought that I had no sooner fallen asleep than I had a dream in which Brother sent a servant to invite me to attend a party at your place in celebration of an official promotion and urged me to come as quickly as possible. Upon arrival, I saw that you were dressed entirely in scarlet clothing. You took two jade hairpins out of your sleeve to show me and told me that one of them was broken. After examining them for some time, I said, 'Brother, it's too bad. This one that is broken is made of jade, while the one that is intact is made of artificial crystal.' But you insisted that they were both made of jade. My wife and I were asleep together when I woke up and said to myself that this dream boded no good. My wife noticed that I was smacking my lips and asked me who I was talking to, but I said, 'It's something you don't know about. I'll tell you in the morning.' But when morning came, who should appear but your servant, dressed in white mourning garments, which led me to stamp my feet in consternation. And now, sure enough, Brother, I see that you are wearing mourning clothes."

"I had a dream just like yours last night," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I dreamed that my kinsman Chai Ch'ien in the Eastern Capital had sent me a set of six hairpins, one of which was broken. I said it was too bad, and I was just telling my wife about it in the middle of the night when, unexpectedly, we learned that the lady in the front compound had stopped breathing. Heaven must be blind to leave me so destitute! I would rather that I, Hsi-men Ch'ing, had died in her stead, rather than having to confront this event. In the future, whenever I think of her during any:

Single hour or half a minute, how can I help but be pained at heart? What have I ever done to anyone that Heaven should now see fit to rob me so egregiously of my beloved!⁶² First that child of ours died, and now she too has departed:

With her legs stretched out straight."⁶³

What have I still got to live for in this world? Though in my home:

The piles of money reach higher than the dipper, what good will it do me?"

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "these sentiments of yours are wrong. It is true that my sister-in-law has been a good wife to you, and when she died so suddenly, while still seeming vibrantly alive, how could you help being pained at heart? But the fact is that you are not only the possessor of considerable wealth, but also have an official career before you. You are like the bastion of Mount T'ai, upon which the members of this entire household, both high and low, are dependent. If anything were to happen to you, what would become of them? These other ladies of yours, for example, would be left without a husband to support them. As the saying goes:

So long as one of us lives, all three will live;

Whenever one of us perishes, all three will die.⁶⁴

Brother, you are not only intelligent, but clever. What need is there for your brothers to point these things out to you? It is no wonder that the death of our sister-in-law in the springtime of her youth is something the pain of which is hard to get over, hard to survive. But when you have put on your mourning clothes, arranged for Buddhist monks and Taoist priests to recite scriptures on her behalf, mounted an impressive funeral procession, and seen that she is properly buried in her tomb, your feelings for her will have been given full expression, as is only appropriate in commemoration of your relationship with her. What more can you do? You must set your mind at rest."

At the time, this single conversation with Ying Po-chüeh had such an effect on Hsi-men Ch'ing that:

The ground of his heart was profoundly affected;

The obstruction in his mind was abruptly removed.⁶⁵ and he stopped weeping. Before long, when tea was served, he actually drank it.

He then called for Tai-an and said to him, "Go back to the rear compound, and tell them to prepare some food for me to share with your Second Master Ying, Licentiate Wen, and Master Hsieh."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "do you mean to say that you haven't even eaten yet?"

"Ever since you left," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've been busy all night. Up until now, I haven't had so much as a taste of anything to eat."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "it is foolish of you not to eat. As the saying goes:

It is preferable to forfeit your capital,

Rather than opting to suffer from hunger.⁶⁶

Is it not said in the Hsiao-ching, or Classic of Filial Piety, 'People should be taught that the dead should not hurt the living,⁶⁷ and that disfigurement should not lead to the detriment of life'?⁶⁸ The dead are dead, and the survivors must continue to get on with their lives. Brother, you must get ahold of yourself."

Truly:

A few words serve to disclose the proper path to a gentleman;

A single speech suffices to awaken the sleeper from his dream.

FRIENDS AND RELATIVES OFFER FUNERAL OBLATIONS AT A MEMORIAL FEAST; HSI-MEN CH'ING IS REMINDED OF LI P'ING-ERH WHILE WATCHING A DRAMA

Even among the twelve jasper terraces¹ and jeweled balustrades of paradise,
Once the alabaster blossoms have fallen, they are unlikely to bloom again.
Even medications concocted out of dragon's beard² have not been efficacious;
Though pills were being made up from bear's gall, they weren't ready in time.
Behind hibiscus curtains the night brings sorrow,
the red candles have expired;
Within paper windows, as autumn comes to an end,
the kingfisher quilt is cold.
One feels empathy with the goose that has lost it's fellows and flies alone;
As frost falls and the wind rises, it's image appears in forlorn isolation.

THE STORY GOES that on that day, as a result of Ying Po-chüeh's persuasion, Hsi-men Ch'ing wiped away his tears, ceased his weeping, and ordered a page boy to go back to the rear compound and bring them some food.

Before long, Wu K'ai and Wu the Second arrived, performed their obeisances before the spirit tablet of the deceased, saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing, and communicated their distress at his bereavement. They were invited into the anteroom, where they sat down with the others.

Meanwhile, Tai-an went back to the rear compound and said to Yüeh-niang, "How come you ladies did not believe me? Master Ying the Second had no sooner arrived than, with a single conversation, he succeeded in persuading Father to have something to eat."

"You lousy inveterate jailbird!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "Since you spend all day outside the house playing the role of pander for him, it's scarcely surprising that you understand his character."

"I've attended the master since my childhood," said Tai-an. "How could I fail to be familiar with his innermost feelings?"

"Just who are the people sitting in the anteroom who will be sharing a meal with him?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"Your elder brother and your second brother have just showed up," said Tai-an. "Along with Licentiate Wen, Second Master Ying, Master Hsieh, Manager Han, your son-in-law, and Father, there are eight in all."

"Ask our son-in-law to come back here and eat in the rear compound," said Yüeh-niang. "Why should he insist on joining the party?"

"He has already sat down with them," said Tai-an.

"You and the other page boys go to the kitchen and take the food out to them," said Yüeh-niang. "And take an extra bowl of congee for Father to eat. He hasn't had any breakfast this morning."

"What other page boys are there?" said Tai-an. "I'm the only one left at home. All the rest have been deputed to announce the death to friends and relatives, to burn paper money, or to buy things. And Wang Ching has been sent to Kinsman Chang Kuan's place to borrow a cloud-shaped gong for the occasion."

"Why don't you get that slave Shu-t'ung to help you out?" said Yüeh-niang. "Though I suppose he's:

Reluctant to set the fins on his silk hat aflutter."³

"Shu-t'ung and Hua-t'ung have been assigned to serve before her spirit tablet," said Tai-an, "one of them to strike the chime, and the other to burn paper money. And as for Ch'un-hung, Father has sent him to go with Pen the Fourth to exchange the damask that he bought earlier today. He doesn't think it's good enough and wants to exchange it for a grade of damask that costs six mace per length, in order to make mourning garments for the visitors."

"If you stop to consider it," said Yüeh-niang, "that damask that cost five mace per length would have been good enough, but he would insist on exchanging it."

She then went on to say, "You call that little slave Hua-t'ung off his post and get him to help you take the food out. What are you waiting around for?"

Thereupon, Tai-an, together with Hua-t'ung, proceeded to carry the food out to the front compound, in:

Large platters and large bowls, and set up an Eight Immortals Table on which to serve it.

While the company were eating their meal, who should appear but P'ing-an, carrying in his hand an accordion-bound calling card, who reported, "His Honor Hsia Yen-ling from the yamen has sent along a professional scribe, and three members of the guard unit, for your benefit and would like a note of acknowledgment."

After reading the card, Hsi-men Ch'ing issued instructions, saying, "Get three mace of silver to reward the messenger, and write out an accordion-bound thank-you note, indicating that the sender is in one-year mourning, in reply to His Honor Hsia Yen-ling."

When the company had finished their meal, the utensils were cleared away.

Who should appear at this juncture but Lai-pao, who brought with him the painter Master Han.

After saluting him, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "I would trouble you, sir, to paint a portrait of my deceased consort."

"I understand," said Master Han.

"If there is any further delay," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I fear that the appearance of her countenance will have changed."

"It doesn't matter," said Master Han. "I can capture her likeness even after death."

Just as they were finishing their tea, P'ing-an suddenly came in and announced that Hua the Elder from outside the city gate had arrived. Hsi-men Ch'ing accompanied Hua Tzu-yu as he wept in front of the spirit tablet for a while, after which, salutations were exchanged as he joined the rest of the company.

He then went on to ask, "At what time did she die?"

"She stopped breathing at 2:00 AM," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She was still speaking:

Clearly and distinctly, shortly before her death. She had not been asleep for long when her maidservant got up to see how she was and found that she had stopped breathing."

Hua Tzu-yu, upon noticing that the young attendant standing beside Master Han was holding an easel, and that he had pulled a painting brush and some pigments out of his sleeve, said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Brother-in-law, are you planning to have her portrait painted?"

"I am so heartsick over her death," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that I can't bear not to have an image of her likeness that I can look at from time to time to remind me of her."

He then issued instructions that the womenfolk from the rear compound should stay out of the way and then lifted aside the curtain and led Master Han, along with Hua the Elder and the rest of the company, into the partitioned area in which Li P'ing-erh was lying in state.

Master Han then proceeded to lift the funeral banderole aside with his hand and concentrated the gaze of those vigilant organs of his, with their:

Five concentric rings,
Eight precious attributes, and Two spots of magic liquid,⁴ upon the sight revealed below. He saw that her hair was done up in a raven-black kerchief, and that, although she had been ill for a long time:

Her coloration was still lifelike,⁵ and
Her countenance remained unaltered.

Although she appeared sallow than before, her lips were still adorably red and moist. Hsi-men Ch'ing could not help wiping the tears from his eyes as he wept at the sight.

Thereupon, Lai-pao and Ch'in-t'ung set up the easel at her side and laid out the pigments. Master Han took in her appearance at a glance, and the company crowded around him, urging him to begin to paint.

Ying Po-chüeh ventured to address him, saying, "Sir, you must realize that this is the visage of an invalid. In the past, when she was well:

Her face was fuller than this, and Her countenance was enchanting."⁶

"There is no need for the venerable gentleman to instruct me," said Master Han. "I understand the situation. May I venture to ask Your Honor, is this, by any chance, the same person that I caught a glimpse of formerly, on the first day of the fifth month, when she was paying a visit to the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak?"

"She is that very one," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She was still herself at the time. If you will endeavor to remember what she looked like, sir, and paint one full-length portrait, as well as a half-length one to be worshipped beside her spirit tablet, I will present you with a bolt of satin, and ten taels of silver to boot."

"With regard to Your Honor's instructions," said Master Han, "I will, of course, do my best."

In hardly any time at all, he succeeded in producing a half-length portrait. Truly:

Her jade face exhibits the rare beauty of a secluded flower;

Her full flesh is a delicate jade that exudes its own bouquet.

When he showed it to the assembled company, they saw that it was, indeed, a portrait of a beauty.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had looked at it, he said to Tai-an, "Take it back to the rear compound and show it to the ladies, to see what they think. If they find anything wrong with it, come tell us, so that it can be corrected."

Tai-an, accordingly, took it back to the rear compound and said to Yüeh-niang, "Father says that you ladies should examine this portrait of the Sixth Lady to see how well it is done. If you find any feature that is not true to life, say what it is, so that Master Han can correct it."

"Why that:

Inveterate mischief-maker!"

exclaimed Yüeh-niang.

"Nobody knows where the dead end up going to.

Master Han Produces a Portrait as a Posthumous Memento

And yet he insists on having her portrait painted. It doesn't even resemble her all that much."

P'an Chin-lien picked up where she left off, saying, "And where are her children, if her likeness is to be perpetuated in the form of a portrait so they can:

Kowtow and perform obeisances, before it? In the future, when all six of his womenfolk have died, he'd better have portraits painted of all six of us."

Meng Yü-lou and Li Chiao-erh took the portrait in hand and examined it, saying, "First Lady, come and see. This painting depicts her the way she looked when she was well. She's dolled up very vividly, but her lips look a little flat."

"The left side of her forehead is a bit too low," said Yüeh-niang. "And her eyebrows were more curved than those depicted here. But it's amazing that this gentleman could capture such a likeness from her dead body."

"He caught a glimpse of the Sixth Lady at the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak," explained Tai-an. "Just now, he was able to produce this likeness from memory."

In a little while, who should appear but Wang Ching, who came in and said, "If you ladies have had a chance to examine it, I've been instructed to have it taken back outside. Your kinsman Ch'iao Hung has arrived and is anxious to have a look at it."

Tai-an, accordingly, took it back to the front compound and said to Master Han, "The ladies in the rear compound say that her lips are a bit flat, the left corner of her forehead is a bit too low, and her eyebrows should be made to curve a little more."

"That's no problem," said Master Han, and he took up his brush forthwith, made the desired corrections, and then presented it to Ch'iao Hung for his approval.

"This portrait of my kinswoman is masterfully done," announced Ch'iao Hung.

"It lacks only the breath of life."⁷

Hsi-men Ch'ing was delighted by this response and proceeded to toast Master Han with three cups of wine. After he had been wined and dined, he rewarded him with a bolt of silk and ten taels of silver, presented to him upon a red lacquer tray.

He then told him, "Finish the half-length portrait first, as I want to hang it up immediately. As for the full-length portrait, it will be all right as long as it's ready in time for the funeral procession. She must be depicted in bright blue and green style, with pearls and trinkets adorning her chignon, wearing a scarlet full-sleeved variegated brocade robe, over a flower-sprigged skirt. And it should be mounted on patterned damask, with ivory knobs on the ends of the roller."

"There is no need for you to instruct me any further," said Master Han. "I understand what is wanted."

He then accepted the silver, told his young attendant to carry the easel, bowed in farewell, and went out the gate.

Ch'iao Hung and the others spent some time looking over the newly constructed coffin, after which, he said, "I suppose the preliminary laying out ceremony for my kinswoman will be performed today."

"Right now," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "as soon as the coroner's assistant and his workers arrive, we will carry out the preliminary laying out. The encoffining ceremony will take place on the third day."

After finishing his tea, Ch'iao Hung said his farewells, stood up, and departed.

Before long, the coroner's assistant and his workers arrived to perform their functions. The papier-mâché funerary objects were made up, and the burial clothes laid out. Hsi-men Ch'ing himself performed the ceremony of swabbing the eyes of the deceased with a ball of damp cotton, so she could see her way more clearly in the underworld, and had Ch'en Ching-chi play the role of a filial son by closing her eyelids. Hsi-men Ch'ing then came up with an imported pearl, which he inserted into her mouth. In no time at all, the preliminary laying out was completed satisfactorily, she was left to lie in state as before, the curtains were let down, and the entire household, high and low, wept to mark the occasion.

Lai-hsing had already obtained from a shop that specialized in burial objects for the dead gold-flecked effigies of four maidens to wait on her, bearing a chamber pot, a towel, a washbasin, and a comb, respectively. They wore pearl necklaces and enchased silver pendant earrings that looked just like the real thing, and they were dressed in clothes of variegated satin. Two of them were placed to each side of the body. Before her spirit tablet there were arrayed antique bronze incense burners and vases from the Shang and Chou dynasties, as well as candlesticks and incense cases, made to order by pewterers, that graced the table on which they were placed:

With a glitter that rivals the sun's.

Ten taels of silver were also weighed out for a silversmith to be made into three sets of silver ceremonial goblets.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the anteroom in the front courtyard, deciding, with the help of Ying Po-chüeh, how to handle the record books for the expenses of the funeral proceedings. To begin with, he weighed out five hundred taels of silver and a hundred strings of cash and entrusted them to Han Tao-kuo to keep account of. Pen the Fourth and Lai-hsing were put in charge of making the necessary purchases, both large and small, and were also made responsible for the outside kitchen. Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Licentiate Wen, and Manager Kan Jun, the four of them, were to take turns keeping company with the guests who came and went to offer condolences. Ts'ui Pen was placed in charge of monitoring the expenses incurred by providing the guests with mourning wear. Lai-pao was put in charge of the outer storeroom. Wang Ching was given responsibility for the wine cellar. Ch'un-hung and Hua-t'ung were deputed to be in attendance before the spirit tablet. P'ing-an was responsible every day, with the help of four orderlies, for striking the cloud-shaped gong, and presenting incense sticks and paper money to the guests whenever they arrived. The professional scribe, along with another four orderlies, were stationed at the main gate to record the names of the visitors, hold the baldachin on the days when scriptures were being recited, be available to carry the heraldic pennants, and, when they had nothing else to do, help guard the gate. Once these duties had all been assigned, they were written down and posted on a screen wall, for the benefit of the parties concerned as they went about their respective tasks.

Lo and behold, at this juncture, Eunuch Director Hsüeh, the supervisor of the local imperial estates, sent people to deliver sixty pine planks, thirty stems of sturdy bamboo, three hundred reed mats, and a hundred lengths of hemp cord, together with his calling card, which they showed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who rewarded the head messenger with five mace of silver and sent him back with a card indicating that he was in one-year mourning.

He then directed the carpenters to raise the main beam of the temporary covered structure they were erecting in order to enlarge it further, so that it would accommodate two portals, with a screen wall in between. He also told them to erect an eighteen-foot-wide covered structure in front of the kitchen in the front compound, and a forty-two-foot-wide structure outside the main gate for the display of placards detailing the particulars of the funereal arrangements.

Twelve Buddhist monks from the Pao-en Temple, or Temple of Kindness Required, were engaged to come and recite sutras for the salvation of the deceased. Two waiters were hired to be on duty every day in order to provide a regular supply of tea from a local tea house, and two cooks were engaged to work in the outer kitchen and produce whatever foods might be called for.

That day, Hua Tzu-yu and Wu the Second visited for a while and then got up and left.

Hsi-men Ch'ing asked Licentiate Wen to draft the text of an obituary notice that he intended to have printed and told him to include the words, "My poor wife has unexpectedly died."

When Licentiate Wen surreptitiously showed this to Ying Po-chüeh for his advice, Ying Po-chüeh said, "You cannot logically say such a thing as long as my sister-in-law Wu occupies the position of his legitimate wife. How can he disseminate such a statement without arousing criticism? Even Brother Wu K'ai is certain to be distressed at heart. Let me take the subject up with him at my leisure. You had better not put it that way."

They continued to keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company until evening arrived, at which they separated and returned home.

That evening Hsi-men Ch'ing did not go back to the rear compound but had a summer bedstead set up beside Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet, surrounded by standing screens and provided with the necessary bedding, so that he could sleep there by himself, with Ch'un-hung and Shu-t'ung close by to wait upon him. At dawn the next morning he went back to the master suite to perform his ablutions and put on the white T'ang-style mourning cap, mourning robe, white velveteen socks, white shoes, and mourning girdle that the tailor had made for him.

On this second day after Li P'ing-erh's death, early in the morning, Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling came to visit the bereaved, offer his condolences, and urge his host to moderate his grief. When Hsi-men Ch'ing had returned his salutation, Licentiate Wen joined them for a cup of tea, after which Hsia Yen-ling got up to go.

On his way out the gate, he admonished the scribe that he had sent over, saying, "Be sure to do a conscientious job while you're here. If any of the orderlies fail to show up for duty, report it to the yamen so that they can be disciplined."

When he had finished speaking, he mounted his horse and headed back to the yamen.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then directed Licentiate Wen to send out the obituary notices and sent servants to invite the relatives of the family to come early on the third day after Li P'ing-erh's death to attend a service for her benefit and the recitation of sutras on her behalf. That afternoon vergers from the temple arrived, whose job it was to prepare the consecrated space in which the ceremony would be held and hang up Buddhist effigies, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

That same day, Wu Yin-erh in the licensed quarter heard the news of Li P'ing-erh's death and came in a sedan chair to weep in front of her spirit tablet and burn paper money on her behalf. Upon her arrival in the rear compound, Wu Yüeh-niang led her back out front, where she kowtowed to Yüeh-niang and wept, saying, "When the Sixth Lady died I didn't know a thing about it. No one came to say so much as a word to me. It's really distressing."

"You are her adopted daughter, after all," said Meng Yü-lou. "She has been unwell for some time, and you didn't even come to see her."

"My good Third Lady!" protested Wu Yin-erh. "If I had only known, how could I have failed to come? May I die if I'm not telling the truth. The fact is, I didn't know anything about it."

"You may not have come to see your mother," said Yüeh-niang, "but she still bore you in mind and set aside something to give you as a keepsake. I've been keeping it for you."

She then instructed Hsiao-yü, "You go get it and show it to Sister Yin."

Hsiao-yü, accordingly, went into the inside room and brought out a bundle containing a set of satin clothing, two gold-headed hairpins, and a floral ornament of gold. This had the effect of causing Wu Yin-erh to:

Weep so copiously she seemed to be made of tears.

"If I had only known that she was so unwell," she exclaimed, "I would have come and waited on her for a couple of days."

As she spoke, she bowed to Yüeh-niang in gratitude. Yüeh-niang entertained her with tea and asked her to stay until the third day ceremonies were completed before going home.

On the third day after Li P'ing-erh's death, the monks began to strike their chimes, conducted the flag-raising ceremony to invite the presence of the gods, and proceeded to recite their sutras. Paper money was carried outside to be burned, and the members of the entire household, high and low:

Donned hempen garments and put on mourning apparel.⁸

Ch'en Ching-chi, attired in heavy mourning and a hempen headband, prostrated himself before the effigies of the Buddhas. The neighbors in the area, friends and relatives, and senior officials who came to extend their condolences, burn paper money, and offer oblations on behalf of the deceased could not be numbered. Yin-yang Master Hsü put in an early appearance in order to preside over the encoffining ceremony, and when the sacrificial announcements had been completed, the body was carried over to be placed inside the coffin.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had Yüeh-niang search out four outfits of Li P'ing-erh's first-class clothing and fit them into her coffin, in addition to which, he placed four small ingots of silver in the four corners of the coffin.

At this, Hua Tzu-yu remarked, "Brother-in-law, there is no need to put those in there. Gold and silver are sure to reemerge in the world at some time in the future. That is not:

A good long-term plan.”⁹

Hsi-men Ch'ing refused this advice and proceeded to put them where he had intended. A “seven star board”¹⁰ had been placed inside the coffin for the corpse to rest on, the purple interior cover was put in place, and the coroner's assistants, standing on all four sides, then simultaneously drove “longevity nails” into the four sides of the lid of the casket. At this point, the members of the entire household, high and low, commenced weeping and wailing out loud.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, for his part, wept himself into a stupor, protesting again and again, without ceasing, “My tender-aged sister! I'll never be able to see you again.”

After some time, once the formal wailing was over, he treated Yin-yang Master Hsü to a vegetarian repast and saw him on his way.

When the officiating monks had done with the ceremony of scattering paper flowers and rice on the bier, a placard on which there were pasted four large characters reading “May the votive lamps ensure her peace” was set up before the spirit tablet. The friends and relatives, managers, and others were all dressed in mourning garments for the occasion, so that when the ritual of circumambulation while burning incense was performed, the area in front of the gate was turned into a patch of white.

Licentiate Wen had recommended that Privy Councilor Tu, who resided in the northern quarter of the city, should be invited to inscribe the funeral banner. His given name was Tzu-ch'un,¹¹ his courtesy name was Yün-yeh, and he had served in the Hsüan-ho¹² Palace Hall during the reign of Emperor Chen-tsung¹³ but was now living in retirement at home. Hsi-men Ch'ing, accordingly, provided him with a gift of gold currency and a box of candied fruit and entertained him in the summerhouse, where he personally toasted him with three cups of wine in the presence of Ying Po-chüeh and Licentiate Wen. The funeral banner of scarlet government-quality linen was laid out for him to inscribe.

Hsi-men Ch'ing wanted him to write the words “Coffin of the Respected Lady of the Imperially Commissioned Commandant Hsi-men Ch'ing of the Embroidered-Uniform Guard,” but Ying Po-chüeh repeatedly objected, saying, “Your legitimate wife is alive and well. How can you say such a thing?”

“I understand that the deceased had borne him a son,” said Privy Councilor Tu Tzu-ch'un. “Under the circumstances, that way of putting it would not offend against propriety.”

They argued about it for some time before substituting the term “consort” for the term “respected lady.”

“The term ‘respected lady,’” said Licentiate Wen, “is a title bestowed by an imperial patent of nobility, whereas the term ‘consort’ simply means ‘the person who shares the bedroom with you.’ It is a term of much wider application.”

Thereupon, Tu Tzu-ch'un inscribed the banner, as directed, in white pigment and also applied gold leaf to the words “Imperially Commissioned.” The banner was then suspended before Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet. He was also invited to inscribe the name of the deceased on her spirit tablet. When these tasks were completed, Hsi-men Ch'ing expressed his gratitude with a bow and entertained him with a collation, after which he took his leave and departed.

That day, Ch'iao Hung, Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, Hua the Elder, as well as Mr. Han, the husband of Meng Yü-lou's elder sister, and Mr. Shen, the husband of Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister from outside the city gate, all contributed offertory tables of the three sacrificial animals and came to burn paper money. Ch'iao Hung's wife, Wu K'ai's wife, Wu the Second's wife, and Hua the Elder's wife all came to offer their condolences, make sacrifices, and weep over the bier. Yüeh-niang and the others, all wearing white hempen covers over their chignons, held in place with hempen headbands, with hempen girdles around their waists and hempen skirts, came out to return their salutations and join in the wailing, after which they ushered them into the rear compound to entertain them with tea and a vegetarian repast. Only Hua the Elder's wife and Hua the Elder himself wore heavy mourning, being dressed in long robes cut like those of a Taoist priest. The rest of the guests all wore light mourning.

That day, Li Kuei-chieh in the licensed quarter learned of Li P'ing-erh's death and came in a sedan chair to burn paper money on her behalf.

When she saw that Wu Yin-erh was already there, she asked, “When did you get here? And why didn't you let me know about it? Some friend you are! All you ever think about is yourself.”

“I also hadn't known about Mother's death,” said Wu Yin-erh. “Had I known about it, I would have come sooner.”

Yüeh-niang entertained them in the rear compound, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Time passed quickly, and it was not long before the day came for the first of the seven weekly commemorations of Li P'ing-erh's death. For this occasion, Buddhist Superior Lang,¹⁴ the abbot of the Pao-en Temple, or Temple of Kindness Required, led a contingent of sixteen senior monks in coming to perform a “land and water” mass for the salvation of the deceased. The liturgy included excerpts from the *Lotus Sutra*¹⁵ and the Litany of the Compassionate Water of Samādhi.¹⁶ Among the household's relatives, friends, and managers there was not one who did not attend.

On the day in question, Abbot Wu of the Temple of the Jade Emperor also came to burn paper money and offer his condolences, with a view to securing the job of presiding over the services for the second weekly commemoration. Hsi-men Ch'ing invited him into the summerhouse to join the rest of the guests in a vegetarian repast.

At this juncture, a page boy suddenly appeared to announce that Master Han had come to deliver the half-length portrait, and everyone was invited to have a look at it. Behold:

The chignon on her head was adorned with gold and turquoise ornaments,
With two phoenixes, from whose beaks dangled bangles on ropes of pearls.¹⁷
She was dressed in a gown of figured scarlet material,

And her countenance was pale and fragrant,
Looking exactly as it did when she was alive.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw it, he was utterly delighted and had it suspended above the head of the coffin. Among those present there were none who did not praise it extravagantly, saying:

"It lacks only the breath of life."¹⁸

Hsi-men Ch'ing invited Master Han into the summerhouse to share in the vegetarian repast and enjoined him, saying, "With regard to the full-length portrait, you must lavish even greater attention than usual upon it."

"Your humble servant," said Master Han, "will expend his utmost skill with the brush upon it. How could he presume to be inattentive?"

After Hsi-men Ch'ing had rewarded him generously, he made his departure.

At noon, Ch'iao Hung came to present the offerings of his household. These included pigs and sheep and other sacrificial offerings; fancy table settings of a kind intended as much for display as for eating; high-stacked pyramids of cone-shaped fruit; candied effigies of the Five Ancients and ingot shaped cakes; square-shaped confectionery and trees of wheat-gluten candy; soup and rice in gold saucers; ornate bowls containing the flesh of the five sacrificial animals; mountain-shaped stacks of imitation gold and silver ingots; satins, silks, and variegated fabrics; paper money for the use of the dead and offertory incense; more than fifty carrier-loads in all. Local mummers on stilts, performing to the beat of gongs and drums, and musicians playing more refined music on percussion and wind instruments, along with hired mourners carrying tasseled banners, all arrived, filling the air with noise, along with innumerable male and female guests.

Yin-yang Master Hsü was engaged to declaim the funeral eulogy, while Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'en Ching-chi, attired in mourning garments, positioned themselves in front of the spirit tablet to return the salutations of the visitors, and Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta, together with Licentiate Wen Pi-ku and Manager Kan Jun, devoted themselves to entertaining the guests.

That day, Ch'iao Hung had invited Provincial Graduate Shang, Censor Chu, Wu K'ai, School Official Liu, Battalion Commander Fan, and Kinsman Tuan, the father of Big Sister Tuan, some seven or eight relatives and friends in all, to come with him in order to burn incense in front of Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet. After the three sacrificial libations had been offered, they knelt down to hear the recitation of his funeral eulogy, which read as follows:

On this, the twenty-second day hsin-ssu, of the ninth month, the first day of which was keng-shen, in the year ting-yu, the seventh year of the Cheng-ho reign period, her kinsman Ch'iao Hung and others respectfully offer a stiff-bristled pig and a soft-haired sheep,¹⁹ along with other offertory foods,²⁰ in sacrifice before the spirit tablet of our late kinswoman, née Li, the consort of Hsi-men Ch'ing. Alas! The lady was, by nature, magnanimous and kindhearted. In regulating her household she was diligent and thrifty.²¹ In governing her inferiors she was compassionate and good-natured. Her total exemplification of the female virtues aroused the admiration of the neighborhood. As the flower of the women's quarters, she exuded the fragrance of orchids. In her marriage with her husband she did her best to simulate the relations of the male and female phoenix. In nurturing her offspring she exhibited judgment and talent. In emulation of the paragons of female conduct she was submissive and virtuous. In setting a moral example for the women of the household she displayed harmony and purity in her relations with her in-laws. The jade was planted in Indigo Field²² and the pearl from Ho-p'u had begun to shine.²³ Everyone expected her to live forever in marital harmony with her husband like that between zither and cithara, enjoying an extended longevity without limit. Who could have anticipated that as the result of a single illness the Yellow Millet Dream²⁴ should have ended? At the death of a good person, who is not grief-stricken? Our infant daughter, while still in her diapers, rejoiced in the love of our kinswoman. Who could have anticipated that before the union between our families could be consummated, Heaven should fail to comply with our wishes,²⁵ and the phoenix should have lost its mate? We are doomed to endure the separation between the living and the dead, there being nothing that can be done about it. May our ties of friendship remain long-lasting, and find expression in this proffered libation. Should the spirit of the deceased be cognizant of our actions,²⁶ may it deign to come and enjoy our offering.²⁷ Pray come and partake thereof.²⁸

When the male guests had finished with their offerings and had received a salutation in return, they were ushered into the summerhouse, where a collation had been prepared for them. But no more of this.

Afterwards, Ch'iao Hung's wife, her sister-in-law Mrs. Ts'ui, the wife of Censor Chu, the wife of Provincial Graduate Shang, Big Sister Tuan, and the other female guests and relatives presented their offerings. Meanwhile, local mummers, to the accompaniment of gongs and drums, performed an ensemble dance depicting the Assessor of the underworld, which created quite a din. Wu Yüeh-niang joined her guests in ceremonial wailing before the spirit tablet, after which, she invited them into the rear compound, where they were served tea, and then an ample repast, complete with the usual:

Three soups and five courses,

but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the summerhouse entertaining his guests with wine, when they suddenly heard the sound of the cloud-shaped gong in the front compound being struck, and a servant appeared in a state of obvious agitation, to report, "His Honor Prefect Hu Shih-wen has come to burn paper money. He is descending from his sedan chair at the front gate."

This threw Hsi-men Ch'ing into a state of consternation, as he hastened to don his formal mourning garments and await the arrival of his guest in front of the spirit tablet. He also had Licentiate Wen, dressed in the cap and gown of a licentiate, but in mourning white, go out to greet the visitor and assist him in changing out of his outer garments in the front reception hall.

Only after his attendants had entered bearing the offertory incense and paper money did Prefect Hu Shih-wen, dressed in white mourning-clothes with a gold girdle, come in himself, surrounded by a retinue of officials and functionaries who:

Smoothed his garments and adjusted his girdle,

Dancing attendance upon him without cessation.²⁹

Thereupon, Ch'un-hung, who was kneeling before the spirit tablet, held the incense up high for him while he prostrated himself twice.

"Venerable sir, please stand up. We have put you to a great deal of trouble," Hsi-men Ch'ing protested, as he hastily came forward to return his salutation.

"I fear I have been remiss in offering my condolences," said Prefect Hu Shih-wen. "When did your honorable spouse die? Your pupil only found out about it yesterday.”

“Who could have foreseen,” responded Hsi-men Ch’ing, “that my humble spouse should come down with an incurable ailment? I am the undeserving recipient of the concern you have deigned to express.”

When Licentiate Wen had saluted him, he and Hsi-men Ch’ing sat down to either side of their visitor to offer him a cup of tea, after which Prefect Hu got up to go, while Licentiate Wen saw him to the gate and into his sedan chair. The guests who had come to offer sacrifices were entertained until the afternoon, before the party broke up and they went their separate ways.

The next day, Cheng Ai-yüeh from the licensed quarter came to burn paper money on behalf of the deceased. When she descended from her sedan chair, she was dressed in a jacket of white cloud-patterned damask that opened down the middle, over a skirt of blue silk, while her chignon was wrapped in a white drawnwork kerchief, held in place with a pearl headband. When she came inside and burnt an offering of paper money before the spirit tablet, Yüeh-niang observed that she had brought with her eight platters of patisserie, meat of the three sacrificial animals, soup and rice, to offer in sacrifice to the deceased, and hastened to provide her with a mourning skirt of plain damask. Wu Yin-erh and Li Kuei-chieh also came and offered three mace apiece as sacrificial gifts.

When Yüeh-niang told Hsi-men Ch’ing about it, he said, “What does it matter? Provide each of them with a plain damask mourning headband and girdle, and invite them into the rear compound, where they can be served with tea and stay overnight.”

That evening, the relatives, friends, and employees of the family all gathered to participate in an all-night wake. A troupe of Hai-yen³⁰ actors was engaged to perform southern-style plays of the genre known as hsi-wen.³¹ Li Ming, Wu Hui, Cheng Feng, and Cheng Ch’un were also in attendance.

For this evening, Hsi-men Ch’ing had set up fifteen banquet tables in the large temporary structure in the main courtyard. Among the more prominent guests were Ch’iao Hung, Wu K’ai, Wu the Second, Hua Tzu-yu, Brother-in-law Shen, Brother-in-law Han, Licentiate Ni, Licentiate Wen, Dr. Jen Hou-ch’i, Li Chih, Huang the Fourth, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Chu Jih-nien, Sun T’ien-hua, Pai Lai-ch’iang, Ch’ang Shih-chieh, Fu Ming, Han Tao-kuo, Kan Jun, Pen Ti-ch’uan, the two nephews Wu Shun-ch’en and Ts’ui Pen, in addition to which there were seven or eight neighbors. Each of the banquet tables was replete with the customary:

Ten dishes and five appetizers, and ten or more great candles on raised candlesticks were lighted. In the adjacent reception hall, blinds were let down, and banquet tables were set out for the female guests, surrounded by standing screens, so arranged that they were able to look outside in order to watch the dramatic performance.

On this occasion, after the guests had finished making their sacrificial offerings, and Hsi-men Ch’ing and Ch’en Ching-chi had saluted them in return, they sat down in their designated places, while the actors struck up their gongs and drums before them. The play they performed was Yü-huan chi, or The Story of the Jade Ring, the tale of the two lives of love between Wei Kao and the courtesan Yü-hsiao.

Hsi-men Ch’ing had deputed four orderlies to be in charge of carrying the platters of food, while Ch’in-t’ung, Ch’i-t’ung, Hua-t’ung, and Lai-an were responsible for serving the individual dishes, and the four boy actors, Li Ming, Wu Hui, Cheng Feng, and Cheng Ch’un, poured the wine at the banquet tables.

Before long, after the prelude to the drama, the sheng (young male lead), playing the part of Wei Kao, sang for a while and then went offstage, followed by the t’ieh-tan (supporting female role), playing the part of Yü-hsiao, who also sang for a while before exiting the stage. At this point, the chef arrived from the kitchen to supervise the serving of the soup and rice and carve the goose.

Ying Po-chüeh then turned to Hsi-men Ch’ing and said, “I hear that the three singing girls from the quarter are here. Why not have them come out to serve a cup of wine to your venerable kinsman Ch’iao Hung and your elder brother-in-law Wu K’ai? They would then be better situated to watch the play, so you’d actually be doing them a favor.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing accordingly told Tai-an to go inside and invite the attendance of the three singing girls.

“That really isn’t appropriate,” remarked Ch’iao Hung. “They are here to offer their condolences. How can you call on them to serve the wine?”

“Venerable kinsman,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “you don’t understand the situation. Little whores like this should not be allowed to cool their heels. Have them dragged out for me immediately. Tell them that Master Ying the Second says that since the Sixth Lady has died, they ought to demonstrate their filiality by serving each of us a cup of wine.”

Tai-an went inside on this errand and was gone for some time before coming back to report, “When they heard that Master Ying the Second was present, they all refused to come out.”

“In that case,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “I’ll have to go myself.”

After taking a few steps, however, he came back and sat down.

“Why have you come back?” Hsi-men Ch’ing laughed at him.

“I really intend to drag those three little whores out here,” said Ying Pochüeh, “but I need to utter a few words of abuse in order to vent my spleen before I’ll be prepared to go.”

After this, Tai-an was sent inside to summon them once again before the three of them finally came out, as nonchalantly as could be. All of them were dressed in white satin jackets that opened down the middle, over blue silk skirts. After facing the company and:

Neither correctly nor precisely, bowing in greeting, they stood by to one side with ingratiating smiles.

“Since you knew that we were all here,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “how could you bring yourselves to:

Adduce three excuses or four pretexts,³²
for refusing to appear?”

The three of them did not respond to this sally but stepped up to serve a round of wine and then sat down at a table that had been set up for them.

Below them:

Drums and music began to sound, as the players came on to perform another scene in which the sheng, playing the part of Wei Kao, and the ching (comic-villain role), playing the part of Pao Chih-shui, pay a visit together to the bordello in which the singing girl Yühsiao is employed.

When the madam came out to receive them, Pao Chih-shui said, "You go and call out that girl for me."

"Master Pao," responded the madam, "you don't know how to treat people properly. My daughter is not accustomed to come out for just anybody. Are you incapable of uttering the word 'please'? How can you speak of simply calling her out?"³³

At this, Li Kuei-chieh turned to the company and laughed, saying, "This character named Pao is just like Beggar Ying, a lame donkey who doesn't know the score."

"If I don't know the score," said Ying Po-chüeh, "how is it that the madam of your establishment likes me so much?"

"What she likes is for you to keep out of the way," responded Li Kueichieh.

"Let's watch the play," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What are you dithering about anyway? If you say another word, you'll have to drink a large bumper of wine as a forfeit."

Only then did Ying Po-chüeh consent to remain silent, while the players finished the scene they were performing and went offstage.

Meanwhile, Sister-in-law Wu, Wu the Second's wife, Aunt Yang, Old Mrs. P'an, Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, Meng Yü-lou's elder sister, Wu Shun-ch'en's wife Third Sister Cheng, Big Sister Tuan, together with Yüeh-niang and her sister-wives from the Hsi-men household, were all watching the play through the suspended blinds on the left side of the reception hall, while Ch'un-mei, Yü-hsiao, Lan-hsiang, and Hsiao-yü were all crowded together watching the play through the suspended blinds on the right side.

The servant Cheng Chi, in charge of serving the tea to the ladies on the other side, happened to pass underneath the blinds where the maidservants were gathered carrying a serving of tea flavored with fruit kernels, when Ch'unmei called him to a halt, asking, "Who are you serving this tea to?"

"It's for Sister-in-law Wu and the ladies on the other side," responded Cheng Chi.

Ch'un-mei appropriated a cup for herself and was holding it in her hand, when, unexpectedly, Hsiao-yü, on hearing that down below the actor playing the female role was performing the part of a character named Yü-hsiao, grabbed hold of Yü-hsiao, saying, "Whore, your patron has shown up, and the madam is calling for you to receive the customer. Why haven't you gone out?"

As she spoke, she gave her a vigorous shove, which pushed her outside the suspended blinds and splashed the tea in Ch'un-mei's hand all over her person.

Ch'un-mei cursed Yü-hsiao, saying, "You crazy whore! What do you think you're doing? By horsing around this way you've splashed my tea all over. You're lucky you didn't break the teacup."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing overheard this altercation, he sent Lai-an over to inquire who was responsible for the commotion.

Ch'un-mei remained seated on her chair, saying, "Go tell him that Yühsiao, the wanton whore, couldn't help responding wantonly on catching sight of her lover."

After Hsi-men Ch'ing had made this inquiry, he was busy seeing to the wine service at the banquet and let the matter drop.

Yüeh-niang came over to the other side of the reception hall and scolded Hsiao-yü, saying, "You've been out here for some time. You ought to go back and see to things in the master suite. When all of you are out here, who is there to look after the place?"

"Your step-daughter Hsi-men Ta-chieh just went back there," said Hsiao-yü. "The two nuns are also sitting in your room."

"Whenever we let you lousy dog-begotten creatures come out here to watch the show," expostulated Yüeh-niang, "you end up:

Provoking an altercation."³⁴

When Ch'un-mei saw that Yüeh-niang had come over, she stood up and said, "Mother, you ought to interrogate them. The whole lot of them have been carrying on crazily, with total abandon, guffawing raucously, heedless of whether anyone sees them or not."

After Yüeh-niang had given them a scolding, she returned to the other side of the reception hall.

By this point, Ch'iao Hung and Licentiate Ni had gotten up and departed.

Brother-in-law Shen, Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i, and Brother-in-law Han were also about to go, but Ying Po-chüeh stopped them, appealing to Hsi-men Ch'ing with the words, "Our host. You, too, say something. Some of us are your friends, after all, and ought not to leave you in the lurch, but even your relatives are threatening to leave. Brother-in-law Shen does not reside outside the city gate, and though Brother-in-law Han, Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i, and Hua the Elder live outside the wall, it's only the third watch, and the gates aren't even open yet. What's the hurry? We should all sit down together for a while longer. After all, the performance isn't over yet."

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by ordering a page boy to bring out four jugs of Ma-ku wine³⁵ and put them down in front of him, saying, "If you gentlemen will only finish off these four jugs of wine, I won't insist on detaining you any longer."

He then took a large loving cup and put it down in front of Wu K'ai, saying, "Whoever elects to:

Leave the feast and break up the party, by threatening to get up and go, will have to drink a penalty cup of wine enforced by this gentleman."

Thereupon, the company all sat down again, while Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Shu-t'ung, "Urge the players to lose no time in putting on another scene, and to choose one that is lively."

In no time at all, the drums and clappers began to sound, and the mo (supporting male role) came out and addressed Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "May I ask, would the scene entitled 'Bequeathing the Self-Portrait' be appropriate?"

"I don't care," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "just so it's lively."

The t'ieh-tan, playing the part of Yü-hsiao, then proceeded to sing for a while.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard the player sing the words:

In this life we are unlikely to meet again.

For this reason, I bequeath this self-portrait to you.³⁶ it suddenly brought to mind the image of Li P'ing-erh on her sickbed, and his heart was so moved that he couldn't help starting to shed tears, which he wiped away constantly with a handkerchief.

This was spotted at once by P'an Chin-lien, who was gazing with a sardonic eye through the lowered blinds and pointed it out to Yüeh-niang, saying, "First Lady, just look at that feckless good-for-nothing! Why on earth should he have started to cry while drinking wine and watching the performance of a play?"

"Smart as you are," said Meng Yü-lou, "it's a wonder you don't understand such things.

Music expresses man's sorrows and joys, partings and reunions.³⁷

Hsi-men Ch'ing Is Deeply Stirred While Watching a Drama

I imagine that on seeing this episode of the drama, his heart was moved.

Upon seeing an object one remembers its owner;³⁸

Upon seeing a saddle one thinks of one's horse.³⁹

That is why he started to shed tears."

"I, for one," said Chin-lien, "do not believe that:

The storyteller, when he lets his tears fall,

Empathizes with the sorrows of the ancients.

It is all nothing but an act. Only if he could reduce me to tears by his singing would I rate him a good actor."

"Sister Six, quiet down," said Yüeh-niang. "We're listening to the performance."

Meng Yü-lou then turned to Wu K'ai's wife and explained, "Our Sister Six here, for some reason or other, is given to shooting off her mouth."

The players continued to perform for a while until, during the fifth watch, everyone got up to go. Though Hsi-men Ch'ing, holding a large goblet of wine in his hand, blocked the door and urged them to have another drink, he was unable to detain them any longer, and finally saw them out to the front gate.

After overseeing the clearing away of the utensils, Hsi-men Ch'ing directed the players to leave their costume trunk behind, saying, "Tomorrow, Eunuch Director Liu and Eunuch Director Hsüeh are coming to offer a sacrifice and spend the day, so I'll expect you to put on another day's performance."

The players assented to this and, after having been treated to food and wine, returned to their lodgings to rest. The four young musicians, Li Ming and company, also returned home. But no more of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, seeing that the day was about to dawn, also returned to the rear compound to get some rest. Truly, it is a case of:

As the red sun illuminates the windows

the night chill diminishes;

As the thin mist envelopes the bamboos the dawn light is exiguous.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 64

YÜ-HSIAO KNEELS IN MAKING AN APPEAL TO P'AN CHIN-LIEN; OFFICERS OF THE GUARD SACRIFICE TO A RICH MAN'S SPOUSE

Infatuated by love, on awakening to find the night almost over;
He tentatively examines the handkerchief woven of mermaid silk.
Only when dead does the spring silkworm's thread come to an end;
Not until burnt to ashes do the tears of the wax candle dry up.¹
The male and female phoenix mates have been blown apart by the wind;
Her soft jade and captivating fragrance² are no longer of this world.
Before he has finished boasting of the two words that spell "romance";
The cock has crowed beneath the waning moon and the fifth watch is chill.³

THE STORY GOES that by the time the company had dispersed, the cocks were already crowing and Hsi-men Ch'ing retired to rest.

Tai-an took a large jug of wine and several saucers of food out to the shop in the front compound, intending to share them with Manager Fu and Ch'en Ching-chi. Manager Fu was getting along in years and had stayed up all night, so he didn't feel like sitting around any longer but proceeded to spread out a mat and lay down on the k'ang to go to sleep.

"You and P'ing-an help yourselves," he said to Tai-an. "I doubt if Son-in-law Ch'en will show up."

Tai-an lit a candle on the counter and invited P'ing-an to come inside where the two of them proceeded to share the wine:

First a cup for you,

Then a cup for me,

until it was all gone, after which, they put the utensils away and P'ing-an went back to the gatehouse to sleep. Tai-an then secured the gate to the shop and lay down foot-to-foot on the k'ang next to Manager Fu.

Manager Fu, idly responding to something in the preceding conversation, said to Tai-an, "Now that the Sixth Lady is dead, the quality of the coffin, the sacrifices, the sutra recitations, and the funeral arrangements are certainly more than sufficient, are they not?"

"On the one hand," responded Tai-an, "she was blessed with good fortune, but not with longevity. Although Father has spent all this money on her, he has not had to dip into his own pocket. When the Sixth Lady married Father, there is no disguising the fact, as you well know, that she brought with her a considerable dowry. Others may not know the extent of it, but I do. Without even taking into account the amount of silver specie, the gold and pearl jewelry, objets d'art, jade-ornamented girdles, chatelaines, pendants, silver frets, and valuable gemstones were too numerous to count. Why do you suppose Father was so enamored of her? He was not enamored of her person, but enamored of her money.

"Even though that was the case, if one were to bring up the subject of the late Sixth Lady's disposition, no one in this whole household was her equal. She was self-deprecating and congenial, and greeted everyone with a smile. As far as we servants were concerned, she never once raised her voice in criticism, made the mistake of reviling us as slaves, or threatened us with dire consequences.

"When commissioning us to buy anything for her, she would simply hand us a nugget of silver. And when we suggested, 'Mother, why don't you put it on the scale and weigh it, so we'll know what we're spending,' she would laugh, saying, 'Just take it. What's the point of weighing it? If you don't expect to make a little something out of the transaction, what are you hoping for? Just see that I get my money's worth.'

"Who is there in this entire household who hasn't borrowed silver from her? And though she lent it out, no one ever returned it. She didn't seem to care whether she got it back or not. The First Lady and the Third Lady are also liberal as far as money is concerned, but the Fifth Lady and the Second Lady are a bit tight. When it is their turn to be in charge of the household finances, we feel plague-stricken. They are more than willing to grind our legs down to the bone. At best, they simply will not give full value. Even without any other funny business, for an expense of a mace of silver, they will weigh out only nine and a half candareens worth, or, when you get right down to it, no more than nine candareens, apparently expecting us to make up the difference."

"Well, at least the First Lady is better than that," said Manager Fu.

"Although the First Lady is all right," said Tai-an, "she's got a hair-trigger temper. One minute, she'll be in a good mood, talking away as pleasantly as can be, but the next minute, should anyone offend her, no matter who it might be, she'll let you have it in no uncertain terms. In the final analysis, she's no match for the Sixth Lady, who aroused resentment in nobody and was often willing to put in a good word with Father on our behalf. Even in the weightiest matters of a kind that would not brook appeal, if we appealed to her, she would speak to Father on our behalf, and he would never fail to comply. The Fifth Lady, on the other hand, is quick to make groundless allegations, is forever saying, 'Just you see if I don't tell Father about this,' and constantly threatens people with a beating. And now, this sister of ours, Ch'un-mei, is another star of contention, and, as fate would have it, they are both to be found in the same quarters."

"The Fifth Lady has been here for some years now," averred Manager Fu.

"You know what kind of a person she is," said Tai-an, "and can remember back to the time when she first arrived. She doesn't even show any respect to her own mother. On more than one occasion when the old lady has visited, she has treated her so badly she has gone home in tears. And now that the Sixth Lady has died, she is able to preside over the world of the front compound. She feels free to abuse whoever is in charge of sweeping the flower garden for not getting it clean enough, so that, early in the morning, he ends up looking as though:

His head has been sprayed with dog's blood."

The two of them talked for a while until Manager Fu started to snore stertorously as he fell asleep on his pillow. Tai-an also had had more than enough to drink and no sooner closed his eyes than he became oblivious to:

Heaven above and earth below.

By the time:

The red sun was three rods high in the sky,⁴ they had still not gotten up.

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing often chose to sleep in front of Li P'ingerh's spirit tablet in the front compound. In the morning, when Yü-hsiao came out to dispose of the bedding, Hsi-men Ch'ing would go back to the rear compound to comb his hair, while Shu-t'ung, with his own hair still undressed, would take advantage of the opportunity for the two of them to:

Engage in badinage and repartee, joking and contending with each other for some time before she returned to the rear compound.

Who could have anticipated that, on this particular day, when Hsi-men Ch'ing had gone back to the master suite to get some rest, Yü-hsiao availed herself of the fact that people weren't up yet, to surreptitiously come out to the front compound and give Shu-t'ung a wink, upon which the two of them snuck out to the studio in the garden and proceeded to get down to business together.

They could hardly have foreseen that P'an Chin-lien would arise early that morning and abruptly make her way to the reception hall, where she found that the lamp in front of the spirit tablet had gone out, while the tables and chairs in the large temporary structure were lying around:

Higgledy-piggledy,⁵ with no one in attendance but Hua-t'ung, who was busily engaged in sweeping the grounds.

"You lousy jailbird!" Chin-lien said to him. "Do you mean to say that you are the only one here sweeping the grounds? Where have all the others gone?"

"They haven't gotten up yet," replied Hua-t'ung.

"Drop your broom for the time being," said Chin-lien, "and go up front to ask our son-in-law for a length of white damask for my mother, Old Mrs. P'an, who doesn't have a mourning skirt. You can also pick up a mourning headband and girdle for her. She's going home later today."

"I fear your son-in-law may still be asleep," said Hua-t'ung, "but I'll go ask him for you."

After some time, he returned and reported, "Your son-in-law says that it's not part of his responsibility, since it is Shu-t'ung and Ts'ui Pen who are in charge of monitoring the expenses incurred by providing the guests with mourning wear. The thing for you to do is to ask Shu-t'ung for what you want."

"Who knows where that slave has gone off to?" said Chin-lien. "You go see if you can find him."

Hua-t'ung looked into the studio in the front courtyard and reported back, saying, "He was there a minute ago. He must have gone to the studio in the garden to do his hair."

"You can finish your sweeping," said Chin-lien. "I'll go ask that jailbird for what I need myself."

Thereupon, she:

Lightly moved her lotus feet,
Gently lifted her beige skirt, and headed toward the studio in the garden. Upon chancing to hear the sound of laughter within, she pushed open the door, only to find Shu-t'ung and Yühsiao just in the thick of things on the bed inside.

"A dandy jailbird you are!" she exclaimed. "A fine thing the two of you are up to in here!"

The two of them, who were still entwined with each other, were thrown into such consternation by her appearance that they were barely able to extricate themselves in time to kneel down on the ground before her and plead for mercy.

"You lousy jailbird!" said Chin-lien to Shu-t'ung. "Just go fetch me a bolt of mourning damask and a bolt of cotton cloth, so I can send my mother home with them.”

Shu-t'ung lost no time in fetching the wanted articles and proffering them to her, whereupon, Chin-lien went straight back to her quarters, with Yü-hsiao following in her wake.

Upon their arrival there, Yü-hsiao knelt down on the floor and groveled around on her knees, appealing to Chin-lien with the plea, “Fifth Lady, whatever happens, don’t tell Father about this.”

“You lousy little bitch!” Chin-lien demanded. “Tell me the truth. All this while, how many times has that slave made out with you? You’d better not try to deceive me by so much as a single word.”

Yü-hsiao then confessed the whole story of how the two of them had been carrying on an affair.

“If you want me to let you off,” said Chin-lien, “you’ll have to agree to three conditions.”

“If you consent to spare me,” said Yü-hsiao, “no matter how many conditions you impose, I’ll agree to them all.”

“The first condition,” Chin-lien said, “is that you will tell me everything that happens in your mistress’s quarters, no matter how trivial. If you fail to tell me anything, and I hear about it, I will definitely not let you off the hook. The second condition is that if I ask you for anything, you’ll find a way to see that I get it. The third condition is that you tell me how it is that your mistress, who has not been pregnant before, should now have managed to conceive.”

“I will not deceive you, Fifth Lady,” said Yü-hsiao. “The fact of the matter is that my mistress, thus and so, conceived after taking a fertility potion, provided by Nun Hsüeh, containing the afterbirth of a firstborn male child.”

Chin-lien made a mental note of everything she had said and only then consented not to report anything to Hsi-men Ch’ing.

When Shu-t’ung saw the sardonic smile on the face of P’an Chin-lien as she led Yü-hsiao off to her quarters, he realized that this was an affair that was not likely to end propitiously for him. He therefore availed himself of the opportunity to help himself to the considerable number of handkerchiefs, scarves, ornamental toothpicks, hairpins, toggles, and other gifts from visitors that were stored in a cabinet in the studio. He had managed to scrounge something over ten taels of silver for himself, and he also went to the counter of the shop out front and finagled Manager Fu into giving him another twenty taels by saying they were needed to buy additional supplies of mourning damask. He then went straightaway outside the city gate and hired a long-distance mount to take him to the nearest embarkation point, where he boarded a boat from his hometown and embarked for his place of origin in Su-chou. Truly:

Breaking to pieces the jade cage,
the phoenix flies away;
Smashing apart the metal padlock,
the dragon breaks free.⁶

It so happened that on that day Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, and Cheng Aiyüeh all returned to their respective establishments. In the morning, Eunuch Director Hsüeh and Eunuch Director Liu sent men to deliver offertory tables of the three sacrificial animals, so that they would be able to offer oblations and burn paper money on behalf of the deceased. Each of them also donated a tael of silver as their contributions toward the expenses of an all-night wake and engaged the services of two professional performers of the genre known as Tao-ch’ing, or Taoist songs, proposing to come visit with Hsi-men Ch’ing during the day.

Shu-t'ung Secretly Decamps Setting Sail before the Wind

Hsi-men Ch'ing was anxious to be able to supply his visitors with mourning damask and started looking for Shu-t'ung in order to get the necessary key but couldn't find him anywhere.

"This morning," reported Manager Fu, "he came to the counter in the shop and asked me for twenty taels of silver to buy mourning damask with. He said that you had told him the existing supply of mourning damask was inadequate. No doubt he has gone outside the city gate to purchase some more."

"I didn't tell him any such thing," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "So why should he be asking you for silver?"

He then sent someone outside the city gate to the shops that sold mourning damask to look for him, but he was nowhere to be found.

"I suspect this slave has been up to some funny business," said Yüeh-niang to Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Who knows what sort of scurvy tricks he's capable of? And now it looks like he's appropriated several taels of silver and made off with them. You had better open up those studios of yours and give them a good going over. It's not a job for a legless crab like myself. I fear he may have absconded with other things as well."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, accordingly, went to inspect his two studios and found that the keys to the storeroom were still hanging on the wall, but that a considerable number of handkerchiefs, scarves, gifts of books and silver, ornamental toothpicks, toggles, and the like, were missing from the large cabinet.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was enraged and called in the neighborhood authorities, telling them to seek out and apprehend the fugitive throughout the:

Three quarters and two alleys, of the pleasure precincts, but he was nowhere to be found. Truly:
Not only was he impatient to return to his native place;
But the misty waters of the Five Lakes⁷ were impenetrable.

By this time, at about noon that afternoon, Eunuch Director Hsüeh had arrived in his sedan chair, and Hsi-men Ch'ing invited Wu K'ai, Ying Pochüeh, and Licentiate Wen to help entertain him.

Before doing anything else, Eunuch Director Hsüeh went up to Li P'ingerh's spirit tablet to burn incense and perform an obeisance, after which, he saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "How sad! How sad! What ailment was it that your lady died of?"

"Unfortunately," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "she suffered from a severe case of hemorrhaging, which was not looked after properly, and resulted in her death. I am grateful to you, venerable sir, for your expression of concern."

"I haven't much to offer," said Eunuch Director Hsüeh. "It is but a paltry expression of my feelings."

Then, catching sight of the portrait of Li P'ing-erh that was hanging nearby, he said, "What a beautiful lady. She looks just as though she were:

Enjoying prosperity in the springtime of her youth.
What a pity that she has departed this world so early."

"That things are unequal is part of their nature,"⁸ opined Licentiate Wen, who was standing to one side. "After all:

Failure or success, long life or short,⁹ are things that are predetermined. Even a sage can do nothing to alter them."

Eunuch Director Hsüeh turned his head to look at Licentiate Wen and, noticing that he was dressed in the cap and gown of a licentiate, but in mourning white, asked, "What school is this venerable gentleman enrolled in?"

Licentiate Wen responded with a bow, saying, "Your unworthy pupil is enrolled in the Prefectural School."

Changing the subject, Eunuch Director Hsüeh said, "I'd like to see the lady's coffin, if I may."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered his attendants to lift aside the curtains suspended to either side, so that Eunuch Director Hsüeh could go inside and take a look.

Expressing the most fulsome admiration,
Eunuch Director Hsüeh said, "What a fine coffin. May I ask how much you paid for it?"

"I got it through a relative," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and compensated him appropriately."

"Venerable sir," said Ying Po-chüeh, "why don't you hazard a guess. Where did the wood come from, and what is it called?"

After carefully examining it, Eunuch Director Hsüeh said, "If it didn't come from Chien-ch'ang,¹⁰ it must have come from Chen-yüan."¹¹

"Even if it came from Chen-yüan," said Ying Po-chüeh, "it wouldn't be worth all that much."

"The best coffin wood," said Eunuch Director Hsüeh, "is surely Yang-hsüan Elm."¹²

"Boards cut from the Yang-hsüan Elm are comparatively thin and short," said Ying Po-chüeh. "How could they pass muster? These coffin boards are superior to those made from the Yang-hsüan Elm. They come from a place called Peach Blossom Cavern, located on the Wu-ling River in Hu-kuang province. In former days, during the T'ang dynasty, a fisherman entered this cavern where he encountered the Hairly Woman, a refugee from the Ch'in dynasty, who had sought shelter there from the military conflicts of the time.¹³ It is a secluded place where people seldom come. These boards were all more than seven feet long, four inches thick, and two feet five inches wide. As a special favor to a kinsman the owner gave him a substantial discount, so the asking price was only 370 taels of silver. You have never seen the like, sir. When they were sawed open, they exuded a pungent aroma and had flowerlike patterns on both sides."

"The lady is fortunate indeed," said Eunuch Director Hsüeh, "to be able to enjoy a coffin of this quality. We eunuchs, when we pass away, cannot expect such elaborate funeral arrangements."

"Venerable sir," said Wu K'ai, "that's a fine way to talk! People like you have direct access to the imperial court and enjoy great rank and emolument. We outer officials can hardly hope to compete with the likes of you, venerable sir, who are daily exposed to the pure radiance of the sovereign and transmit the words of the Lord of Ten Thousand Years. At present, His Honor T'ung Kuan has been promoted to the rank of Commandery Prince,¹⁴ and his sons and grandsons are all entitled to:

Wear python robes and girdles of jade.

What limit is there to your prospects?"¹⁵

"Might I ask," said Eunuch Director Hsüeh, "what is the name of this glib-tongued gentleman?"

"This is my wife's elder brother, Wu K'ai," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "At present he holds the position of battalion commander in the local guard."

"Is he the elder brother of this deceased lady?" asked Eunuch Director Hsüeh.

"No," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He is the elder brother of my humble spouse."

Eunuch Director Hsüeh then saluted Wu K'ai with a bow, saying, "Pray forgive my unmindfulness."

After he had inspected the coffin for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing escorted him to the summerhouse, where a folding armchair had been placed in the position of honor, upon which Eunuch Director Hsüeh sat down.

After a servant had served them with tea, Eunuch Director Hsüeh said, "How is it that Eunuch Director Liu is not here yet? I'll have one of my retainers go out to meet him."

At this, a black-clad retainer knelt down and reported, "When Your Honor left home, you sent your humble servant to invite His Honor Liu to start out, and his sedan chair was already in waiting. He should be here any minute."

Eunuch Director Hsüeh then went on to ask, "Have those two performers of Tao-ch'ing arrived, or not?"

"They arrived this morning," reported Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll have them called in."

It was not long before they appeared before the company and kowtowed.

"Have you had anything to eat?" asked Eunuch Director Hsüeh.

"We have been given something to eat," they replied.

"Since you've already been fed," said Eunuch Director Hsüeh, "I want you to do the best you can today. I'll see that you are amply rewarded."

"Venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "your pupil also has a troupe of players here, who are prepared to perform for you."

"Where are these players from?" asked Eunuch Director Hsüeh.

"It is a troupe of Hai-yen actors," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"What with that barbarous accent of theirs," pronounced Eunuch Director Hsüeh, "who knows what they are singing about? Their plots are only concerned with those poor discontented scholars who endure hardship for three years within their unheated chambers and then wander abroad for nine years, carrying their:

Zithers, swords, and book boxes,¹⁶ on their backs, making their way to the capital in order to compete in the examinations, in the hope of obtaining an office. They don't even have the consolation of wives or children by their sides. What do the vicissitudes of such people mean to celibate old eunuchs like ourselves? We can do without them."

Licentiate Wen, who was seated beside him, laughed at this diatribe, saying, "Venerable sir, what you have just said is quite unreasonable.

Those who reside in Ch'i speak with a Ch'i accent;

Those who reside in Ch'u speak with a Ch'u accent.

Though you may reside in your:

High halls and spacious structures,¹⁷

how can your heart fail to be moved by such things?"

At this rejoinder, Eunuch Director Hsüeh clapped his hands and laughed, saying, "I had forgotten that Licentiate Wen was present. You outer officials always come to the defense of each other."

"After all," said Licentiate Wen, "it is from us licentiates that members of the official class are recruited. Venerable sir:

For every branch you chop down,

A hundred trees are threatened.¹⁸

When the hare dies, the fox is sad;

Creatures grieve for their fellows."¹⁹

"That is not so," responded Eunuch Director Hsüeh:

"In the space of any particular quarter,

There are both the wise and the foolish."

As they were talking, an attendant suddenly came in and reported that Eunuch Director Liu was getting out of his sedan chair, at which, Wu K'ai and the others went out to greet him. Upon coming inside, Eunuch Director Liu bowed in front of Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet.

When they had finished with the customary amenities, Eunuch Director Hsüeh addressed his fellow eunuch, saying, "Why is it, venerable sir, that you have not arrived until now?"

"Eunuch Director Hsü from the northern quarter dropped by for a visit," Eunuch Director Liu explained, "and I had to entertain him for a while before sending him off."

The company thereupon sat down in their respective places, while attendants served them with tea.

Eunuch Director Liu then asked one of his servitors, "Have our offertory tables been set up yet, or not?"

"They have all been properly set up," the servant replied.

"We might as well proceed to burn paper money on behalf of the deceased, then," said Eunuch Director Liu.

"Venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "there is no need for any further ritual observances. You have already demonstrated your respect for the deceased."

"Why else did we come?" said Eunuch Director Liu. "We ought to present our offerings in person."

At this juncture, the attendants provided them with incense sticks, and the two eunuchs proceeded to light them before the spirit tablet, offer the customary three libations, and then perform an obeisance.

"Venerable sirs, please get up," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Thereupon, after performing two kowtows, they stood up, and Hsi-men Ch'ing kowtowed to them in return.

The company then returned to the summerhouse and sat down, while the preparations for the feast were completed, and wine was served. The two eunuchs were seated in the places of honor to left and right, with Wu K'ai, Licentiate Wen, and Ying Po-chüeh placed below them, while Hsi-men Ch'ing occupied the position of host at the lower end of the seating arrangement. As their:

Drums and gongs began to sound, the players came on and presented the program of pieces they were prepared to perform. The two eunuch directors examined it for a while and chose a selection from the play entitled Liu Chih-yüan hung-p'ao chi, or Liu Chih-yüan and the Crimson Robe.²⁰

Before many scenes had been played, however, they grew tired of it and called in the performers of Tao-ch'ing, saying, "It would be more fun if they were to sing a Tao-ch'ing for us."

Thereupon, the two of them began to tap their "fisherman's drums,"²¹ as they stood shoulder to shoulder, facing their audience, and sang in high-pitched voices the story entitled Han Wen-kung hsüeh-yung Lan-kuan, or Han Yü Is Impeded by Snow at Lan-kuan.²²

At this juncture, the chef came out and kowtowed before the company, and the two eunuch directors rewarded him with appropriate gratuities. Hsi-men Ch'ing had also prepared meat and wine to serve to their attendants, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

During the course of the banquet, Eunuch Director Hsüeh began a conversation with Eunuch Director Liu, saying, "Brother Liu, you may not have heard about it yet, but, the other day, on the tenth day of the eighth month, during:

A great downpour of rain,²³

the thunder and lightning destroyed the owl-tail-shaped ornaments at the ends of the roof beam of the Ning-shen Hall in the grounds of the Imperial Palace, frightening any number of palace women to death. The Emperor himself was greatly alarmed and ordered that all his officials should engage in self-examination,²⁴ that daily petitions should be presented to the spirits during propitiatory services in the Temple of Highest Clarity, that the butchering of animals should be prohibited for ten days, that the judicial offices should suspend punishments, and that no officials should be permitted to present memorials to the throne.

"Recently, an envoy from the Jurchen regime of the Great Chin has presented a memorial demanding that we cede them the territory of our three frontier defense commands,²⁵ and that old villain Ts'ai Ching proposed that we should agree to this, and that the troops and horses under the command of T'ung Kuan should be turned over to Censor-in-Chief T'an Chen,²⁶ along with Huang Yu²⁷ and the other ten commissioners in charge of the Three Border Regions, but the troops refused to return, and the matter has been turned over to the court officials for deliberation.

"The other day, at the solar term 'Beginning of Winter,' the Lord of Ten Thousand Years was scheduled to come out to sacrifice at the Imperial Ancestral Temple. That morning, an erudite of the Court of Imperial Sacrifices named Fang Chen,²⁸ who was supervising the sweeping of the premises, observed that a brick in the wall of the temple was oozing blood,²⁹ and that there was a declivity in the northeastern corner of the floor of the hall. He reported these observations in a memorial to the throne. In response to this, a supervising secretary in the Office of Scrutiny sent up a memorial stating in the strongest possible terms that T'ung Kuan had been given too much authority, and that eunuchs ought not to be granted the rank of commandery prince. At present, an imperial mandate written in letters of gold has been dispatched by express courier, ordering Commander T'ung Kuan to return to the capital."

"Now that you and I have been sent out to be local officials," responded Eunuch Director Liu, "such affairs at court are no longer any business of ours. As the saying goes:

Each day you live is merely another day.³⁰

Even if the sky should be about to fall,

There are the four giants to hold it up.³¹

Sooner or later this realm of the Great Sung dynasty is sure to come to grief at the hands of this bunch of discontented scholars.

Wang Ten-plus-nine,

Let's sip our wine!"³²

He then called for the two performers of Tao-ch'ing to come forward and instructed them, saying, "Sing us the story of Li Po hao t'an-pei, or Li Po's Addiction to the Cup."³³

The two performers then began to tap their "fisherman's drums" and sang to them for a while.

The feasting continued until evening, when the two eunuchs ordered their servants to prepare their sedan chairs and got up to go. Hsi-men Ch'ing was unable to detain them any longer and saw them out to the front gate, where they departed, with their escorts shouting to clear the way.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing came back inside, he ordered that candles should be lit and the tables left in place, instructed the caterers to set things back in order, and urged Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, and Licentiate Wen to keep their seats. In addition, he sent a page boy to invite Manager Fu Ming, Manager Kan Jun, Han Tao-kuo, Pen Ti-ch'uan, Ts'ui Pen, and Ch'en Ching-chi to join them.

When they had all been seated, he called for the players and instructed them, saying, "Continue to perform the Yü-huan chi from where you left off yesterday."

He then turned to Ying Po-chüeh and remarked, "These eunuchs have no taste for the flavor of southern-style drama. If I had known they didn't like it, I would not have urged them to stay."

"They failed to appreciate your intentions," said Ying Po-chüeh. "Eunuchs, with their perverted tastes, only go for pieces like Lan-kuan chi,³⁴ and the:

Suggestive songs and lewd tunes, performed by their boy actors. What do they know of major works that treat of:

Sorrows and joys, partings and reunions?”

Thereupon, the drums and clappers began to sound, and the players proceeded to present:

With lively action and slow singing, the remaining scenes from Yü-huan chi that they had not finished performing the day before. Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered the page boys to serve the company by:

Promptly pouring the fine wine.³⁵

Ying Po-chüeh, who was sitting at the same table with Hsi-men Ch'ing, asked him, “Have the three singing girls gone home yet? If not, why don't you have them come out and serve us a cup of wine?”

“You're still dreaming of them, are you?” said Hsi-men Ch'ing. “They've long since had enough of it and gone home.”

“They must have stayed over here for two or three days,” said Ying Po-chüeh.

“Wu Yin-erh stayed the longest time of all,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

That day, the company remained seated at their places until the third watch after the performance of the play was over, before the party finally broke up. Hsi-men Ch'ing asked his brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, to come a little early the next morning in order to help entertain the official visitors who were coming to offer a sacrifice to the deceased, after which, he rewarded the players with four taels of silver and sent them on their way.

The next day, Commandant Chou Hsiu, Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yenling, and a sizable contingent of officials from the local guard all clubbed together to provide a pig and a sheep, and a fancy table setting of a kind intended as much for display as for eating, as their sacrificial offerings. A ritual specialist had been engaged to declaim the funeral eulogy. Hsi-men Ch'ing had prepared a banquet for the occasion, and the three boy actors, Li Ming and company, were also in attendance.

At noon, the sound of drums was heard, indicating that the offertory gifts had arrived. Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, and Licentiate Wen went out to the gate to welcome the visitors and looked on as the group of officials, with their attendants:

Crowding behind and clamoring in front,³⁶ dismounted and were ushered into the front reception hall to change their clothes.

Before long, the sacrificial offerings were duly displayed, the group of officials gathered in front of Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet, and Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'en Ching-chi returned their salutations. The ritual specialist, whose job it was to act as master of ceremonies, then called out his instructions, presented the three sacrificial libations, knelt down to one side, and proceeded to declaim the funeral eulogy, which read as follows:

On this, the twenty-fifth day chia-shen, of the ninth month, the first day of which was keng-shen, in the year ting-yu, the seventh year of the Cheng-ho reign period, his devoted colleagues Chou Hsiu, Ching Chung, Hsia Yen-ling, Chang Kuan, along with their fellow officials Fan Hsün, Wu K'ai, Hsü Feng-hsiang, P'an Chi, and others, respectfully offer a stiff-bristled pig and a soft-haired sheep, along with other offertory foods, in sacrifice before the spirit tablet of the late consort, née Li, of Hsi-men Ch'ing, an officer of the Embroidered-Uniform Guard. We address the spirit of the departed. Delicately raised in the women's quarters, she was chaste and adept at female occupations. Her virtue was that of gold or jade, her appearance that of fragrant orchids. In regulating her household she exhibited judgment, in managing her domestic tasks she left nothing to be desired. She showed respect for learning and was on good terms with her in-laws. Revering her husband as her Heaven, she paid him respect by raising the serving tray as high as her eyebrows.³⁷ Though she hoped to live to a ripe age, Heaven chose to curtail her remaining years. She and her husband should have enjoyed the harmony of phoenix mates or musical instruments, but, alas, Heaven begrudged her her remaining years and chose to hurry them to an abrupt end. Alas! The length or brevity of life are predetermined.³⁸ Heaven seems to reject persons of worth. Pearls sink below the waves and jade disks are shattered. Clouds can be threatening and winds bring sorrow in their wake. Though we knock at the door of the grave, it will not open. We may sigh for the dew on the shallot, but it will soon evaporate.³⁹ I, Chou Hsiu, and the others, occupying the position of colleagues, and mindful of the obligations of friendship, hereby offer up meat in sacrificial vessels, and decant wine into offertory goblets, in the hope that the spirit of the departed will deign to enjoy them. Should she be mindful of our eulogy on this sad occasion, may she come and partake thereof.

When the sacrificial ceremony was finished, and Hsi-men Ch'ing had thanked the participants, Wu K'ai and company led the group of officials to the summerhouse, where they divested themselves of their mourning garments and were served with tea. The boy actors started to play their instruments and sing for their entertainment as they sat down at their places to enjoy the collation that had been prepared for them. Their servants and attendants were also properly attended to. The chef then came out to supervise the presentation of the:

Three soups and five courses, which were even more lavish than those served on the preceding two days, and kowtowed before the company. Hsi-men Ch'ing, along with Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, and Licentiate Wen, occupied the position of hosts, plying their guests with wine until:

Drinking vessels and game tallies lay helter-skelter, while the three boy actors, Li Ming and company, with their:

Silver psalteries and ivory clappers, played and sang to entertain the company. Meanwhile, outside, Hsi-men Ch'ing's managers and storekeepers saw to it that the carriers who had accompanied the official guests all received appropriate gratuities of silver according to precedent.

The officials remained in their places until mid-afternoon before getting up to go, but Hsi-men Ch'ing would not hear of it and, together with Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, and company, with large goblets in hand, endeavored to detain them, while telling Li Ming and the other boy actors to strike up their instruments and sing songs to them. They continued drinking and enjoying themselves until evening before the party broke up.

Hsi-men Ch'ing tried to persuade Wu K'ai and Ying Po-chüeh to stay a little longer, but Wu K'ai said, “We've all been imposing on you for days on end, and you must be tired out yourself, Brother-in-law. We'd better go our respective ways and get some rest.”

Thereupon, they bade him farewell, and went home. Truly:

The verdant peaches in the celestial realm are saturated with dew;
The red apricots that grow beside the sun are enveloped in clouds.⁴⁰

Chapter 65

ABBOT WU MEETS THE FUNERAL PROCESSION AND EULOGIZES THE PORTRAIT; CENSOR SUNG IMPOSES ON A LOCAL MAGNATE TO ENTERTAIN EUNUCH HUANG

Moved by the respect she always showed him, he admired her gentleness;
Not having expected to be parted forever,
he can sing only sad songs.
The waning moon, hovering beside the clouds,
suspends its broken mirror;
Time's flowing light flies past as swiftly as the shuttle on a loom.
Sorrow, like the color of verdant foliage,
fades by the end of spring;
Bitterness, suffusing the yearning heart, serves to prolong the night.
If you should inquire how many tears have fallen, only to evaporate;
They are as numerous as the autumn colors in a grove of maple trees.

THE STORY GOES that the twenty-eighth day of the ninth month was the time for the second of the seven weekly commemorations of Li P'ing-erh's death. Abbot Wu of the Temple of the Jade Emperor, who had secured the job of presiding over the services on that day, brought sixteen Taoist priests to come to Hsi-men Ch'ing's home to conduct the flag-raising ceremony inviting the presence of the gods, and erect the ritual altar for the performance of the "Litany Addressed to the Heavenly Savior from Distress Who Dwells in the Blue Heaven of the East"¹ for the second weekly commemoration.

While they were setting up the altar that morning, a messenger came to deliver a letter from Secretary An Ch'en of the Ministry of Works, and Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that he was properly entertained before going on his way.

Abbot Wu had brought with him from the temple vessels for the meat of the three sacrificial animals, offerings of soup and rice, patisserie, vegetarian fare, imitation gold and silver ingots, paper money, and the like, along with a bolt of fabric, to serve as his sacrificial gifts. When the Taoist priests had circumambulated the coffin reciting their spells, Abbot Wu prostrated himself in front of the spirit tablet.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'en Ching-chi kowtowed to him in return, saying, "Your Reverence has put himself to considerable expense.

What can we do to be worthy of such largess?"

"I am most embarrassed," responded Abbot Wu. "I really should have provided for the recitation of an additional scripture to pray for the salvation of your lady, but my means would not permit me to do so. As for these coarse offerings of tea and rice that I have presented:

They are no more than tokens of my esteem.

I hope that Your Honor will see fit to accept them with a smile."

When the presentation of the sacrificial offerings had been completed, Hsi-men Ch'ing agreed to accept them and saw to the dismissal of the carriers who had brought them.

That day the sacred texts recited at the three morning, noon, and evening audiences included the Chiu-t'ien sheng-shen chang ching, or Scripture of the Stanzas of the Vitalizing Spirits of the Nine Heavens,² a litany designed to destroy the Hells of the Nine Realms of Darkness,³ a ritual for attracting and summoning the soul of the deceased, a memorial written in red characters addressed to the above-mentioned Heavenly Savior from Distress Who Dwells in the Blue Heaven of the East, and the talismans notifying the various Perfected Beings of the rites that were being celebrated. These rituals were all performed in their entirety, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

The next day, the first person who came to offer a sacrifice to the deceased was Han Ming-ch'uan, the husband of Meng Yü-lou's elder sister, who lived outside the city gate. At the time, Meng Yü-lou's younger brother, Meng Jui, who had been away from home as a traveling merchant for five or six years, had happened to arrive home the day before and, learning from his elder sister that there was to be a funeral observance at Hsi-men Ch'ing's place, chose to accompany his brother-in-law Han Ming-ch'uan in coming to offer a sacrifice to the deceased and acquire the appropriate mourning garment. He also brought with him something considerable in the way of gifts. After exchanging the customary amenities with Hsi-men Ch'ing, he proceeded to Meng Yü-lou's quarters to pay his respects. By this time, there were some ten or more female guests on the premises, and Hsi-men Ch'ing had also provided a collation for their entertainment. But no more of this.

At noon on the same day, the district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho, Li Ta-t'ien, the vice magistrate, Ch'ien Ch'eng, the assistant magistrate, Jen T'ing-kuei, the docket officer, Hsia Kung-chi, and the magistrate of Yang-ku district, Ti Ssu-pin, five officials in all, who had clubbed together to provide the necessary funds, came, attired in appropriate mourning garb, to burn paper money and offer their condolences. Hsi-men Ch'ing had prepared a collation for them and saw that they were accommodated in the summerhouse. He had asked his brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, along with Licentiate Wen, to help keep them company, and also engaged the services of the three boy actors to play their musical instruments and sing for their entertainment. The grooms that had accompanied them to tend their horses were also provided with platters of assorted snacks, which they carried to the place that had been set aside for them so they could sit down and eat.

Just as the guests at the party were devoting themselves to their cups and having a high time of it, as luck would have it:

Without coincidences there would be no stories.

It was unexpectedly announced that the secretary of the Ministry of Works, Huang Pao-kuang, who was the superintendent of the Imperial Brickyard, had come to offer his condolences. This threw Hsi-men Ch'ing into such consternation that he hastily changed into his mourning clothes and went before Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet to await his guest. Licentiate Wen, who had gone outside the front gate to welcome him, ushered him into the front reception hall, where he changed his clothes, and then led him inside. The servants who accompanied him, bearing incense sticks and candles, paper money, and bolts of satin brocade, arrayed on red lacquer trays, knelt down, holding up the incense in their hands.

After Huang Pao-kuang had offered up the incense and kowtowed before the spirit tablet, and Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'en Ching-chi had stepped forward to return his salutation, Huang Pao-kuang said, "Your pupil did not know of the death of your respected spouse. I have been remiss in offering my condolences. Forgive me. Forgive me."

"Your pupil has hitherto neglected to pay you his respects," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "And now, venerable sir, you have not only condescended to express your condolences, but have deigned to bestow these lavish gifts upon me.

My gratitude will be impossible to contain."

When they had finished exchanging these amenities, Huang Pao-kuang was conducted to the summerhouse, where he was invited to sit down in the place of honor at the head of the table, while Hsi-men Ch'ing and Licentiate Wen sat down in the position of hosts to keep him company, and the attendants served them with tea.

Upon finishing his tea, Huang Pao-kuang said, "Yesterday Sung Ch'iao-nien asked me to convey his greetings to you. He has also learned of the demise of your respected lady and would like to have been able to offer his condolences in person. Unfortunately, however, he has a plethora of pressing matters on his hands. At present he is stationed in Chi-chou.

"You may not have heard about it yet, sir, but the Emperor is currently engaged in constructing the Mount Ken Imperial Park⁴ and has issued an edict ordering Chu Mien, the defender-in-chief of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, to proceed to the Hu-Hsiang region of Chiang-nan to take charge of the Flower and Rock Convoys⁵ that will transport the rare flowers and rocks required for the embellishment of the park. The boats in these convoys are proceeding, one after the other, along the waterways, and the first contingent is about to arrive in the Huai River region.

"Moreover, the eunuch Huang Ching-ch'en, the defender-in-chief of the Palace Command, has been put in charge of the safe delivery of the rock formation known as 'The Fabulous Peak of Auspicious Clouds and a Myriad Shapes.'⁶ This object is twenty feet long and several feet thick and has been wrapped in yellow felt. A number of boats are involved in its transport, all flying yellow flags, and the convoy is proceeding through Shantung on the canal. But the water in the canal is low, and corvée laborers from eight prefectures have been requisitioned to tow the boats, with the result that:

The officials are in dire straits, and

The people are reduced to destitution.⁷

"His Excellency Sung Ch'iao-nien has been put in charge of the functionaries from the prefectures and districts and is personally involved in everything that happens.

The quantity of paperwork is mountainous, and

He is obliged to work both day and night, without any respite whatever. On top of which, Defender-in-chief Huang Ching-ch'en is about to show up from the capital, and His Excellency Sung Ch'iao-nien is expected to lead the officials of the Two Provincial Offices in receiving him.

"Not being on familiar terms with anyone else in the area, he has deputed your pupil to respectfully ask if you would consent to allow your distinguished mansion to be used for his reception, and to host a banquet in honor of Defender-in-chief Huang. But I don't know if you will assent to this or not."

He then instructed an attendant to summon the servitors of His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien, whereupon two functionaries, dressed in black livery, knelt down in front of them, reached into a felt bag, and presented two bolts of satin brocade, a stick of aloeswood incense, two sticks of white wax, and a quire of "cotton paper," made from the bark of the paper-mulberry.⁸

"Those are the consolatory contributions offered by His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien," said Huang Pao-kuang. "These other two packets are the joint donations toward the banquet expenses presented by the officials of the Two Provincial Offices and eight prefectures. The twelve officials from the Two Provincial Offices have donated three taels apiece, and the eight prefectural officials have given five taels apiece, making twenty-two contributions, amounting to 106 taels in all."⁹

He handed these over to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "May I trouble your worthy staff to take care of this, or not?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing hesitated to assent, saying, "Your pupil is currently in mourning. What am I to do? What am I to do?"

He then went on to inquire, "When is this reception to take place?"

"It's early yet," said Huang Pao-kuang. "It will not be until the middle of next month. Eunuch Director Huang Ching-ch'en has not even left the capital yet."

"The funeral procession for my late consort will not take place until the twelfth day of the tenth month," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. But if I am directed to undertake this at the behest of the venerable Sung Ch'iao-nien, how could I refuse? And please extend my thanks for his generous consolatory offerings. With regard to these other contributions, however, you must take them back.

I absolutely refuse to accept them.

You have but to let me know the number of table settings needed. Your pupil will not fail to provide everything that is required."

"Ssu-ch'üan," said Huang Pao-kuang, "this proposal of yours is mistaken. Sung Ch'iao-nien entrusted me with the task of asking you to undertake this burdensome responsibility. These are the joint contributions of the officials from the entire province of Shantung and are not proffered by Sung Ch'iao-nien himself. How can you refuse them? If you should not accept them, your pupil would be constrained to report the fact back to Sung Ch'iao-nien, and he would not presume to trouble you any further."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard these words, he said, "In that case, your pupil will accept them for the time being."

He then directed Tai-an and Wang Ching to take possession of the contributions and put them away.

"How many table settings should be prepared?" he then went on to ask.

"For Defender-in-chief Huang Ching-ch'en," replied Huang Pao-kuang, "there should be a large table setting of the kind intended as much for display as for eating. For His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien and the officials of the Two Provincial Offices, individual table settings of the ordinary sort will do. And for the prefectural officials who rank below them, communal seating will suffice. The musicians required for their entertainment will be provided. There is no need for your household to engage any."

When he had finished speaking, after the tea had been twice replenished, he got up to leave.

Hsi-men Ch'ing endeavored to detain him, but Huang Pao-kuang said, "Your pupil must pay another call on the venerable gentleman Shang Liu-t'ang, who formerly served as district magistrate in my native place before being promoted to the post of prefectural judge in Ch'eng-tu. His son, Shang Hsiao-t'ang, is also a fellow student of mine, having passed the provincial civil service examinations the same year that I did."

"Your pupil was unaware, venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that you were on intimate terms with Shang Hsiao-t'ang. Your pupil and he are also acquainted."

When Huang Pao-kuang stood up to go, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Venerable sir, pray convey my sentiments to Sung Ch'iao-nien, and assure him that, when the time comes, he will find my humble abode respectfully at his disposal."

"Shortly beforehand," said Huang Pao-kuang, "Sung Ch'iao-nien will send someone to let you know. There is no need to be overly extravagant."

"Your pupil understands," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, as he escorted him to the front gate, where he mounted his horse and departed.

When the officials from the district yamen learned that the secretary of the Ministry of Works, Huang Pao-kuang, with other high-ranking officers from the regional inspector's office, had visited the premises, they were thrown into such consternation that they secreted themselves in the small summerhouse beneath the artificial hill as they drank their wine and ordered their subordinates to get their sedan chairs and horses out of the way.

On this occasion, when Hsi-men Ch'ing rejoined his guests in the summer-house, he told the assembled officials all about how the regional investigating censor Sung Ch'iao-nien was planning to lead the officials of the Two Provincial Offices and eight prefectures in welcoming Defender-in-chief Huang Ching-ch'en next month and had asked him to provide a reception in his honor.

On hearing this, the assembled officials, with one voice, said, "This visit will entail insuperable tribulation for the prefectures and districts involved. When such imperial emissaries come, all of the expenses for the attending personnel, provisions, public banquets, utensils, and corvée laborers are borne by the prefectures and districts, which, in turn, must extract them from the people. As a way of bringing about the utter depletion of both public and private resources:

Nothing could surpass this.¹⁰

We all hope, Ssu-ch'üan, that you will put in a good word with your superiors on our behalf in order to alleviate our plight. That would constitute a signal demonstration of our mutual esteem."

When they had finished speaking, they chose not to remain any longer, but got up, mounted their horses, and departed.

To make a long story short, when the time came for the third weekly commemoration of Li P'ing-erh's death, Abbot Tao-chien of the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city wall led sixteen Buddhist monks of high attainments to come and recite scriptures on her behalf. Wearing their cassocks of cloud-patterned brocade and their Vairocana hats, and accompanied by the music of large cymbals and large drums, in the morning they performed the ceremonies of "obtaining sacred water," "paying homage to the five directions," "invoking the Three Treasures," and "bathing the Buddha." At noon, they went on to perform the ceremonies of "soliciting the aid of the Tathāgata," "summoning the soul," "breaking out of Hell," reciting the Litanies of Emperor Wu of the Liang Dynasty,¹¹ and declaiming the dhāraṇīs of the Sutra of the Peacock King.¹² Everything was done with appropriate solemnity.

That evening, Ch'iao Hung's wife, and the wives of Hsi-men Ch'ing's employees, joined Yüeh-niang and company in participating in an all-night wake, during which they were entertained with puppet shows in front of Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet, while Hsi-men Ch'ing, along with Ying Po-chüeh, Wu K'ai, and Licentiate Wen, drank wine behind a screen at the eastern end of the temporary structure that had been erected in the courtyard.

The eighth day of the tenth month was the date for the fourth of the weekly commemorations of Li P'ing-erh's death. For this occasion, Lama Chao, the head priest of the Pao-ch'ing Lamasery outside the west gate of the city, was engaged to bring sixteen monks and recite their foreign scriptures. They set up an altar, performed a shamanistic dance, scattered paper flowers and rice on the bier, and circumambulated it while burning incense and reciting dhāraṇīs. The oblations consisted of cow's milk, tea, cheese, and the like. The suspended effigies were in the form of pien-hsiang, or transformation tableaux, representing nine horrific aspects of Māra, in which he was depicted wearing a chaplet of glass beads, with a necklace of skulls around his neck, in the act of devouring an infant, while seated astride an evil sprite, with serpents and hornless dragons encircling his waist. He was portrayed with four heads and eight arms, brandishing dagger-axes and halberds in his hands, with red hair and a blue face, presenting an incomparably ugly appearance.¹³ Once the noon vegetarian repast was over, the celebrants fell to consuming meat and wine.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was not at home that day. Together with Yin-yang Master Hsü, he had gone to the family graveyard outside the city gate in order to break ground for the excavation of the tomb and did not return until the afternoon. That evening the rites were concluded and the lamas were dismissed.

The next day, he made arrangements for the transportation of the requisite accoutrements, wine, rice, table settings, and other culinary supplies to the grave site. He also deputed his managers and employees to go to his country estate and see to the erection of temporary structures at both the front and rear of the grounds, including four or five rooms to serve as wine depositories and kitchens, and also put up an eighteen-foot-wide covered structure by the graveside. The local residents and the neighbors who had previously been invited were entertained to a feast there with:

Unlimited quantities of meat and wine, after which, when the party broke up, they returned home with their:

Shoulders and backs loaded with gifts,
but there is no need to describe this in detail.

On the eleventh, during the day, professional boy singers of funeral dirges and actors who performed exorcistic skits to the accompaniment of gongs and drums came to put on a farewell show before the spirit tablet of the deceased. The skits they played were entitled "The Five Devils Plague the Assessor,"¹⁴ "Celestial Master Chang Tao-ling¹⁵ Is Befuddled by Devils," "Chung K'uei¹⁶ Hoodwinks the Little Devils," "Lao-tzu Traverses the Han-ku Pass,"¹⁷ "The Six Traitors Plague Maitreya,"¹⁸ "The Plum Blossom in the Snow,"¹⁹ "Chuang Chou Dreams That He Is a Butterfly,"²⁰ "The Four Heavenly Kings Subdue Earth, Water, Fire, and Wind,"²¹ "Lü Tung-pin Beheads Huang-lung with His Flying Sword,"²² and "Emperor T'ai-tsu Escorts Ching-niang on a Thousand-Li Journey."²³

When this medley of vaudeville acts had been performed, the female guests, who had been looking on through a hanging screen, paid their farewell respects to Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet and then went inside, after which the male relatives came in to bid farewell to the spirit tablet and burn paper money before it. Copious tears were shed.

The next day was the date for the funeral procession. Early in the morning, the funeral banner and all the various banderoles, portable pavilions, and pa-pier-mâché funerary objects were carried outside, and the Buddhist and Taoist monks, drummers, musicians, and carriers all assembled. In preparation for this event, Hsi-men Ch'ing had solicited the services of fifty military patrolmen from Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command, all of whom came with their archery gear and horses, and were:

Attired in full-dress uniforms.²⁴

He left ten of them to guard his residence, while directing the remaining forty to divide themselves into two contingents and march in front of the casket on either side of the road. In addition, there were twenty orderlies from his yamen to clear the road ahead of the procession and look after the burial objects, while yet another twenty had been sent ahead to guard the gate to the family graveyard and receive whatever sacrificial offerings might be delivered there.

That day, the officials and gentry, relatives and friends, who came to take part in the funeral procession:

Created a hubbub with their horses and carriages,

Overflowing the streets and blocking the alleys.²⁵

The sedan chairs of the members of the Hsi-men family and their male and female relatives and guests alone numbered more than a hundred, in addition to which, there were several tens of smaller sedan chairs for the madams and painted faces from the licensed quarter.

Yin-yang Master Hsü had determined that 8:00 AM would be the right time for the ceremony of raising the coffin. Hsi-men Ch'ing left Sun Hsüeh-o and the two nuns to look after the house and ordered P'ing-an together with two orderlies to guard the front gate. His son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi performed the role of filial son by kneeling in front of the casket and smashing an earthenware crock to signal that the procession was about to begin. Sixty-four professional coffin bearers fastened the main carrying poles to the catafalque,²⁶ while an assistant coroner stood on a platform attached to one end of this structure, from which vantage point he beat a wooden clapper to provide a cadence as they hoisted it onto their shoulders and proceeded along the route of the procession. Hsi-men Ch'ing had arranged beforehand for Buddhist Superior Lang, the abbot of the Temple of Kindness Required, to preside over the coffin-raising ceremony. The procession had no sooner turned onto Main Street and headed toward the south than:

Mountains and seas of people,²⁷ lined up to watch on either side. It happened to be a fine, clear day, and it was truly a spectacular funeral procession. Behold:

A genial breeze livens the handsome streets;

A tenuous drizzle moistens the fragrant dust.

In the eastern quarter the morning sun has just arisen;

In the northern sector the lingering mists clear away.²⁸

Tung-tung lung-lung,

The decorated funeral drums maintain a constant din;

Ting-ting tang-tang,

The exorcistic players' gongs resound night after night.
The funeral banner sways in the breeze,
Inscribed with large characters on nine feet of red silk;
High-rising rockets soar into the sky,
Bursting asunder the yellow clouds suspended in midair.
Fiercely and ferociously,
The Road-clearing Demon²⁹ nonchalantly holds his golden battle-axe;
Prancing and swaggering,
The Spirit of the Perilous Paths³⁰ grimly grips his silver dagger-axe.
Wandering freely and easily,³¹
The Eight Taoist Immortals appear surrounded by tortoises and cranes;
Gracefully and seductively,
The four handmaidens come into sight followed by tigers and by deer.
The exorcistic devils,
Flash by to a crashing of gongs;
The rack of fireworks,
Explodes into a myriad crackers.
Creating quite a stir,
A float of a lotus-gathering boat comes by,
Presenting skits of slapstick humor;³²
Lanky and large-sized,³³
Local mummers performing on lofty stilts,
Are dressed in armor, wearing helmets.
Clean-cut and good-looking,³⁴
A company of sixteen young Taoist acolytes,
Each attired in a roseate robe and Taoist cap,
Sound the bells from the court of Mt. K'un-lun,
And play eight gong-chimes hanging in a frame,³⁵
Producing strains of immortal music;
Big-bellied and overweight,³⁶
A band of twenty-four aged Buddhist monks,
Each one garbed in a cloud-patterned cassock,
Beat their large cymbals, and
Strike their great drums,
Paying homage to the five directions.
There are twelve large damask portable pavilions, Each of which is conspicuous for its dancing greens and flying reds;³⁷
And twenty-four little damask portable pavilions, Every one of which exhibits clustering pearls and kingfisher ornaments.
On the left,
Counterfeit open-air storehouses and underground vaults follow one after another;
On the right,
Papier-mâché mountains of gold and mountains of silver sweep past in formation.

Portable kitchens display containers of the eight culinary delicacies;
 Pavilions for incense and candles convey the three sacrificial libations.
 Six pavilions of artificial flowers,
 Parade their thousand spheres of brocade;
 The solitary soul-bearing palanquin,
 Exhibits a hundred knots of yellow ribbon.
 On the one hand,
 Artificial lotus blossoms and snowy willows vie with each other in brilliance;
 On the other hand,
 Jeweled canopies and silver-hued banderoles march with each other in formation.
 Banners inscribed in gold, and Banners inscribed in silver,
 Securely protect the catafalque;
 Canopies of white damask, and
 Canopies of green damask,
 Hover about the attached platform.
 Talismanic axes enveloped in clouds,
 Three on either perimeter,
 Are all depicted in vibrant colors;
 Presenting jugs and offering towels,
 Maidservants on both sides,
 Are made up so as to look lifelike.
 As directed by the mourning banner,³⁸
 The filial relatives set up a wail.
 Preceded by five pacesetters and six singing boys,
 The pyramidal pedestal, shaped like Mt. Sumeru, to which the soul banner is affixed,
 Sways up and down as it proceeds.
 The sixty-four pallbearers,
 Wearing black livery and white caps,
 Steadfastly support the bier and its baldachin,
 With its crimson, gold lamé floral designs,
 Decorated with images of the Five Ancients on their cloud-scaling cranes,
 And with tassels dangling from its four corners,
 That surmounts the brocaded catafalque,
 Majestic and unmoved.³⁹

Behold:

To either side, the orderlies who protect the procession and clear the road,
 All wear mourning caps on their heads,
 Black jackets on their bodies,
 Mourning girdles about their waists,
 Puttees on their legs,
 Long-legged boots on their feet,
 And hold staves in their hands,
 Clamoring in front and crowding behind.
 To either side, the equestrian acrobats who perform their stunts,

Are attired in sesame-patterned flat-topped caps,⁴⁰ Held in place with hammered gold rings that float at the back of their heads,
 And two or three layers of satin jackets,
 The waists of which are enclosed in purple belts,
 While their feet are shod in four-seamed dark-tan eagle-talon boots,⁴¹
 Set off by variegated embroidered stockings depicting frolicking sea creatures.
 The acrobats resemble eagles or falcons,
 The horsemen are like gibbons or monkeys.
 Some brandish a gleaming spear in one hand,
 While flourishing a blue standard mounted on a vermilion staff with the other,
 Some do headstands or execute somersaults,
 Some perform feats of archery under the bellies of their mounts,
 Some assume the pose of "The Golden Cock
 Standing on a Single Foot,"⁴²
 Some adopt the posture of "The Immortal Crossing the Bridge," While some do the trick of "Hiding Their Bodies in the Stirrups."⁴³
 Everyone expresses his admiration,⁴⁴
 One and all vying in their approval.
 Shoving shoulders and bumping backs,
 In their confusion, no distinction is made between the wise and the foolish;⁴⁵
 Pressing to see and crowding to watch,
 Amid the chaos, none discriminate between the distinguished and the humble.
 Chang the Third, who is clumsy and fat,
 Can only pant for breath;
 Li the Fourth, who is short of stature,
 Repeatedly stamps his feet.
 White-haired old gentlemen,
 Prop their beards upon their walking sticks;⁴⁶
 Black-haired young beauties,⁴⁷
 Bring their children to watch the procession.

Truly:

The thunder of gongs and drums mingles with the dust of the streets;
 Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade
 a myriad people look on.
 The sound of lamentation begins to fade away
 as the catafalque departs;
 This funeral procession can truly be said to outdo any in the capital.

Wu Yüeh-niang in a large sedan chair, headed up the ten or more chairs of Li Chiao-erh and the other members of the household in following, single file, in the wake of the casket. Hsi-men Ch'ing, attired in a palmetto hat and mourning clothes, led the assembled relatives and friends after them, while Ch'en Ching-chi accompanied the catafalque, keeping one hand upon it, until the procession arrived at the entrance to East Street.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had previously provided an honorarium and invited Abbot Wu Tsung-che of the Temple of the Jade Emperor to preside over the ceremony of displaying and dedicating the full-length portrait of Li P'ing-erh. His body was clothed in a Taoist vestment emblazoned with twenty-four cranes on a crimson background flying amidst variegated sunset clouds. On his head he wore a ninefold-yang thunder cap⁴⁸ adorned with a jade ring. His feet were shod in red shoes, he held an ivory tablet in his hands, and he was seated in an open sedan chair, borne by four bearers, as he came to meet the procession. When he held up the full-length portrait of Li P'ing-erh in both hands, Ch'en Ching-chi knelt down in front of it, and the procession came to a halt. The crowd of spectators listened attentively as, from his elevated position, and in a loud voice, he intoned a eulogy to the portrait.

The hare scampers and the raven flies⁴⁹
west and then east;

The hundred years of a man's life are like a windblown lamp.

The people of today do not understand⁵⁰
the meaning of no-birth;

Only at this time do they realize that phenomena are ephemeral.

In solemn commemoration of the spirit of the late respected lady of Commandant Hsi-men Ch'ing of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, whose life in this world extended into her twenty-seventh year. She was born at noon on the fifteenth day of the first month in the year hsin-wei, and died at 2:00 AM on the seventeenth day of the ninth month in the seventh year of the Cheng-ho reign period. We respectfully submit that: as the genteel daughter of a prominent family, and a winsome occupant of ornate chambers, she possessed a countenance reminiscent of blossoms and moonlight and was naturally endowed with an orchid-like fragrance. It was her salient virtue to be gentle and compliant, and she was by nature both temperate and mild. In her match with the gentleman Hsi-men Ch'ing, she demonstrated her fitness for wedded bliss. As a dweller in the women's quarters she was both worthy and chaste, exhibiting marital harmony like that between zither and cithara. Jade was planted in Indigo Field,⁵¹ only to perish like the orchids of Ch'u.⁵² Though she might have looked forward to a lifetime of prosperity, unfortunately the springtime of her life lasted only twenty-seven years.

Alas! The bright moon wanes all too soon, the finest objects are difficult to preserve.⁵³ Persons of worth suffer unexpected calamities, the length or brevity of life are predetermined. At present, the catafalque occupies the highway, and red pennants flutter in the breeze. Her husband stamps his feet in grief before the casket, while her relatives wail in lamentation along the alleys. The feelings engendered by separation are deep and difficult to dispel, but the longer we are deprived of her voice and appearance the easier they become to forget. Unworthy though we be to wear these caps and pins, we are ordained devotees of the Taoist religion. Though we unhappily lack the divine arts of a Hsin-yüan P'ing,⁵⁴ we faithfully adhere to the tradition bequeathed by Lao-tzu, the founder of the school of the Mysterious Origin. All we can do is display this mirrorlike portrait of Ts'ui Hui,⁵⁵ being unable to bring back the butterfly of Chuang Chou's dream. May she be enabled to imbibe sweet dew and bathe in the carnelian nectar of the gods, transcend her position as an immortal, and ascend to the Purple Elysium.⁵⁶ May she bedeck herself with a hundred jewels and be presented before the Seven Perfected Ones,⁵⁷ that they may enable her purified soul to escape from the road to the shades. Her one mind will then be without impediments, in realizing that the four elements are all illusory.

Desire to Share Her Afterlife Inspires a Lavish Funeral

It is bitter! Bitter! Bitter!
 The breath is transformed into a clear breeze,
 the form returns to earth;
 The numinous soul's true nature, once lost,
 will never be recovered;
 The head is altered and the face replaced an infinite number of times.
 Harken now to the final words. So:
 Nobody knows to what place her vital essences may have returned;⁵⁸
 Only her portrait remains to be passed on to later generations.

When Abbot Wu had finished intoning the eulogy, he sat upright in his sedan chair and it backed out of the way of the procession. Thereupon:

Drums and music resounded to the heavens, and
 The sounds of lamentation shook the earth, as the funeral procession started up again and wended its way toward the South Gate of the city. The friends and relatives kept Hsi-men Ch'ing company in walking as far as the gate before they mounted their horses. Ch'en Ching-chi accompanied the casket on foot, keeping one hand upon it, all the way to the family graveyard at Wu-li Yüan.

It so happens that Chang Kuan, the militia commander of Ch'ing-ho, at the head of two hundred troops, along with Eunuch Director Liu and Eunuch Director Hsüeh, had already set up a tent on the high ground in front of the grave site, where wind and percussion instruments started to play, and the bronze gong and bronze drum were beaten, to welcome the funeral procession. As the mourners looked on, the papier-mâché burial objects were set up and burned:

The smoke and flames flaring up to the sky.⁵⁹

Within the graveyard there were arrayed ten or more sacrificial offerings for the wake, which had been provided by the courtesans of the two Music Offices. Marquees had also been put up for the accommodation of the female guests and relatives.

When the catafalque arrived and had been set down by the bearers, Yin-yang Master Hsü, leading several coroner's assistants, consulted his geomancer's compass⁶⁰ in order to assure the correct alignment of the casket in the grave. After sacrificing to the Earth God and the tutelary gods of the locality at 10:00 AM, the casket was duly interred, and covered with soil. When Hsi-men Ch'ing had changed his clothes, he presented a gift of two bolts of silk to Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command and asked him to perform the ceremony of dotting the spirit tablet.⁶¹

After the sacrificial rites were completed, the officials of the Ch'ing-ho Guard and the assembled relatives, friends, and employees competed with one another in offering wine to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Drums and music resounded to the heavens, and

The remnants of fireworks littered the ground.

The servitors responsible for the disposal of the sacrificial oblations did as they were directed, and the workers did not indulge in disorderly conduct. Refreshments for the mourners were provided in four or five places, the female guests were seated in the rear summerhouse, and each location had a set number of servants assigned to it. Everything was done on a festive and lavish scale, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

When the formal collation was finished, the owners of the adjacent estates had also set up tables at which they invited Hsi-men Ch'ing to partake of wine in celebration of the wake, which involved a considerable expenditure in the way of gratuities.

That afternoon, when it was time for the return of the spirit tablet, Wu Yüeh-niang sat in the sedan chair designated for the conveyance of the soul of the departed, holding the spirit tablet and the soul banner, while Ch'en Ching-chi walked alongside the bier that held the spirit bed, keeping one hand upon it. It was draped with a spirit shroud of jet satin and was invested in a jade-colored, gold lamé, waterproof canopy, with tassels dangling from its four corners. The procession also included the portable pavilion in which the full-length portrait of Li P'ing-erh was suspended, the large damask pavilions, the little damask pavilions, and the pavilions for incense and candles, and was accompanied on either side by sixteen drummers and musicians, and the young Taoist acolytes, all performing on their instruments.

Wu K'ai, Ch'iao Hung, Wu the Second, Hua Tzu-yu, Brother-in-law Shen, Meng the Second, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Licentiate Wen, as well as all the managers and employees of the household kept company with Hsi-men Ch'ing as he reentered the city, while the sedan chairs of the female guests brought up the rear. When they arrived at the gate of the residence they observed the custom of leaping over a fire before entering.⁶² After the spirit tablet had been set up in Li P'ing-erh's quarters, Yin-yang Master Hsü offered a sacrifice to the gods and performed a ritual purification in the front reception hall and then proceeded to paste pollution-dispelling spells on all the doors. Hsi-men Ch'ing brought out a bolt of silk and five taels of silver to thank Master Hsü for his services and then escorted him to the gate. The hired personnel were then dispatched, and twenty strings of cash were distributed between them, five strings for the military patrolmen from the Regional Military Command, five strings for the orderlies from the yamen of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, and ten strings for the militiamen. Hsi-men Ch'ing also sent cards to express his gratitude to Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, and Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling. But no more of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered his attendants to set up tables and urged Ch'iao Hung, Wu K'ai, and the rest of his guests to sit down and stay a little longer, but they all refused, said goodbye, and departed. Lai-pao came in and reported that the carpenters who had set up the temporary structures for the funeral observances were waiting outside and proposed to come back the next day to take down the structures.

"There's no need to take down the structures quite yet," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Have them come back to take them down the day after the banquet ordained by His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien is over."

The carpenters were consequently sent on their way.

Meanwhile, in the rear compound, the wife of Hua the Elder, along with Ch'iao Hung's wife and the other female guests, had waited until after Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet was set up to engage in a round of wailing, after which they, too, made their departure.

As for Hsi-men Ch'ing:

He could not bear to part with her so precipitously.⁶³

That evening he went back to Li P'ing-erh's quarters with the intention of spending the night by her spirit tablet. Once there, he saw that her spirit bed had been set up in the position of honor, with her full-length portrait hanging to one side, and her half-length portrait placed inside it, along with a little brocade quilt, a bed table, some clothing, a dressing case, and the like.

There was nothing that had not been provided.

There was even a pair of her tiny golden lotuses resting below it. On the table in front of it there were:

Incense, flowers, lamps, and candles,⁶⁴

Golden saucers, goblets, and vessels, replete with every kind of offering.

Hsi-men Ch'ing wept incessantly and directed Ying-ch'un to make up his bed on the k'ang across from it. In the middle of the night, confronted with a lonely lamp and:

The slanting moon in the half-open window,⁶⁵
he tossed and turned, unable to sleep:

Giving vent to long sighs as well as short, as he yearned for his vanished beauty. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Giving vent to long sighs as well as short,
he contemplates the window;
The solitary image of the dancing phoenix⁶⁶ is enough to break his heart.⁶⁷
The orchids have withered like those of Ch'u⁶⁸
during the rains of autumn;
The maple leaves have fallen on the Wu River,⁶⁹
succumbing to the night frost.
In our former lives we had already expressed the wish to twine our branches;
But in this lifetime it is difficult to find a soul-resuscitating incense.
If her pure spirit continues its existence beneath the Nine Springs,
In the nether world as in this human realm two hearts will be broken.

During the daylight hours, when the offerings of tea and rice were made to Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet, Hsi-men Ch'ing came into her room to supervise the maidservants as they laid them out and then seated himself at a table facing the tablet and proceeded to eat with her, raising his chopsticks and asking her to partake with him as he did so. Thus he carried out the principle of:

Sacrificing to the spirits as if they were present.⁷⁰

When they saw this, the maidservants and waiting women could not help wiping the tears from their eyes.

The wet nurse, Ju-i, when no one else was about, constantly appeared before him:

Serving tea or serving water,
Touching him or bumping him,
Pinching him or teasing him, interrupting him or engaging him in repartee. It did not take more than two or three nights of this before Hsi-men Ch'ing, having had too much to drink while entertaining someone one day, returned to Li P'ing-erh's quarters, where Ying-ch'un helped him into bed. During the night, he wanted some tea to drink and called for Ying-ch'un, but she did not respond. Ju-i got up and brought him some tea, after which she noticed that his quilt was falling off the k'ang and, having collected the teacup, reached down with her hand to put it back in place. Hsi-men Ch'ing, seized by a momentary impulse, embraced her by the neck and gave her a kiss, sticking his tongue into her mouth, to which the woman responded by sucking his tongue, without saying so much as a word. Hsi-men Ch'ing told her to take off her clothes and get onto the k'ang with him, where the two of them proceeded to embrace under the quilt, where:

Unable to contain their pleasure, they engaged in the sport of clouds and rain together.

"Since you have seen fit to favor me, Father," said Ju-i, "now that my mistress is dead, I am more than willing to remain in your household, and let you do with me as you will."

"My child," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you are content to cater to my desires with all your heart, you need not worry about my willingness to support you."

At this juncture, as far as the woman was concerned:

Upon the pillow and the mat,⁷¹

there was nothing she refused to do in order to please him. The two of them:

Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes, as she bent herself to his will, which delighted Hsi-men Ch'ing no end.

The next day, the woman got up early in the morning, fetched Hsi-men Ch'ing's footwear for him, and folded his bedding, so that Ying-ch'un's services were no longer required.

Catering to him with the utmost assiduity,⁷²

There was no length to which she would not go.

Hsi-men Ch'ing unlocked the door to the inner room and sought out four of Li P'ing-erh's ornamental hairpins with which to reward her, and the woman kowtowed to him in thanks. Ying-ch'un realized that he had been intimate with her, and the two of them decided to ally themselves with each other. The woman, for her part, relying upon the favor that had been shown her, felt that she was on a firm footing and no longer sought help in any other quarter.

During a Nightly Vigil He Succumbs to the Scent of Rouge

Three days after Li P'ing-erh's burial, when Hsi-men Ch'ing came back from the ceremony of revisiting the grave, to which he had invited a host of officials, female guests, the singing girls Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, and Cheng Ai-yüeh from the licensed quarter, along with the four boy actors Li Ming, Wu Hui, Cheng Feng, and Cheng Ch'un, it was observed that Ju-i had assumed a demeanor:

Different from that of former days.

What with her:

Phony eyebrows and bogus airs, she made herself conspicuous among her fellow maidservants by the way in which:

She talked, and she laughed;

a fact which immediately caught the attention of P'an Chin-lien.

The next morning, while Hsi-men Ch'ing was sitting with Ying Po-chüeh, it was suddenly announced that His Honor the regional investigating censor Sung Ch'iao-nien had sent someone to deliver a consignment of complimentary gifts for Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch'en. These consisted of a table setting of gold and silver wine vessels, including two gold flagons, a pair of gold goblets on raised stands, ten little silver cups, two silver ewers with hinged lids, four silver loving cups, two crimson variegated python robes, two bolts of satin brocade, ten jugs of wine, and two carcasses of mutton.

The messenger also stated, "The defender-in-chief's boat has already arrived in Tung-ch'ang prefecture, and my master would impose upon Your Honor to make the necessary arrangements for the banquet in good time, so that the welcoming ceremony can definitely take place on the eighteenth."

Hsi-men Ch'ing took careful possession of the gifts, rewarded the messenger with two taels of silver, and sent him back with a written reply. He then proceeded to weigh out the necessary silver to Pen the Fourth and Lai-hsing, so that they could order the table settings, see to the preparation of the sweetmeats, and contract for all the other needed supplies, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

He then turned to Ying Po-chüeh and said, "From the time that she first became ill, right up until the present moment, I haven't been able to relax for even a single day. I have barely been able to finish off the business of the funeral, when this kind of thing comes up, leaving me with:

Groping hands and floundering feet."⁷³

"There is no need for you to complain, Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh. "After all, you did not solicit this obligation. He sought you out and imposed it upon you. Even though this banquet stands to cost you a good deal of money, in the future, the fact that you have entertained the presiding officials from the whole province of Shantung, including the grand coordinator, the regional inspector, and miscellaneous military officers, not to mention the imperially commissioned defender-in-chief of the Palace Command, will only serve to shed glory on this household of yours, and further enhance your prestige."

"That's not the point," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I had hoped that it would be scheduled for some time after the twentieth, but now, contrary to my expectation, the welcoming event is to be held on the eighteenth. I'm feeling altogether too:

Pressured and pushed.

Moreover, the eighteenth falls within the fifth week after her death, and I've already paid Abbot Wu Tsung-che to draft the petitions for the observance scheduled for that day. How can I change it? But if I don't:

The ends of the fire tongs will get entangled with each other.

How will I ever manage it?"

"That's no problem," said Ying Po-chüeh. "As I calculate it, since Sister-in-law died on the seventeenth day of the ninth month, the twenty-first day of this month marks the end of the fifth week after her death. If you hold your banquet on the eighteenth, you can still schedule a scripture recitation on the twentieth without its being too late."

"You're right," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll send a page boy to tell Abbot Wu to reschedule the date."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I've got another suggestion to make. You should take advantage of the fact that at the present time Perfect Man Huang Yüan-pai from the Eastern Capital is in temporary residence at his temple. The Emperor dispatched him to the subprefecture of T'ai-an in order to present a hanging censer decorated with golden bells for the burning of imperial incense,⁷⁴ and officiate at a seven-day rite of cosmic renewal⁷⁵ on the sacred peak of Mount T'ai. This presents you with the opportunity, before he returns to the capital, to ask Abbot Wu to invite him to preside as the high priest at your ceremony on the twentieth. Thus you can avail yourself of his name to add luster to the occasion."

"To be sure," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I, too, have heard that this Perfect Man Huang is a very charismatic prelate. In that case I would have to make arrangements for a plenary service, with an additional twenty-four Taoist priests, in order to make a day and night ceremony out of it. The only problem is that Abbot Wu has already presented a sacrificial offering during the second weekly commemoration, and I also prevailed upon him to preside over the ceremony of displaying the portrait during the funeral procession, and to supply the Taoist acolytes who accompanied the catafalque. Not having any other way to compensate him, I engaged his services to officiate at this scripture recitation, meaning it to be:

No more than a token of my esteem.

Now if I should invite this Perfect Man Huang to act as the chief celebrant, is he not likely to be offended?"

"The responsibility for the ceremony as a whole," said Ying Po-chüeh, "will remain in the hands of Abbot Wu. He will only be inviting Perfect Man Huang to officiate, that's all. It will cost you a few more taels of silver, Brother, but, after all, it is for my sister-in-law that you are doing it, not for anyone else."

Hsi-men Ch'ing forthwith instructed Ch'en Ching-chi to write out a card on his behalf addressed to Abbot Wu, enclosing another five taels of silver for the drafting of the ceremonial petitions, and requesting him to extend the invitation to Perfect Man Huang, reschedule the scripture recitation for the twentieth, supply an additional twenty-four Taoist priests, and expand the ceremony into a Water and Fire sublimation ritual extending over a day and a night. As soon as this was completed, he ordered Tai-an to go on horseback to deliver it.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had seen off Ying Po-chüeh, he went back to the rear compound where Wu Yüeh-niang greeted him by saying, "Pen the Fourth's wife has purchased two gift boxes for us. She has come to kowtow and inform us that their daughter, Chang-chieh, has become engaged to someone."

"To whom has she become engaged?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Pen the Fourth's wife, who was wearing a blue damask jacket, a white damask skirt, and a black satin cloak, and her daughter, who was dressed in a jacket of crimson satin over a skirt of yellow damask, and whose hairdo was adorned with trinkets, kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing four times as formally as though inserting a taper in its holder.

"I didn't know about it either," said Yüeh-niang, who was standing to one side. "It turns out that this child is to be elevated to the position of a concubine in the household of His Honor Hsia Yen-ling. The engagement was only formalized yesterday, and she is to be carried across his threshold on the twenty-fourth. They have obtained a mere thirty taels of silver for her. If you stop to consider it, the child has already developed a good figure. She doesn't look like a fourteen-year-old, but more like a girl of fifteen or sixteen. It's been some time since we've seen her, and she's grown up to such an extent in the interim."

"The other day, at a drinking party," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "he mentioned that he was planning to secure a couple of girls in order to have them trained as musicians, but I didn't know that you had offered your daughter to him."

Thereupon, he suggested to Yüeh-niang that she usher them into her parlor and invite them to stay for a cup of tea. Later on, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh all came in to greet them and help keep them company. As they were about to leave, Hsi-men Ch'ing and Yüeh-niang gave them a set of heavy silk brocade clothing and a tael of silver, while Li Chiao-erh and the others each gave them trinkets, handkerchiefs, cosmetics and the like.

That evening, Tai-an came back and reported that Abbot Wu had accepted the silver and understood what was wanted, that Perfect Man Huang was still in residence at the temple and would not return to the Eastern Capital until after the twentieth, and that he would come a day early, on the nineteenth, in order to set up the altar.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing remained at home to supervise the chefs in making advance preparations for the banquet, and see that everything was in proper order. Outside the main gate he erected a seven-story-high tower of variegated bunting in the shape of a mountain, and in front of the reception hall another one of five stories.

On the seventeenth, the regional investigating censor Sung Ch'iao-nien sent two district officials to inspect the preparations for the banquet. They found that at the head of the reception hall:

The screens displayed their peacocks' tails, and

The floor was covered with woolen carpets;

The tablecloths were fabricated of brocade, and

The seat cushions flaunted floral designs.

The place of honor for Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch'en, from which he would be in a position to survey the feast, featured a large portable table with a setting of a kind intended as much for display as for eating, to be supplied with seasonal delicacies and other culinary specialties, cone-shaped piles of fruit and ingot-shaped cakes, as well as high-stacked pyramids of square-shaped confectionery stamped with the images of the Five Ancients and richly decorated with brocade. There were two smaller portable tables beside it so that the grand coordinator and the regional investigating censor could keep him company. Ranged along either side were the tables for the officials of the Two Provincial Offices, while the communal seating for the officials of the eight prefectures was in a temporary structure outside the reception hall. The arrangements for the officials seated on either side of the hall were to be individual table settings of the ordinary kind, provided with five appetizers and five dishes. When the district officials had finished their inspection of the arrangements they were entertained to tea by Hsi-men Ch'ing, after which they got up and returned to report on their findings.

The next day, the grand coordinator Hou Meng and the regional investigating censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, at the head of an entourage of mounted men, proceeded early in the morning to meet the boat of Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch'en. The resulting procession was preceded by a large yellow banner emblazoned with the two words "Imperial Commission" in the Emperor's own hand. The local military officials, Commandant Chou Hsiu, Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, and the seal-holding officers of the left and right battalions of the Ch'ing-ho Guard, all attired in their martial uniforms and armor, at the head of their mounted subordinates, followed in its wake. Accompanied by an honor guard of soldiers bearing blue flags, tasseled spears, and tridents, the procession extended over several li in length.

Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch'en was dressed in a crimson robe emblazoned with the images of two pythons, one on the front and one on the back, done in variegated embroidery. He rode in a curtained sedan chair with a silver finial on top, carried by eight bearers, accompanied by eight outriders, and shielded by a tea-leaf-colored canopy above. The staff officers who followed in his entourage were without number, all of them mounted on mettlesome steeds that neighed as they proceeded. All in all, the procession resembled a glittering tapestry of a myriad figures, as it wended its way along the road, to the music of drums and wind instruments.

Clouds of yellow dust enveloped the highway;

Sounds of chickens and dogs were not heard;⁷⁶ and Woodcutters and gatherers stayed out of sight.

As the cavalcade of men and horses passed through Tung-p'ing prefecture and entered Ch'ing-ho district, the area by the roadside was rendered black by the number of district officials kneeling there to welcome the procession. The attendants of the defender-in-chief ordered them to rise and assist in clearing the streets all the way to the main gate of Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence, where:

The beat of the Music Office drums,

Reverberated to the cloudy empyrean, and the officers and functionaries, attired in black livery, were drawn up in order like the wings of a formation of wild geese.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, in formal black attire, stood there waiting respectfully as he gazed at the approaching dust. It took some time for the escorting cavalcade to pass by, after which, the defender-in-chief finally alighted from his sedan chair and came inside, while the grand coordinator and the regional investigating censor, at the head of the other officials, both high and low:

Swarmed inside as a single throng,⁷⁷

and entered the reception hall. Within the reception hall, the refined music of psaltery and mandola, metallophone and gong-chimes, dragon flutes and phoenix pipes,⁷⁸ was heard to resonate.

The first persons to formally present themselves to the visitor were the grand coordinator of Shantung, Hou Meng, and the regional investigating censor, Sung Ch'iao-nien, and the defender-in-chief responded to them with appropriate protocol.

Next came left provincial administration commissioner of Shantung, Kung Kuai,⁷⁹ left administration vice commissioner, Ho Ch'i-kao,⁸⁰ right provincial administration commissioner, Ch'en Ssu-chen,⁸¹ right administration vice commissioner, Chi K'an, left assistant administration commissioner, Feng T'ing-hu, right assistant administration commissioner, Wang Po-yen,⁸² investigation commissioner, Chao No,⁸³ investigation commissioner, Han Wenkuang, surveillance vice-commissioner of education, Ch'en Cheng-hui,⁸⁴ assistant commissioner of the Military Defense Circuit, Lei Ch'i-yüan, and so forth. When the personnel of the Two Provincial Offices had finished presenting themselves, the defender-in-chief responded to them with somewhat less elaborate protocol.

When it came to Prefect Hsü Sung of Tung-ch'ang, Prefect Hu Shih-wen of Tung-p'ing, Prefect Ling Yün-i⁸⁵ of Yen-chou, Prefect Han Pang-ch'i⁸⁶ of Hsü-chou, Prefect Chang Shu-yeh⁸⁷ of Chi-nan, Prefect Wang Shih-ch'i⁸⁸ of Ch'ing-chou, Prefect Huang Chia⁸⁹ of Teng-chou, and Prefect Yeh Ch'ien⁹⁰ of Lai-chou, the presiding officials of these eight prefectures presented themselves as a group, and the defender-in-chief merely responded to them with a low bow.

When the local military officials, including Commandant Chou Hsiu, Military Director-in-chief Ching Chung, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, and so forth, presented themselves, the defender-in-chief simply remained sitting upright in his place, allowing them to dispose themselves as they would, standing in attendance outside the reception hall.

Finally, Hsi-men Ch'ing and Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling stepped up to pay their respects and offer their visitor tea, after the consumption of which, the grand coordinator, Hou Meng, and the regional investigating censor, Sung Ch'iao-nien, came forward with cups in hand to offer toasts to the defender-in-chief. At this, the drums struck up beneath the dais, as the defender-in-chief was presented with floral ornaments of gold and toasted in jade goblets. Only after toasts had been exchanged and the wine replenished did the defender-in-chief take his seat in the place of honor, while the grand coordinator and the regional investigating censor sat down in their positions below him to preside over the feast. The rest of the officials, including Hsi-men Ch'ing, then proceeded to sit down in their respective places.

When a director from the Music Office had presented an album listing the program of pieces they were prepared to perform, the music commenced. Every one of the performances, including both instrumental and vocal music, and ensemble dance pieces, was presented in appropriate order, displaying to maximum advantage the beauties of sound and color. During the feast, after a scene from the ch'uan-ch'i drama P'ei Chin-kung huan-tai chi (The story of P'ei Tu's return of the belts)⁹¹ had been performed, the chef came out to preside over the carving of the entrées of roast venison and pork, served with a soup of a hundred ingredients, other culinary specialties, and steamed open-topped dumplings. After this, four of the musicians, playing the psaltery, mandola, p'i-p'a, and harp, without any percussion instruments, sang a song suite in the Nan-lü mode, beginning with the tune "A Sprig of Flowers":

Holding office as one of the Eight Bulwarks of the state,
Drawing a salary of a thousand bushels,⁹² or thereabouts,
His deeds will be remembered for a hundred generations,
His name will be renowned for a myriad years of spring.
His strict propriety ensures his success and honesty.
Governing the realm and stabilizing the country⁹³ are his only considerations;
His mode of presiding over the vessels of state⁹⁴ is innovative.⁹⁵
In his adherence to protocol and leadership of the loyal and true,
His only concern is to requite his ruler and display magnanimity.
In relying upon the worthy and upright while adhering to justice,
His sole endeavor is to clarify the laws and transform the people.⁹⁶

By the time the singing was over, the second soup course had not yet been served, although three musical performances had been presented.

Meanwhile, the regional investigating censor, Sung Ch'iao-nien, deputed two district officials to take care of the various servitors and attendants in the visitor's entourage in Hsi-men Ch'ing's summerhouse, where tables had been set up for their entertainment. As for Commandant Chou Hsiu, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, and the other local officials, Hsi-men Ch'ing had arranged for them to be entertained in a guest room in the front compound, where seats had been provided for them.

At this point, Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch'en ordered his attendants to reward the serving staff with ten taels of silver, after which, he called for his sedan chair and prepared to make his departure. The various officials present, after having repeatedly endeavored to detain him without success, proceeded to see him out to the front gate.

The music of drums and pipes resounded once more, as

The clamor of his escort filled the adjacent streets.

Outriders prepared to clear the way, as Men and horses lined up in formation.

The officials mounted their horses and proposed to escort him for some distance, but the defender-in-chief ordered them to desist, raised his hand in salute, got into his sedan chair, and proceeded on his way. Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien and Grand Coordinator Hou Meng ordered the guards officers serving under Militia Commander Chang Kuan to escort him all the way to the imperial vessel in which he had come, and then come back and report to them. The table settings and utensils that had been prepared for the visitor, along with the congratulatory offerings of mutton and wine, were turned over to Prefect Hu Shih-wen of Tung-P'ing and Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command, together with an accordion-bound album listing the perquisites involved, for them to deliver to the imperial vessel and hand over in person.

When Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien returned to the reception hall, together with Grand Coordinator Hou Meng, he thanked Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Today we have imposed egregiously upon your illustrious household. We are profoundly grateful, profoundly grateful. If our contribution to the expenses proves to have been inadequate, we will endeavor to make up the difference.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing hastily:

Bent his body to perform an obeisance, saying, “Your pupil has repeatedly benefited from your instruction and consideration, and has often been the recipient of your lavish presents, not to mention the consolatory gifts you bestowed upon me the other day. As for these:

Paltry and insignificant expenses,

They are:

Hardly worth hanging on the teeth.⁹⁷

My snail-like abode is so inadequate I fear it may not have lived up to your expectations. My only hope is that Your Excellency will excuse my remissness. That would be fortunate indeed.”

No sooner had Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien finished expressing his thanks than he ordered his attendants to call for his sedan chair and departed, along with Grand Coordinator Hou Meng. The officials of the Two Provincial Offices and the eight prefectures, having said their farewells, followed suit, after which the various members of the serving staff that had been hired for the occasion:

Dispersed in a single tumult.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to the reception hall, he arranged for the directors and musicians from the Music Office to be rewarded with food and drink, after which they, too, were allowed to depart. He retained only the services of the four boy actors that were on duty for the occasion. Whatever was left of the table settings that had been provided for the various officials both inside and outside the reception hall was carried off by their servants. But no more of this.

Observing that it was still relatively early in the day, Hsi-men Ch'ing had the utensils cleared away and found that there was enough left over to supply four tables with a sumptuous repast. He then sent servants to invite his brother-in-law Wu K'ai, Ying Po-ch'ueh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Licentiate Wen, Fu Ming, Kan Jun, Han Tao-kuo, Pen the Fourth, and his son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi, who had been up since the fifth watch that morning and was exhausted by all the matters he had been made responsible for, to join him for a drink.

It did not take long for the group of them to arrive. Wu K'ai, Licentiate Wen, Ying Po-ch'ueh, and Hsieh Hsi-ta were seated at the head table, Hsi-men Ch'ing presided over the proceedings as host, and the various managers were arrayed to either side, while the servants brought out the wine to be served at the party.

“Brother, you've certainly had a busy day of it,” opined Ying Po-ch'ueh. “How long did Defender-in-Chief Huang stay, and was he pleased by the occasion, or not?”

“Today,” remarked Han Tao-kuo, “the venerable eunuch Huang, on seeing what a splendid banquet had been provided for him, could not have been anything but pleased. The grand coordinator and the regional investigating censor certainly felt that:

Their gratitude knew no bounds, and expressed their gratitude again and again.”

“If any other household had attempted to put on a banquet of this kind, they could never have pulled it off,” stated Ying Po-ch'ueh. “They would not have the space available in this household of yours and would lack the number of hands that you have at your disposal. At a conservative estimate, you must have had more than a thousand people on your premises today, and they all had to be provided for. Even though it must have cost you a good deal of silver, Brother, it will have the effect of spreading your fame throughout the entire province of Shantung.”

“Even your pupil's mentor,” chimed in Licentiate Wen, “the venerable vice-commissioner of education, was present at the feast today.”

When Hsi-men Ch'ing asked him to explain, Licentiate Wen said, “His name is Ch'en Cheng-hui. He is the son of the venerable Ch'en Kuan⁹⁸ of the Remonstrance Bureau. His native place is Ch'uan-ch'eng district in Honan province. He began to compete in the examination system at the age of seventeen and became a metropolitan graduate in the year jen-ch'en.⁹⁹ At present he holds the local office of surveillance vice-commissioner of education and is renowned for his erudition.”

“This year then,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “he is no more than twenty-three years old.”

As they were chatting, soup and rice were served. After they had finished eating, Hsi-men Ch'ing called up the four boy actors and asked them their names.

“Your servants are called Chou Ts'ai, Liang To, Ma Chen, and Han Pi,” they replied.

“You must be from Han Chin-ch'uan's place, aren't you?” said Ying Poch'ueh.

Han Pi knelt down and replied, “Han Chin-ch'uan and Han Yü-ch'uan are both my younger sisters.”

“Have you had anything to eat and drink?” asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

“Your servants have just finished our food and wine,” replied Chou Ts'ai.

Because the memory of Li P'ing-erh had come into his mind, and he had been disappointed at not being able to see her during the banquet that day, Hsi-men Ch'ing said to the boy actors, “Fetch your instruments and come over here. Can you perform the song that begins with the words:

The flowers of Lo-yang,

The moon of Liang-yüan,¹⁰⁰ or not? I'd like you to sing it for me.”

Han Pi knelt down before him and said, “Your servant and Chou Ts’ai do know it.”

Thereupon:

Strumming the psaltery and plucking the mandola,¹⁰¹

To the beat of the clappers inlaid with red ivory, they sang the song to the tune “The Whole Realm Rejoices”:

The flowers of Lo-yang,
The moon of Liang-yüan;¹⁰²
Fine flowers must be purchased;
The bright moon is only on loan.
Leaning on the balustrade, we viewed the flowers as their blossoms proliferated;
With wine cups in hand, we interrogated the moon on the nights we were together.
The moon waxes only to wane;¹⁰³
Flowers blossom only to wilt.
It seems that in this life the hardest thing to bear is separation.¹⁰⁴
The wilting of the flowers means that the end of Spring is near;
The waning of the moon indicates that
Mid-Autumn will soon come;
But once one’s loved one has departed when will she ever reappear?¹⁰⁵

When they had finished singing this song, Ying Po-chüeh, who noticed that Hsi-men Ch’ing’s eyes were feeling sour and were on the brink of tears, said, “Brother, other people may not understand what is on your mind, but I know a thing or two about it. You asked them to sing this particular song because its words related to something in your heart. It must be because you were thinking of my late sister-in-law, and how the two of you used to be like intertwined branches, or the fish that swim in pairs, having only one eye apiece. Now that you are separated, how can you help longing for her?”

Observing that saucersful of sweetmeats were being brought out for them from the rear compound, Hsi-men Ch’ing said, “Brother Ying the Second, you may take exception to what I say, but when she was here she would have prepared these things with her own hands. Ever since she died, it’s been left to the maidservants to concoct them, with the result that they’re hardly worth looking at. There isn’t so much as a single tasty morsel for me to enjoy.”

“Confronted with such a lavish spread as this,” Licentiate Wen objected, “the venerable gentleman can hardly be said to lack a competent domestic staff. It is more than sufficient.”

“Brother,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “you really oughtn’t to talk that way. It may well be only because you can’t get over your heartache that you say such things, but they are likely to have a chilling effect on the feelings of my other sisters-in-law.”

As they continued to converse over their drinks, they were not aware that P’an Chin-lien was standing behind the hanging screen in order to listen to the singing. When she overheard what Hsi-men Ch’ing said, she went back to the rear compound and repeated it, word for word, to Yüeh-niang.

“You might as well let him say whatever he likes,” said Yüeh-niang. “After all, what can you do about it? Remember how, the other day, when she was still alive, I promised her that I would arrange to have Hsiu-ch’un work for the Second Lady. But when I tried to do so, he opened his eyes wide and shouted at me, saying, ‘How long has she been dead, after all, that you would presume to separate the maidservants from her quarters?’ I was reduced to having nothing further to say about it. And you, too, must have noticed, the last few days, how that wet nurse and her two maids have been carrying on. And if I so much as open my mouth about it, he accuses me of trying to get rid of them.”

“Mother,” said Chin-lien, “I also have noticed how that woman has altered her demeanor the last few days. I fear that that lousy shameless good-for-nothing of ours, who has been spending all day in her quarters, is making out with that woman. It would hardly surprise me. I’ve heard that, the other day, he gave her two pairs of ornamental hairpins, and that the woman has had the effrontery to wear them on her head, showing them off, first to this one, and then to that one.”

“Bean sprouts don’t lend themselves to being bundled,” said Yüeh-niang.

Thus it was that, behind their backs, everyone:

Conveyed the clear impression that they were not happy.

Truly:

If one’s real work had ever found favor in the eyes of one’s contemporaries;
One would not have had to spend money on rouge in order to paint peonies.¹⁰⁶

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Beneath the terrace of King Hsiang of Ch’u¹⁰⁷
the water flows on unhurried;
A single case of heartsickness¹⁰⁸ is able to produce sorrow in two places.¹⁰⁹

The moon itself is completely oblivious of the changes in human affairs;
As, late at night, it continues to shine on the crest of the plastered wall.¹¹⁰

Chapter 66

MAJORDOMO CHAI SENDS A LETTER WITH A CONSOLATORY CONTRIBUTION; PERFECT MAN HUANG CONDUCTS A RITE FOR THE SALVATION OF THE DEAD

The translucent windows on all eight sides open one after the other;
Yielding a view of her girdle pendants as she descends the jasper terrace.
Outside the boudoir door the Spring colors blend with the new willows;
On the mountain ridges the cold plum blossoms
bedeck the verdant slopes.
The shadows of the plum branches begin to stir as the bright moon ascends;
A breeze agitates the bamboos along the path, auguring a friend's arrival.
The beauty, having left behind a specimen of her mandarin duck brocade;
It is up to the Lord of the East to decide what should be done with it.¹

THE STORY GOES that on that day, as Hsi-men Ch'ing continued drinking with Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, and company, he asked Han Tao-kuo, "When is the convoy of merchant vessels with its armed escort scheduled to start out, so we can get things packed up in advance?"

"Yesterday someone came to inform me about it," said Han Tao-kuo. "The boats will start out on the twenty-fourth."

"In that case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we can wait until after the scripture service on the twentieth to pack up."

"Which two people are you sending on this expedition?" asked Ying Pochüeh.

"I'm sending three people in all," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I plan to have Ts'ui Pen return first next year with a boatload of merchandise from Hang-chou, while Han Tao-kuo and Lai-pao go on to the five entrepôts below Sung-chiang to acquire cotton goods for sale. I have enough in the way of satin and silk fabrics already in stock."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "what you propose is right on the mark. As the saying goes:

You've got to have everything in stock in order to do good business."

By the time this conversation was finished it was already the first watch and Wu K'ai got up to go, saying, "Brother-in-law, you've been wearing yourself out for days on end, and we've already had enough to drink. We had better take our leave so you can get yourself some rest."

Hsi-men Ch'ing objected to this and endeavored to retain them a little longer, ordering the boy actors to serve them with wine and sing a few more songs for their entertainment. Only after each of his guests had downed another three goblets of wine did he allow them to leave the premises.

Hsi-men Ch'ing proposed to reward the four boy actors with six mace of silver, but they repeatedly refused to accept the gratuity, saying, "His Excellency Sung Ch'iao-nien issued summonses mandating our attendance. How could we accept Your Honor's generous reward?"

"Even though you were here on official orders," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "this is my personal expression of appreciation. What are you afraid of?"

Only then did the four of them kowtow in gratitude, accept the gratuity, and depart. But no more of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded to go back to the rear compound and go to bed.

The next day, he got up early and went off to the yamen.

Early that morning, Abbot Wu Tsung-che of the Temple of the Jade Emperor sent a disciple of his, along with two vergers, to take charge of setting up the altar space in the large reception hall. At the upper end of the altar space were placed images of the Three Pure Ones and the Four August Ones.² In the middle was placed an image of the Grand Monad Heavenly Worthy Who Saves from Distress,³ with images of the Gods of the Eastern Peak and Fengtu⁴ to either side of it. At the lower end of the altar space were placed images of the Ten Kings⁵ who rule over the Nine Realms of Darkness that constitute the underworld; the two marshals with their Divine Tiger talismans that guard the altar; the Four Great Celestial Lords Huan,⁶ Liu,⁷ Wu,⁸ and Lu;⁹ the Divine Empress of the Moon; the Seven Perfected Jade Maidens who govern the fates of deceased women; and the seventeen divine marshals of the Tribunal for Suspended Lives whose job it is to summon up the souls of the dead.¹⁰

Both within and without the altar space,
Everything is arranged in perfect order;
The incense, flowers, lamps, and candles,
Are arrayed in glittering resplendence.
Censers are supplied with the famous “hundred-blend” incense;¹¹
Hanging lamps are suspended loftily around the sacred area.
The scripture lecterns are in place,
Curtained off by drapes of gold lamé;
Ritual drums are situated on high stands,
Surrounded by cranes in variegated clouds.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing returned home and saw the preparations that had been made, he was utterly delighted. After seeing to it that the disciple and the two vergers had been supplied with a vegetarian meal before returning to their temple, he immediately told Licentiate Wen to write out cards inviting Ch'iao Hung, Wu K'ai, Wu the Second, Hua Tzu-yu, Brother-in-law Shen, Meng Jui, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Ch'ang Shih-chieh, Wu Shun-ch'en, and all the other relatives and female guests to attend the scripture reading on the following day. He also directed the chefs that had been hired for the occasion to make the advance preparations for the oblations that would be required. But no more of this.

The next day, at the fifth watch, the cohort of Taoist priests that had been engaged for the occasion waited for the opening of the gate in the city wall before being allowed to enter and proceed to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence. Once there, after calling for the opening of the front door, they went directly to the altar space that had been set up for the scripture reading, where they lit the lamps and candles, washed their hands and ignited the incense, struck up their musical instruments, and began the recitation of the sacred texts, beginning with the Chiu-t'ien sheng-shen chang ching.¹²

Meanwhile, outside the main gate, the vergers suspended a long banner announcing the rites to be performed, hung up a placard with an inscription describing the nature and purpose of the ceremony, and pasted parallel statements, written on yellow paper in large characters, to either side of the doorway. The parallel statements read:

The Sovereign of the East displays benevolence, Enabling the souls of the dead to transcend the position of immortals and ascend to the Purple Elysium.
The Celestial Lord of the South forgives sins, Enabling purified souls, after undergoing the refining of sublimation, to mount to the Vermilion Height.

The inscription on the placard read as follows:

In order to uphold the Way and save the soul of the departed, her devoted husband, the faithful office holder Hsi-men Ch'ing, resident of such and such a precinct of the Ch'ing-ho district of Tung-p'ing prefecture in Shantung province of the Great Sung Empire, together with his entire household and the assembled relatives and guests, wish on this day to express their sincere devotion, and appeal to your powers of compassionate magnanimity on behalf of the spirit of his consort, née Li, whose life in this world extended into her twenty-seventh year. She was born at noon on the fifteenth day of the first month in the year hsin-wei and died at 2:00 AM on the seventeenth day of the ninth month in the seventh year of the Cheng-ho reign period. I respectfully submit that: As our connubial feelings were profound, I cannot but sigh over the untimely parting of the male and female phoenixes; since the moon shines coldly on her boudoir, I deplore the fact that we can no longer harmonize like zither and cithara. Merely grieving over her memory is unbearable, yet I cannot but think longingly of her voice and appearance. Light and darkness alternate all too swiftly,¹³ and it is already time for the fifth weekly commemoration of her death. Wishing to rescue her incarcerated soul, I respectfully tender my ardent expectations. On this twentieth day of the present month I have reverently engaged the services of these duly ordained Taoist officiants to come to my house of mourning and erect an altar for the performance of a sublimation ritual of the sworn alliance with the perfected, including the promulgation of the talismanic texts inscribed on jade tablets; and the nine recitations according to hallowed precedent of the Chiu-t'ien sheng-shen chang ching, and invocations from the sacred texts contained in the precious storehouse of the Taoist Canon. We solicit the attendance of the deities riding on their lion steeds to bestow the light of their beneficence, so that their golden lamps can dispel the darkness; and the conferment of their talismans in dragon script that abolish guilt, so that its pain may be as surely impeded as by iron pillars. In the deep of night, may the souls of the departed be enabled to cross the variegated bridge to the tinkle of their jade pendants; and may they be able to dine on the evening mist, ascend to the azure empyrean and meet with the Golden Perfected. It is our humble desire that the Supreme Deity may confer his benevolence from the jade steps of his palace, and that the Lord of the East may vouchsafe his attention from the vantage point of his Verdant Abode. May they broadly extend the benevolence of their compassion, and greatly display their powers of salvation, so that the souls of the departed may soon mount to the realm of freedom and ease, and the incarcerated spirits may all be able to ascend to the Celestial Paradise. May the relatives of the household, both living and dead, enjoy propitious auspices, and may their kindred be able to attain the Taoist shore. It is to be hoped that all those who participate in this rite of redemption shall be enabled to achieve salvation. Such is the purpose of this placard.

The placard is dated such and such a day, in such and such a month, of such and such a year of the Cheng-ho reign period.

The officiant is the Savant of the Highest Purity Great Cavern Scriptures and Registers, the Grand Master of the Golden Gates of the Nine Heavens, the Assessor of the Jade Palace of the Divine Empyrean, the Superintendent of the Various Thunder Bureaus, the Prelate of Lofty Attainments Who Elucidates Tenuity, Amplifies the Way, Embodies the Mystery, Cultivates Simplicity, and Upholds the Doctrine, the Superintendent of the Temple of the Supreme Unity, the Precursor of the Imperial Altar, and Director of Taoist Affairs throughout the Empire, the High Priest Huang Yüan-pai.¹⁴

Over the altar space that had been set up for the scripture reading in the main reception hall there was suspended a twenty-character announcement of the rite to be performed, written in a large script, which read:

Litany to be addressed to the Heavenly Savior from Distress Who Dwells in the Blue Heaven of the East, including the dispatch of talismanic announcements, on the occasion of the scripture recitation on the fifth weekly commemoration of the decease of the departed, on the ritual altar for the performance of a Water and Fire sublimation rite of salvation.

That day, Perfect Man Huang, dressed in a crimson robe, riding in an ivory sedan chair, girt with a golden girdle, surrounded by his attendants, with his outriders shouting to clear the way, did not arrive until the sun was already high in the sky. Abbot Wu, at the head of his cohort of Taoist priests, ushered him up to the altar space and went through the ceremonies of greeting, after which Hsi-men Ch'ing, dressed in white clothing and a mourning cap, paid his respects. After tea had been served, a lectern for the scripture reading was set up beside the altar table, supplied with a crimson gold lamé altar cloth and a figured seat cushion. Two Taoist acolytes stood in waiting to either side of him. Perfect Man Huang had a distinguished demeanor, wore a cap of black satin with a jade ornament in front, and was dressed in a robe of crimson silk that featured a tou-niu design,¹⁵ and a pair of black shoes. Hsi-men Ch'ing had prepared a bolt of satin brocade to present to him when he was ready to dispatch the documents.

When the documents had been signed and he was ready to ascend the altar, Perfect Man Huang changed into a ninefold-yang thunder cap, a crimson Taoist robe embroidered with golden clouds and white cranes, the pattern of which extended to its flying sleeves,¹⁶ soft white satin socks, and vermilion cloud-scaling ceremonial slippers. An outward-facing Pavilion of Heaven and Earth was set up, covered by two gilded flabella, where Golden Lads presented incense, and Jade Maidens scattered flowers, while holding aloft pennants and standards. As for the divine marshals who guard the altar, the talismanic functionaries of the Three Worlds, the four duty officers in charge of the year, the month, the day, and the hour,¹⁷ the God of Walls and Moats, the divinity of the soil, the local tutelary god, and his attendants, there were none whose presence was not invoked. On the high priest's incense table were arrayed five talismanic writs for summoning the celestial sovereigns, a black pennant for evoking thunder deities, the jade ruler of the celestial general T'ien-p'eng,¹⁸ a sword incised with a diagram of the seven stars of the Dipper, and a ritual ewer of purified water.

Only when the lector had finished declaiming the text of the announcement, and Hsi-men Ch'ing, as the ordainer of the rites, had washed his hands and presented incense, did two thurifers, swinging their hand-held censers and facing outwards, perform the ceremony of presenting incense three times in order to invite the presence of the various deities invoked. At this point, the high priest rapped his tablet of authority on the table and burnt incense in order to dispel pollution and cleanse the altar space, sent flying talismans in order to summon the generals, dispatched all the relevant documents and talismans,¹⁹ petitioned the Three Heavens, and enunciated the covenant to the Ten Courts of the Underworld. After the three sacrificial libations had been offered, music was struck up, paper money was burned, and the rite of circumambulation while burning incense was performed. Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'en Ching-chi, carrying hand-held censers, followed in the wake of the procession, while orderlies shouted to clear the way. In front and behind there were four gold lamé flabella, as well as three pairs of tasseled standards.

The relatives of the family were all lined up outside the front gate, where a temporary structure housing the spirit tablet of the deceased was erected in the street, and orderlies were deputed to look after the soup, rice, and other purified offerings that were presented before it. When the circumambulatory parade returned, and the consecration of the ritual altar was complete, a vegetarian repast was provided in the summerhouse. That day, the relatives and friends, neighbors, and employees of the household who came to make sacrificial contributions:

Arrived in an unbroken stream.²⁰

Hsi-men Ch'ing had Tai-an and Wang Ching accept these gifts, make a record of them, and bestow gratuities on the servants who took back the boxes in which they were contained.

After the morning invocation the Three Treasures were invited to authenticate the covenant, the various talismans and texts were promulgated, and the ceremonies of "breaking out of Hell" and "summoning the soul" were performed. Music was struck up again, and a ritual for attracting and summoning the soul of the deceased was performed in front of Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet. During the morning audience, the table that held her spirit tablet was placed at the foot of the altar so that while paying court before the jade steps²¹ she might hear the scriptures and achieve enlightenment. The high priest, seated on his elevated throne, recited the Chiu-t'ien sheng-shen chang ching, and burnt petitions addressed to the Grand Monad, the Gods of Feng-tu and the Eastern Peak, and the Ten Kings of the courts of the underworld, dressed in their caps and capes, and riding in their cloud chariots.

At the noon audience, the high priest, attired in his formal headgear and vestments, proceeded to:

Pace the stars and tread the Dipper,²² respectfully presented a memorial written in red characters to the Verdant Abode of the Heavenly Savior from Distress Who Dwells in the Blue Heaven of the East, requesting him to dispatch the divine marshals to fly down to Mount Lo-feng.²³

Perfect Man Huang Petitions for the Salvation of the Dead

It so happens that Perfect Man Huang was about thirty years old, and:

His demeanor was out of the ordinary.

When he was garbed in his formal regalia in order to preside over the noon audience, he looked just like a living god or immortal. Truly, what did he look like? Behold:

His star-embellished cap is enhanced with leaves of jade;
His crane-decorated robe is embroidered with gold clouds.

His spirit is as pure as the hoary moon over the Yangtze River;

His visage is as ancient as a tall pine on the summit of Mount Hua.

When treading the stars, his red shoes traverse the glowing clouds;

When pacing the void, his sacred texts float amid auspicious vapors.

With his long beard and broad cheeks,

He has practiced austerities until attaining the Heaven of No Imperfection;
With his white teeth and bright eyes,²⁴
He has mastered the registers that give him command over the Five Thunders.
The Three Isles and the Ten Continents,²⁵
he visits by conserving his nature;
The grotto heavens and blessed abodes,
he explores by self-induced trance.
Loftily he dines upon the evening mist;
Quietly he attends upon the Primordial.
When he traverses the moon at the third watch the cries of the phoenix are distant;
When he mounts the clouds for ten thousand li his seat on the crane's back is high.²⁶
It is as if the Grand Master of the Immortals has come to visit the mundane realm;
Or just as though the Perfect Man Kuang-hui²⁷ has chosen to visit the world below.²⁸

Once the memorials had been presented, Abbot Wu presided over the altar, where he dispatched the Sheng-t'ien pao-lu, or Precious Registers for Rebirth in Heaven, and the Shen-hu yü-cha, or Jade Talismans of the Divine Tigers. After the rite of circumambulation while burning incense had been performed at noon, the celebrants returned to the summerhouse where a vegetarian repast had been prepared for them. Perfect Man Huang was placed before a large table setting, replete with ingot-shaped cakes, Abbot Wu and the other Taoist officiants were provided with somewhat smaller-scale table settings, and the rest of the Taoist company had individual table settings of the ordinary kind. Perfect Man Huang and Abbot Wu were each given a bolt of satin, the four officiants who were entitled to wear figured vestments each received a bolt of woven silk, and each of the remaining Taoist priests was rewarded with a bolt of cotton fabric. The table settings were turned over to servants to take back to the temple, and the Taoist priests had their disciples put the bolts of fabric they had received into their trunks, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

After the midday vegetarian repast was over, the Taoist celebrants thanked Hsi-men Ch'ing for his hospitality and then proceeded to wander through the various pavilions, terraces, and grottoes in the garden as they digested their meals. Meanwhile, the utensils were cleared away, and new table settings of greater and lesser elaborateness were provided with vegetarian fare, of which Wu K'ai and the other relatives and friends of the household were invited to partake.

As they were eating, it was suddenly announced that Majordomo Chai Ch'ien in the Eastern Capital had sent a courier to deliver a letter. Hsi-men Ch'ing immediately went out to the reception hall and invited the messenger to come in. It turned out to be one of the factotums on the staff of the grand councilor's establishment, dressed in black livery, with tight-fitting trousers, wearing a flat-topped cap and dark-tan boots, and equipped with a complete set of bow and arrows. After he had come forward and bowed in greeting, and Hsi-men Ch'ing had returned the compliment, he pulled out a letter and presented it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who found that the outer envelope contained a packet of ten taels of silver as a consolatory contribution.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing asked the courier his name, he replied, "Your humble servant's surname is Wang, and his given name is Yü. I have been commissioned by His Honor Chai Ch'ien to deliver this letter to you. He didn't know about your bereavement. It wasn't until a letter from His Honor An Ch'en arrived in the capital that he learned about it."

"When did His Honor An Ch'en's letter arrive?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"His Honor An Ch'en's letter did not reach the capital until sometime in the tenth month," replied the courier. "Because his one-year appointment to be in charge of expediting the delivery of imperial lumber has expired, he has been promoted to the position of secretary of the Bureau of Irrigation and Transportation in the Ministry of Works. Right now, he has been imperially commissioned to take charge of the repair work on the Grand Canal and will not return to the capital until that task is completed."

After Hsi-men Ch'ing had questioned him for a while, he told Lai-pao to provide him with a vegetarian meal in one of the side rooms in the front courtyard and directed him to return the next day to pick up his reply.

Major-domo Chai Sends a Letter with a Consolatory Present

“Where does Han Tao-kuo reside?” the courier asked. “I have a letter for him here from his daughter in Chai Ch’ien’s household. After seeing him, I have to go on to deliver a letter in Tung-p’ing prefecture.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing immediately summoned Han Tao-kuo, and, after keeping the courier company as he ate his vegetarian meal, the two of them went off to Han Tao-kuo’s house together.

Hsi-men Ch’ing opened the letter to see what it was about and then happily took it to the summerhouse to show to Licentiate Wen, saying, “You can draft a letter in reply to this one, and I’ll also send him ten crepe handkerchiefs, ten satin handkerchiefs, ten low-grade gold toothpicks, and ten black gold wine cups as a return gift. The courier is coming back tomorrow to pick up the reply.”

Licentiate Wen took the letter and proceeded to peruse its contents, which read as follows:

Respectfully indited by his devoted servant in the capital, Chai Ch’ien, for the perusal of the newly promoted officer of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, his distinguished kinsman Hsi-men Ssu-ch’üan:

Since the day when we shook hands and bade each other farewell at my residence in the capital, I have not had the opportunity for a leisurely chat with you, which I profoundly regret. As for those matters which you entrusted to me, I have already laid them out before His Honor the grand councilor.

It is only recently, in a letter received from An Ch’ien, that I learned that my venerable kinsman was drumming on a basin and sighing²⁹ over the death of his wife, but the fact that I have not been able to express my condolences in person is an occasion for sorrow. What is one to do? What is one to do? I respectfully hope that the observance of the rites will serve to moderate your grief. In addition, I offer a consolatory contribution, as a paltry expression of my heartfelt feelings, in the hope that you will deign to accept it with a smile.

I have long admired the way in which, in your distinguished post, you have conspicuously devoted yourself to the promotion of virtuous government, with the result that the populace sing of their five pairs of trousers,³⁰ and you are renowned for their having tried three times to prevent you from relinquishing your position. At this year’s merit rating you are certain to receive a promotion. The other day, the officers in charge of the Divine Shipments of the Flower and Rock Convoys reported on their last two missions, and I have already spoken to His Honor the grand councilor about adding my kinsman’s name to the list of deserving officials. When the memorial on the completion of the Mount Ken Imperial Park is submitted, you are sure to be the beneficiary of imperial largess. My kinsman will have the pleasure of being promoted to the office of judicial commissioner, while Hsia Yen-ling, on the basis of the annual end-of-year evaluation, will be transferred to the position of commander of the escort for imperial processions in the capital. I respectfully provide advance notice of this in the humble expectation that you will give it your highest attention. I am unable to express myself more fully.³¹

PS. This letter is for your perusal alone. No word of it should be allowed to reach his ears. It is strictly confidential. Strictly confidential.

PPS. His Honor Yang Chien died in prison on the twenty-ninth day of last month.

Indited during the first decade of the first month of winter.

To resume our story, when Licentiate Wen had finished reading the letter, he was about to put it in his sleeve when Ying Po-chüeh snatched it away from him, read it over, and then handed it back to him, saying, “Venerable sir, whatever happens, do your very best to compose a well-written reply. In Master Chai Ch’ien’s household there are many men of talent, and we wouldn’t want to give them any occasion for mirth at our expense.”

Licentiate Wen replied:

“When sable-tailed cap ornaments run out,

They can only be supplanted by dog tails.³²

Your pupil is lacking in talent. How could I:

Show off my skill with an axe before the gate of Lu Pan, the master carpenter?³³

All I can do is endeavor to fulfill my responsibilities.”

“The venerable gentleman will have his own ideas about how to go about it,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “What does a dog like you know about such things?”

Before long, when they had finished with the midday vegetarian repast, Hsi-men Ch’ing directed Lai-hsing to see to the delivery of the leftover delicacies to the homes of the various relatives and neighbors. But no more of this.

Tai-an went to deliver return gifts to the six establishments in the licensed quarter that had sent contributions toward the cost of the ceremony, namely, those of Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, Cheng Ai-yüeh, Han Chin-ch’uan, Hung the Fourth, and Ch’i Hsiang-erh. Each of them received a bolt of muslin and a tael of silver.

During the course of the afternoon, the three boy actors, Li Ming, Wu Hui, and Cheng Feng, were called upon to entertain the company.

After some time, the group of Taoist celebrants once again ascended to the altar space, where they proceeded to beat their drums, pay reverence to the celestial court, perform the ritual of penance, conduct the lamp-lighting ritual,³⁴ take temporary leave of the altar, and then perform the rite of seeing off the celestial worthies.

In the waning light, by the time the preparations for the chiao ritual had been completed, it was already the first watch. Hua Tzu-yu, who resided outside the city gate, was invited to stay overnight by Hsi-men Ch’ing and so did not take his leave. Ch’iao Hung, Brother-in-law Shen, and Meng the Second said farewell and went home before the others. This meant that only Wu K’ai, Wu the Second, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Licentiate Wen, Ch’ang Shih-chieh, and the group of employees remained behind to observe the Water and Fire sublimation rite of salvation that was to take place that evening.

In the temporary structure outside the large reception hall, an elevated throne had been set up, a variegated bridge of papier-mâché had been constructed, a basin containing water and a basin containing fire were put in place, and food for the souls of the dead was provided. Offerings were neatly arrayed before the table that held Li P’ing-erh’s spirit tablet, under its own marquee. Her soul banner was placed beside it, together with a red banner and a yellow banner, and above it was suspended an inscription that read:

Overcome demons and guarantee the opportunity,³⁵

To undergo sublimation in the Southern Palace.

The cohort of Taoist priests and musicians were already arrayed on either side, while four Taoist acolytes stood in waiting to either side of the ritual throne, grasping tallies, and holding a ritual ewer and a sword. Perfect Man Huang, wearing a yellow gold demon-subduing cap and a crimson silk robe embroidered with variegated sunset clouds, ascended to the elevated throne, and:

Recited an incantation.

At this point, the music stopped, and two thurifers, swinging their hand-held censers, declaimed a gatha:

May the benevolent worthy, the Grand Monad, order his carriage to descend,

And the somber gates of the valley of night to open one after the other;

In order to let the acolytes, pair by pair, go in front and lead the way,

That the dead souls may undergo sublimation³⁶ and mount the cloudy stairs.

Perfect Man Huang, having fumigated his vestments, performed his ablutions, and burned incense, went on to chant an invocation, as follows:

We humbly submit that: The Mysterious Sovereign, in founding our religion, opened up a way of salvation from the road to the shades; the sect of Orthodox Unity, in transmitting its rites, has enabled us to refine the bodies of the dead so they may achieve transcendence. These mercies extend to incarcerated souls; these benefits ameliorate the fate of hungry spirits. Diligently dispersing genuine incense, we sincerely invoke the attendance at this sacred rite of the Great Compassionate and Merciful Occupant of the Palace of the Eastern Apogee Who Listens to the Voices of the Distressed and Is Moved to Respond to Their Needs, the Grand Monad Heavenly Worthy Who Saves from Distress, i.e., the Sovereign Deity Who Dwells in the Blue Heaven of the East and Presides over the Nine Yang, his avatars, the Great Perfect Men Who Save from Distress of the Ten Directions, the celestial and terrestrial transcendents, the officers of the Three Worlds, the deities of the Five Peaks, the Ten Kings of the Underworld, and the worthies of the Water Bureau and Mount Lo-feng. We respectfully hope that your lion throne will float through the void,³⁷ and your dragon pennant sparkle in the sunlight, that you may dispense the malachite elixir that dispels distress, and the sweet dew and ambrosia that generously alleviate the hunger of bereaved souls. Today, we dedicate a provisional offering upon the table holding the spirit tablet of the deceased and transmit the talismans that will abolish the guilt of those incarcerated in the Nine Realms of Darkness, so that their interrogations may be ended and their punishments cease. We humbly observe that the human beings who dwell in this world of dust are daily entangled in mundane affairs. Oblivious of their impending death, they merely seek to covet life. Few are able to plant the roots of goodness; most, consequently, fall into evil ways. Too befuddled to achieve enlightenment, they give free rein to their desires, resorting to covetousness and anger. In the expectation that they will live forever, they do not believe how easily death may come. When the day arrives and they suddenly pass away, everything reverts to nothingness.³⁸ Karmic encumbrances beset their bodies, as they suffer torments in the court of the underworld. At present, in accordance with the Way, we humbly observe that because the spirit of Hsi-men Ch’ing’s deceased consort, née Li, has relinquished its worldly ties and been engulfed for some time in the eternal night, if it is not rescued from the impediment of its sins, it is sure to find it hard to avoid a painful retribution. We respectfully hope that the Heavenly Worthy, whose name has been renowned for untold kalpas, and whose pneuma coordinates the Nine Yang, will exercise his benevolent nurture of life by rescuing those souls that cry out in pain; asperse his sweet dew so as to nourish the diverse species; shed his auspicious light in order to illuminate the paths of darkness; order the Three Officers to relax the protocols of interrogation; command the Kings of the Ten Courts of the Underworld to set aside their adjudicatory brushes; liberate the incarcerated and set free the imprisoned; forgive their transgressions and dispel their enmities; allowing each one of them to follow the talismanic functionaries in escaping completely from the somber gates. May they all experience the purification of the basins of water and fire in order to bathe the yellow efflorescence of their refined bodies, so that they may all be reborn, and hope to regain the Taoist shore.

The high priest then recited the Wu-ch'u ching, or Scripture of the Five Feasts,³⁹ and the sacred spell that transmutes the food offerings, thereby distributing the ritual foodstuff to the hungry spirits. The high priest then continued to declaim, as follows:

As I have heard: the Nine Pneumas float in Heaven, though the Nine Pneumas came into existence before the Great Void;⁴⁰ the Nine Realms of Darkness lie clustered beneath the Earth, and the Nine Realms of Darkness are concealed beneath stacks of layered Yin. When the Nine Pneumas are properly arrayed,⁴¹ the myriad beings are all brought to life,⁴² which is why they are the root of Heaven and Earth. Each being is conceived in the womb⁴³ and depends for its nurture on the Three Origins.⁴⁴ The reason why human beings suffer from death and decay is that they are unable to cherish their forms, preserve their spirits, value their pneumas, and solidify their roots,⁴⁵ thus forsaking their true natures.⁴⁶ In order to be reborn, their forms must be bathed in the Great Yin, and their substance refined by the Great Yang, so that the Nine Pneumas may cause them to coalesce, and the Three Origins re-create them in the womb, thereby giving renewed shape to their forms. Were they not able to rely upon the immutable laws of the Most High, and the esoteric commands of Lao-tzu, the founder of the school of the Mysterious Origin, how could they hope to find a way of salvation for their incarcerated souls, or expect the restoration of their original bodies, enabling them to mount the auspicious clouds and attend upon the Primordial,⁴⁷ while overcoming demons and being guaranteed redemption? To this end, we shall reverently present the true talisman of the Numinous Treasure for the refinement of the bodies of the dead.

The Lord of Grand Tenuity summons with his yellow pennant,
The deity of Florescent Nonbeing directs the soul banners.⁴⁸
Attracting and summoning the dead from their eternal night,
They provide a way of salvation for their resurrected souls.⁴⁹

The Taoist celebrants first took Li P'ing-erh's soul banner, immersed it in the basin of water, and burnt a talisman addressed to Chieh-lin, or the Ladies of the Moon, after which they exchanged it for the red banner. They then put this in the basin of fire and burnt a talisman addressed to Yü-i, the Emperors of the Sun, after which they replaced it with the yellow banner.⁵⁰ The high priest then declaimed the words:

The Heavenly number one begets water,
The Earthly number two begets fire;
When water and fire are refined together,
They give birth to the true form.⁵¹

Once the sublimation ceremony was completed, the soul of the deceased, attired in its formal cap and cape, was invited to cross the golden bridge, pay court before the jade steps, and confess her allegiance to the Three Treasures.⁵²

The assembled celebrants then intoned the three refuges and presented the "Five Offerings"⁵³ before each of them:

HOMAGE TO JADE CLARITY

In the Taoist school we honor,
The Lord of Jade Clarity.
The primordial chaos, devoid of light,
harbored the Brahma pneumas;
The myriad phenomena in their diversity were in a grain-sized pearl.
When the souls of the dead undergo sublimation,
They are able to ascend to the immortal realm.

HOMAGE TO UPPER CLARITY

In the Taoist school we honor,
The Lord of Upper Clarity.
In the Ch'ih-ming era the graphs appeared,⁵⁴
disclosing the end of days;
The primordial net flowed out,⁵⁵ penetrating the mysterious illimitable.
When the souls of the dead undergo sublimation,
They are able to ascend to the immortal realm.

HOMAGE TO GRAND CLARITY

In the Taoist School we honor,
The Lord of Grand Clarity.
The Way embraced Heaven and Earth from the outset of the Mysterious Origin;
For countless kalpas it has provided a way of salvation for befuddled souls.
When the souls of the dead undergo sublimation,
They are able to ascend to the immortal realm.

The high priest then said, "Having acknowledged the three refuges, we should proclaim the nine precepts:

- 1st precept: Be respectful and courteous; filially nourish your father and mother.
- 2nd precept: Be diligent and industrious; exhibit loyalty toward your rulers.
- 3rd precept: Do not kill; compassionately preserve all living creatures.
- 4th precept: Do not engage in venery; be upright in your approach to others.

5th precept: Do not steal; promote justice even at your own expense.
6th precept: Do not give way to anger; abusing others in the heat of wrath.
7th precept: Do not be dishonest; practicing deception and harming the good.
8th precept: Do not be arrogant; proudly indifferent to the truly virtuous.
9th precept: Do not be duplicitous; obey these precepts with a single mind.⁵⁶

You must listen attentively. Take heed! Take heed!”

When he had finished enunciating the nine precepts, the Taoist priests performed an interlude of music, after which Perfect Man Huang intoned the appropriate talismanic commands, followed by an incantation addressed to the ten classes of homeless souls,⁵⁷ to the tune “Hanging Chains of Gold”:

May the Great Compassionate and Merciful,
Imperial Savior of the Blue Heaven of the East,
Whose lion throne floats through the void,
Who is able to miraculously transform departed spirits,
Purify this offering of food for the dead,
And appear before the scorched demons of Hell,
So that the homeless souls that crowd the underworld,
Can come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May those who campaign to north and south,
The soldiers who don armor and wear uniforms,⁵⁸
Who risk death and forget life,
In order to repay their debt to their country,
Who after a single burst of cannon fire,
Are left to lie upon the battlefield;
The homeless souls who perish in battle,
Come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May those good boys and good girls,⁵⁹
Serving others as their slaves or servants,
Who are cursed at night and beaten in the morning,
Whose clothes do not cover their bodies,
Who are driven out of their masters' gates,
To lie helplessly in the long streets;
The homeless souls who starve to death,
Come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May sedentary traders and traveling merchants,⁶⁰
As well as itinerant Buddhist and Taoist priests,
Who are compelled year in and year out,⁶¹
To seek their sustenance away from home,
Who find themselves afflicted with illness,
And with no one to rely on in their wayside inns;
The homeless souls who die upon the road,
Come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May criminals guilty of assault and battery,
Who must wear the cangue and chains in prison,
And are beheaded, strangled, or sliced to death,
Thus forfeiting their lives in the long streets,
According to the clear articles of the statutes,⁶²
For the crime of violating the law of the land;
The homeless souls who suffer capital punishment,
Come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May enemies from a previous incarnation,⁶³
Who encounter each other in this life,
And resort to secret schemes or covert plots,
To disrupt each other's bowels with poison,
So that vapors arise from their nine apertures,
With the result that they lose their lives;
The homeless souls who die of poisoning,
Come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May those who breast-feed infants for three years,⁶⁴
Demonstrating the illimitable kindness of parents,
Who bear the fetus in their wombs for ten months,⁶⁵
Enduring the rigors of accouchement and parturition,
While their lives are hanging by a thread,
The babies and mothers who return to the shades;
The homeless souls who die in childbirth,
Come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May those endangered by grave misfortunes,
The threats of which are difficult to avoid,
Those burdened by private debts and tax arrears,
For which they are dunned day after day,
Who slit their own throats or hang themselves,
Thereby severing their three inches of breath;
The homeless souls who are driven to suicide,
Come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May those who suffer from prolonged illness,
Abdominal distension, paralysis, or consumption,
Scabrous suppurations, or flesh wounds,
Whose entire bodies reek of purulent discharges,
With no relatives to proffer them beans or water,
For whom prescribed medications offer no cure;

The homeless souls who perish of disease,
Come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May those beset by huge waves, windblown breakers,
Or spreading floods that surge up to the heavens,⁶⁶
Whose hawsers break and whose vessels sink,
So that their bodies are lost in the long river,
Who are homesick for their native places,⁶⁷
But have no one to send them even a letter;
The homeless souls who go to watery graves,
Come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May those encountering fire, with wind and smoke,
Who are caught by surprise and unable to escape,
From the fierce conflagration that knows no mercy,
Whose entire bodies are subjected to the flames,
Leaving them with singed scalps and scorched heads,⁶⁸
So that even in death they are smoke-cured ghosts;
The homeless souls who perish in the flames,
Come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

May the sprites and goblins who inhabit the trees,
As well as other varieties of ungovernable demons,
And the fish, crustaceans, and feathered creatures,
None of whom would not like to be reborn as humans,
Look up to the Most High and compassionate one,
To widely extend the scope of his benevolence;
So that the ten classes of homeless souls,
Can come to savor the taste of this sweet dew.

Once the sublimation ritual was completed, Perfect Man Huang came down from his elevated throne, and the Taoist priests struck up their music as they escorted him outside the front gate where paper money was burnt and a coffer of papier-mâché goods for the dead was incinerated. Once they came back inside, the ceremony was officially over, and the Taoist celebrants changed their clothes while the vergers proceeded to take down the scrolls depicting the Taoist deities.

Meanwhile, Hsi-men Ch'ing had already ordered that:

Painted candles be set alight, and

An array of banquet tables set out, in the large reception hall, where the three boy actors were on hand to play their musical instruments and sing for the assembled relatives and friends.

Hsi-men Ch'ing started out by offering a toast to Perfect Man Huang, while his attendants proffered him a bolt of ultramarine cloud-crane brocade, a bolt of variegated satin, and ten taels of silver.

After kowtowing to him four times, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "My deceased consort has this day, as a result of the efficacy of the scripture recitation conducted by my reverend teacher, been enabled to gain salvation and attain reincarnation. For all of which my gratitude is profound. These insignificant gifts are no more than an expression of my heartfelt feelings."

Perfect Man Huang replied, "Unworthy though I am to wear this cap and vestment and claim to be a devotee of the Taoist religion, what virtue could I possess that would enable me to affect mankind or Heaven? It is only owing to the effect of Your Honor's sincere devotion that your revered lady has been enabled to mount the auspicious clouds and attend upon the Primordial. Were I to accept these gifts, it would truly be a cause of embarrassment."

"These gifts are paltry in the extreme," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I humbly beseech you to accept them with a smile."⁶⁹

Only then did Perfect Man Huang direct a young acolyte to take charge of them.

After toasting Perfect Man Huang, Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to offer a toast to Abbot Wu and presented him with a bolt of satin brocade and five taels of silver, in addition to the fee of ten taels of silver as payment for arranging the scripture reading.

Abbot Wu would only accept the fee for the scripture reading, and refused the other gifts, saying, "Whatever efforts I may have expended in arranging for the scripture recitation designed for the salvation of your lady, so that she could be reborn in the immortal realm, were no more than the fulfillment of my responsibilities. I ought not even to accept this fee, let alone these other lavish gifts."

"Your Reverence is wrong," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Although Perfect Man Huang may have presided over the ceremony, all of the documents and protocols for the ritual were arranged for by you. These gifts are merely intended to compensate you for your efforts. How can it be right for you to refuse them?"

Only then did Abbot Wu feel that he had no alternative but to accept them, and he thanked him profusely.

After Hsi-men Ch'ing had presented a toast to the entire group of Taoist priests, Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, and the others came up to assist Hsi-men Ch'ing in enjoying the food and drink that had been offered in sacrifice.

Wu K'ai presented the toast, Ying Po-chüeh held the flagon, Hsieh Hsi-ta proffered some viands, and they all knelt down in front of him, while Ying Po-chüeh said, "Brother, you have held this ceremony today, invited Perfect Man Huang to preside over it, and availed yourself of the efforts of Abbot Wu. Just now, as the paper money was being burnt at the conclusion of the ritual, I saw a vision of my sister-in-law, wearing a phoenix cap on her head, dressed in white clothing, with a feather fan in her hand, mounting into the clouds on the back of a white crane. This is all due to the efficacy of Perfect Man Huang's rites of salvation, your own sincere heart, and my sister-in-law's good fortune, and it is a source of delight to me as well."

Thereupon, he filled a cup of wine and handed it to Hsi-men Ching.

"I am indebted to all of you gentlemen," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "for all you have done during the last few days. I cannot thank you enough. I am scarcely worthy of your surpassing generosity."

When he had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Drained it in one gulp.

Ying Po-chüeh then proceeded to fill another cup of wine, saying, "Brother, in drinking wine, you should make a twosome out of it, rather than confining yourself to a single cup."

Hsieh Hsi-ta hastened to proffer him a chopstick-serving of viands, which he promptly consumed.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished toasting the company, they all sat down at their places, while the boy actors entertained them by playing their musical instruments and singing, and the chef came out to present the first serving. That night, during the course of the banquet, what with:

Playing at guess-fingers or gaming at forfeits, and Performing on woodwind and string instruments, the party continued until the second watch and Hsi-men Ch'ing was half inebriated before the company said farewell, got up to go, and went their ways.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then came inside, rewarded the boy actors with three mace of silver, and returned to the rear compound. Truly:

During this life, if wine is on hand,

you might as well get drunk;

Not a single drop has ever been known to reach the Nine Springs.⁷⁰

There is a poem that testifies to this:

One day, you may swear to live your lives together,
But, one night, your oath will vanish like a cloud.
Her flying phoenix golden hairpin will tumble out,
The soaring phoenix precious mirror will fracture.
Your delight in her salvation will prove ephemeral,
While your lasting mortification will not diminish.
Only by frequent resort to the contents of the cup,
Can you gain temporary relief from your affliction.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 67

HSI-MEN CH'ING APPRECIATES THE SNOW WHILE IN HIS STUDIO; LI P'ING-ERH DESCRIBES HER INTIMATE FEELINGS IN A DREAM

Throughout the livelong day I think of you, but I cannot see you;¹
The sounds of the drum and the cold bugle are difficult to bear.
The ruptured mirror in your dressing case only reflects the waning moon;
The remaining clothes in your chest are but clusters of broken clouds.
The shivering sparrow finds it hard to perch upon the sparse branches;
The migrating goose breaks formation and cries
as it deserts the flock.
The jade hairpin may be smashed to pieces, but emotion is hard to shatter;
When I envisage you, it is heartbreaking that my recollections are unreal.

THE STORY GOES that when Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to the rear compound he was so exhausted that he slept until the sun was high in the sky without getting up.

Lai-hsing came in at this point and reported, "The carpenters are waiting outside and want to know if they are to dismantle the temporary structures that they put up for the funeral rites."

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded irritably to Lai-hsing, saying, "As for the dismantling, just go ahead and have them do it. What need is there to bother me about it?"

The carpenters outside then proceeded, hugger-mugger, to take down the matting, cordage, and pine planks of the structures in question and transport them to the building across the street for storage. But no more of this.

Yü-hsiao came into the room and reported, "The weather outside is really threatening."

Hsi-men Ch'ing told her to fetch his clothes from on top of the heated k'ang and prepared to get up and put them on.

"You were tired out last night," said Wu Yüeh-niang, "and the weather looks threatening. Why don't you get a good sleep before getting up. Why should you feel compelled to crawl out of bed so soon? You might just as well not go to the yamen today."

"I'm not planning to go to the yamen," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'm afraid that messenger from our kinsman Chai Ch'ien will come by looking for a reply, and I'll need to be here to send him off with it."

"In that case," said Yüeh-niang, "you might as well get up. I'll have a maidservant heat some congee for you to eat."

Without even performing his morning ablutions, and leaving his hair in disarray, Hsi-men Ch'ing threw on a woolen robe, donned a felt cap, and headed straight for his studio in the Hidden Spring Grotto in the front garden.

It so happens that, ever since Shu-t'ung had absconded, Hsi-men Ch'ing had arranged for Wang Ching to look after the garden and the keys to the two doors on either side of his studio there, and deputed Ch'un-hung to take care of cleaning up and sweeping his other studio in front of the large reception hall. During the winter months, Hsi-men Ch'ing spent his leisure time in the studio in the Hidden Spring Grotto. On the surface of the bed frame over the k'ang, which was heated by an underground firebox, there was also a brazier of yellow brass. Warmth was retained in the room by a hanging portiere of thin oiled silk, decorated with a motif of the moon amid the plum branches. The outer parlor was embellished with an oleander, a variety of chrysanthemums;

Cool slender bamboos, and Turquoise-hued orchids.

The studio itself was furnished with:

Brushes, inkstones, and a plum in a vase;

Zither and books were elegantly displayed.

On the bed frame over the k'ang there were:

A madder red strip of felt lying on top of,

A brocade mat figured with silver flowers.

The pillow was decorated with water birds;

The hanging curtains were of mermaid silk.

Hsi-men Ch'ing lay down casually on the bed frame, while Wang Ching hastened to retrieve some ambergris incense from an ivory box on the table and ignited it in a small gilded censer.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then said to Wang Ching, "Go find Lai-an, and tell him to go invite Master Ying the Second to come join me."

Wang Ching accordingly went out and sent Lai-an off on this errand.

Whom should Wang Ching run into at this juncture but P'ing-an, who came up to him and said, "Little Chou, the barber, is waiting outside."

Wang Ching went back into the studio and told this to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had him call Little Chou inside.

When Little Chou had kowtowed to him, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "You've come at just the right moment to comb my hair and give me a massage."

He then went on to ask, "Why is it that you haven't shown up for such a long time?"

"On hearing that your Sixth Lady had died," said Little Chou, "I imagined that you were probably preoccupied, so I didn't come."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, seated himself on a "Drunken Old Gentleman's" lounge chair, let down his hair, and told him to trim and comb it for him.

Who should appear at this juncture but Ying Po-ch'ueh, who had been summoned by Lai-an. He was wearing a felt hat on his head, a green woolen jacket on his torso, a pair of old black boots on his feet, and a palmetto cloak, as he lifted aside the portiere, came in, and bowed in greeting.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, whose hair was in the process of being combed, said, "There's no need for you to perform an obeisance. Pray sit down."

Ying Po-ch'ueh pulled a chair over and sat down next to the brazier.

"How come you're dressed that way today?" enquired Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"You may not be aware of it," said Ying Po-ch'ueh, "but snow is falling outside, and it's extremely cold. Yesterday, it was so late when I went home that the rooster had already crowed. You sent a servant to see us on our way, but we could hardly walk by that point. When I saw how overcast it was, I asked for a lantern and made my way home together with your brother-in-law, Wu K'ai. Today, I could hardly crawl out of bed. If Lai-an hadn't come to call for me, I'd be asleep yet. Brother, you're quite a stout fellow to be able to get up this early. If it were me, I couldn't manage it."

"Luckily, you've been a witness to it all," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I haven't had a moment's peace. Ever since the day of her burial, I've been preoccupied with entertaining Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch'en and arranging for the scripture reading ceremonies, so that, from that time to this, my mind has been perturbed. This morning, my wife said, 'You're tired out. Why don't you get a good sleep before getting up?' But I was worried that the messenger from my kinsman, Chai Ch'ien, would come by for a reply to his letter, and I also had to see to the dismantling of the temporary structures that were erected for the funeral rites. On the twenty-fourth, I'm sending off Manager Han Tao-kuo and some other employees on a trip and need to see that everything is packed up, and the statement of account written out. The various funeral arrangements have also put people to a lot of trouble. As far as the relatives and friends are concerned, it might be all right, but when it comes to the gentry and officials, if you fail to pay them a personal visit to thank them for their generosity, it will constitute a breach of propriety."

"That's so," said Ying Po-ch'ueh. "I, too, have been concerned about your need to pay these personal visits to thank people for their generosity. You'll have to do it, I guess, but you might as well select only the most important households, and let it go at that. As for the rest, since you're on good terms with them, if you run into each other, all you need to do is apologize, that's all. Who doesn't know how busy you've been? You can rely on their mutual understanding."

As they were speaking, what should they see but Wang Ching, who lifted aside the portiere to allow Hua-t'ung to bring in a square box of painted lacquer, with two teacups of carved lacquer inlaid with silver, containing boiled cow's milk flavored with butterfat and crystallized sugar.

Ying Po-ch'ueh picked up a cup and cradled it in his hand, admiring the way in which the glistening white goose-fat-like butterfat floated on the surface, and said, "What a wonderful treat. It's boiling hot, and if you hold it in your mouth, it's:

Fragrant, sweet, and delectable."

Without any trouble at all, he managed to finish it off with a few swallows. Hsi-men Ch'ing, on the other hand, waited until Little Chou had finished with his hair and then told him to clean the wax out of his ears, setting the milk aside on a table, without drinking any of it.

"Brother," said Ying Po-ch'ueh, "why don't you drink some of it? It would be a pity to let it get cold. If you drink a cup of this first thing every morning, it's sure to have a restorative effect on your constitution."

"I'm not going to drink it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You can have it. In a little while I'm going to eat some congee."

This was just the signal Ying Po-ch'ueh had been waiting for, and, picking it up in his hand, he:

Finished it off with a single gulp,² after which Hua-t'ung took the cups away.

When the wax had been cleaned out of Hsi-men Ch'ing's ears, he told Little Chou to take the wooden roller and go over his body with it, employing the art of massage and the therapeutic gymnastic techniques called "guiding and pulling."³

"Brother," asked Ying Po-ch'ueh, "now that your body has been gone over with the roller, do you feel any improvement in your sense of well-being?"

"There is no reason for me to deceive you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The fact is that in the evening my body regularly starts to hurt, and I feel pain in my lower back. If I didn't get this kind of going over, I don't know how I'd stand it."

"For someone with such a corpulent figure as yours," opined Ying Po-chüeh, "and one who eats such rich food every day, it is hardly surprising that you should suffer from phlegm-fire."

"The other day," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Jen Hou-ch'i said to me, 'Venerable sir, although you possess an imposing stature, you suffer from an excess of vacuity.' He gave me a jar of life-prolonging restorative pills and said that they were concocted from a prescription made up for the use of His Majesty the Emperor by Perfect Man Lin Ling-su, and that I should take one every morning, and wash it down with human milk. I've been so distracted the last few days, however, that I haven't taken any of them yet. You all say that I've got a plethora of bedmates at my disposal, and indulge in this business every day, but ever since she died, I haven't been in the mood to consider such matters."

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Han Tao-kuo, who came in, bowed in greeting, and sat down, saying, "Just now, all the parties concerned have come to terms about our expedition. The boats have been chartered and we are all set to embark on the twenty-fourth."

Hsi-men Ch'ing gave instructions that Manager Kan Jun should prepare the accounts and weigh out the silver so that they could wrap things up the next day.

He then went on to ask, "How much silver in the way of profits from the two shops is available?"

"It comes to something over six thousand taels altogether," said Han Tao-kuo.

"I'll weigh out an allotment of two thousand taels," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and turn it over to Ts'ui Pen so he can go to Hu-chou to buy silk. As for the other four thousand taels, you and Lai-pao can proceed to Sung-chiang to purchase piece goods. You must try to be on time to join the first fleet of boats that returns north in the new year. Each of you can take an advance of five taels of silver to cover the expenses of packing up for the trip at home."

"I've got another problem," said Han Tao-kuo. "As the holder of a hereditary corvée labor obligation on the staff of the Prince of Yün, I have to report for duty in person at periodic intervals and am not permitted to pay a fee for hiring a substitute. What am I to do about it?"

"Why can't you pay a fee to hire a substitute?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Lai-pao also holds a nominal appointment on the staff of the Prince of Yün, and he merely pays three mace of silver a month to avoid having to report for duty."

"As for Brother Pao's case," said Han Tao-kuo, "his right to do so was stipulated in the document of appointment from the grand preceptor so no one dares to interfere with him. In my case, it's a hereditary position which mandates the drafting of another able-bodied adult male from my clan if I am unable to serve."

"In that case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you draft a memo about it, and I'll ask Jen Hou-ch'i to speak to Attendant Wang on the prince's staff, and have your name removed from the roster of those whose corvée service is mandated, so that you can commute your obligation to regular payments in money. Every month all you'll have to do is depute a reliable person from your household to go make the necessary payment for you."

Han Tao-kuo bowed to him to express his gratitude.

"Brother," chimed in Ying Po-chüeh, "once you've taken care of this problem for him, he'll have an easier mind while out on the road."

Before long, after Little Chou had finished massaging him with the roller, Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to the rear compound to comb his hair and directed that Little Chou should be given something to eat.

After some time, Hsi-men Ch'ing came back out wearing a white velveteen "loyal and tranquil hat" on his head and a fine woolen robe on his body. He rewarded Little Chou for his services with three mace of silver and then sent Wang Ching to summon Licentiate Wen.

Before long, Licentiate Wen came in, formally attired in the typical garb of a scholar:

A high hat and a wide girdle.⁴

When they had finished exchanging greetings, the servants set out a table and brought in the congee. This repast included four side dishes, namely, a bowl of slow-boiled ham hocks, a bowl of blanched donkey meat flavored with chives, a bowl of blanched chicken wonton flavored with pickled fish, and a bowl of slow-boiled squab, along with four bowls of congee made from nonglutinous rice. Four pairs of ivory chopsticks were also provided. Ying Pochüeh together with Licentiate Wen were seated at the head of the table, Hsi-men Ch'ing played the role of host, and Han Tao-kuo was seated to one side.

Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Lai-an, saying, "Fetch another bowl of congee and a pair of chopsticks, and ask our son-in-law to come have some congee with us."

Before long, Ch'en Ching-chi arrived, wearing a mourning cap on his head, an outer robe of white pongee cut like that of a Taoist priest, over a loose undergown of pale green satin, and rush sandals with velvet socks. After bowing to Ying Po-chüeh and the others, he also sat down to one side. In a little while, when they had finished the congee and the utensils had been cleared away, he departed, and Han Tao-kuo also got up to go, leaving only Ying Po-chüeh and Licentiate Wen sitting in the studio.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then turned to Licentiate Wen and asked, "Have you finished writing the reply, or not?"

"Your pupil has already prepared a draft, which I have brought with me," said Licentiate Wen. "I won't copy out the final version until you have had a chance to peruse it, venerable sir."

He then pulled it out of his sleeve and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing to look over. The letter read as follows:

Earnestly indited by his devoted servant in Ch'ing-ho, Hsi-men Ch'ing, in response to His Eminence of surpassing virtue, the pillar of state Chai Ch'ien, his venerable kinsman:

Since I forsook your illustrious countenance after exchanging views during our meeting at your residence in the capital, without my being aware of it, half a year has abruptly elapsed. Your pupil having been so unfortunate as to suffer the loss of his consort, is especially grateful for the receipt of his kinsman's consolatory contribution, conveyed from a distance, as well as his admonitory advice, which suffices to demonstrate the profundity and generosity of his efforts on my behalf. I am both moved and impressed more than words can tell, and shall not forget my debt of gratitude as long as I shall live.⁵ My only fear is that if I should ever be remiss in the performance of my official duties, since I depend upon your influence, I should fail to live up to your expectations. The fact that I can rely upon you to protect my interests before the venerable minister is something for which your pupil will remain forever grateful, since it is entirely due to his kinsman's largess. At present, taking advantage of a convenient messenger, I wish to respectfully enquire after your well-being, and to convey my unsurpassable regard. I humbly expect that you will comprehend my sentiments, and am not able to express myself more fully.

In addition, I am sending ten handkerchiefs of Yang-chou crepe, ten handkerchiefs of variegated satin, twenty low-grade gold toothpicks, and ten black gold wine cups, as a paltry expression of my sentiments from afar, in the hope that you will accept them with a smile.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished reading the draft, he told Ch'en Ching-chi to get out the presents there in the studio and assist Licentiate Wen in wrapping them up. The letter was then copied out on brocade notepaper, after which the envelope was securely closed, and a seal affixed to it. A packet containing five taels of silver was also sealed up as a gratuity for the courier, Wang Yü. But no more of this.

After a while, they noticed that the snow was falling more heavily, and Hsi-men Ch'ing kept Licentiate Wen in the studio so they could appreciate the snow together. The table was wiped off, and some appetizers were provided to go with their wine. What should they see at this juncture but someone lifting aside the portiere and peeking inside.

Hsi-men Ch'ing asked who it was, and Wang Ching replied, "Cheng Ch'un is here."

Hsi-men Ch'ing told him to come in. Holding a pair of boxes up high in his hands, Cheng Ch'un came in and knelt down in front of the company. There was also a little square box adorned with gold tracery balanced on top of the other two.

"What's in the boxes?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked.

"My elder sister, Ai-yüeh," Cheng Ch'un replied, "knowing that Your Honor is tired out from the scripture-reading ceremony for the Sixth Lady yesterday, and having nothing better to offer, has sent these two boxes of tea pastries for Your Honor to give away to someone if you like."

When he proceeded to open them, one box turned out to contain stuffed cream puff pastries, while the other one turned out to hold butterfat "abalone shell" sweets.

"These were made by my sister Ai-yüeh with her own hands," said Cheng Ch'un. "She knows that Your Honor is fond of these sweets and has sent them as a sign of her filial respect."

"I am already beholden to your establishment for the gifts you provided yesterday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and today your sister Ai-yüeh has taken the trouble to send these things as well."

"Wonderful!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "Bring them over here so I can taste them. Having lost one daughter who was adept at making these things, another daughter who is good at the same task has appeared."

Picking one up and sticking it in his mouth, Ying Po-chüeh also chose another one and handed it to Licentiate Wen, saying, "Venerable sir, have a taste of this. Once you have eaten it:

Your loose teeth will grow again;⁶

You'll feel like a new individual.⁷

Even to gaze upon such an exotic object,

Is superior to gaining ten years of life."⁸

When Licentiate Wen proceeded to savor it, he found that:

It melted on entering the mouth, and said, "This delicacy must come from the Western Regions. It is not something known to the human world.

It irrigates the lungs and transfuses the heart.
Surely it is a rare specialty from the Realms Above."

Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to ask, "And what's in the little box?"

Cheng Ch'un calmly knelt down in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing and opened the box, saying, "This is a personal gift from my sister Ai-yüeh to Your Honor."

Hsi-men Ch'ing put the box on his knee and was about to take a look at the contents, when Ying Po-chüeh snatched it away with one hand and opened it up himself. Inside there was a tasseled peach-red satin handkerchief with a diapered, double-patterned, border and a meticulously worked motif of overlapping antique cash coins and joined hearts in the shape of interlocking lozenges, containing a package of melon seeds which the donor had cracked with her own teeth. Ying Po-chüeh tossed the handkerchief back to Hsi-men Ch'ing but proceeded to cram the melon seeds into his mouth in two handfuls and gobble them up.

By the time Hsi-men Ch'ing endeavored to grab them back, there were hardly any left, and he expostulated, "You crazy dog! Are you suffering from such:

Acute consumption or avid craving?

If you leave me so much as a glimpse of them, it will show that you have a human heart after all."

"They were a gift from my daughter," said Ying Po-chüeh. "If she didn't intend to show her filial feelings toward me, to whom should she display them? As I see it, you ordinarily have more than enough to eat."

"Since Licentiate Wen is here," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I can hardly give you the cursing you deserve. You dog! That's hardly acceptable conduct."

With that, he tucked the handkerchief into his sleeve and told Wang Ching to take the boxes back to the rear compound. Before long:

The cups and plates were duly arrayed,⁹ and the wine was served.

They had only finished one round of wine when Tai-an came in and reported, "Li Chih and Huang the Fourth have finally received payment and have come to deliver the silver they owe you."

"How much does it come to?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"They say they've brought a thousand taels," said Tai-an, "and that they'll deliver the remainder at a later date."

"Just take a gander at those two goddamned characters," said Ying Po-chüeh. "They've been keeping me, too, in the dark, without telling me what they're up to. It's no wonder they never showed up for that scripture-reading ceremony of yours yesterday. They must have gone to Tung-p'ing prefecture to collect their silver. Now that you've received this repayment, you'd better not let them have any more silver in the future. These two "bare sticks" owe money to so many people that I fear, in the future:

Their reserves will prove to be inadequate.¹⁰

The other day, Eunuch Director Hsü from the northern quarter was so upset at this prospect that he said he planned to go to Tung-p'ing prefecture himself, and bring back the silver he was due in person. I fear that if that:

Old ox with his rapacious snout,¹¹ makes off with the whole bundle, you may have difficulty recovering the remainder of your investment."

"I'm not afraid of the likes of him," stated Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It doesn't matter to me whether it's Eunuch Director Hsü or Eunuch Director Li. How do you suppose he would like it if I were to have his servant detained in the lockup? There's no reason to fear that he would fail to cough up the silver."

Turning to Ch'en Ching-chi, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Take the steelyard out with you, and take care of weighing his silver and putting it away. That should settle the terms of the contract. There's no need for me to go out."

After some time, Ch'en Ching-chi came back and reported, "I've weighed out the silver, which comes to exactly a thousand taels, and taken it back to the rear compound for the First Lady to put away. Huang the Fourth says that he'd like you to go outside and have a few words with him."

"Tell him I'm busy entertaining someone," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "After all, the only thing he wants to discuss is the renegotiation of the contract. Tell him to come back after the twenty-fourth."

"It's not that," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "There's a different matter that he'd like to solicit your help with. He's asking you to go outside so he can explain it to you in person."

"I wonder what it could be," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'd better go out and see."

When he got to the reception hall, Huang the Fourth kowtowed to him and then stood up and said, "The thousand taels of silver that I brought with me has already been accepted by your son-in-law and I am prepared to write a promissory note for the remainder. But there is another matter that I would like to solicit Your Honor's assistance with today."

As he spoke he knocked his head on the floor and wept.

Hsi-men Ch'ing helped him to his feet and said, "What is it, actually. Tell me about it."

"My father-in-law Sun Ch'ing," said Huang the Fourth, "employs a manager named Feng the Second to handle his cotton business in Tung-ch'ang prefecture. Who could have anticipated that this Feng the Second had a son named Feng Huai who:

Was not the sort to abide by his lot, but was in the habit of locking the door of the shop at night and going out to patronize prostitutes. One day, two large bales of cotton were found to be missing, and when my father-in-law, Sun Ch'ing, complained about it, Feng the Second punished his son with a few strokes of the cane. His son, consequently, engaged in an affray with my brother-in-law, Sun Ch'ing's son, Sun Wenhsiang, in which he managed to knock out one of his antagonist's teeth and also suffered a head injury himself, before the other employees were able to break it up. Who could have anticipated that his son would develop a case of tetanus and die in his home half a month later? His father-in-law, who is a notorious local tyrant named Pai the Fifth, nicknamed Moneybags Pai, who operates as a fence for stolen goods in the area west of the Grand Canal, incited Feng the Second into preparing a deposition and lodging a complaint at the yamen of the regional investigating censor, who has muddle-headedly deputed Lei Ch'i-yüan, the assistant commissioner of the military defense circuit, to hear the case. But His Honor Lei Ch'i-yüan is so busy facilitating the Imperial Flower and Rock Convoys that he has assigned the case to Prefectural Judge T'ung. The Pai family has bought off Prefectural Judge T'ung and suborned the neighbors into falsely testifying that my father-in-law, Sun Ch'ing, egged on his son from the sidelines during the affray, so that, at present, a warrant has been issued for my father-in-law's arrest. My only hope is that, whatever happens, Your Honor will deign to take pity on me by writing a letter to Lei Ch'i-yüan requesting him to hold my father-in-law in custody for a few days before submitting a final decision. Only if His Honor Lei Ch'i-yüan has the time to hear the case is there any chance that my father-in-law may escape with his life. The fact that the two of them engaged in an affray had nothing to do with my father-in-law, and moreover, the death of Feng Huai did not take place until after the event, when the period of responsibility for the crime had elapsed. After all, Feng Huai had already been beaten by his father, Feng the Second, so why should Sun Wen-hsiang alone be held responsible for his death?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing glanced over his explanatory note and saw that it said, "Please look with favorable eyes on the two prisoners, Sun Ch'ing and Sun Wen-hsiang, who are currently being detained in Tung-ch'ang prefecture."

He then went on to say, "Although it is true that Assistant Commissioner Lei Ch'i-yüan did attend a banquet here some days ago, I have only met him that once and am not well acquainted with him. Under the circumstances, it would hardly be appropriate for me to address a letter to him."

At this, Huang the Fourth knelt down, weeping and wailing, and appealed to him, saying, "If Your Honor does not take pity on them, my father-in-law and his son will both, most likely, be fated to die. As things now stand, if Sun Wen-hsiang must lose his head, so be it, but if you could only contrive to have my father-in-law removed from the case:

My obligation to you could not be greater.

My father-in-law is fifty-nine years old this year and has no one at home to tend to his needs. If he remains incarcerated during the cold winter months, he will be as good as dead."

Hsi-men Ch'ing pondered this for some time and then said, "All right then, I'll ask His Honor Ch'ien Lung-yeh of the Lin-ch'ing customs house to intervene on his behalf. He and Lei Ch'i-yüan are fellow graduates, both having obtained the chin-shih degree in the year jen-ch'en."¹²

Huang the Fourth then proceeded to kowtow once again, after which he pulled a promissory note for "one hundred piculs of white rice"¹³ out of his sleeve and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, at the same time also extracting two packets of silver from the wallet at his waist.

Hsi-men Ch'ing refused to accept these offerings, saying, "What would I want with these monetary inducements of yours?"

"If Your Honor sets no store by them," said Huang the Fourth, "they may just as well be used to thank Ch'ien Lung-yeh."

"That's not a problem," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If the request is successful, I'll buy an appropriate gift to thank him."

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Ying Po-chüeh, who emerged from the postern gate to the garden, saying, "Brother, you ought not to intervene on Huang the Fourth's behalf. This is a case of someone who:

At leisure, doesn't bother to burn incense, but

When in a jam, embraces the legs of the Buddha."¹⁴

Yesterday, when you were holding the scripture-reading ceremony, he didn't even bother to send a gift, or come to pay a visit. Yet today, he shows up and asks you to do him a favor."

Huang the Fourth responded by bowing to Ying Po-chüeh and said, "My good Uncle Two, you're killing me. I've been running myself ragged over this matter for the last half month. Since when have I had any leisure? Yesterday I had to go to the prefectural yamen to collect this silver due to His Honor. This morning Brother Li the Third got up early to report for duty, and I came straight to His Honor's place here to turn over the silver and solicit his intervention in this affair in the hope of saving my father-in-law. If His Honor persists in his refusal to accept these presents, it will indicate that he no longer intends to patronize me."

When Ying Po-chüeh saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was being offered a hundred taels of "snowflake" government silver, he went on to ask, "Brother, are you going to speak up on his behalf, or not?"

"I am not on familiar terms with Assistant Commissioner Lei Ch'i-yüan," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "so, at present, I plan to ask Secretary Ch'ien Lung-yeh of the Lin-ch'ing customs house to say a word on his behalf. In the future, I can buy a gift to thank the venerable Ch'ien Lung-yeh. That ought to suffice. So why should I accept these presents from him?"

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "what you propose to do is not appropriate. Do you mean to say that when someone comes to solicit a favor from you, you should be put to the expense of having to buy a thank-you gift on his behalf? That doesn't make any sense. If you refuse to accept what he is offering, it looks as though you disdain it as being insufficient, which leaves him in an awkward position. You ought to take my advice and accept these presents of his. Although you may not set much store by them yourself, they may be drawn upon just as well in thanking Ch'ien Lung-yeh."

"And as for you, Brother Huang the Fourth," he went on to say, "listen to what I have to say. The fate of your father-in-law and brother-in-law hangs in the balance, and if it should happen that, as a result of the letter you have solicited, they are fortunate enough to escape unscathed, His Honor here has clearly not been swayed by your money, and it would be only appropriate for you to lay on a feast in the licensed quarter to provide us all with a day's entertainment."

"Uncle Two," said Huang the Fourth, "in view of your efforts, it goes without saying that your humble servant will host a party, and I'll have my father-in-law buy a present and come to kowtow to you in gratitude. There is no reason for me to deceive you, but on account of this affair of the two of them, father and son, I have been running around, day and night, high and low, without being able to find any way out of their predicament. If His Honor will not take pity on them, I will be at my wit's end."

"Don't be silly," said Ying Po-chüeh. "Since you embrace his daughter as your wife, if you were not really concerned about him, who would be?"

"My wife does nothing but cry at home," said Huang the Fourth. "Even if my father-in-law had been able to hide out somewhere, there would have been no one at home to deliver food to him."

At this juncture, Hsi-men Ch'ing, having allowed himself to be persuaded by Ying Po-chüeh, agreed to accept the promissory note for a hundred taels but told Huang the Fourth to take back his additional gifts.

"Venerable sir," said Huang the Fourth, "you don't seem to realize what a momentous matter this is, that you should quibble so about it."

Upon saying which, he started to go outside.

"Come over here," said Ying Po-chüeh. "Let me have a word with you. When do you need this letter by?"

"Life and death are hanging in the balance at this moment," said Huang the Fourth. "If His Honor will deign to produce a letter today, and depute someone to deliver it, I'll send my son to accompany him first thing in the morning."

He then proceeded to implore him again and again, saying, "Which of your honorable servants do you intend to send, so I can have a chance to get together with him?"

"I'll write the letter for you right away," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He then called over Tai-an and told him, "You go to deliver it tomorrow, along with Young Master Huang."

When Huang the Fourth saw Tai-an, he said goodbye to Hsi-men Ch'ing and went out the door. When he got to the front gate, he asked Tai-an for the return of the bag in which he had brought the silver. Tai-an went back to the master suite in the rear compound, where he found Yüeh-niang, together with Yü-hsiao and Hsiao-yü, engaged in tailoring some clothes.

When she saw Tai-an standing there waiting for the bag, Yü-hsiao said, "We're busy and don't have the leisure to empty it right now. You might as well have him come back for it tomorrow."

"Huang the Fourth is anxiously waiting for it right now," said Tai-an. "Tomorrow morning he has to get up early and go to Tung-ch'ang prefecture, so he can't come back then. Why don't you just empty it for him?"

"You had better go get it for him," said Yüeh-niang, "rather than keeping him waiting."

"The silver is still lying where we left it on the surface of the bed, isn't it?" said Yü-hsiao.

Going into the inner room she proceeded to dump the silver out of the bag onto the bed, after which, she brought the bag out with her, saying, "You crazy jailbird! Did you think someone had eaten this bag of his, that you should be as persistent as a leech in sucking it out of us?"

"If someone had not wanted it," said Tai-an, "what reason would I have had to come back to the rear compound for it?"

Thereupon, he took it out with him, and, when he got as far as the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds, gave it a shake, when what should fall out but a mushroom-shaped lump of silver, worth about three taels. It so happens that the paper packet in which it was wrapped had broken when Yü-hsiao dumped the silver carelessly out in her fit of pique, so that this lump had fallen out and remained in the bottom of the bag.

"What a stroke of luck," said Tai-an to himself. "I've managed to pick up something for nothing."

Thereupon, tucking it into his sleeve, he went out to the front compound, where he turned the bag over to Huang the Fourth and arranged to set out with him first thing in the morning.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to his studio, where he proceeded right away to instruct Licentiate Wen to compose the letter and turn it over to Tai-an. But no more of this.

Having noticed that outside the door:

Fluttering and swirling,
the snow was coming down just like:

Windblown willow catkins,¹⁵ or

Wildly dancing pear blossoms,

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered the opening of a jug of high-quality Ma-ku wine and told Ch'un-hung to strain it through a cheesecloth sieve and serve it. Meanwhile, Cheng Ch'un was standing to one side, strumming his psaltery and singing in a low voice. Hsi-men Ch'ing told him to sing the song suite that begins with the words:

Beneath the willows the breeze is gentle.¹⁶

As he was singing, whom should they see but Ch'in-t'ung, who came in and said, "Uncle Han Tao-kuo asked me to show you this note."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had read it, he said, "You deliver it to the residence of Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i outside the city gate and get him to speak up on his behalf. Ask him to go tomorrow and speak to Attendant Wang on the staff of the Prince of Yün about it, in order to have Han Tao-kuo's name removed from the roster of those whose corvée labor is mandated."

"It's late today," said Ch'in-t'ung. "I'll go early tomorrow morning."

"That will be all right," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Not long afterwards, Lai-an came in bearing a square box that contained eight bowls of delicacies. These included one bowl of braised yams with chicken, one bowl of minced pork with leeks, one bowl of yams with pork meatballs, one bowl of slow-boiled sheep's head, one bowl of roast pork, one bowl of soup flavored with tripe and lungs, one bowl of broth flavored with blood and intestines, one bowl of beef tripe, and one bowl of quick-fried pork kidneys, as well as two large plates of steamed pastries with rose-flavored stuffings, made of dough kneaded with hot water, and basted with rendered goose fat. When the four of them, including Ch'en Ching-chi, had eaten their fill, Hsi-men Ch'ing told Wang Ching to take a tray with two bowls of delicacies and a plate of pastry and give them to Cheng Ch'un to eat. He also awarded him two large goblets of wine.

Cheng Ch'un knelt down and said, "I can't drink the wine."

"My good child!" said Ying Po-chüeh, "It's ice-cold outside. How can you refuse it when it's awarded to you by your master? How is it that your elder brother drinks what he is provided?"

"My elder brother may drink wine," said Cheng Ch'un, "but I don't drink it."

"Just drink one goblet," said Ying Po-chüeh, "and I'll get Wang Ching to drink the other one for you."

"Master Two," said Wang Ching, "I can't drink it either."

"My child," insisted Ying Po-chüeh, "just drink some of it in his stead. It's not as though you'd be doing him a big favor, or anything like that. It has always been true that:

When an elder bestows something, a junior does not presume to refuse it."¹⁷

Standing up, he then went on to say, "No matter what happens, I'm going to see to it that you drink this cup."

Wang Ching, while holding his nose with one hand, managed to drink it off in one gulp.

"You crazy dog!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If the young good-for-nothing doesn't drink, why should you force him to do so? There's still half a cup left over. Let Ch'un-hung drink it for him, after which he can clap his hands to keep time and sing some southern songs for us."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then went on to say, "Let's play a game of forfeits with Licentiate Wen. Whenever, in the course of the game, anyone has to pay a forfeit by drinking a cup of wine, he can sing to accompany it. That should make it more interesting."

Thereupon, he directed Wang Ching to fetch the dicebox and suggested that Licentiate Wen should start the game off.

"How could your pupil be so presumptuous?" said Licentiate Wen. "It would be more appropriate for the venerable Master Ying to do so."

He then went on to say, "May I enquire, venerable sir, what is your courtesy name?"

"My courtesy name is Nan-p'o, or Southern Slope," replied Ying Pochüeh.

"Venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, with tongue in cheek, "let me explain it to you. His wife takes on such a large number of customers that, at night, when it is time to empty the commode, there is so much shit in it that he is embarrassed to empty it anywhere close by and has a maidservant lug it all the way to the southern edge of the city and dump it underneath the wall of the district granary. That is the origin of his courtesy name, Nan-p'o, or Southern Slop."

Licentiate Wen laughed, saying, "That is a different character pronounced p'o, which is composed of the water radical on the left and the character fa, or 'to transmit,' on the right. The p'o character he means is composed of the earth radical on the left and the character p'i, or 'skin,' on the right."

"Venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you've deciphered it correctly. His wife is besieged by skinheads all day long."

"How can you bring yourself to say such a thing?" laughed Licentiate Wen.

"You may not be aware of it, sir," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but he has forever been adept at offending other people."

"It has always been true," opined Licentiate Wen, "that:

Language which is not off-color fails to amuse."

"Venerable sir," said Ying Po-chüeh, "you're interrupting our game of forfeits. What's the point of arguing with him? He's forever given to:

Hurting other people with his shitty mouth,¹⁸ so why pay any attention? There's no need to make excuses for him."

"Well then," said Licentiate Wen, "whatever number comes up when you throw the die, you must quote a line, whether it be from a poem, a lyric, a song, or a rhapsody, in which the word 'snow' occurs in the position corresponding to the number you have thrown. If you come up with an appropriate quote, you must drink a small cup of wine. If you fail to come up with one, you must drink a large cup of wine."

Thereupon, Licentiate Wen threw a one-spot and said, "I've got a line:

Snow has melted off the water birds for some time now."¹⁹

He then passed the dicebox to Ying Po-chüeh, who threw a five-spot.

Ying Po-chüeh, after pondering for what seemed like half a day and coming up blank, said, "I can't think of anything for the life of me."

After a further interval, he said, "I've finally managed to dredge something up:

Snow-clad plum blossoms²⁰ in snow are blooming.²¹

How will that do?"

"Venerable sir," said Licentiate Wen, "you've committed an error by introducing the word 'snow' twice. There's a redundant occurrence of the word 'snow' at the head of your line."

"The initial instance refers only to light snow," explained Ying Po-chüeh, "whereas the second instance denotes a heavy snow."

"You dog!" Hsi-men Ch'ing exclaimed. "All you ever do is talk nonsense."

He then told Wang Ching to pour him a large goblet of wine, while Ch'un-hung, clapping his hands to keep time, sang a southern song to the tune "Stopping the Horse to Listen":

On this cold night, needing some tea,
I plod toward the village ahead in search of an inn.
This snow lightly sprinkles the monks' quarters,
While densely bespattering the sing-song houses,²²
And distantly delaying the homebound watercraft.
Along the riverbank people seize the chance to admire the plum blossoms;
Within their courtyards they enjoy the scene while burning silver candles.
As far as the eye can see,²³
As far as the eye can see,
Like the willow catkins at the Pa River Bridge,²⁴
It fills the sky as it flutters down.²⁵

Ying Po-chüeh was about to take up his forfeit of wine to drink when whom should they see but Lai-an, who came in from the rear compound carrying several saucers of snacks for them to eat. These included a saucer of stuffed pastries, a saucer of cream puff pastries, a saucer of baked chestnuts, a saucer of sun-dried dates, a saucer of hazelnut kernels, a saucer of melon seeds, a saucer of snow pears, a saucer of apples, a saucer of dried caltrops, a saucer of water chestnuts, a saucer of butterfat "abalone shell" sweets, and a saucer of black spherical dumplings wrapped in orange leaves. When Ying Po-chüeh picked one of these up and smelled it, he found that it exuded a pungent fragrance, and when he put it in his mouth, it tasted like a mixture of malt sugar and honey, being fine-textured, sweet, and delicious, but he couldn't identify it.

"Why don't you take a guess?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"They must be sugared torreya nuts?" Ying Po-chüeh ventured.

"Sugared torreya nuts don't taste nearly as good as that," declared Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I would have said they were sugared plum bonbons," said Ying Po-chüeh, "were it not that they have kernels."

"You dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Come over here and let me tell you. You wouldn't arrive at the right answer even in your wildest dreams. These were brought to me the other day by one of my employees on the boat from Hang-chou. They are called 'coated plums.' They consist of red bayberries, covered with a paste of distilled medicinal spices and honey, with an outer coating of peppermint, and wrapped in orange leaves. That's why they have such a pleasing flavor. If you let one dissolve in your mouth first thing in the morning every day, it will engender saliva, strengthen the lungs, eliminate bad breath, reduce phlegm, relieve hangovers, and control the appetite. They are much superior to sugared plum bonbons."

"If you hadn't told me," said Ying Po-chüeh, "how could I have known?"

He then turned to Licentiate Wen and said, "Venerable sir, let's each have another one, shall we?"

After which, he said to Wang Ching, "Fetch a sheet of paper, so I can wrap up two of them to take home for my wife."

He also picked up one of the "abalone shell" sweets and said to Cheng Ch'un, "Were these 'abalone shell' sweets really prepared personally by your sister Ai-yüeh?"

Cheng Ch'un knelt down and said, "You don't mean to suggest that I would dare tell a lie do you? I don't know how much care my sister Ai-yüeh devoted to preparing these few samples in order to show her filial respect for His Honor."

"Thanks to her skill," said Ying Po-chüeh, "she's twisted each of their surfaces into the spiral shape of a snail shell, and made two kinds, one pink, and one white."

"When I see these things," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I can't help feeling sore at heart. The late Sixth Lady was the only member of my household that could make these sweets, and now that she's dead there's no one left who knows how to make them."

"Did I not say earlier," remarked Ying Po-chüeh, "that I have no cause for regret? Having lost one daughter who was adept at making these 'abalone shell' sweets in order to show her filial respect for me, another daughter who knows how to make them has turned up. You're amazingly gifted at finding such people, and they all turn out to be real stunners, to boot."

This caused Hsi-men Ch'ing to:

Laugh until the slits of his eyes disappeared, and he went after Ying Po-chüeh and gave him a playful slap, saying, "You Dog! All you ever do is talk nonsense."

"You two venerable gentlemen," remarked Licentiate Wen, "are certainly on as intimate terms as you can get."

"Venerable sir," said Ying Po-chüeh, "you may not know it, but he's just like a member of your humble nephew's family."

"In fact," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've been a regular customer of his establishment for twenty years."

When Ch'en Ching-chi saw that the two of them were getting increasingly indecent with each other, he got up and went away, while Licentiate Wen merely covered his mouth with his hand and laughed.

Before long, Ying Po-chüeh finished off the large goblet of wine, and it was Hsi-men Ch'ing's turn to throw the dice.

Thereupon, when his throw ended up with seven spots, after pondering for what seemed like half a day, he said, "I've come up with a quote from a song to the tune 'A Girdle of Fragrant Silk,'" and proceeded to sing it:

Spring is taking flight;
Pear blossoms are like snow.²⁶

"You've committed an error," said Ying Po-chüeh. "The word 'snow' is in the ninth position rather than the seventh. You'll have to drink a large goblet of wine."

Thereupon, he filled a chased silver goblet to overflowing and placed it in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing, telling Ch'un-hung to sing, and challenging him by asking, "My child:

If you saw that date pit in your stomach to pieces,
How many pieces can you ever hope to come up with?"²⁷

Ch'un-hung responded by clapping his hands to keep time and singing to the same tune:

On all sides dark clouds are hovering,
When I look around me, the rivers and mountains stretch to the horizon.
This snow is as light as willow catkins,²⁸
As fine as goose down,
And whiter than plum blossoms.
The twisting paths on the hillside become even muddier;
The insipid wine in the villages becomes more costly.
Heavenly flowers flutter down in profusion,
Heavenly flowers flutter down in profusion.
The moats are leveled, the ditches are full;
It is enough to make one sigh in amazement.²⁹

As they were enjoying their drinking bout, evening arrived, and candles were lighted.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished drinking his penalty cup, Ying Pochüeh said, "Since your son-in-law is no longer here, it is the turn of the venerable gentleman Licentiate Wen to finish the game."

Licentiate Wen, accordingly, took up the dicebox and threw a one-spot. After thinking for a while, he noticed that there was a pair of framed hanging scrolls on the wall of the studio, on which a couplet was inscribed in gold-flecked characters, that read:

Wind ruffles the flaccid willows beside the level bridge at eventide;
Snow sprinkles the cold plum blossoms in the small court at springtime.³⁰

So he quoted the second line of the couplet.

"That doesn't count. That doesn't count," objected Ying Po-chüeh. "It's not something you came up with out of your own mind. You'll have to drink a large goblet of wine."

Ch'un-hung, accordingly, proceeded to fill the goblet for him. Licentiate Wen:

Could not handle the effects of the drink, but found himself dozing off on his chair, and asked to be excused. Ying Pochüeh was unable to persuade him to stay.

"That's enough. That's enough," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The venerable gentleman is a man of culture and is not accustomed to carousing."

He then turned to Hua-t'ung and said, "You take good care of Master Wen, and escort him across the street to get some rest."

This was just the signal Licentiate Wen had been waiting for, and he said goodbye and departed.

"It seems that Wen Pi-ku is not up to it today," opined Ying Po-chüeh. "How much wine did he have, after all, before getting drunk like that?"

Thereupon, after drinking together for some time more, Ying Po-chüeh got up to go, saying, "It's dark underfoot, and I've had enough to drink."

He then went on to say, "Brother, be sure to have Tai-an deliver that letter on his behalf first thing tomorrow morning."

"Weren't you aware of it?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've already given him the letter and told him to deliver it tomorrow morning."

When Ying Po-chüeh lifted aside the portiere and saw that the sky was dark and the ground was slippery, he asked for a lantern and set off together with Cheng Ch'un. Hsi-men Ch'ing gave Cheng Ch'un five mace of silver for himself and also put a canister of "coated plums" in the box that he had brought with him, for him to take back and present to his elder sister Cheng Ai-yüeh.

As they were on their way out the door, Hsi-men Ch'ing joked with Ying Po-chüeh, saying, "See that you two brethren take good care of each other."

"You're wasting your breath," responded Ying Po-chüeh.

“When a father and son hike together,

It’s a case of each man for himself.”³¹

I might just as well go now and have a word with that little whore, Cheng Aiyüeh.”

As he finished speaking, Ch’in-t’ung escorted them out the gate.

Hsi-men Ch’ing, having watched while the utensils were cleared away, leaned for support on Lai-an, who held a lantern for him as they went through the postern gate. As they passed by the door of P’an Chin-lien’s quarters, he saw that the side gate was closed and silently made his way past it to the gate of Li P’ing-erh’s quarters, where he proceeded to rap gently at the door. Hsiu-ch’un opened the door to let him in, and Lai-an then went back out of the garden.

When Hsi-men Ch’ing entered the parlor, he saw Li P’ing-erh’s portrait and asked if the daily offering of soup and rice had been presented before it, or not.

Ju-i then came out and replied to his question, saying, “The maidservants and I just finished presenting it.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing then went into the bedroom and sat down on a chair, while Ying-ch’un served him with tea, after which, he asked her to help him undress. Ju-i, realizing that he intended to spend the night there, hastily proceeded to spread out the bedding and heat the quilt by inserting a hot-water bottle until it was good and warm, whereupon, she helped him into bed. Hsiu-ch’un locked the postern gate, and the three of them then laid out their bedding on wooden benches in the parlor and prepared to go to sleep.

When Hsi-men Ch’ing called for another serving of tea, the two maidservants, who understood the state of affairs, encouraged the wet nurse to go inside and sleep with him. The woman, accordingly, took off her clothes and burrowed her way under his quilt. Hsi-men Ch’ing, exhilarated by the wine he had drunk, took a dose of the aphrodisiac and fastened the clasp on his member. The woman then lay faceup on the k’ang, raised her legs, and allowed him to peg away at her for all he was worth. Slamming away at her recklessly, he kept it up until:

The tip of her tongue became ice-cold, and

Her vaginal fluids began to overflow,³²

while she called out “Daddy” incessantly. In the quiet of the night the noise that they made could be heard several houses away.

When Hsi-men Ch’ing saw that the woman’s flesh was as soft as cotton wadding, he embraced her with both arms and then directed her to squat down under the quilt and suck his cock. There was nothing the woman would not debase herself to do in ministering to his pleasure.

“My child,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “it turns out that the flesh of your body is every bit as fair as that of your late mistress. When I embrace you, it feels just the way it did when I slept with her. If you try your best to cater to me, I will look after you.”

“It hardly needs saying, Father,” the woman replied, “but, how can you compare Heaven to Earth? You’ll be the death of me yet. How can I be compared to my mistress in any way? Seeing that your servant’s husband is already dead, whenever the spirit moves you, early or late, if you don’t reject me for my homeliness, all you have to do is tip me a wink, and I’ll be at your service.”

“How old are you?” Hsi-men Ch’ing went on to ask.

“Since I was born in the year of the hare,” the woman replied, “this year I’m thirty years old.”

“It turns out then,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “that you’re a year younger than I am.”

He was impressed by the fact that she was both glib with her tongue and fond of the pillow-top game of breeze and moonlight.

The next morning, when it was time to get up, the woman got out of bed first in order to minister to him by fetching his shoes and socks, and helping with his morning ablutions.

Catering to him with the utmost assiduity, she succeeded in putting Ying-ch’un and Hsiu-ch’un in the shade.

She also made a request of Hsi-men Ch’ing, saying, “I’d like to have a piece of pale green pongee to make into a jacket so that I can wear mourning for my mistress.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing agreed to everything she asked, sending a servant to get three lengths of pale green pongee from the shop, and saying, “Each of the three of you can make a mourning garment for yourselves.”

As a result of this night together, having had two or three encounters with her, Hsi-men Ch’ing’s heart was moved, and, behind Yüeh-niang’s back, he began to supply her with silver, clothing, and jewelry, in fact, there was nothing he refused her.

The next day, when P’an Chin-lien learned that Hsi-men Ch’ing had spent the night in Li P’ing-erh’s quarters sleeping with the wet nurse, Ju-i, she went straight to the rear compound and said to Yüeh-niang, “Elder Sister, you’d better have something to say to that lousy shameless good-for-nothing of ours. Yesterday, he made his way surreptitiously into her quarters next door and spent the night with that woman, the wet nurse. He is just like someone whose:

Hungry eyes have alighted on a melon skin.

What kind of a good-for-nothing is he, to pick up whatever comes his way, no matter whether it be good or bad:

Neither light nor dark?”³³

In the future, if she should produce a child, whose would it be? She’ll be just like Lai-wang’s wife was:

Assuming privileges above her station.

What kind of a spectacle would that create?”

“All you seem bent on doing,” said Yüeh-niang, “is to get me to do the dirty work of accusing him of having an affair with the servant woman of his deceased lady, while you play the role of an innocent bystander behind my back. Do you think you can simply:

Put a water crock over my head?

What sort of a fool do you take me for? If you want to take him to task, go ahead and do it. I'm not going to get myself involved in your idle undertakings."

When Chin-lien heard Yüeh-niang's response, she did not have another word to say, but simply went back to her quarters.

Hsi-men Ch'ing got up early that morning and, seeing that the weather was clear, proceeded to dispatch Tai-an on his errand to deliver the letter to Secretary Ch'ien Lung-yeh's office. After he had gone to the yamen and returned home, P'ing-an came inside and reported that the messenger from Chai Ch'ien's place had come back to pick up his reply.

After giving him the letter, Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to ask, "How come you didn't come back to pick it up yesterday?"

"Your humble servant," the messenger replied, "had to deliver another letter to His Honor Hou Meng, the grand coordinator of Shantung province, and was held up for two days."

When he finished speaking, he took the letter and went out the gate.

After eating a meal, Hsi-men Ch'ing went over to the house across the street to supervise the weighing out of the silver, the packing up, and the writing out of the statement of account, so that on the twenty-fourth he could burn propitiatory paper money and send off the managers, Han Tao-kuo, Ts'ui Pen, and Lai-pao, along with the young men, Jung Hai and Hu Hsiu, the five of them, on their expedition to the South. He also saw to the writing of a letter to be delivered by them to Miao Ch'ing, thanking him for his lavish presents.

By the twenty-fifth or twenty-sixth day of the month, Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished paying the personal visits to relatives and friends to thank them for their condolences during the funerary rites for Li P'ing-erh.

One morning, as he was sitting in the master suite after eating his breakfast, Yüeh-niang said to him, "The first day of the coming month is the birthday of our kinsman Ch'iao Hung's daughter Chang-chieh. We really ought to buy something in the way of a gift and have it sent over there. As the saying goes:

A betrothal, once made, should not be altered.

We ought not to cease extending these courtesies merely because our son is dead."

"Of course we should send something," agreed Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Thereupon, he told Lai-hsing to buy two roast geese, a set of pig's trotters, four fresh chickens, two smoked ducks, a platter of birthday noodles, an outfit of figured satin clothing, two gold lamé handkerchiefs, and a box of costume jewelry. When this had been done, he wrote a note to accompany them and had Wang Ching deliver them.

When he had finished taking care of this, Hsi-men Ch'ing went out to the garden in the front compound and sat down in his studio in the Hidden Spring Grotto. Who should appear at this juncture but Tai-an, who had come back after delivering the letter to report on his errand.

"His Honor Ch'ien Lung-yeh," he said, "on seeing your note, immediately wrote a letter and sent one of his functionaries to accompany me and Huang the Fourth's son to deliver it to Assistant Commissioner Lei Ch'i-yüan at the office of the Shantung Military Defense Circuit in Tung-ch'ang prefecture. His Honor, in turn, dispatched an order requesting Prefectural Judge T'ung to forward to him the documents in the case, along with the defendants, so that he could conduct a new hearing of the case. As a result, Sun Ch'ing, as well as his son Sun Wen-hsiang, have been exonerated. The latter has been assessed the sum of ten taels of silver to pay for the burial expenses of the deceased and has only been charged with the crime of manslaughter, for which the penalty of seventy strokes with the heavy bamboo is redeemable for a cash payment. I then had to return to the customs house in order to report back to His Honor Ch'ien Lung-yeh, and obtain a reply from him, before I could come home."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw how competently Tai-an had performed his task, he was delighted. When he opened the reply, he found that Assistant Commissioner Lei Ch'i-yüan's note in reply to Ch'ien Lung-yeh was also included, and read as follows:

Your behest has already been fully complied with. In view of the fact that Feng the Second had previously beaten his son, and that, moreover, both his son and Sun Wen-hsiang had sustained injuries as a result of their affray, and that the ensuing death of his son took place after the period of responsibility for the crime had already expired, to sentence Sun Wen-hsiang to the death penalty would hardly be equitable. It has therefore been adjudged that the defendant shall be assessed the sum of ten taels of silver to compensate Feng the Second for his burial expenses, and the appropriate measures have already been carried out.

Respectfully indited in reply.

Your devoted fellow graduate Lei Ch'i-yüan humbly salutes you.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished reading this document he was very pleased and went on to ask, "Where is Huang the Fourth's father-in-law now?"

"Upon being released, they have both gone home," replied Tai-an. "Tomorrow, he will come with Huang the Fourth in order to kowtow in gratitude to you. Huang the Fourth's father-in-law also gave me a tael of silver."

"You can keep it to buy shoes for yourself," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Upon this, Tai-an kowtowed and went out.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then sprawled out on the k'ang frame and went to sleep, while Wang Ching lit some incense in a small burner on the table and then quietly made his way out of the room.

After some time, Hsi-men Ch'ing suddenly heard the sound of someone lifting aside the portiere, when whom should he see but Li P'ing-erh abruptly entering the room. She was dressed in a violet blouse over a white damask skirt:

Her raven locks were carelessly coiled, and her complexion was sallow.

Advancing up to the bed, she cried out, "My Brother, you're asleep here, are you? I've come to pay you a visit. That wretch has lodged a formal complaint against me, as a result of which I have been locked up in prison, where:

I am dripping with blood,³⁴ befouled by my own filth, and have been suffering torments all this time. But the other day, as a result of the appeal you lodged with the court on my behalf, the charges against me have been reduced by three degrees. That wretch, however, adamantly refuses to accept this verdict and is angrily determined to file a complaint against you, and have you taken into custody. I wouldn't have come to tell you about this, but I feared that, sooner or later, you might find yourself the unexpected victim of his venomous skullduggery. Right now, I am going to look for a place of refuge for myself. You had better be on your guard. If you are not obliged to, try to avoid going out drinking at night, and, wherever you do go, come home early. Whatever happens, keep my words firmly in mind, and don't forget them."

When she had finished speaking, the two of them embraced each other and then burst out crying.

"Sister," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Tell me where it is that you are going."

But, suddenly, she broke away from him with a jerk, revealing it to be but:

A dream of the Southern Branch.³⁵

When Hsi-men Ch'ing awoke from his dream, he found himself to be weeping. Upon seeing the shadows of the blind that pervaded the studio, he realized that it was already noon. When he recollected the dream, he couldn't help feeling sorely distressed at heart. Truly:

When the blossoms fall and are buried in the earth their fragrance is not perceptible;

The mirror is void of the image of the phoenix mate³⁶ when he first awakes from his dream.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The dwindling snow, having just cleared, illuminates the paper window;
The embers in the brazier have burnt out,
and cold penetrates the couch.
The lovers, having chanced to encounter each other in a lovelorn dream;
Wind wafts the fragrance of plum blossoms inside the drapery of the bed.³⁷

Who could have anticipated that, in response to the presents that had been sent to the Ch'iao household that morning, Ch'iao Hung's wife sent Ch'iao T'ung to deliver a card inviting Yüeh-niang and her sister wives to a party? When the page boy told them that Hsi-men Ch'ing was asleep in his studio, no one dared to disturb him, and Yüeh-niang merely decided to entertain Ch'iao T'ung, for the time being, in the rear compound.

"Give me that card," said P'an Chin-lien. "Let me go ask him what to do about it."

Thereupon, she abruptly proceeded out to his studio. She was wearing a blouse of jet satin that opened down the middle, had a diapered border with purpled gold lamé edging, and was adorned with a row of five gold buttons decorated with a three rivers pattern. Underneath this she wore an overskirt of light silk, above an underskirt of Lu-chou silk with a gold-spangled border, fastened in front with a girdle of communion,³⁸ braided out of mermaid silk, and displaying the motif of a pair of amorous water birds. On her feet, the upturned points of her golden lotuses peeked out beneath her red brocade ankle leggings. On her head, her cloudy locks were enclosed in a chignon. Altogether, she was made up as if:

Li P'ing-erh Describes Her Intimate Feelings in a Dream

Modeled in plaster, carved of jade, while from her ears there dangled a pair of pendant onyx earrings.

Pushing open the door of his studio and finding Hsi-men Ch'ing sprawled on the k'ang frame, she proceeded to park her posterior on a chair, saying, "My child, what are you doing here, talking to yourself all by your lonesome? No wonder you were nowhere to be seen. It turns out you've been here all the time, catching up on your sleep."

As she spoke, she cracked melon seeds with her teeth.

She then went on to ask Hsi-men Ch'ing, "How come you've been rubbing your eyes until they're all red?"

"I must have fallen asleep on my face," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Actually," said the woman, "it looks more as if you've been crying."

"You crazy slave!" protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Why should I have been crying for no good reason?"

"It seems more likely to me," said Chin-lien, "that you've happened to remember something about someone who is uppermost in your mind."

"Don't talk such nonsense," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Who could there be who is either uppermost or undermost in my mind?"

"Li P'ing-erh is uppermost in your mind," said Chin-lien, "and her wet nurse is undermost in your mind, while the rest of us are completely outside your mind, not even worth taking into account."

"You crazy little whore!" protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You're indulging once again in your:
Ridiculous blatherskite."

He then went on to inquire, "What I say to you now is serious. On that earlier occasion, when you were dressing your sister Li in her burial clothes, what kind of garments did you put on the lower part of her body?"

"Why do you ask?" responded Chin-lien.

"For no particular reason," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I just thought I'd ask."

"There must be a reason behind your asking," said Chin-lien. "On the outside, she was dressed in two outfits of satin brocade, underneath which she wore a white satin jacket and a skirt of yellow pongee, over a purple satin camisole, a petticoat of white pongee, and a pair of scarlet underdrawers."

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by nodding his head in recognition.

"Do you suppose," Chin-lien remarked, "that:

After practicing veterinary medicine for twenty years,

I would fail to diagnose the stomach ailment of an ass?

If you weren't thinking of her, why should you ask?"

"I had just seen her in a dream," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Chin-lien said:

"Dreams are produced by what is on your mind;³⁹

Sneezes are induced by a tickle in your nose.⁴⁰

Even though she's dead, you're still so preoccupied with her, it would seem that the rest of us no longer tickle your fancy. In the future, when we die, I fear, there will be no one to commemorate us. You're so preoccupied with her that your mind is in a daze."

Hsi-men Ch'ing stood up, reached out with one hand, embraced her by the neck, and gave her a kiss, saying as he did so, "You crazy little oily mouth! You've certainly got:

A sharp mouth and a sharp tongue, don't you?"

"My son," responded Chin-lien, "do you really think this old mother of yours is oblivious to the fact that:

You may be a brown cat, but you've got a black tail?"

As she spoke, she transferred the mouthful of melon seeds she had been cracking from her mouth into his. The two of them then fell to sucking each other's tongues for a while, until he became aware that:

Her sweet spittle transfused his heart,⁴¹

Her scented lips were imbued with rouge, and

The odor of orchid and musk from her body assailed his senses.

Thereupon, Hsi-men Ch'ing's:

Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused.

Pulling her onto the bed where he was sitting, he leaned against the comb-back-shaped back rest, exposed his organ, and told the woman to indulge him by "toying with the flute." The woman then actually proceeded to:

Bend low her powdered neck, and Engulf and release it with her mouth.

As she moved back and forth:

The sound of her sucking was audible.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed that her head was adorned with a gold tiger-shaped tiara, her fragrant tresses were studded all round with plum-blossom-shaped ornaments with kingfisher feather inlays, and the hair behind her temples was embellished with a profusion of pearl headgear, he could hardly contain his excitement.

Just as they were approaching their climax, they suddenly heard Lai-an, from outside the portiere, saying, "Master Ying the Second is here."

"Invite him to come in," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

This threw the woman into such consternation that she called out inarticulately, "Lai-an, you louse! Don't you let him come in until I've had a chance to get out of the way."

"He's already come in," said Lai-an, "and is waiting in the little courtyard."

"Why don't you go tell him to stay out of the way?" said the woman.

Lai-an, accordingly, went out and said to him, "Master Two, you'd better get out of the way for the time being. There's someone in the room with him."

Ying Po-chüeh then went out beside the juniper hedge, where he could contemplate the sight of the bamboos, embellished as they were with snow. Wang Ching lifted aside the portiere, and all that could be heard was a swish of her skirts as Chin-lien disappeared in a puff of smoke on her way back to the rear compound. Truly:

Concealed by the snow, the presence of the egrets is not seen until they fly;

Hidden by the willows, the existence of the parrots is not known until they speak.

Ying Po-chüeh then went inside, greeted Hsi-men Ch'ing with a bow, and sat down.

"How come you haven't been around the last few days?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I've been stuck at home, where things have been as aggravating as can be."

"What's been aggravating you?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Tell me about it."

"It's embarrassing to have to explain it," said Ying Po-chüeh. "The fact is, I'm short of money at home right now. Yesterday, that concubine of mine went and produced another child for no good reason. It's possible for a person to cope with such contingencies by daylight, but it happened during the third watch in the middle of the night. My wife is incapacitated, suffering from:

Seven pains and eight ailments, so I had to crawl out of bed, collect the necessary absorbent grass paper and bedding, check on how the mother was doing, and then go out to find the midwife. On top of everything else, Ying Pao was not at home, my elder brother having sent him out to his country estate to bring back some fodder. Not having anyone else at hand in this emergency, I had to take a lantern and go off myself to engage Midwife Teng, who lives at the mouth of the alley. By the time she came through the door, the baby was already born."

"What was the sex of the child?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"She gave birth to a baby boy," replied Ying Po-chüeh.

"You silly dog!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If she's produced a son for you, isn't that a good thing? What have you got to be annoyed about? Was it that slave of yours, Ch'un-hua, who gave birth to him?"

"It was, indeed, your sister-in-law Ch'un-hua," Ying Po-chüeh responded with a laugh.

"That lousy bitch of a leg-wagging slave!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Whoever recommended that you take her on in the first place? And now you're complaining simply because you had to go looking for the midwife."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "you don't understand the situation. During these cold winter months, our situation is not to be compared with that of well-to-do households like yours. You not only have plenty of money, but also hold an official position with prospects of future advancement, so that, if a son is born to you, it is just like:

Adding a flower to a piece of brocade.⁴²

No wonder you are happy. Whereas, right now, I've got one shadow too many as it is. And I've got to provide food and clothing for that nestful of people in my household. On top of which, for the last several days, I've been driven out of my mind by matchmaking problems. Ying Pao is tied up every day with his corvée labor obligations, and my elder brother, for his part, doesn't pay any attention to my problems. Although my eldest daughter has been married off, thanks to Heaven above, as well as the assistance you rendered, Brother, as you have seen with your own eyes, my second daughter is growing up and will be twelve years old next year. Yesterday, a matchmaker came and asked for a card giving the year, month, day, and hour of her birth. I said it was early days yet and told her to hold off for the time being. It was really driving me to distraction, and then, all of a sudden, in the middle of the night, this new karmic encumbrance turned up. When one has to:

Grope one's way in the dark of night,⁴³ where can one go to convert anything into ready cash? When my wife saw the state of perturbation I was in:

For lack of any alternative option,⁴⁴

she took one of her silver stick-pins and gave it to the midwife in order to settle the matter. Tomorrow is the time for the third day lustration ceremony,⁴⁵ so everyone in the neighborhood will find out about it. When it comes time for the full-month celebration,⁴⁶ where am I going to find the wherewithal to pay for it. When the day comes, I guess I'll have to vacate the house, make myself:

As free as you please, and go off to stay at some Buddhist monastery for a few days."

"If you do make yourself scarce," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you'll only open the way for one of the monks to take your place in the warm bedding. You dog! When you get right down to it, all you ever care about is gaining petty advantages for yourself."

He continued to laugh at his expense, but Ying Po-chüeh only made a deliberate pout with his lips, and remained silent.

"My son," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "don't be so annoyed. How much silver do you need? If you just tell me, I'll take care of it for you."

"Who knows how much it will take?" said Ying Po-chüeh.

"You'll need enough to take care of things satisfactorily," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "And if you find yourself short in the midst of things, you can always go pawn some of your clothes, after all."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "if you deign to help me out, twenty taels of silver ought to suffice. I'll write a promissory note for you on the spot. I'm putting you to so much trouble and expense that I've found it difficult to broach the subject. I wouldn't presume to quibble over the amount. Whatever you decide, Brother, will be fine by me."

Hsi-men Ch'ing refused to accept his promissory note, saying, "Don't talk such rot! Among friends, who needs a promissory note?"

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Lai-an, who came in with a serving of tea.

"Put down those teacups," said Hsi-men Ch'ing to the servant, "and go tell Wang Ching to come here."

Before long, Wang Ching came in, and Hsi-men Ch'ing said to him, "You go back to the rear compound and tell the First Lady to look on top of the cabinet on the rear wall of the bedstead in the inner room for the two packets of silver that were provided by His Honor the regional investigating censor Sung Ch'iao-nien on the occasion of the banquet we put on for him the other day, and bring one of them back to me.”

Wang Ching nodded his assent and was not gone for long before coming back with the silver.

Hsi-men Ch'ing handed it over to Ying Po-chüeh, saying, “This packet contains fifty taels of silver. You can take all of it and use whatever you need, thus sparing me the trouble of opening it, since:

The original seals have not been tampered with.⁴⁷

You can open it and see for yourself, if you want.”

“It’s too much,” said Ying Po-chüeh.

“If it’s more than you need at the moment,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “you can keep the remainder on hand. At present, seeing that your second daughter has reached marriageable age, you can use it to pay for the making of some shoes, footbindings, and clothing for her, so that she’ll appear to advantage during the full-month celebration.”

“Brother, what you say makes sense,” said Ying Po-chüeh.

When he opened the packet of silver and saw that it did, indeed, contain the joint contributions made by the officials of the Two Provincial Offices and the eight prefectures, in ingots of three taels apiece of the highest grade of incised silver stamped with the mark of the Sung-chiang mint, he was utterly delighted.

Hastily bowing in thanks, he said, “Who could match Brother’s magnanimous feelings? Are you really unwilling to accept my promissory note?”

“You silly child!” said Hsi-men Ch'ing. “Why should I treat you the way I would anyone else? After all, I’m in the position of your parent. Were that not the case, would you presume to come pester me over every problem that comes up? This child is not even your own child but may be considered the product of our joint efforts. The truth of the matter is that at the time of the full-month ceremony, if you should make that slave Ch’un-hua of yours available to serve me for a while in lieu of interest, it would not be asking too much of you.”

“Your sister-in-law Ch’un-hua, these last few days,” responded Ying Pochüeh, “has become just as emaciated by the demands made upon her as your wife.”

We will say no more at this point about the banter between the two of them in the studio.

Ying Po-chüeh then went on to ask, “What has happened with regard to that predicament of Huang the Fourth’s father-in-law?”

Hsi-men Ch'ing, in giving him a complete account of Tai-an’s mission, said, “Upon receiving Ch’ien Lung-yeh’s letter, Assistant Commissioner Lei Ch’i-yüan dispatched an order requiring that the defendants in the case be sent back to his jurisdiction so that he could conduct a new hearing of the case, as a result of which he exonerated both Sun Wen-hsiang and his father Sun Ch’ing. Sun Wen-hsiang has been assessed the sum of ten taels of silver to cover the burial expenses of the deceased and has only been charged with the offense of manslaughter, for which the penalty of seventy strokes with the heavy bamboo is redeemable for a cash payment. Thus the matter has been brought to a successful conclusion.”

“What a stroke of luck for him!” exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. “If he had lit a lantern to look for help, where else could he have found anyone capable of doing him such a favor? If you persist in refusing to accept what he is offering you, that’s up to you; but though you may not set much store by it yourself, it would be a good idea to keep it in order to compensate Ch’ien Lung-yeh. Don’t let him off the hook. Whatever happens, you should get him to lay on a lavish drinking party somewhere in the licensed quarter and invite us to partake thereof. If you don’t want to suggest it to him, I’ll be happy to do so. You’ve prevented his brother-in-law from being charged with a capital offense, after all, which is not an inconsequential matter.”

To resume our story, while they were talking in the studio, after Yüeh-niang in the master suite had located the silver and given it to Wang Ching to deliver, whom should she see but Meng Yü-lou, who came into the room and said that her younger brother, Meng Jui, was at her brother-in-law Han Ming-ch’uan’s place.

“Right now,” she went on to say, “he is planning to set out before long on an expedition to buy miscellaneous merchandise in Szechwan and the Hu-Kuang region and has come today to say goodbye to Father. He’s sitting in my quarters. Wherever Father happens to be, Sister, could you send a page boy to let him know about it?”

He’s in his studio in the garden, visiting with Ying Po-chüeh,” said Yüeh-niang.

“As to inviting Father to come inside,” she went on to say, “a while ago, Sister P’an the Sixth did a fine job on her mission of inviting him back here. Ch’iao T’ung had delivered an invitation card and was waiting for a chance to speak to Father in order to get a verbal reply, so that we would know whether or not to prepare to go out tomorrow. I kept him here in the expectation of getting a response and served him with tea, but despite:

Waiting for long periods as well as short,

Father never showed up, and when Ch’iao T’ung could endure it no longer, he got up and left. After what seemed like half a day, lo and behold, Sister Six came back from the front compound, and when I asked her if she had fulfilled her mission or not, she was at a loss for words, merely saying, ‘Oops! I completely forgot to mention it to him, and, in a little while, Ying the Second came in and I had to leave. Who has the patience to:

Stick around and wait forever,⁴⁸

just for the chance to say a word to him? The card is still in my sleeve.’ This caused me to say to her:

‘When biting the stalk of a crisp vegetable, start with the root end.

Luckily it wasn’t a matter of critical importance, but you’ve kept everybody waiting. You’re just a good-for-nothing creature who lacks the tail to follow up with.’ Who knows what she was up to out there that kept her from coming back inside for half a day, only to report that she hadn't remembered to say what she went for? After I had given her a piece of my mind, she took herself off to the front compound."

A little while later, Lai-an came in, and Yüeh-niang sent him to summon Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Tell him that Brother-in-law Meng the Second is here."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then got up, but told Ying Po-chüeh to stay where he was, saying, "Don't you go anywhere. I'll be right back."

When he arrived in the rear compound, Yüeh-niang first told him that Ch'iao Hung's household had sent them an invitation.

"On the day in question," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "You ought to go by yourself. While we are still in mourning, it would hardly be appropriate for the whole family to go."

"Brother-in-law Meng the Second has come to say goodbye to you," said Yüeh-niang. "He's planning to set out in the next day or two on an expedition to Szechwan and the Hu-Kuang region. He's sitting in his sister's quarters over there waiting to see you."

She then went on to ask, "A while ago, when you asked for that packet of silver, who did you want to give it to?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing explained the whole situation to her, saying, "Last night Brother Ying the Second's concubine Ch'un-hua gave birth to a son, and he asked me to loan him a few taels of silver. He also said that his second daughter had reached marriageable age and he was feeling as hard up as could be about the situation. So I decided to help out by lending him a few taels of silver."

"He's lucky enough, at his age, to finally beget a son," said Yüeh-niang. "His wife must be very happy about it. Tomorrow, we'll have to send them some rice for making congee."

"That goes without saying," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "When the time comes for the full-month celebration, I'm not going to let that beggar off the hook, but put him to the trouble, no matter what, of issuing invitations to the lot of you to visit his home, where you can take a look at what sort of a woman Ch'un-hua is."

"In any case," laughed Yüeh-niang, "she's bound to resemble those in your own household in having a nose, and having eyes. How could she be any different?"

She then sent Lai-an to invite Brother-in-law Meng the Second to join them. It was not long before Meng Yü-lou and her younger brother came in to pay their respects. When they had done with the customary amenities, Hsi-men Ch'ing chatted with him for a while and then invited him to accompany him to his studio in the front compound, where he introduced him to Ying Po-chüeh. He also told a servant to fetch something to eat from the rear compound.

Thereupon, a table was set up, and wine and delicacies were laid out so that the three of them could have a drink together.

Hsi-men Ch'ing further instructed the servant, saying, "Fetch another wine goblet and pair of chopsticks, and go invite Master Wen from across the street to come and help keep Brother-in-law Meng the Second company."

Lai-an came back in a little while and reported, "Master Wen is not at home but has gone to visit Master Ni P'eng."

"Ask our son-in-law to join us then," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After some time, Ch'en Ching-chi came in, saluted Meng the Second with a bow, and sat down to one side.

Hsi-men Ch'ing questioned Meng Jui, saying, "Brother-in-law, when are you setting out on your expedition, and how long will you be gone?"

"I'm scheduled to set out on the second day of next month," replied Meng Jui, "but how long I'll be gone is impossible to say. I've got to go to Ching-chou to buy paper, and to Szechwan and the Hu-Kuang region to purchase incense and wax. When you get right down to it, it's likely to take no less than a year or two before I'll be able to purchase everything I need and return home. On this expedition I will take the overland route by way of Honan, Shensi, and Han-chou on the way out, and return on the water route by way of the Yangtze Gorges and Ching-chou. The round-trip will amount to seven or eight thousand li."

"How old are you, Mr. Meng?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"I'm twenty-five," replied Meng Jui.

"It's remarkable that someone as young as you are should be so familiar with the various routes on the rivers and lakes," said Ying Po-chüeh, "while people like myself have grown old in vain, sitting around at home."

Before long, a new serving of delicacies was brought in, and:

The cups and plates were duly arrayed.

Meng the Second remained drinking with them until the sun began to set in the West before he said goodbye and took his leave. Hsi-men Ch'ing saw him off and then came back to rejoin Ying Po-chüeh and drink a while longer.

Lo and behold, at this point, two coffers for burnt offerings to the dead were brought in, and Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ch'en Ching-chi to take charge of preparing them, and to ask Yüeh-niang for two outfits of Li P'ing-erh's brocade clothing, along with imitation gold and silver paper money, to put into the coffers.

He then said to Ying Po-chüeh, "Today is the date for the sixth weekly commemoration of Li P'ing-erh's death, and, rather than holding a scripture-reading ceremony, we are going to burn these two coffers for her."

"How swiftly time flies," said Ying Po-chüeh. "My sister-in-law has already been dead for a month and a half."

"The fifth day of the coming month," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is the time for the final weekly commemoration of her death. We will have to have a sutra reading for her then."

"So, on that occasion," said Ying Po-chüeh, "the recitation of a Buddhist sutra will suffice."

"My wife," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "has reminded me that, while she was still alive, after the birth of her son, she promised two of the Buddhist nuns that frequent our household that they could preside, together with some other nuns that will be engaged for the purpose, over a recitation of the Hsüeh-p'en ching, or Blood Pool Sutra, and other litanies of repentance, on her behalf."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished speaking, Ying Po-chüeh, observing that it was getting late, said, "I'd better be off, so that you can proceed with the ceremony of burning paper money for my sister-in-law.”

He then made a deep bow and said, “As the unworthy recipient of Brother’s profound generosity:

I will find it hard to forget either dead or alive.”⁴⁹

“My son,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “whether you find it hard to forget or not, you’d better not pretend to be:

Still asleep in dreamland.

When it comes time for the full-month ceremony, your whole bevy of mothers will buy presents and show up at your place.”

“What need is there for them to purchase gifts,” said Ying Po-chüeh. “If I have to kowtow to each one of them, whatever happens, I would like to invite the entire group of my sisters-in-law to condescend to visit my humble household.”

“When the day comes,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “whatever happens, I hope you will get that slave of yours, Ch’un-hua, to doll herself up, and trot her out so I can take a look at her.”

“Your sister-in-law Ch’un-hua,” responded Ying Po-chüeh, “has remarked that now she has a son, she has no further use for you.”

“That’s enough of your lies,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “When I see that slave, I’ll know what to say to her.”

Ying Po-chüeh, thereupon, nonchalantly took himself off with a laugh, while Hsi-men Ch’ing told the page boys to clear away the utensils and then went over to Li P’ing-erh’s quarters.

Ch’en Ching-chi and Tai-an had already completed the task of preparing the coffers. That day, the Temple of the Jade Emperor, the Temple of Eternal Felicity, and the Temple of Kindness Requited had all sent over effigies to be burned at the ceremony. That from the Taoist temple was an effigy of the Perfected Lord of Precious Solemnity and Manifest Accomplishment,⁵⁰ while those from the two Buddhist temples were effigies of the Great King of Transformation who sits in judgment over the Sixth Court of the Tribunal of the Underworld.⁵¹ The household of Brother-in-law Hua Tzu-yu outside the city gate sent a box of steamed dumplings and ten quires of paper money for the use of the dead, and the household of Wu K’ai did likewise.

Hsi-men Ch’ing looked on as Ying-ch’un put the offerings of soup and rice in place, with the steamed dumplings below them, and lit the incense and candles. He then sent Hsiu-ch’un back to the rear compound to invite Wu Yüeh-niang and the other ladies to join him. After Hsi-men Ch’ing had finished burning the offering of paper money to Li P’ing-erh, he had the coffers carried out and deputed Ch’en Ching-chi to supervise their incineration outside the front gate. But no more of this. Truly:

Her fragrant soul has probably not perished along with the dying ashes;

But has gone to perpetuate its old affinity in the incarnation to come.⁵²

CHENG AI-YÜEH FLAUNTS HER BEAUTY AND DISCLOSES A SECRET; TAI-AN PERSEVERES ASSIDUOUSLY IN SEEKING OUT AUNTIE WEN

Snow buries the scattered red blossoms

THE STORY GOES that after Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished the ceremony of burning paper money on Li P'ing-erh's behalf, he went to P'an Chin-lien's quarters, where he spent the night.

The next day, first, Ying Po-chüeh's household sent over a box of noodles in celebration of their birth of a son, and then, Huang the Fourth, along with his young brother-in-law, Sun Wen-hsiang, came to kowtow to Hsi-men Ch'ing, bringing with them offerings of a newly slaughtered pig, a jug of wine, two roast geese, four roast chickens, and two boxes of fruit.

Hsi-men Ch'ing repeatedly refused to accept these things, until Huang the Fourth knelt down and groveled around on his knees, saying, "Your Honor has done Sun Wen-hsiang:

The favor of saving his life.

My entire family:

Feels profoundly grateful to you.⁴

Now, we have nothing with which to express our filial respects but these few paltry gifts for Your Honor to give away to someone if you like. How can you refuse to accept them?"

After persisting in his refusal to accept the proffered gifts for what seemed like half a day, Hsi-men Ch'ing finally consented to accept only the pig and the wine, saying, "They will serve as well as anything else to send to His Honor Ch'ien Lung-yeh to thank him for his intervention on your behalf."

"In that case," said Huang the Fourth, "I will have no way of fully expressing what I only intended to be:

A token of my gratitude."

After reluctantly agreeing to take back the other proffered comestibles, he went on to ask, "When does Your Honor have any free time available? I have already consulted Uncle Ying the Second and would like to invite you to a party in the licensed quarter."

"You shouldn't pay any attention to his foolery," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It is only putting you to further expense. But the best time would be sometime during the New Year's celebrations."

At this juncture, Huang the Fourth and his young brother-in-law took their leave with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude,

while Hsi-men Ch'ing tipped the bearers that had brought the gifts and sent them on their way.

On the first day of the eleventh month, Hsi-men Ch'ing, after coming home from the office, went to attend a party hosted by the magistrate, Li Ta-t'ien, in the district yamen, while Yüeh-niang:

All by her solitary self,⁵ dressed herself in white mourning, got into a sedan chair, and went to celebrate Chang-chieh's birthday in the home of Ch'iao Hung. As a consequence, neither of them was at home.

That afternoon, Nun Hsüeh from the Lotus Blossom Nunnery, who had learned of Yüeh-niang's plan to arrange for her to engage the services of eight other nuns and come to the house on the fifth in order to preside over the final weekly commemoration of Li P'ing-erh's death, recite scriptures, and perform the litany of the Blood Pool Sutra, proceeded, while keeping Nun Wang in the dark, to buy two boxes of presents, and come to pay a call on Yüeh-niang.

Since Yüeh-niang was not at home, Li Chiao-erh and Meng Yü-lou invited her to stay for a cup of tea and said, "The First Lady is not here but has gone to the home of our kinsman Ch'iao Hung in order to celebrate their daughter Chang-chieh's birthday. You'd better stay until she comes home in order to see her. She wants to talk to you, and to pay you for the drafting of the petitions that will be needed for the observance in question."

Nun Hsüeh, consequently, continued to sit and wait.

P'an Chin-lien, meanwhile, happened to remember having been told by Yü-hsiao that Yüeh-niang had only been able to conceive after taking a fertility potion provided by Nun Hsüeh. Moreover, ever since the death of Li P'ingerh, Hsi-men Ch'ing had continued to frequent her quarters, where he had established a liaison with the wet nurse. She was afraid that if the wet nurse should produce a child, she might succeed in usurping her favored position. As a result, she took the opportunity to invite Nun Hsüeh to accompany her to her quarters in the front compound, where there was no one else about, and surreptitiously appealed to her, offering her the inducement of a tael of silver, to concoct a fertility potion for her that would enable her to conceive, and, with this end in mind, to acquire for her the afterbirth of a firstborn male child. But no more of this.

That evening, when Yüeh-niang returned home, she invited Nun Hsüeh to stay overnight, and the next day she asked Hsi-men Ch'ing for five taels of silver and gave them to her to contract for the drafting of the ceremonial petitions. Nun Hsüeh, for her part, kept Nun Wang and the abbess of the Kuanyin Nunnery in the dark, without saying a word to them about it.

On the fifth day of the month, together with the eight nuns she had engaged for the occasion, she proceeded to set up an altar in the summerhouse in the garden, post announcements on hanging scrolls at each of the doorways, preside over the recitation of the Avatamsaka Sutra,⁶ the Diamond Sutra, and the litany of the Blood Pool Sutra, the scattering of paper flowers and rice, and the recitation of the Sutra of the Names of the Thirty-five Buddhas.⁷ That evening, the ritual of distributing food in order to save the hungry ghosts with their burning mouths was performed.⁸

On this occasion, Wu K'ai's wife and Hua Tzu-yu's wife, along with the male guests Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, and Licentiate Wen, were invited to partake of the vegetarian repast. The nuns did not make an elaborate performance out of the rites, choosing merely to accompany themselves by striking the wooden fish and the hand chime as they recited the sutras.

That day, Ying Po-chüeh brought with him a servant from Huang the Fourth's household with an invitation for Hsi-men Ch'ing to attend a party at Cheng Ai-yüeh's establishment in the licensed quarter on the seventh day of the month, but when Hsi-men Ch'ing saw the invitation, he laughed and said, "I'm not free on the seventh since I have an engagement to attend a birthday party at the home of Chang Hsi-ts'un that day. But I am free tomorrow."

He then went on to ask, "Who else will be there?"

"He's not inviting anyone else," said Ying Po-chüeh, "other than myself and Brother Li the Third to keep you company. But he has gone to the trouble of engaging four girls to sing scenes from the Hsi-hsiang chi."

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw to it that Huang the Fourth's servant was given some vegetarian fare to eat and then sent him on his way.

Ying Po-chüeh then went on to ask, "That day, when Huang the Fourth came to thank you, what had he purchased in the way of presents?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, thus and so, "I didn't accept all that he brought. He kowtowed to me repeatedly, but I only consented to accept the pig and the wine. After adding to these two bolts of silk decorated with a silver pheasant motif, two bolts of capital brocade, and fifty taels of silver, I sent them off to thank Ch'ien Lung-yeh for his intervention in the case."

"It would have been more than sufficient if you had refused to accept his silver," said Ying Po-chüeh. "After all, you certainly deserved it. Those four bolts of fabric must be worth thirty taels of silver, at the very least. Where could he have hoped to obtain such a favor for a mere twenty taels of silver? You're letting him off easy. After all, you saved his father-in-law's and brother-in-law's lives."

That day, they continued to chat together until evening before breaking up.

"You'll come by again tomorrow, won't you?" Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Ying Po-chüeh.

"I understand," replied Ying Po-chüeh as he took his leave.

The eight Buddhist nuns prolonged the fuss of their ritual performance until the middle of the first watch before concluding the ceremony, burning the coffers, and going on their way.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing went off to the yamen in the morning.

To resume our story, when Nun Wang got wind of these events, she made her way to Hsi-men Ch'ing's house first thing in the morning, complained that Nun Hsüeh had usurped the privilege of putting on the ritual performance, and demanded her share of the fee.

Yüeh-niang took exception to this, saying, "Why didn't you show up yesterday? Nun Hsüeh said that you had gone to the home of that distaff relative of the imperial family, Wang the Second, to celebrate a birthday."

"That was just a trick on the part of that old whore of the Hsüeh family," said Nun Wang. "She told me that your household had changed the date and were not going to hold the scripture reading until the sixth. So she made off with the entire fee, leaving me with nothing at all."

"But, at this late date, you failed to take part in the rite," said Yüeh-niang, "and the fee for the performance and the drafting of the petitions has already been paid to her in full. Luckily, I still have a bolt of fabric on hand to compensate you with."

She then instructed Hsiao-yü, saying, "Quickly, serve up some of the vegetarian fare left over from yesterday for her to eat, and give her that bolt of blue cloth."

Nun Wang muttered to herself as she cursed, saying, “The old whore made off with a tidy amount of the Sixth Lady’s silver behind my back while negotiating for the printing of those sutras. And it was originally agreed that the two of us should share the fee for this sutra-reading rite, but you’ve made off with the whole thing for yourself.”

“Nun Hsüeh,” remarked Yüeh-niang, “claims that you received five taels of silver from the Sixth Lady as compensation for the recitation of the Blood Pool Sutra on her behalf. How is it that you have failed to recite it for her?”

“On the occasion of the fifth weekly commemoration of her death,” responded Nun Wang, “I arranged for four nuns to recite it, and they kept at it for half a month.”

“If you did recite it,” said Yüeh-niang, “why did you keep it to yourself, without mentioning it to me? If you had told me about it, I might have given you something more for your pains.”

Nun Wang did not have another word to say but sat there in embarrassed silence for a while, before going off to Nun Hsüeh’s place to have it out with her.

Gentle reader take note: black-clad Buddhist nuns of this ilk ought never to be patronized under any circumstances.

 Their faces may be like the faces of nuns,

 But their hearts are the hearts of whores.⁹ It is simply the case that:

 Their six senses are unpurified,

 Their basic natures are unclear,

 Their vows are entirely ignored,

 Their sense of shame is effaced.

 Though falsely boasting of their compassion,

 They are driven entirely by profit and lust.

 Ignoring karma and the wheel of transmigration,

 They think solely of the pleasure of the moment.

 Having inveigled the frustrated young maidens of humbler households,¹⁰

 They set their sights on the susceptible wives of prominent families.¹¹

 At their front doors they welcome benefactors and donors,

 At the back doors they dispose of their unwanted fetuses.¹²

 When not promoting illicit liaisons,

 They are devising adulterous trysts.¹³

There is a poem that testifies to this:

 At Buddhist gatherings, monks and nuns are the members of one family;¹⁴

 The wheel of the law turns unceasingly¹⁵

 at the Dragon Flower Assembly.¹⁶

 Yet creatures of this ilk are either preoccupied with procreation;¹⁷

 Or the wrongful use of metal implements in order to effect abortions.¹⁸

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch’ing returned from the yamen, before he had even finished his meal, Ying Po-chüeh showed up.

Attired in a newly blocked satin cap, an aloeswood-colored tunic, and white-soled black boots, he bowed in greeting to Hsi-men Ch’ing and said, “It’s already approaching noon, so we’d better be off. They have already sent a servant to urge us on our way more than once. We oughtn’t to make things difficult for them.”

“I think I’ll invite Licentiate Wen to go with us,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, and, turning to Wang Ching, he said, “Go across the street and ask Master Wen to join us.”

Wang Ching went off on this errand and returned before long, saying, “Master Wen is not at home but has gone out to visit a friend. Hua-t’ung has gone after him to extend the invitation.”

“We ought not to wait for him,” said Ying Po-chüeh. “These scholarly types carry on:

 As though they don’t know any better.

If he’s gone out to visit a friend, who knows when he’ll show up? We ought not to let him spoil the occasion.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing accordingly turned to Ch’in-t’ung and said, “Saddle up that sorrel horse for Master Ying the Second to ride.”

“I don’t wish to ride a horse,” said Ying Po-chüeh. “It would be a good idea to keep a low profile, without:

 Ringling bells and beating drums.

I’ll just go a step ahead of you, and you can come along at your leisure in a sedan chair.”

"What you say makes sense," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You go on ahead of me."

Ying Po-chüeh then proceeded to raise his hand in farewell and set off first, while Hsi-men Ch'ing directed Tai-an, Ch'in-t'ung, and four orderlies to get ready a closed sedan chair and prepare to accompany him.

Just as he was about to go out the door, P'ing-an suddenly came in from outside in a state of obvious agitation, holding in his hand an accordion-bound calling card, and reported, "His Honor An Ch'en of the Ministry of Works is on his way to pay you a visit and has sent a functionary ahead to deliver a calling card. His Honor is right behind him and will be here any minute."

This threw Hsi-men Ch'ing into such a state of consternation that he ordered the servants to have some food prepared and sent Lai-hsing out to purchase platters of ready-made snacks for the occasion. After some time, Secretary An Ch'en duly arrived, along with a sizable entourage, and Hsi-men Ch'ing, in formal attire, came out to receive him. The secretary was dressed in a figured round-collared robe emblazoned with a mandarin square featuring an egret in the clouds,¹⁹ and a girdle with a decorative plaque that was both embossed and gilded. When he had entered the gate, and the customary exchange of salutations had taken place, they sat down in the positions of guest and host, while attendants served them with tea. Having finished their tea, they proceeded to a discussion of:

What had occurred since their last meeting.²⁰

"Venerable Sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I very much regret to say that I have not yet had the chance to congratulate you on your illustrious promotion. The other day, when I received the elegant epistle and lavish gifts that you bestowed upon me, I was so busy with the funeral arrangements that I was unable to wait upon you in person, for which I can only apologize."

"Your pupil," said An Ch'en, "is guilty of failing to offer his condolences in person. Upon my arrival in the capital, I spoke to Chai Ch'ien about it, but I don't know whether you have received a gift from him, or not."

"It is the case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that I have occasioned my kinsman Chai Ch'ien the trouble of sending a consolatory gift from a great distance."

"Ssu-ch'üan," said An Ch'en, "this year you yourself are sure to have an occasion for congratulation before long."

"Your humble servant," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is the possessor of slight ability and an insignificant office. How could I presume to hope for more than I deserve?"

"Venerable Sir," he continued, "this illustrious promotion to an important office that you have just received will provide you with the opportunity to further develop your:

Outstanding talent and bold vision.²¹

The success of your repair work on the Grand Canal is something:

The entire empire looks forward to."²²

"Ssu-ch'üan," responded An Ch'en, "You do me too much honor. I am nothing but:

An insignificant Confucian scholar,²³ who has been fortunate enough, by means of the examination system, to qualify for a humble post in the bureaucracy. It is thanks to the support of the venerable gentleman Ts'ai Ching that I occupy a position in the Ministry of Works and have undeservedly been made responsible for the irrigation and transportation system. For the past year I have been so busy traveling back and forth in the Hu-Hsiang region that:

Engaged upon the ruler's business,²⁴

I have not had a minute's respite.

At present, I have also been ordered to take charge of the repair work on the Grand Canal, at a time, moreover, when:

The people are impoverished and finances are depleted.²⁵

Recently, when the imperial vessels were engaged in the Flower and Rock Convoys, they:

Demolished the dikes and destroyed the embankments,

Leaving nothing but a trail of havoc in their wake,

so that:

Public and private resources are totally exhausted.²⁶

At present, all along its route, in Kua-chou, Nan-wang, Ku-t'ou, Yü-t'ai, Hsü-p'ei, Lü-liang, An-ling, Chi-ning, Su-ch'ien, and Lin-ch'ing, the Grand Canal is in a state of disrepair. The southern branch of the Yellow River has overflowed its banks and moved further south, silting up the canal to such an extent that its bed is dry in places, leaving the populace of the eight prefectures in dire straits. Moreover:

Bandits interfere with the repair work, and Fiscal resources are utterly deficient,²⁷

so that even if we were able to deploy:

The power of gods or the art of ghosts,

It would not avail to execute the task."²⁸

"Venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you but exert the talent and faculties that you possess, you will have everything in good order before long and are certain to be rewarded with a substantial promotion."

He then went on to ask, "Venerable sir, does your imperial commission have a time limit, or not?"

"The imperial commission is for a period of three years," said An Ch'en. "When the repair work on the Grand Canal is completed, His Majesty will depute an official to come and offer sacrifices to the God of the River."

While they were speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered that a table should be set up, but An Ch'en said, "The truth of the matter is that your pupil still intends to pay a visit to Huang Pao-kuang's place."

"In that case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "stay a little longer, and I will arrange for your attendants to have something to eat."

Before long, a table was set up and provided with a platter of cold hors d'oeuvres and an assortment of other delicacies to go with the wine, served in a set of sixteen matched bowls, containing slow-boiled appetizers such as chicken feet, goose and duck, fresh fish, sheep's head, tripe and lungs, blood and intestines, soup flavored with pickled fish, and so forth, along with congee made from pure white, fresh, nonglutinous rice, served in silver-mounted bowls, and flavored with granulated sugar, hazelnuts, and pine and melon seeds. These were accompanied by small gold cups of heated vintage wine. The attendants, for their part, were provided with platters of assorted snacks as well as meat and wine.

At this repast, Secretary An Ch'en, after downing only three cups of wine, took his leave and got up to go, saying, "Your pupil will return to seek your instruction another day."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was unable to detain him any longer and saw him to the gate, where he got into his sedan chair and departed.

On returning to the reception hall, Hsi-men Ch'ing divested himself of his official hat and girdle, replacing them with a cap and headband, dressed himself in a long gown of purple velvet featuring only a mandarin square with an embroidered lion, and sent to ask if Licentiate Wen had come home, or not.

Upon coming back, Tai-an reported, "Master Wen has not yet returned home, but Cheng Ch'un, along with Lai-ting from Huang the Fourth's place, have been here to urge you on your way for half a day already."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, went out the gate, got into his sedan chair, and, accompanied by his attendants, set out directly for Cheng Ai-yüeh's establishment in the licensed quarter. When he arrived at the gate of the quarter, the "cribbers" and the "ball clubbers"²⁹ stayed out of his way, and only the file leaders from the Music Office on duty that day stood to attention on either side, not presuming to kneel down and receive him, while Cheng Ch'un and Lai-ting went ahead to announce his coming.

Ying Po-chüeh was engaged in playing backgammon with Li the Third, and when they heard that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived they barely had time to put the game pieces away. Cheng Ai-yüeh and Cheng Ai-hsiang, wearing sealskin toques over their "bag of silk" chignons in the Hang-chou style, held in place by plum-blossom-shaped ornaments with kingfisher feather inlays that enhanced their:

Glossy hair and powdered faces,³⁰ and made up to resemble flower fairies, came out to the door to meet him.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing got out of his sedan chair and came into the parlor he directed them to refrain from the customary welcoming flourish of wind and percussion instruments and suspend any drum music. After Li the Third and Huang the Fourth had saluted him, and the madam of the Cheng Family Establishment had come out to welcome him, Cheng Ai-yüeh and her sister kowtowed to him:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder.

Two folding chairs were placed at the upper end of the room, upon which Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ying Po-chüeh took their seats, while Li Chih, Huang the Fourth, and the two Cheng sisters took their places to either side.

Tai-an, who was standing in attendance, asked, "Should we keep the sedan chair here, or send it back home?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing directed that the orderlies and the sedan chair should be sent home and instructed Ch'in-t'ung, saying, "When you get home, see if Master Wen has come back, and, if he has, prepare the sorrel horse for him and escort him here."

Ch'in-t'ung nodded in assent, and departed on his errand.

Ying Po-chüeh then asked, "Brother, how come you delayed half a day before getting here?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing then told him all about how Secretary An Ch'en of the Ministry of Works had showed up for a visit, and he had felt compelled to detain him for a bite to eat.

Before long, Cheng Ch'un came in with some tea, and Cheng Ai-hsiang served a cup to Ying Po-chüeh, while Cheng Ai-yüeh presented one to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Ying Po-chüeh hastily intervened by reaching out his hand for this cup as well, saying, "Oh, I guess I'm mistaken. I thought you intended it for me."

"I should grant precedence to you?" exclaimed Cheng Ai-yüeh. "You haven't earned the right to it."

"Just look at this little whore," said Ying Po-chüeh. "She only has eyes for her patron and gives no heed to her guests."

"It's not your turn to be a guest today," laughed Cheng Ai-yüeh, "but there may be other guests in the offing."

When they had finished their tea, the cups and their raised saucers were taken away.

Before long, the four singing girls who had been engaged to perform scenes from the Hsi-hsiang chi came out and kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Like sprigs of blossoms swaying in the breeze,
Sending the pendants of their embroidered sashes flying,
and he asked each of them her name.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then turned to Huang the Fourth and said, "When they come out to sing for us later on, see that they perform only to the beat of a drum, without any other wind or percussion instruments."

"I understand," replied Huang the Fourth.

Who should appear at this juncture but the madam, who came out and said, "I fear that Your Honor may be cold."

She then told Cheng Ch'un to let down the portiere to keep the heat in. Animal-shaped briquettes were constantly added to the brazier, and the fragrance of orchid and musk pervaded the air.

Just at this juncture, what should they see but several black-clad “ball-clubbers,” who, having heard that His Honor Hsi-men Ch’ing had come into the quarter and was drinking at the Cheng Family Establishment, came to loiter at the door:

Sticking out their heads and craning their necks, but not daring to proceed inside. One of them, who was acquainted with Tai-an, bowed to him and asked him to help them out. Tai-an quietly came inside and asked if they could come in, but Hsi-men Ch’ing merely responded with a shout, which so disconcerted them that they disappeared in a puff of smoke.

It was not long before the fruits and appetizers suitable to accompany a drinking party were served. Two tables were set out at the upper end of the room, one for Hsi-men Ch’ing alone, and the other to be shared by Ying Po-chüeh and Licentiate Wen, with the empty place reserved for Licentiate Wen on the left end. On that side of the room there was a table for Li the Third and Huang the Fourth, while on the right side there was one for the two sisters. Truly:

Platters are piled with exotic viands,

Blossoms are displayed in golden vases.

Cheng Feng and Cheng Ch’un provided musical entertainment on the sidelines.

Just as the wine was being poured and they were about to take their seats, Licentiate Wen appeared, wearing a raised, bridge-shaped scholar’s cap,³¹ a jacket decorated with a motif of green clouds, a pair of shoes with cloud patterned toes, and velvet socks. As he entered the door, he merely made a ceremonial bow to the company.

“Venerable sir,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “why have you arrived so late? A place has been saved for you for some time already.”

“Your pupil is at fault,” replied Licentiate Wen. “I did not know that the venerable gentleman had called for me. I happened to have gone to my fellow student’s place for a literary gathering and am consequently a step too late.”

This flustered Huang the Fourth into hastily seeing that he was provided with a cup and chopsticks, and directing him to sit down next to Ying Po-chüeh.

Before long, soup and rice were served, together with steamed open-topped dumplings flavored with hotbed leeks, a soup of eight ingredients, and saucers of ginger and vinegar. The two boy actors entertained them by singing for a while and then retired. Truly:

Wine is poured, gleaming with glaucous foam,³²

Lyrics are sung to the tune “Golden Threads.”³³

Only then did the four singing girls come out and perform the two opening scenes of the Hsi-hsiang chi, starting with the aria to the tune “Dabbing the Lips Red” that begins with the words:

*I travel for study through the Central Plain.*³⁴

Who should appear at this point but Tai-an, who came in and reported that Wu Yin-erh from the alley behind theirs had sent Wu Hui and La-mei to deliver a gift of tea. It so happens that Wu Yin-erh’s establishment was located on the alley behind the Cheng Family place, and, when she heard that Hsi-men Ch’ing had come for a drinking party there, she made a point of sending a gift of tea.

Hsi-men Ch’ing called them inside, and when Wu Hui and La-mei had kowtowed to him, they said, “Sister Wu Yin-erh sent us over to deliver a gift of tea to Your Honor.”

When they opened the gift box and poured out the tea, there was a cup of the fragrant beverage, flavored with melon seeds, shredded chestnuts, marinated bamboo shoots, sesame seeds, and attar of roses, for each member of the company.

“What is Wu Yin-erh doing at her place?” asked Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“She’s at home today and hasn’t gone out,” replied La-mei.

When they had drunk the tea, and Hsi-men Ch’ing had rewarded the two of them with three mace of silver, he turned to Tai-an and Wu Hui and instructed them, saying, “Go and invite Wu Yin-erh to come join us.”

Cheng Ai-yüeh, who was quick on the uptake, said to Cheng Ch’un, “You go along with them, and make sure, whatever happens, that you persuade Wu Yin-erh to come. If she refuses to do so, tell her that in the future I won’t treat her as a colleague any longer.”

“You make me laugh,” exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. “After all, the two of you are only colleagues in the cunt-peddling trade.”

“My dear sir,” said Licentiate Wen. “How can you be so:

Out of touch with human nature?”³⁵

It has always been true that:

Notes of the same key resonate with each other;

Beings of the same nature seek one another out.³⁶

What is rooted in Heaven inclines to what is above;

What is rooted in Earth inclines toward that below.³⁷

Their feelings for each other as colleagues are governed by the same principle.”

“Beggar Ying,” said Cheng Ai-yüeh, “you, also, are a colleague of Cheng Ch’un and the others, in that, like them, you are here in order to provide entertainment.”

“Silly child!” exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. “I’m an old hand in the procuring trade. Back in the days when I was making out with your mother, you were still in her belly.”

As they were talking and laughing together, the chef came out to preside over the carving of a set of pig’s trotters, which were served together with four bowls of other culinary items, including dock and celery cabbage, minced pork with leeks, soup flavored with tripe and lungs, broth flavored with blood and intestines, and the like.

The singing girls then came out and sang the song suite from the Hsi-hsiang chi, starting with the aria to the tune "Powdery Butterflies" that begins with the words:

Five thousand rebellious troops.³⁸

When they were finished, Hsi-men Ch'ing called for the girl surnamed Han who had performed the part of Ts'ui Ying-ying and asked her, "Are you from the Han Family Establishment?"

"Father," responded Cheng Ai-hsiang, "you don't recognize her, but she is a niece of Han Chin-ch'uan, and her given name is Hsiao-ch'ou. This year she is just twelve years old."

"This youngster," opined Hsi-men Ch'ing, "will grow up to be a fine woman. Her demeanor is sprightly, and she sings very well."

He consequently told her to join the company and serve them with wine. Huang the Fourth, for his part, in presiding over the repast:

Catered to his guests with the utmost assiduity.

It was not long before Wu Yin-erh arrived. Her chignon was enclosed in a fret of white crepe, held in place with a pearl headband, ornaments with cloud-shaped kingfisher feather inlays, and an array of little pins all around the edge. From her ears dangled a pair of gold, clove-shaped pendant earrings. On her upper body, she wore a jacket of white satin with purpled edging that opened down the middle; while below, she wore a skirt of sand-green Lu-chou silk, trimmed with purpled gold-spangled edging, and shoes of plain ink-black satin. After coming in the door with an ingratiating smile and kowtowing to Hsi-men Ch'ing, she proceeded to bow in greeting to Licentiate Wen and each of the other members of the company.

"What a laugh!" exclaimed Ying Po-ch'ueh. "You have only to appear in order to rub me the wrong way. The rest of us are no more than stepchildren I suppose. You recognize only your father with a kowtow, while sparing merely a nod for the rest of us. You denizens of the Verdant Spring Bordello³⁹ treat your customers too rudely. If I presided over a yamen, I would certainly not spare you the squeezing you deserve."

"Beggar Ying," exclaimed Cheng Ai-y'ueh, "you shameless pip-squeak! As I see it, your ball-handling is not that great. All you can do is brag about it."

A place was then arranged for Wu Yin-erh, and she sat down beside Hsi-men Ch'ing's table, while a cup and chopsticks were hastily provided for her.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed that she was wearing a white fret over her chignon, he asked, "who are you wearing mourning for?"

"Father, what a question to ask!" replied Wu Yin-erh. "I've been wearing mourning for Mother ever since she died."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard that she was wearing mourning for Li P'ing-erh, his heart was filled with delight, and he moved his seat closer to hers so they could converse more readily.

In a little while, soup and rice were served, and Cheng Ai-y'ueh got up from her place to serve the wine.

Wu Yin-erh also stood up, saying, "I haven't yet had a chance to pay my respects to Auntie Cheng," as she went into the madam's room to exchange greetings and then came out again.

"Ai-y'ueh," said the madam, "give Sister Yin-erh a seat. I'm afraid she may be cold. And have the maidservant heat a hand warmer so she can warm up her hands."

Immediately afterwards, a new course of hot dishes was served. Wu Yin-erh, in her place at Hsi-men Ch'ing's side, ate only half of one of the delicacies supplied, and drank two mouthfuls of soup, before putting down her chopsticks and engaging Hsi-men Ch'ing in conversation.

Subsequently, she picked up her wine cup and said, "Father, this wine is cold and needs to be replaced with some warmed wine."

Cheng Ch'un then stepped up and served new wine to Ying Po-ch'ueh and the rest of the company.

After they had drunk one round, Wu Yin-erh asked, "Did you have a sutra reading service on the occasion of the final weekly commemoration of Mother's death?"

"I would like to thank you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "for the offering of tea that you sent on the occasion of the fifth weekly commemoration of her death."

"That's a fine way to talk," said Wu Yin-erh. "That coarse tea that we sent induced you to send us a gift in return. We are grateful for your return present, the lavishness of which caused my mother no little perturbation. On the occasion of Mother's final weekly commemoration yesterday, I consulted with Cheng Ai-y'ueh and Li Kuei-chieh about sending you another offering of tea, but we didn't know whether you were holding a sutra reading in your home, or not."

"For the final weekly commemoration," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we merely engaged the services of several Buddhist nuns to perform a ritual of penance and did not even invite a single relative to attend, lest we put them to further expense."

As they drank wine and chatted together, Wu Yin-erh went on to ask, "Are the First Lady, and the other ladies in your household, doing all right?"

"They're all fine," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Father," continued Wu Yin-erh, "after having lost Mother unexpectedly this way, when you go into her quarters and find yourself all alone, you must long for her in your heart."

"It goes without saying that I long for her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The other day, while I was in my studio, she appeared to me in a dream in broad daylight, which caused me no end of grief."

"When she died so suddenly, while still seeming vibrantly alive," said Wu Yin-erh, "you could hardly help longing for her."

"The two of you are so wrapped up in your conversation," said Ying Po-ch'ueh, "that you are completely ignoring the rest of us. If you don't order another round of drinks and provide some songs for our entertainment, we might as well get up and go."

This remark threw Li the Third and Huang the Fourth into such consternation that they hurriedly urged the two Cheng sisters to serve a round of wine and prepare their musical instruments. Wu Yin-erh also got up to join them. The three painted faces, sitting in a row to one side of the company, with their feet propped on the brazier, joining their voices together:

Opened their ruby lips,

Exposed their white teeth, and sang the song suite in the Chung-lü mode the first number of which, to the tune "Powdery Butterflies," begins with the words:

"Three Variations on the Plum Blossom."⁴⁰

Truly:

When words emerge from the mouth of a beauty,

They have a sound that causes rocks to split and sets the clouds in motion.

When they had finished singing this song suite, Hsi-men Ch'ing turned to Ying Po-chüeh and said, "You are the one who harassed the three girls into singing for us; so you ought to get up and offer them something in return."

"That's no problem," responded Ying Po-chüeh,

"It's not going to kill me.

Let me consider how I might disport myself with them. I could do it lying on my back, standing straight up, or reclining on my side. I could take my pleasure by adopting the position of 'The Golden Cock Standing on a Single Foot.'⁴¹ Then again, I might avail myself of the positions known as 'The Wild Stallion Stamping the Turf,' 'The Feral Fox Pulling Threads,'⁴² 'The Gibbon Offering Fruit,'⁴³ 'The Yellow Dog Spraying Urine,' 'The Immortal Pointing the Way,'⁴⁴ 'The Culprit with His Back to the Post,' or 'Embracing the Wooden Doll at Night.'⁴⁵ Let them choose whatever posture they prefer."

"I'd just be wasting my breath on you," said Cheng Ai-hsiang. "You're delirious, you lousy beggar. You're just:

Talking nonsense and uttering rubbish."⁴⁶

Ying Po-chüeh arranged three wine cups on a saucer and said, "My children, down two cups of wine at my behest. If you don't do so, I'll splash it all over you."

"I'm not drinking any wine today," pronounced Cheng Ai-hsiang.

"Only if you genuflect to your Auntie Ai-yüeh," said Cheng Ai-yüeh, "and allow me to give you a slap on the face, will I consent to drink any wine."

"Sister Yin-erh," asked Ying Po-chüeh, "what do you say?"

"Master Two," responded Wu Yin-erh, "I'm feeling distressed at heart today. I'll drink half a cup. That's all."

"You beggar," said Cheng Ai-yüeh, "if you don't kneel down for me, I won't drink anything at your behest for a hundred years."

"Master Two," intervened Huang the Fourth, "if you refuse to kneel, it will show that you don't know how to take a joke. Just kneel down, and she may dispense with the slap."

"Nothing doing," declared Cheng Ai-yüeh. "Only if he accepts two slaps on the face from me will I consent to drink this cup of wine."

"I call upon the venerable Licentiate Wen to witness," said Ying Po-chüeh, "the extent to which this crazy little whore is prepared to carry things to extremes."

Thereupon, seeing that he was up against it, he actually got down on his knees, so his torso looked as though it were sticking straight out of the ground like a post, while Cheng Ai-yüeh:

Lightly rolled up her variegated sleeves,

Fastidiously exposed her slender fingers, and took him to task, saying, "You lousy beggar. Will you ever dare to offend your Auntie Ai-yüeh so discourteously again? If not, answer me out loud. If you fail to respond, I will refuse to drink any wine."

Ying Po-chüeh, finding himself:

At a loss for what to do next, could only respond by promising, "I will never dare to offend my Auntie Ai-yüeh again."

Cheng Ai-yüeh then proceeded to slap him across the face twice in a row before drinking the cup of wine.

Ying Po-chüeh got back on his feet and said, "What an unkind and unjust little whore you are! You might, at least, have saved a mouthful for me, instead of draining the entire cup yourself."

"If you kneel down again," said Cheng Ai-yüeh, "I'll reward you with a cup of wine."

Thereupon, she filled a cup to the brim and laughed as she proceeded to pour it down Ying Po-chüeh's throat.

"You crazy little whore!" Ying Po-chüeh expostulated. "In the course of your mischievous tricks you've splashed the wine all over me. Old foggy that I am, all I've got is this one outfit of formal clothes, and you've managed to soil it the very first day I've worn it. I'll have to ask that man of yours to replace it for me."

After trifling with each other for a while, they returned to their places.

As the day began to grow dark, candles were lit, and the final complement of dishes was served. Meanwhile, a table was set up in the madam's quarters, on which soup and rice, food and wine, were provided for the entertainment of Tai-an, Ch'in-t'ung, Hua-t'ung, and Ying Pao.

Before long, additional saucers of assorted delicacies were served, and Ying Po-chüeh, while urging Licentiate Wen to try them, proceeded to uninterruptedly stuff them into his own mouth and fill his sleeves with them. Hsi-men Ch'ing then called for a dicebox and suggested that Licentiate Wen initiate the game.

"Whoever heard of such a thing," responded Licentiate Wen. "It is you who ought to begin, venerable sir."

Thereupon, Hsi-men Ch'ing and Wu Yin-erh commenced playing "Competing for the Red"⁴⁷ with twelve dice, while the four singing girls below took up their instruments and proceeded to play and sing, calling for the participants to drink a cup of wine at appropriate intervals. After one round had been consumed, Wu Yin-erh changed places in order to play "Competing for the Red" with Licentiate Wen and Ying Po-chüeh, while Cheng Ai-hsiang came over to offer Hsi-men Ch'ing a cup of wine and play guess-fingers with him. Before long, Cheng Ai-yüeh moved over to play "Competing for the Red" with Hsi-men Ch'ing, while Wu Yin-erh left her place in order to offer wine to Li the Third and Huang the Fourth.

It so happens that Cheng Ai-yüeh then withdrew to her room and came out again after dressing herself anew. She was wearing a jacket of iridescent satin that opened down the middle and had a diapered border, over a gosling-yellow skirt of Hang-chou silk, shot with turquoise and embellished with gold thread, as well as figured ankle leggings, and shoes the points of which were adorned with red phoenixes. Under the lamplight, her sealskin toque served to enhance the quality of her thickly powdered snow-white face, rendering her a fit contender for a beauty contest. Behold:

Her fragrant features and lovely person are more alluring than ever;
The sparkle of her limpid gaze⁴⁸ sets off the beauty of her snowy face.
The semicircular curves of her phoenix eyes conceal her amber pupils;
The seamless protuberance of her ruby lips⁴⁹ is like a painted cherry.
When exposed, the jade shoots of her fingers are slender and delicate;
When walking, the golden lotuses of her feet captivate with every step.
She is white jade that exudes its own bouquet,
a flower that can also speak;
Even at a thousand taels for one night her like cannot be found.⁵⁰

How could Hsi-men Ch'ing have been anything but captivated? After having drunk several cups of wine, he was half intoxicated. Remembering that Li P'ing-erh had admonished him in a dream not to stay out drinking late at night, he got up and headed toward the rear of the establishment to relieve himself. This flustered the madam into calling for a maidservant to light a lantern and lead him back to perform his ablutions. Cheng Ai-yüeh made haste to follow in their wake and, after he had finished relieving himself, took him by the hand and drew him into her room.

This chamber had been prepared in advance, so that:

The moon-shaped window was half open,
Candles in silver sconces burned high,
The atmosphere was as genial as that of spring,
Amid the fragrance of orchid and musk;

while at her bedside:

Clouds of vapor hovered athwart the drapery,⁵¹ and Haze enveloped the curtains of mermaid silk.

Thereupon, Hsi-men Ch'ing took off his outer garments, leaving only his white satin tunic, cut like the robe of a Taoist priest, and the two of them cuddled up to each other on the bed, thigh over thigh.

To start off with, Cheng Ai-yüeh asked, "Father, why don't you plan not to return home tonight?"

"I'll have to go home," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "In the first place, Wu Yin-erh is here, so it could be embarrassing for me to stay. In the second place, I occupy an official position and am subject to an impending merit evaluation, so I fear it might get me in trouble. I had better only come to visit you by daylight."

He then went on to say, "I am profoundly grateful for those butterfat 'abalone shell' sweets that you sent me the other day, though your gift caused me half a day of heartache. Originally, my late Sixth Lady was adept at making them, but since she died, there has not been anyone in my household who knows how to do so."

"They're not hard to make," said Cheng Ai-yüeh. "You've just got to get the knack of it. On that occasion I casually made a few up, not very many of them, and, knowing that you liked them, sent Cheng Ch'un to deliver them to you. The melon seeds that I sent with them were all cracked by my own teeth, one at a time, and the handkerchief that they came in was one that I took the trouble to add the tassels to in my spare time. With regard to the melon seeds, I hear that Beggar Ying helped himself to most of them."

"As for that shameless beggar-in-chief you speak of," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I watched him cram the melon seeds into his mouth in two handfuls and gobble most of them up, without leaving many of them for me."

"So it turns out I was only benefiting that lousy beggar," said Cheng Ai-yüeh, "as though I meant to show my filial respects to the likes of him."

She then went on to say, "Thank you, Father, for the 'coated plums' you sent me. When my mother saw them, she ate one and found it very much to her taste. She often suffers from buildups of phlegm that cause her to cough in the evenings and keep the rest of us awake half the night. As a result, her mouth is always dry, but when she lets one of these 'coated plums' dissolve in her mouth, it produces a good deal of saliva. My elder sister and I had only eaten a few of them before the old lady took them away and secreted them in her room, where she helps herself to them early and late, and no one else dares to disturb them."

"That's no problem," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Tomorrow I'll send a page boy to deliver another canister of them for you to enjoy."

Cheng Ai-yüeh then went on to inquire, "Father, have you seen anything of Li Kuei-chieh recently?"

"From the time of the funeral until now," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I haven't seen anything of her."

"At the time of the fifth weekly commemoration of the Sixth Lady's death," asked Cheng Ai-yüeh, "did she send a gift of tea?"

"Her establishment sent Li Ming to deliver a gift of tea," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I have something to say to you," said Cheng Ai-yüeh, "but you must keep it to yourself."

"What do you have to say?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Cheng Ai-yüeh thought to herself for a while and then said, "I'd better not say it. If I do, it will only look as though I'm telling stories about one of my sisters behind her back, which would be embarrassing."

Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced her by the neck, saying as he did so, "You crazy little oily mouth! Whatever you have to say, say it to me. You can rest assured I'll not give you away."

Just as the conversation between the two of them started to warm up, Ying Po-chüeh suddenly strode in and cried out in a loud voice, "A fine couple of people you are; abandoning the rest of us and coming in here to engage in a private conversation."

"Eeyuck!" exclaimed Cheng Ai-yüeh. "What an obnoxious, crazy, shameless beggar you are, to break in on us that way, and give us such a start!"

"You crazy dog!" swore Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Get back to the front of the place immediately, where you've left Licentiate Wen and Wu Yin-erh, or they might choose to follow you back here."

But Ying Po-chüeh proceeded to park his posterior on the bed beside them, saying, "Give me your arm, so I can take a bite out of it before I go, and leave the two of you to screw around together."

Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation, he reached into Cheng Ai-yüeh's sleeve and dragged out her snow-white arm, as smooth as goose fat, adorned with a silver bracelet, and the unblemished jade of her ten slender fingers, ensheathed in gold rings.

"My child!" he exclaimed in admiration. "These two hands of yours are made to order for the task of inducing an ejaculation."

"You crazy chunk of knife-bait!" protested Cheng Ai-yüeh. "I'd only be wasting my breath on you."

But Ying Po-chüeh took up her arm and took a nip at it before consenting to go, causing the woman to revile him in a loud voice, saying, "You crazy beggar, to barge in here for no good reason only to drive people to distraction."

She then called in the maidservant T'ao-hua and said to her, "You escort him back out, and see that the door to the covered passageway is closed."

Ying Po-chüeh Playfully Nibbles at a Jade-white Forearm

When the door was closed, Cheng Ai-yüeh told Hsi-men Ch'ing the whole story of how Li Kuei-chieh had recently resumed her indulgence in "the play of boys and girls"⁵² with Wang the Third.

"Once again," she reported, "he is frequenting her place day after day, in the company of the touts Blabbermouth Sun, Pockmarked Chu, and Trifler Chang, the 'cribbers' Stupid Yü and Tiptoe Nieh, and the 'ball-clubbers' Mohammedan Pai and Yokel Sha. He is no longer involved with Ch'i Hsiang-erh but is carrying on with Ch'in Yü-chih. Since he is spending his money at both places, he has run out of funds and has had to pawn his fur coat for thirty taels of silver. He has also turned over a set of his wife's gold bracelets to the Li Family Establishment in lieu of the monthly charge for his liaison with Li Kuei-chieh."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he swore, saying, "That little whore! I told her she ought not to carry on with that youngster, but she disregarded my advice and even resorted to:

Swearing by the gods and uttering oaths, while choosing to deceive me all the while."

"Father," said Cheng Ai-yüeh, "you needn't get upset about it. I'll tell you a scheme by which you can arrange for Wang the Third to get a slap in the face, and thereby vent your spleen."

Taking Cheng Ai-yüeh onto his lap, Hsi-men Ch'ing wrapped his white satin sleeve around her powdered neck and kissed her fragrant cheek, while she put the opening of her sleeve over a warmer with a cover of brass wire, in which there were smoldering pellets of aromatic incense, in order to fumigate her person.

"Father," she then went on to say, "you must not let a single person know what I am going to tell you. Even Beggar Ying should be kept in the dark, lest any inkling of it should leak out.”

“My child,” responded Hsi-men Ch’ing, “tell me what you have to say. I am not such a fool as to let anyone else know about it. Really, what is this scheme of yours?”

Cheng Ai-yüeh then proceeded to lay it out in detail, saying, “Wang the Third’s mother, Lady Lin, is currently no more than thirty-nine years old and is still a spectacle to behold.

Painting her brows and making up her eyes, she dolls herself up in such a way as to:

Appear the veritable simulacrum of a vixen.

While her son spends his days in the licensed quarter, she is left to her own devices at home and does not scruple to peddle her wares on the side. Pretending to attend services at a nunnery, she actually drops in on the go-between Auntie Wen, who functions as her procuress. She is reputed to be an old hand at the game of breeze and moonlight. I can assure you, Father, that if you should wish to arrange an assignation with her sometime in the future, it would not be difficult. But there is another fortuitous benefit to this scheme. Wang the Third’s wife is now just eighteen years old and is the niece of Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch’en of the Eastern Capital. She is as pretty as a picture, and proficient at backgammon and chess. Since Wang the Third chooses to spend so much of his time out of the house, she might as well be observing her widowhood. As a result, she is:

So angry she scarcely cares whether she is dead or alive,

and has had to be rescued after trying to hang herself two or three times. Father, such an opportunity is not to be missed. If you succeed in initiating an affair with the mother, there is no reason to fear that the daughter-in-law will not fall into your hands.”

This single conversation had the immediate effect of arousing:

Depraved intentions and excited anticipation, in the mind of Hsi-men Ch’ing, who embraced the painted face, saying, “My darling, let me ask you, how did you ever come by all this inside information?”

Cheng Ai-yüeh withheld the fact that she often performed in the Wang mansion herself but merely said, “An old client of mine, thus and so, once had a rendezvous with Lady Lin at her place, which was arranged for him by Auntie Wen.”

“Who was that?” asked Hsi-men Ch’ing. “No doubt it was Chang the Second, the nephew of Mr. Chang, the well-to-do merchant, who lives on Main Street.”

“Why that fucking Chang Mao-te!” exclaimed Cheng Ai-yüeh. “His cheeks are all covered with pockmarks, and his two eyes are mere slits. He’d only give me the creeps. No one but the likes of Fan Pai-chia-nu, or Hundred Customers Fan, would take him on. His affair with Tung Chin-erh has been ‘a-nail-eighted’⁵³ for some time now.”

“I’m at a loss then,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “Just who was it?”

“I might as well tell you,” replied Cheng Ai-yüeh. “It was that southerner who originally deflowered me. He comes here on business twice a year, and, after spending a night or two in the quarter, he customarily ventures outside and indulges himself in the furtive pleasures of:

Snitching cats and filching dogs.”

When Hsi-men Ch’ing heard this and realized that everything the painted face proposed resonated with his own feelings, he was more pleased than ever and said, “My child, if you are willing to cater to my tastes, I’ll undertake to pay your mother thirty taels of silver a month for your keep, and you won’t have to take on any other customers. I’ll visit you whenever I have the free time.”

“Father,” said Cheng Ai-yüeh, “if you have taken a liking to me, what difference does the sum of thirty taels or twenty taels make? You can just fork out a few taels to my mother every month or two. Since I am personally disinclined to take on any other customers anyway, I’ll just put myself at your disposal.”

“What a thing to say!” protested Hsi-men Ch’ing. “I’ll be sure to come up with thirty taels of silver.”

When they had finished speaking, the two of them:

Got into bed and engaged each other in amorous sport.

The comforters on the bed were nearly a foot thick.

“Father,” Cheng Ai-yüeh asked, “are you going to take off your clothes, or not?”

“We might as well indulge ourselves with our clothes on,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “I fear they’re waiting for us to come back, up front.”

He then repositioned a pillow, and the painted face unfastened her lower garments and draped herself face up over its surface. She was wearing under-drawers of red Lu-chou silk and pulled down one of her ankle leggings. Hsi-men Ch’ing hoisted her two tiny golden lotuses onto his shoulders, opened up his blue satin drawers, and fastened the clasp around his organ. Behold:

The flower’s heart is lightly exposed, as

She gently wriggles her willowy waist.⁵⁴

Truly:

The blossom is too tender to be disturbed,

But the spring breeze refuses to spare it.⁵⁵

The flower’s heart does not feel satiated,

Its prodigal feelings are yet unsatisfied.

In a low voice she intimates to her lover,

“The spring night’s pleasure is not over.”⁵⁶

By the time the two of them reached the point at which he was about to ejaculate,⁵⁷ Hsi-men Ch'ing had exerted himself to such an extent that he was:

Panting and puffing, while the painted face gave voice to lascivious sounds without end.

As her cloudy locks tumbled over the pillow, all she could manage to say was, "My own daddy, slow down a bit."

Sometime later, as the saying goes:

When pleasure reaches its height passions are intense, and he:

Ejaculated like a geyser.

After:

The clouds dispersed and the rain evaporated,⁵⁸

they proceeded to readjust their clothing, and, by the light of the lamp:

Straighten themselves up before the mirror.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had washed his hands in the basin in front of the bed, and put all his clothes on, the two of them held hands as they went back to rejoin the rest of the company.

Wu Yin-erh was looking after Ying Po-chüeh, and Cheng Ai-hsiang was snuggled up to Licentiate Wen as they engaged in:

Casting dice and playing at guess-fingers,⁵⁹

while:

Drinking vessels and game tallies lay helter-skelter.

The merrymaking was at its height. When the company saw Hsi-men Ch'ing come back in, they all stood up and offered him a seat.

"Since you have seen fit," said Ying Po-chüeh, "to abandon the rest of us here, all this time, before deigning to rejoin us, you'd better have a pick-me-up to restore your energy after your recent exertions."

"We were just having a chat together," protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What other silly business would we have been up to?"

"That's a fine way of putting it!" responded Ying Po-chüeh. "I suppose you would have us believe that the two of you were merely engaged in a private conversation."

Thereupon, Ying Po-chüeh handed him a large goblet filled with warm wine, and the rest of them kept Hsi-men Ch'ing company as he drank it. Meanwhile, the four singing girls picked up their instruments and played and sang for their entertainment.

At this point, Tai-an, who was standing at his side, covered his mouth with his hand and whispered, "Your sedan chair is here."

In response, Hsi-men Ch'ing made a meaningful moue, and Tai-an, accordingly, hastened out to tell the orderlies to light their lanterns and stand by outside.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing indicated that he would not stay any longer, the company all:

Stood up to toast him with drinks in hand, while he turned to the four singing girls and asked, "Can you sing for me the set of songs that starts off with the words:

On first seeing that bashful beauty?"

"We do know it," responded Han Hsiao-ch'ou.

Thereupon, taking up her p'i-p'a, she:

Gently displayed her coquettish voice, doing her best to show off her talent, as she sang:

On first glimpsing that bashful beauty,

The passions evoked by clouds and rain brought us together.

I saw that she had a thousand coquettish and a hundred allurements,⁶⁰

Displaying her seductiveness in a myriad ways;

A veritable handful of warmth and softness.

In corresponding with me, she selected her words carefully;

In revealing her feelings, she secretly

let her glances flow.

I kept her message in my heart,⁶¹

In my heart;

But did not know when our desires would be fulfilled.

When the first song in the set was finished, Wu Yin-erh served Hsi-men Ch'ing with wine, Cheng Ai-hsiang served Ying Po-chüeh, and Cheng Ai-yüeh served Licentiate Wen. Li Chih and Huang the Fourth were also supplied with wine. Han Hsiao-ch'ou then continued by singing the second song:

I speak to the maidservant, saying,

I wish to build a golden altar, on which to appoint my commander.

Before the morrow dawns, tell that young scholar to prepare for,

The clouds and rain on Witch's Mountain.⁶²
This night my double doors have not even been locked;
In my secluded boudoir, I await the advent of my lover.
The night is quiet, the watches nearly over,⁶³
The watches nearly over.
This time, that master of seduction will be hard to resist.

When the song was finished, Hsi-men Ch'ing called for more wine, and Cheng Ai-hsiang came forward to serve him, while Wu Yin-erh served Licentiate Wen, Cheng Ai-yüeh served Ying Po-chüeh, and Cheng Ch'un stood by to proffer refreshments. Han Hsiao-ch'ou then continued by singing the third song:

I dream of that tryst at Kao-t'ang,
Upon my assignation with that romantic and enticing maiden.
She and I grasp each other by our white hands,⁶⁴
As we enter the silken bed curtains together,⁶⁵
To make a lasting pact between the phoenixes.
The transfusing touch of the magic rhinoceros horn penetrates her innermost regions.
Beneath the mermaid silk bed curtains⁶⁶ the coverlet is disturbed by crimson waves.
Her powdered sweat becomes congealed fragrance,⁶⁷
Congealed fragrance.
A mere quarter hour of this evening⁶⁸ is like Heaven on Earth.

When the song was finished, another round of wine was called for. Cheng Ai-yüeh then moved over to wait on Hsi-men Ch'ing, while Wu Yin-erh served Ying Po-chüeh, and Cheng Ai-hsiang served Licentiate Wen, as well as Li the Third and Huang the Fourth. More wine was poured, after which Han Hsiao-ch'ou continued by singing the fourth song:

In the spring warmth under the hibiscus curtains,
My coiffure is in disarray, my hairpins askew,
and my chignon disheveled.
All on his account, my fragrance is alluring,
and my jade is soft.
As we emulate billing swallows and cooing orioles,
Our feelings are ardent, our passions are intense.⁶⁹
My waist has become languorous, and my eyes are bleary,
But in the depths of our passion
my eyebrows are wanton.
The two of us share an affinity,
An affinity;
Desirous of enjoying a lifetime of love,⁷⁰ in harmony like phoenix mates.

When the song was finished, and they had all enjoyed another round of drinks, Hsi-men Ch'ing stood up and ordered Tai-an to take eleven packets of gratuities, of differing quantities, out of his letter case. There were three mace of silver for each of the four singing girls, five mace of silver for the chef, who was called out to receive them, three mace of silver each for Wu Hui, Cheng Feng, and Cheng Ch'un, two mace of silver each for the servant and the boy who served the tea, as well as three mace of silver for the maidservant T'ao-hua. All of them kowtowed to him in gratitude.

Huang the Fourth did his best to prevent him from leaving, saying, "Uncle Ying the Second, won't you say a word to dissuade him? It's early yet, and if His Honor will consent to stay a little longer, it will enable me to convey the full extent of my feelings. Why should he insist upon leaving right away? Auntie Ai-yüeh, won't you also endeavor to detain him?"

"I have tried to detain him," said Cheng Ai-yüeh, "but he simply won't stay."

"You don't know about it," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but there are things I have to do tomorrow."

Then, bowing to Huang the Fourth and Li the Third, he said, "Thank you for all the trouble you have taken on my behalf."

"I fear," responded Huang the Fourth, "that since we have only invited Your Honor to partake of meager fare, and you are unwilling to stay any longer, you will conclude that we have been lacking in respect."

As they spoke, the four singing girls kowtowed together, saying, "When Father gets home, please convey our regards to your First Lady, and the other ladies. When we have some free time, we'll get together with Wu Yin-erh and come to your place to visit the First Lady."

"When you have the time," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "do come and spend the day with us."

By this time, the lanterns had been lit, and, when Hsi-men Ch'ing descended the stairs, he was met by the madam of the Cheng Family Establishment, who bowed to him, saying, "Won't Your Honor consent to stay a while longer? The fact that you are so anxious to leave must show that you do not find our fare to your taste. There is another course remaining that has not yet been served."

"I've eaten my fill," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and would stay a little longer, were it not that I have a lot of business to take care of. I have to get up early tomorrow morning in order to deal with matters pending at the yamen. Since Brother Ying the Second has no such responsibilities, I'm sure that he can be persuaded to stay a while longer."

Ying Po-chüeh was going to get up and follow him out, but he was forcefully detained by Huang the Fourth, who said, "Master Two, if you insist on leaving, it will certainly spoil the fun."

"That's not the case," responded Ying Po-chüeh, "and there's no need for you to try to retain me. But if you have the prowess to detain the venerable Licentiate Wen, I'll consider you a stout fellow."

Licentiate Wen actually did try to bolt out the gate but was prevented from doing so by Huang the Fourth's page boy, Lai-ting, who held him back by embracing him around the waist.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived at the main gate, he asked Ch'in-t'ung, "Does Master Wen have a mount here, or not?"

"His donkey is here ready for him," replied Ch'in-t'ung. "Hua-t'ung is looking after it."

"Since you have a mount here, venerable sir," Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Licentiate Wen, "you might as well keep Brother Ying the Second company and stay a while longer. I am compelled to leave before you."

Thereupon, they all escorted him outside the gate to see him off.

Cheng Ai-yüeh took Hsi-men Ch'ing's hand and surreptitiously gave it a pinch, while simultaneously turning to face him and saying in a loud voice, "Father, make sure you keep what I told you just now to yourself. As you know:

The dharma must not be divulged to six ears."

"I understand," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

She then turned to Cheng Ch'un and said, "You escort His Honor on his way home, and give our regards to his ladies when you get there."

Wu Yin-erh also chimed in, saying, "Give my regards to the First Lady."

"I really oughtn't to mention it," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but these lousy little whores are all attempting to:

Monopolize the trade and compete for business, in conveying their regards, while I'm left without anyone to convey my regards to."

"You beggar!" retorted Cheng Ai-yüeh. "Get out of the way."

Wu Yin-erh then said goodbye to the group of guests, and the two Cheng sisters, and set out for home, accompanied by Wu Hui, who held a lantern to light her on her way.

"Sister Yin-erh," Cheng Ai-yüeh called after her, "if you run into that wastrel, whatever you do, don't mention this occasion to him."

"I understand," replied Wu Yin-erh.

The remaining company then returned to the scene of their party, where:

Animal-shaped briquettes were replenished, and

New servings of "sunset clouds" were decanted;

as amid:

Song and dance and wind and string instruments,

They enjoyed the pleasure of drinking together.

The party continued until the third watch before breaking up. Huang the Fourth, who hosted this drinking party, paid out ten taels of silver for it, and Hsi-men Ch'ing also contributed three or four taels. But no more of this.

That day, Hsi-men Ch'ing sat in his sedan chair as the two orderlies, holding lanterns, escorted him out through the gate of the licensed quarter, after which he sent Cheng Ch'un back home.

Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling sent someone to summon him, and Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the yamen early in order to participate in the adjudication of some criminal cases and related matters. The hearings continued until noon, after which he came home and ate his midday meal.

Before this, Brother-in-law Shen had sent his servant Shen Ting with a calling card to recommend a young man named Liu Pao to serve as a cook in the silk goods store, and Hsi-men Ch'ing agreed to employ him. He was in his studio, in the process of providing Shen Ting with a reply to take home with him, when he noticed that Tai-an was standing at his side.

Hsi-men Ch'ing turned to him and asked, "What time did Master Wen come home last night?"

"I had been asleep in the shop for quite a while," replied Tai-an, "when I heard Hua-t'ung knocking on the gate across the street. It was sometime in the third watch before he got home. When I asked about it this morning, I learned that although Master Wen was not in his cups, Master Ying the Second was so drunk he spit up all over the street. Auntie Ai-yüeh was concerned that it was so late at night and sent Cheng Ch'un to escort him home."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he guffawed with laughter.

He then called Tai-an over to him and said, "Do you know the address of that Auntie Wen who acted as go-between at the time of our son-in-law's marriage some time ago? If you can locate her, I'd like to have a word with her in the house across the street."

"I don't know Auntie Wen's address," replied Tai-an. "I'll go ask your son-in-law about it."

"As soon as you've finished eating," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "go ask about it, and then set out immediately."

Tai-an, accordingly, went back to the rear compound for his noonday meal and then went out to the shop to ask Ch'en Ching-chi about it.

"What are you looking for her for?" asked Ch'en Ching-chi.

"Who knows what he wants with her?" said Tai-an. "Without any warning, he just asked me to go find her."

"After emerging on East Main Street," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "head straight south until you get to the memorial arch on the other side of the T'ung-jen Bridge, at which point you turn east on Wang Family Lane, halfway down which there is an administrative police station, across from a stone bridge. On the other side of the bridge there is a Buddhist nunnery, next to which there is a small alley. If you head west on the small alley, the third house you come to will be a bean curd shop, right next to which, on the upper side, you will see the double leaves of a red outer door with latticework on the top to let in the light. That is her place. If you just call, 'Auntie Wen,' she will come outside in response."

When Tai-an had heard him out, he exclaimed, "Enough already!

When an itinerant tinker follows behind a parade of incense-burning pilgrims:

The tinkling of his implements seems interminable.

You'll have to go over all that again for me. It's more than I can remember."

Ch'en Ching-chi, accordingly, ran over the directions for him a second time.

"It's not exactly a short jaunt," remarked Tai-an. "I'd better ride a horse."

Thereupon, he led out a large white horse, equipped it with a saddlecloth, fitted on a bit, stood up on the mounting platform, vaulted into the saddle, and gave it a stroke with his riding crop. The horse responded by neighing and prancing as it took off on its way.

Having emerged on East Main Street, Tai-an headed due south to the memorial arch on the other side of the T'ung-jen Bridge and entered Wang Family Lane, halfway down which, sure enough, he found a police station across the street from a dilapidated stone bridge, on the other side of which was a segment of red wall belonging to the Ta-pei An, or Nunnery of Great Compassion. There he found the small alley leading to the west, on the northern, or upper, side of which there was suspended a signboard advertising bean curd. In front of the door of this shop there was an old woman engaged in spreading horse dung out to dry.

Tai-an Surreptitiously Sets Out to Find a Bee Go-between

While still mounted on his horse, Tai-an asked her, "Old mother, is there a go-between named Auntie Wen around here?"

"The house with the latticed outer door right next door is her place," the old woman replied.

Tai-an proceeded in front of it and, sure enough, found the double leaves of a red outer door, just as he had been told.

Hastily leaping off his horse, he knocked on the door with his riding crop and called out, "Is Auntie Wen at home, or not?"

Lo and behold, it was her son, Wen T'ang, who opened the door and inquired, "Where have you come from?"

"I've come with an invitation for your mother from His Honor Judicial Commissioner Hsi-men Ch'ing who resides in front of the district yamen," replied Tai-an. "Ask Auntie Wen to come out immediately."

When Wen T'ang heard that it was someone from the home of the influential official, Judicial Commissioner Hsi-men Ch'ing, he invited him to come inside and take a seat. Tai-an, accordingly, tethered his horse and went into the parlor inside, where he saw that a paper print of the auspicious God of the Marketplace⁷¹ was displayed. In the inner part of the house, a number of persons had just finished holding a conclave and were still engaged in burning incense and settling accounts.

After what seemed like half a day, Wen T'ang came back out and offered him a cup of tea, saying, "My mother is not at home. When she returns, I'll tell her about it, and she can go to your place tomorrow morning."

"Her donkey is still here," objected Tai-an. "How can you pretend that she's not at home?"

So saying, he slipped past his interlocutor and headed toward the back of the house. Who could have known that Auntie Wen and her daughter-in-law were engaged in entertaining a number of devout Taoist women to tea and were unable to avoid being seen by him?

Whereupon, he said, "Is this not Auntie Wen? You told me just now that she was not at home. If I were to go back and tell such a story to my master, how could he avoid being annoyed with me?"

Auntie Wen laughed out loud at this, bowed in greeting to Tai-an, and said, "May I trouble you, Brother, to go home and tell your master that I am engaged in presiding over a tea meeting today. I don't know what His Honor wants to see me about, but I'll pay a visit to his residence tomorrow morning."

"He only told me to come looking for you," said Tai-an. "Who knows what he wants you for? Not knowing that you lived in this out-of-the-way corner, finding you has really put me out."

"For these last few years," said Auntie Wen, "the venerable gentleman has depended on Old Mother Feng and Auntie Hsüeh to buy maidservants, act as go-betweens, and supply artificial flowers for his household. What use has he had for me? But today, all of a sudden, it would seem:

The beans are popping in this cold pot.⁷²

My guess is that since his Sixth Lady has passed away, he must want me to seek another match for him in order to take her place."

"I don't know about that," said Tai-an. "But when you get there and see my master, of course, he'll explain things to you."

"Brother," said Auntie Wen, "just sit down for a bit while I see off the guests at my tea meeting, and then I'll go with you."

"While I wait till you're finished with your tea meeting," said Tai-an, "there's nobody to look after my horse outside. My master is at home, meanwhile, burning with anxiety, like:

A fire within a fire.

He instructed me over and over again to have you come as quickly as possible, so he could have a word with you. Right now he also has another engagement to attend a party with Lo Wan-hsiang,⁷³ the vice prefect of Tung-p'ing prefecture."

"All right," said Auntie Wen, "wait until I get you a snack to eat, and I'll go with you."

"Don't bother," said Tai-an.

She then went on to ask, "Has Hsi-men Ta-chieh given birth to a child, or not?"

"Not as far as I can tell," responded Tai-an.

Auntie Wen proceeded to provide Tai-an with a snack while she changed her clothes and then said, "You go ahead on your horse, and I'll follow behind you more slowly on foot."

"Old mother," said Tai-an, "since you've got a donkey at your disposal, why don't you saddle it up for yourself?"

"Where would I get a donkey from?" said Auntie Wen. "That donkey belongs to the bean curd shop next door. I have merely loaned them the use of my courtyard to graze it in, and you have mistaken it for my donkey."

"I remember seeing you riding a donkey here and there in the past," said Tai-an. "What has become of it?"

"It so happens," said Auntie Wen, "that one year, some time ago, one of the maidservants whose sale I had negotiated hanged herself, and the resulting lawsuit forced me to dispose of my old house, not to mention my donkey."

"The loss of your house doesn't amount to much," said Tai-an, "but you ought to have held on to that donkey in order to keep you company early and late. Aside from anything else, I noticed that he always had quite a whip of an organ dangling beneath him."

Auntie Wen laughed out loud at this, saying, "You crazy monkey of a short-life! I thought you were saying something serious, so I made the mistake of bending my ear to listen to you. A fine creature you've turned out to be! In the few years since I saw you last, you've developed quite an:

Oily mouth and a slippery tongue;⁷⁴ and in the future you'll still expect me to find a match for you."

"My horse goes at a good clip," said Tai-an, "and if you walk, who knows how long it will take you to get there, which will only have the effect of irritating Father. You get on the horse, and the two of us can ride tandem."

"You crazy little short-life!" exclaimed Auntie Wen. "I'm not the one you're after. The people on the street are bound to look askance at us when they see what we're doing."

"If not that," said Tai-an, "saddle up the donkey from the bean curd shop and ride it instead. When we get there, I'll see that they're properly compensated."

"That's more like it," said Auntie Wen.

She then told Wen T'ang to prepare the donkey, put on her eye shades, and proceeded to mount it, after which, she set out with Tai-an for Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence. Truly:

If you want to seek an alluring beauty from a secluded boudoir,
You must rely entirely upon a red leaf to be a good go-between.⁷⁵

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Who believes that there is a road leading to the Peach Blossom Spring?
Yet the peach blossoms, drenched with dew, smile in the spring breeze.⁷⁶
The Peach Blossom Spring is to be found among the hills and streams;
Even today, the young fisherman is still trying to find his way there.

Chapter 69

AUNTIE WEN COMMUNICATES HSI-MEN CH'ING'S WISHES TO LADY LIN; WANG TS'AI FALLS FOR A TRICK AND INVITES HIS OWN HUMILIATION

Casually he cooks a fish in the hope of finding a message on a square of silk;¹
If a road exists to the realm of the immortals, he is ready to embark upon it.
While sweeping the steps he happens upon a leaf inscribed with amorous desires;²
In strumming a tune beneath the moon he deploys
the zither of Ssu-ma Hsiang-ju.³
Seeking an assignation beneath the mulberry trees,
Ch'iu Hu has lascivious intent;⁴
Though finding the opportunity sitting in his lap,
Liu-hsia Hui is not so inclined.⁵
Having strayed inside the gold lamé bed curtains in the darkening twilight;
He seems only desirous of pouring the vintage wine for his solitary amusement.⁶

THE STORY GOES that when Auntie Wen arrived at the Hsi-men residence, P'ing-an told her, "Father is in the house across the street."

Tai-an went inside to announce her arrival and found Hsi-men Ch'ing sitting in the study with Licentiate Wen. Upon seeing Tai-an, he immediately came out and sat down in a small reception room, while Tai-an told him all about his vicissitudes in locating Auntie Wen.

"I've succeeded in bringing her here," he said, "and she's waiting outside."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, told him to call her inside; and Auntie Wen proceeded to cautiously lift aside the portiere that was hanging over the door to keep in the heat and come into the room, where she kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Auntie Wen," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it's been a long time since I saw you last."

"Well, here I am," responded Auntie Wen.

"Where are you living now, since you moved?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Because I was so unfortunate as to be involved in a lawsuit," said Auntie Wen, "I was forced to get rid of my old house. At present, I have moved to the southern edge of the city and am living on Wang Family Lane."

"You can get up in order to talk to me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Auntie Wen, thereupon, got to her feet and stood beside him, while Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered his attendants out of their presence. P'ing-an and Hua-t'ung waited for him on the other side of the postern gate, but Tai-an concealed himself outside the portiere so he could eavesdrop on what they had to say.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded to ask, "What households of prominent families do you frequent?"

"Well," replied Auntie Wen, "I am on familiar terms with the household of Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, who resides on Main Street; the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command; the household of the distaff relative of the imperial family named Ch'iao; that of His Honor Chang the Second; and that of His Honor Hsia Yen-ling."

"Are you familiar with the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang I-hsüan, or not?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"They are old patrons of mine," replied Auntie Wen. "Lady Lin and her daughter-in-law, the wife of Wang the Third, frequently buy costume jewelry from me."

"If you are on familiar terms with them," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "there is a mission I would like to entrust to you. You mustn't refuse me."

Reaching into his sleeve, he proceeded to pull out a five-tael ingot of silver and hand it to her, saying, thus and so, "See if you can find some way or other of inveigling Lady Lin into visiting your place, so I can have a meeting with her. If you succeed in doing so, I will see that you are further rewarded."

On hearing this, Auntie Wen laughed out loud, saying, "Whoever told you about her? Venerable sir, how did you happen to find out about this?"

"As the saying goes," said Hsi-men Ch'ing:

"Just as a man has his reputation,
A tree has its shadow.

How could I help hearing about it?"

"Well, if you want me to describe this lady," said Auntie Wen, "she was born in the year of the pig, so, this year, she would be thirty-four years old. She is really a first-class lady, is as clever as can be, and could pass for being no more than twenty-nine. Although she does engage in this sort of business, she does so with the greatest discretion. When she goes out, she rides in a large sedan chair, accompanied by attendants who shout to clear the way, and proceeds directly to her destination before coming straight home. Since her son, the venerable Wang the Third, has a position in society to maintain, she would scarcely agree to an assignation at someone else's place. Whoever suggested to you that she might was mistaken. It is only within the:

Vast courtyards and secluded mansions, of her own place that, occasionally, when the venerable Wang the Third is not at home, she may surreptitiously consent to secrete a lover:

Unbeknownst to humans,

Unperceived by ghosts.

But this must be arranged in advance. As for the narrow confines of a place like mine, I would scarcely take the risk of attempting to get her to come there. This silver that you have offered me, I cannot agree to accept. I had better simply tell the lady what you have proposed, and leave it at that."

"If you refuse to accept it, and continue to make excuses," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I will be annoyed. If the affair should be successful, I will reward you with some additional pieces of silk fabric for you to wear. If you persist in refusing what I have offered, you will be standing in my way."

"I am scarcely worried about your lack of largess," responded Auntie Wen. "As they say:

When a superior deigns to patronize you,

It spells the advent of your lucky star."⁷

Kowtowing to him, and accepting the proffered silver, she went on to say, "If you wait until I have had a chance to speak to the lady, venerable sir, I will get back in touch with you."

"You must treat this as a serious undertaking," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I will be waiting to hear from you here. When you return, be sure to come to this location. I won't send a page boy to summon you."

"I understand," responded Auntie Wen. "If not tomorrow, then the next day, early or late, as soon as I get the word from her, I'll come back to see you."

As she made her way out, Tai-an said to her, "Auntie Wen, it's up to you, but I would like to have at least a tael of silver for my pains in taking the trouble to find you. You oughtn't to keep everything for yourself."

"You monkey!" exclaimed Auntie Wen.

"If you throw a winnowing sieve over the wall,

Who knows whether it will land right side up or upside down?"

Thereupon, she proceeded out the gate, mounted the donkey, and went straight off, with her son holding the bridle, while Hsi-men Ch'ing continued to visit for a while longer with Licentiate Wen.

Sometime later, Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling showed up, and Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to the house in order to offer him some tea and change into more formal attire, after which they set out together for the prefectural office in order to attend a party for Vice Prefect Lo Wan-hsiang. It was not until after the lamps had been lighted that he returned home.

To resume our story, when Auntie Wen arrived home with Hsi-men Ch'ing's five taels of silver in hand:

Her delight knew no bounds.

After the people attending her tea meeting had departed, late in the day, she went over to Imperial Commissioner Wang I-hsüan's mansion, where she greeted Lady Lin with a bow.

"How is it," asked Lady Lin, "that you haven't come by to visit me the last few days?"

Auntie Wen then proceeded to explain to Lady Lin how she had been busy presiding over a conclave and tea meeting at her place in order to plan for a pilgrimage to offer incense at the temple on the summit of Mount T'ai during the twelfth month.

"Why don't you let your son take care of it?" said Lady Lin. "There's no need for you to go."

"I'm not able to go myself," replied Auntie Wen. "I plan to let Wen T'ang take charge of the incense offering pilgrimage."

"When the time comes," said Lady Lin, "I'll donate something toward the traveling expenses."

"Many thanks for your generosity," responded Auntie Wen.

When they had finished this preliminary exchange, Lady Lin urged her to move closer in order to warm herself at the brazier, and a maidservant served them with tea.

While Auntie Wen was drinking her tea, she inquired, "Is the Third Master not at home?"

"He hasn't come home for two nights in a row," said Lady Lin. "He spends his nights in the licensed quarter. He goes there every day with that crowd of sharpers:

Sleeping among the flowers and lolling beneath the willows, and leaving his blossoming young wife to vegetate in her room, without paying her the slightest attention. What is one to do? What is one to do?"

"Why is the Third Master's wife not to be seen?" Auntie Wen went on to ask.

"She's still in her room," explained Lady Lin, "and hasn't even come out yet."

When Auntie Wen saw that there was no one else about, she said, "That needn't be a problem, Madame, you can relax about it. I have a scheme by means of which you can be sure of dispersing that crowd of hangers-on, and bringing about a change of heart on the part of the Third Master, so that he will not venture into the licensed quarter again. If madame will permit me to explicate it, I will do so; but, should you object, I will not presume to do so."

"When have I ever refused to go along with anything you have to say?" protested Lady Lin. "If you have anything to suggest, go right ahead and say it. I won't object."

Only then did Auntie Wen go on to say, "His Honor, Hsi-men Ch'ing, whose residence is located in front of the district yamen, currently occupies the post of assistant judicial commissioner of the local office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission. His household not only engages in money lending to both officials and functionaries, but also operates four or five businesses, including a satin piece goods store, a pharmaceutical shop, a silk goods store, and a knitting and sewing supplies store. In addition, he operates fleets of merchant vessels with armed escorts on the rivers and lakes, trades salt vouchers in Yang-chou, and purveys incense and wax in Tung-p'ing prefecture for use by the imperial household. He has several tens of assistants and managers in his employ. Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching in the Eastern Capital is his adoptive father. Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien of the Embroidered Uniform Guard is his superior. And Majordomo Chai Ch'ien of the grand preceptor's household is his relative by marriage. The grand coordinator and the regional inspector of Shantung are on familiar terms with him, not to mention the local prefects and district magistrates. The wealth of his household is such that:

The paths run crisscross between the fields;⁸

The stores of rotting rice suggest a granary.

What glitters is gold,

What is white is silver,

What are round are pearls,

What sparkle are jewels.

"In addition to his First Lady, who is the daughter of Battalion Commander Wu of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard, and is his legitimate wife by a second marriage, he has five or six other ladies who preside over quarters of their own and are entitled to wear formal gowns. And, below these, there are several tens of:

Singing boys and dancing girls,⁹ as well as favored maidservants, at his disposal. Truly, for him:

Every day is a Cold Food Festival;

Every night is a Lantern Festival.¹⁰

"At the present time, His Honor is no more than thirty-three or thirty-four years old; truly, a man in the prime of life, who has an imposing physique and is good-looking. He also resorts to aphrodisiacs to nurture his 'turtle'¹¹ and is an old hand at initiating romantic affairs. When it comes to backgammon and elephant chess, there is:

Nothing he has not mastered;

and as for playing at kickball or suchlike sports, there is:

Little he is not proficient at.

With regard to the works of the hundred schools, and the various word games played by breaking characters down into their component parts, he has but to be exposed to them in order to demonstrate his mastery. Truly, his voice is like:

Tinkling jade or plangent bronze,¹² and he is as clever as can be.

"Upon hearing that this family of yours has:

Worn the regalia of officials for generations,¹³

and that your:

Financial foundation is anything but shallow, as well as the fact that the Third Master is enrolled in the Military School, he has expressed a desire to become acquainted with you. The only problem is that, since he has never met you, he is uncertain how to proceed.

"The other day, upon hearing that your birthday is near at hand, and that you are accustomed to accepting worthy gentlemen from anywhere within the four seas, he is single-mindedly desirous of the chance to come and offer you his birthday congratulations. I told him that it would be awkward for him to seek an audience with you precipitously, and that he should wait until I had a chance to approach you on the subject, and obtain your consent. If you should now invite him to come make your acquaintance, not only could you establish a meaningful relationship, but you could also ask his aid in getting rid of this band of rascals that are preying on your son. Such a request would surely do nothing to injure the reputation of your household."

Gentle reader take note: To seek the lower depths, like water, is the nature of women.

On that day, as Lady Lin listened to the encomium on Hsi-men Ch'ing delivered by Auntie Wen, her heart was:

Thrown into a state of confusion,¹⁴ and
Her lustful feelings were aroused.

In the course of considering what to do, she turned to Auntie Wen with a smile and said, "Since he and I:

Are newly acquainted and hardly know each other,
how can we suddenly arrange to meet?"

"That's no problem," responded Auntie Wen. "In speaking to His Honor, I'll just say that you initiated matters by asking me to approach him with a request that he file a complaint on your behalf in the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission against that gang of hangers-on that are inveigling the Third Master into the licensed quarter; and that you also hope that he will favor you with a private visit beforehand. There is nothing unfeasible about such a scheme."

This suggestion produced a feeling of delight in Lady Lin's heart, and she agreed to await his visit on the evening of the day after next. Having obtained the consent of Lady Lin, Auntie Wen went home.

The next day, around dinnertime, Auntie Wen returned to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence. That day, after coming home from the yamen, Hsi-men Ch'ing had nothing to do and was sitting in the studio in the house across the street when Tai-an suddenly came in and announced that Auntie Wen had arrived. Upon hearing this, Hsi-men Ch'ing immediately went into the small reception room and told his attendants to let down the blinds. In due course, Auntie Wen came in and kowtowed to him. Tai-an, who understood the situation, tactfully withdrew, so that the two of them could speak freely to each other.

Auntie Wen then explained how she had exercised her powers of persuasion on Lady Lin, telling him, "I gave an extravagant account of your personal character and wealth, your fashionable standing, and your familiarity with the members of the local bureaucracy; how you are:

Chivalrous by nature and open-handed with your wealth;
as well as being:

Romantic and dashing as can be;
with the result that she expressed herself to be:

Willing a thousand times if not ten thousand times.¹⁵

She agreed that tomorrow evening, while the Third Master is not there, she will prepare a repast in her home and await your visit, so that, on the pretext of asking you for a favor, the two of you can indulge in a secret rendezvous."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he was utterly delighted and ordered Tai-an to reward her with two pieces of silk fabric.

"If Your Honor plans to go tomorrow," said Auntie Wen, "don't go early, but wait until after the lamps are lit and there are fewer people in the streets. Make your way to the rear gate of her residence by way of Dumpling Alley. There is a certain Old Mother Tuan in her employ, who lives right next door to the rear gate of her residence. I'll wait for Your Honor there. Just have your servant tap on the door and I'll come out and conduct you into the inner sanctum, without letting any of the neighbors know about it."

"I understand," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Be sure to get there before me tomorrow, and don't budge by so much as an inch. I'll be there right on time."

When they had finished speaking, Auntie Wen respectfully bade him farewell and returned to report to Lady Lin, while Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to Li Chiao-erh's quarters to spend the night. Concerning that evening there is nothing more to relate.

Hardly able to wait for the day to come, that night Hsi-men Ch'ing chose to conserve his energy. At noontime, he put on a white "loyal and tranquil hat" and joined Ying Po-chüeh in riding on horseback to Hsieh Hsi-ta's place to attend a birthday party in his honor. Two singing girls had been hired for the occasion.

After drinking no more than a few cups of wine, around lamp-lighting time, Hsi-men Ch'ing left the party and mounted his horse, with the two page boys, Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung, to accompany him. It was the ninth day of the month, and:

The light of the moon was dusky.

Putting on his eye shades, after traversing Main Street, he made his way along Dumpling Alley, until he arrived at the rear gate of the late Imperial Commissioner Wang I-hsüan's residence. The lamps had already been lighted, and the streets were relatively deserted. When Hsi-men Ch'ing was half a house away from the rear gate, he reined in his horse and told Tai-an to tap on Old Mother Tuan's door.

It so happens that this Old Mother Tuan occupied quarters in the rear of Imperial Commissioner Wang's residence and had been recommended for her position by Auntie Wen. It was her job to look after the rear entrance, early and late, in order to:

Open the gates and close the doors, and to act as a lookout, enabling anyone bent on an assignation to penetrate the inner sanctum.

When Auntie Wen, who was inside her quarters, heard the tap on the door, she promptly opened it and saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived. She waited inside the rear gate until Hsi-men Ch'ing had dismounted and then led him inside, still wearing his eye shades, while telling Ch'in-t'ung to take the horse and wait with it under the eaves of the house on the west side across the street. Tai-an, for his part, concealed himself in Old Mother Tuan's quarters.

Auntie Wen then invited Hsi-men Ch'ing inside, closed the rear gate, and secured it with the crossbar, after which she led him into the interior through an enclosed passageway that skirted a tier of auxiliary rooms, before arriving at the main suite of five compartments in which Lady Lin resided. There was a closed postern gate to one side, on which Auntie Wen lightly tapped with the door knocker. It so happens that this was a prearranged signal, so that, in no time, a maidservant came out to open the double-leaved door, and Auntie Wen led Hsi-men Ch'ing into the rear reception room.

As they lifted aside the portiere over the latticework of the door and went in, Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that the interior was:

Ablaze with lamps and candles.

In the place of honor at the head of the room there hung a full-length portrait of the military commissioner of T'ai-yüan and Commandery Prince of Pin-yang, Wang Ching-ch'ung,¹⁶ the founding ancestor of the house of Wang I-hsüan. He was wearing a crimson python robe decorated with roundels of entwined dragons, and a jade-ornamented girdle, and was seated on a folding armchair, covered with a tiger skin, reading a book on military strategy. He resembled Kuan Yü, the God of War, except that his beard was a little shorter, and his spear, sword, and bow and arrows were arrayed by his side. The cinnabar-red plaque over the door was inscribed with three characters meaning Hall of Integrity and Righteousness. The two sidewalls of the room were adorned with works of calligraphy and painting, and:

Zither and books were elegantly displayed.

To the left and right of the portrait there hung a pair of scrolls, on which a couplet was inscribed in gold-flecked characters that were written in the archaic clerkly script of the Han dynasty and read:

The integrity he bequeathed to the family endures like pine trees and bamboos;
His services to the country are as conspicuous as the Dipper or a mountain peak.

As Hsi-men Ch'ing was engaged in surveying this scene, he heard the tinkling of a bell on the portiere, and Auntie Wen came in from the interior to serve him with a cup of tea.

"Invite the venerable Lady to come out so that I can pay my respects," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"She will appear by the time Your Honor finishes your tea," said Auntie Wen. "I have just informed the Lady of your arrival."

Who could have anticipated that Lady Lin was surreptitiously engaged in scrutinizing Hsi-men Ch'ing from the other side of the portiere? She saw that:

His physique was awe-inspiring,
His speech out of the ordinary;
He displayed a splendid figure,
Both dignified and outstanding.

On his head, he wore a white satin "loyal and tranquil hat," with sable ear-muffs. On his body, he wore a crane-decorated robe of purple cashmere. On his feet, he wore white-soled black boots. On his upper torso, he wore a riding jacket, emblazoned with a green cut-velvet mandarin square that featured an embroidered lion and was fastened with a row of five gold buttons. Manifestly, he was:

A wealthy but untrustworthy, crafty and treacherous person;
An abuser of the innocent and good,
addicted to wine and sex.

Upon seeing him, Lady Lin was utterly delighted and quietly called over Auntie Wen to ask her who he was wearing mourning for.

"He is wearing mourning for his Sixth Lady," explained Auntie Wen, "who passed away not long ago in the ninth month. At the very least, he still has at his disposal as many more ladies as the fingers on your hand. You may not be able to tell by looking at him, but he is like:

A fighting quail, just released from his cage:
Ever ready to engage."

When the woman heard this:

Her delight knew no bounds, and Auntie Wen urged her to go out and meet Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I'd be too embarrassed,"¹⁷ the woman said. "How can I put myself forward like that? Just ask him to come inside."

Auntie Wen, accordingly, went out and said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "The Lady invites Your Honor to come into her room in order to meet her."

Thereupon, she hastened to lift aside the portiere, and Hsi-men Ch'ing proceeded into the inner room, where he observed that:

The drapery consisted of hanging red curtains,¹⁸
The floor was completely covered with carpets.
Amid the fragrance of orchid and musk,
The atmosphere was as genial as that of spring.
The embroidered bed was enhanced by clouds of vapor hovering athwart the curtains;
The brocaded screen showed the radiance of the moon invading the asterism Hsüan-yüan.¹⁹

On the woman's head, she wore a headdress of gold filigree enhanced with emerald leaves. On her body, she wore a wide-sleeved jacket of white satin, over a brocaded, aloeswood-colored, crane-decorated robe of figured satin, and a wide-bordered skirt of palace-style crimson brocade. On her feet, she wore shoes of raven-hued fabric with embroidered patterns, and high white satin heels. Manifestly, she was:

An alluring and lascivious female inhabitant of ostentatious chambers;
A veritable bodhisattva of coition, dwelling in her sequestered bower.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Her face is glossy, her locks are thick,
and her brows curvaceous;
When her lotus feet are lightly animated,²⁰
she is remarkable indeed.
When intoxicated, her lusts are aroused within the bed curtains;
Only then does one come to see just how extraordinary the lady is.

Upon seeing her, Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Bent his body to perform an obeisance, saying, "Will Your Ladyship please assume the position of honor so that your pupil may pay his respects to you."

"Your Honor," said Lady Lin, "you can skip the obeisance."

But Hsi-men Ch'ing was unwilling to do so and, bending his body, proceeded to kowtow to her twice. The woman, for her part, responded in kind. When they had finished with these amenities, Hsi-men Ch'ing took his seat on a chair in the position of honor, while Lady Lin kept him company by sitting at an angle on the edge of the k'ang next to him, and leaning against a comb-back-shaped back rest. Auntie Wen had long since secured the ceremonial gate leading into the front courtyard, so that there was not a single male servant left in the rear compound. The postern gate leading into the Third Master's quarters had also been locked. A young maidservant, named Fu-jung, brought in a serving of tea on a red lacquer tray, and Lady Lin kept Hsi-men Ch'ing company while he drank it, after which the maidservant took the tea cups and their raised saucers away.

Auntie Wen then initiated the conversation, saying, "The Lady has long known that Your Honor holds a judicial appointment in the yamen of the Provincial Surveillance Commission and has presumed to send me to invite you here in order to ask a favor of you. But she doesn't know whether Your Honor will agree to her request, or not."

"I don't know what it is that her venerable Ladyship would have me do for her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I would not deceive you, sir," said Lady Lin, "but the fact is that, although my husband's family has held the hereditary post of Imperial Commissioner for generations, it is some years now since he passed away, and he had not accumulated much in the way of savings. My son is still young, and has been delicately nurtured, but has not yet qualified to succeed to his father's position. Although he is currently enrolled in the Military School, he is still immature and uneducated and is given to entertaining a number of crafty and uncouth²¹ characters who daily entice him into going out whoring and drinking with them, to the complete neglect of his family responsibilities. On several occasions I have been on the verge of reporting them to the authorities, but since I am unaccustomed to venturing outside my private quarters, I am afraid that by:

Exposing my face to the public gaze,²²

I might damage the reputation of my late husband. That is why, today, I have ventured to invite Your Honor to my humble abode in order to confide my innermost thoughts to you, which will serve as an equivalent of my lodging a formal complaint against them. It is my earnest hope that Your Honor will consent to sympathize with my feelings, and find a way of preventing this bunch of characters from continuing to prey on my son, so that he will be able to:

Correct his faults and renew himself,²³ devoting himself to mastering the requirements for public office, so that he can perpetuate the inheritance of his ancestors. If Your Honor is able to do this, you will have given him:

The favor of a new lease on life,²⁴ and I will not only:

Feel profoundly grateful to you,

but will see that you are handsomely rewarded."

"How can your venerable Ladyship bring yourself to utter the word 'reward'?" protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The members of your distinguished family have:

Worn the regalia of officials for generations, serving the court as generals and ministers. Your household is no ordinary one. Since your noble son has twice been enrolled in the Military School, he certainly ought to strive to achieve success, in order to follow in the footsteps of his ancestors, rather than succumbing to the wiles of such parasites, and allowing himself to become besotted with women and wine as so many young men do. At Your Ladyship's behest, as soon as your pupil returns to the yamen, he will see to it that this bunch of characters is appropriately disciplined. Your son will not be implicated in any way, but this may serve as a warning to him not to continue walking in the same rut and may, I hope, prevent him from doing so in the future."

When the woman heard this, she hastily got to her feet and bowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "On a future occasion, I will express my gratitude to Your Honor."

"You and I are like members of the same family," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"How can you say such a thing?"

As the two of them were:

Talking back and forth, they exchanged meaningful glances with each other. Before long, Auntie Wen set up a table and brought in a serving of wine.

Hsi-men Ch'ing intentionally refused, saying, "Your pupil has come for the first time, with a view to making your acquaintance, but has not brought a gift with him. How can he consent to accept your venerable Ladyship's magnanimous hospitality?"

"I did not anticipate that Your Honor would deign to pay me a visit," said Lady Lin, "so I was unable to make the appropriate preparations. The weather is cold, and I have supplied a meager cup of watery wine.

It is no more than a token of my esteem."

The maidservant then proceeded to pour the wine. Truly:

Golden flagons decant the rarest vintage;

Jade goblets overflow with Yang-kao wine.

Lady Lin stood up and proffered him a cup of wine, but Hsi-men Ch'ing, for his part, also got up from his seat and said, "I ought to first offer Your Ladyship a cup."

Auntie Wen, who was standing to one side, interrupted him, saying, "There is no need for Your Honor to offer Her Ladyship any wine today. The fifteenth day of the eleventh month is the Lady's birthday. Why don't you plan to deliver a present to her on that day, and wish her a happy birthday?"

"Ai-ya," exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It's a good thing you mentioned it. Today is the ninth, so it is only six days away. I will be sure to ascend her hall and wish her a happy birthday when the time comes."

"How could I be so presumptuous," responded Lady Lin with a smile, "as to put Your Honor's generosity to such a test?"

Before long, in:

Large platters and large bowls, an assortment of delicacies was put before them in a set of sixteen matched bowls. These dishes, with their:

Enticing flavors and rare ingredients,²⁵ were steaming hot, and cooked to perfection. They included sautéed chicken and fish, fried and roasted goose and duck, fastidiously prepared vegetable dishes, and rare fruits in season. Beside them:

Crimson candles blazed on high,²⁶
at their feet:

Fuel was replenished in golden braziers.

Exchanging cups as they drank,

Gaming at forfeits and playing at guess-fingers,²⁷

They joked suggestively about clouds and rain,

As the wine enhanced their lustful daring.

They continued drinking until the time when:

The lotus-shaped clepsydra dripped its last, and

The moonbeams in the window reached their height.

They both felt the effects of the Bamboo Leaf wine,²⁸

And their amorous feelings were already stimulated.

Auntie Wen had disappeared, and when they called for more wine, no one responded. Hsi-men Ch'ing, upon seeing that:

There was nobody about,
gradually:

Moved his seat closer to her,

and:

Their conversation became rather risqué.

It was not long before they reached the stage of:

Holding hands and squeezing wrists,²⁹

Rubbing shoulders and nudging elbows.

Initially, when he:

Playfully embraced her powdered neck,
the woman merely:

Smiled but did not choose to respond.³⁰

Eventually, however, the woman:

Gently parted her scarlet lips,

and Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Shot his tongue into her mouth, so that

The sound of their sucking was audible,

And their pleasantries became intimate.

Thereupon, the woman got up and closed the door to the room, after which, she:

Removed her clothes, undid her girdle, and Slightly parted the brocade bed curtains.

Across the bed there lay:

An embroidered quilt and mandarin duck pillow.³¹

The bedding was fumigated with phoenix incense.

Their jade bodies in intimate contact,

He began to fondle her creamy breasts.

It so happens that, because Hsi-men Ch'ing knew that the woman was fond of the game of breeze and moonlight, before leaving home he had picked up his bag of sexual implements and taken a dose of the Indian monk's medication. The woman discovered, by both visual and tactile means, that his male organ was extremely large, and Hsi-men Ch'ing, also, proceeded to manually stimulate her clitoris.

Devoting themselves to each other's pleasure,

Their lascivious excitement burned like fire.³²

The woman placed an absorbent mermaid silk handkerchief within reach beside the bed, while Hsi-men Ch'ing, underneath the quilt, rendered his chowrie handle rampant. Thereupon:

As he extended his apelike arms,

The butterflies were driven to madness and the bees to wantonness;

As she raised up her jade legs,

She was scarcely bashful at the clouds or embarrassed by the rain.

Truly:

Back and forth, they are both practiced hands

at amorous engagement;

What matter if her jade hairpin should happen to fall by the bedside?³³

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The tunes performed in the nuptial chamber are low-pitched and secretive;

As incense burns in the duck-shaped censer³⁴
the lucent vapor spirals upward.

Their dreams are rehearsed amid the pale liquescence of the moonlit night;

As they toss and turn on the ivory bedstead the spring colors are marvelous.

Unexpectedly, on this occasion, she has found herself with a young lothario;

When she is accustomed only to playing games with the wealthiest merchants.

Overcome with desire, she yearns for union,

In Wang I-hsüan's Mansion He Enjoys a Tryst with Lady Lin

but is so languid and enervated;
 She has to urge her Sung Yü to embark upon his own expedition to Kao-t'ang.³⁵
 As he pushes his way through the double gates that have never been locked;
 Dew comes to inundate the blossoming branch of crimson herbaceous peonies.³⁶

Hsi-men Ch'ing, on this occasion, exerted to the full the skills he had acquired during a lifetime as he dallied with the woman, and a watch and a half elapsed before he ejaculated. As for the woman:

Her hair is in disarray, her hairpins askew,
 Her blossoms withered, and her willows tired.
 The oriole's cries and swallow's twittering,
 Still continue to resonate within their ears.

After lying together:

Head to head and thigh over thigh,
 And embracing one another a while, they got up and put their clothes back on. Upon getting down from the bed, the woman:

Deftly trimmed the silver lamp's wick, opened the door of the room, and:

Gazing at the mirror, made herself up.
After calling for the maidservant to bring in some water so they could wash their hands, they:

Resumed drinking the fragrant wine,
Trading toasts in the fine vintage.

After they had exchanged three cups with each other, Hsi-men Ch'ing got up to go, and the woman was unable to detain him any longer, though she urged him repeatedly to return. Hsi-men Ch'ing bowed in consent and apologized politely for the trouble he had put her to, after which he took his leave and departed, while the woman saw him out as far as the postern gate. Auntie Wen had already opened the rear gate and called Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung to bring the horse over for him to mount for the return journey. Out on the street, the night watchman was already:

Shouting the hour and ringing his bell;
The time was late, the night was still.³⁷

Behold:

The atmosphere was pervaded with frost;
The myriad pipes of Heaven were silent.³⁸

Hsi-men Ch'ing proceeded on his way home. Concerning that evening there is nothing more to relate.

The next day, after Hsi-men Ch'ing had disposed of his routine business at the yamen, he retired to the rear chamber and summoned the adjutant and detectives assigned to the area in question and ordered them:

Thus and thus, and
So and so,

saying, "Go and find out who it is that is inveigling the third son of Imperial Commissioner Wang into the licensed quarter, and what establishments he is frequenting. Ascertain their names, and come back to report to me."

He then turned to Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling and said, "Master Wang the Third is allowing himself to be led astray. The other day, his mother importuned someone to come and tell me about it. It's not really her son's fault, but he is being led into temptation's way by this bunch of 'bare sticks.' If steps are not taken now to see that they are severely disciplined, in days to come, they are likely to end up leading the heir of this family badly astray."

"What my colleague says is true enough," responded Hsia Yen-ling. "They ought, certainly, to be apprehended."

The adjutant and detectives, upon receiving Hsi-men Ch'ing's instructions, set to work that very day and actually succeeded in ascertaining the names of the persons in question. Having made out a report on the matter, they came to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence that afternoon and presented their findings. Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that the names in the document were those of Blabbermouth Sun, Sticky Chu, Trifler Chang, Tiptoe Nieh, Yokel Sha, Stupid Yü, and Mohammedan Pai; and that the singing girls in question were Li Kuei-chieh and Ch'in Yü-chih. Picking up his writing brush, he crossed out the names of Li Kuei-chieh and Ch'in Yü-chih, as well as those of Blabbermouth Sun and Sticky Chu.

He then instructed the officers, saying, "You need only take action against Trifler Chang and the rest of those five 'bare sticks.' Arrest them for me, and deliver them to the yamen first thing in the morning."

The functionaries assented and set off on their mission. That evening, having learned that Wang the Third and the others were all drinking and playing kickball at Li Kuei-chieh's place, they concealed themselves behind the rear gate. Late at night, when the party dispersed, they arrested Trifler Chang, Tiptoe Nieh, Stupid Yü, Mohammedan Pai, and Yokel Sha, all five of them. While Blabbermouth Sun and Sticky Chu managed to hide out in one of the back rooms of the establishment, Wang the Third concealed himself under the frame of Li Kuei-chieh's bed and dared not come out. The personnel of the Li Family Establishment were thrown into such consternation that they broke into a sweat. Not knowing who was behind the proceedings, all they could do was to seek information from anyone who could learn the truth of the matter. Wang the Third spent the whole night under the bed, not daring to come out. The madam of the Li Family Establishment feared that the officers involved had been sent all the way from the Eastern Capital to make the arrests. When the fifth watch came around, she persuaded Li Ming to change into different clothes and escort Wang the Third home. The adjutant and detectives involved took Trifler Chang and the rest of them to their orderly room where they hung them up for the night.

Early the next morning, Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the yamen and took his place on the bench together with Hsia Yen-ling. The instruments of punishment were arrayed to either side. When the prisoners were led in, each of them was subjected to a squeezing and given twenty strokes with the heavy bamboo. They were beaten until:

The skin was broken, the flesh was split, and Fresh blood spurted out.
The sound of their cries shook the heavens;
Their howls of distress disturbed the earth.

Hsi-men Ch'ing exhorted them, saying, "As for the bunch of you 'bare sticks,' who devote yourselves to inveigling young men into:

Toying with the breeze in the licensed quarter,
Instead of being content to abide by their lots, you deserve to be punished severely; but, today, I am letting you off lightly with no more than these few strokes of the bamboo. If you should happen to fall into my hands again, however, you can count on being sentenced to public exposure in the cangue outside the gate of the yamen.”

He then shouted an order that the attendants should drive them out of the courtroom. As they were forced outside, they felt as though:

Whether their fates were governed by metal or by water,

There was no place for them to hide.

After having disposed of this case, the two officials retired from the bench and were enjoying a cup of tea in their private quarters, when Hsia Yen-ling said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, “The other day, I received a letter from my relative, Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü, saying that the report on the merit evaluation for the members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard has been submitted, but that the results have not yet been promulgated. Having met with my colleague here today, I propose that we should send a messenger to our colleague Lin Ch'eng-hsün, the judicial commissioner in the Huai-ch'ing office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, since that is closer to the capital, to find out if there is any further news on this head.”

“My colleague's proposal is most perspicacious,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

They then summoned one of the couriers on duty, who knelt down before them, and instructed him, saying, “We will provide you with five mace of silver for your traveling expenses. You are to set out immediately, with calling cards from each of the two of us, travel by way of the southern branch of the Yellow River to Huai-ch'ing prefecture, and present them to Battalion Commander Lin Ch'eng-hsün of the Provincial Surveillance Commission there. We want you to find out for us whether the results of the recent merit evaluations for the members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard have come down from the capital yet. That is to say, whether the formal notification from the Registry Office has been promulgated or not. It is essential that you ascertain the true facts of the matter, and return to report them to us.”

In Verdant Spring Bordello Wang Ts'ai Is Frightened Away

The courier in question took possession of the silver and the calling cards, returned to his office, put on his broad-brimmed hat of Fan-yang felt, accoutered himself for the trip, procured a horse from the stable, and set out on his long journey, while the two officials got up and went home.

To resume our story, when Trifler Chang and the rest of them were expelled from the yamen of the Surveillance Commission and found themselves wandering along the street, they were in a state of trepidation. Completely in the dark as to what had ignited the fuse that resulted in their predicament, they resorted to mutual recriminations.

"No doubt," ventured Trifler Chang, "it must, once again, be something instigated by Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch'en in the Eastern Capital."

"That's not likely," pronounced Mohammedan Pai. "If that were the case, how would he be willing to:

Let anyone lightly out of his clutches?

As the saying goes:

No one is more perverse than a singing girl;

No one is more dishonest than a silversmith;

No one is more accomplished than a 'cribber.'"

Tiptoe Nieh then chimed in, saying, "None of you seem to get it. I'm the only one who has guessed the truth. This must surely be the result of Hsi-men Ch'ing's harboring a grudge against Wang the Third for patronizing his mistress, and choosing to vent his spleen at our expense. Truly:

When the dragon battles the tiger,

The one hurt is the innocent fawn."³⁹

"Gentlemen, that may well be the case," opined Trifler Chang, "it is certainly we who are enduring the pain. Blabbermouth Sun and Pockmarked Chu were just as involved as we were, but it is we alone who are being made to take the blame."

"How can you talk so naively?" said Stupid Yü. "The two of them are friends of his. How could he bring himself to hale them into court to kneel down before him and sentence them to punishment from on high?"

"I wonder why he didn't arrest the women involved?" ventured Trifler Chang.

"The two women are both sweethearts of his," explained Tiptoe Nieh, "and Li Kuei-chieh is his mistress. He could hardly have consented to have her arrested. There's no point in trying to blame anybody. It's just our bad luck to have stumbled into this dragnet. Why do you suppose His Honor Hsia Yen-ling had nothing to say just now? It was only Hsi-men Ch'ing who did the talking. That in itself makes it clear that the fix was in. Right now, we ought to go to Li Kuei-chieh's place and try to get hold of Wang the Third. After all, it's only thanks to him that our buttocks are covered with welts and our thighs beaten to a pulp. If we can get a few taels of silver out of him as compensation, we can avoid being laughed at by our wives."

Thereupon:

Coming this way and going that way,

Rounding bends and turning corners,⁴⁰ they made their way straight to Li Kuei-chieh's establishment in the licensed quarter, where they found that the gate was:

Locked tight as an iron bucket, so that

Not even Fan K'uai himself could get through.⁴¹

They shouted out loud for what seemed like half a day before a maidservant finally responded from the other side of the door, asking who was there.

"It's us," said Trifler Chang. "We're looking to have a word with Master Wang the Third."

"He went home in the middle of the night that day," responded the maidservant. "He's not here, and there's no one else at home either, so I don't dare open the gate."

The bunch of them could think of no alternative but to go back to the residence of Imperial Commissioner Wang I-hsüan, where they barged right into the reception room and sat down. When Wang the Third heard that they had come looking for him, he was so perturbed that he hid out in his own quarters, not daring to emerge.

After what seemed like half a day, he sent his page boy, Yung-ting, out to say to them, "My master is not at home."

They responded by saying, "He's certainly bent on having an easy time of it. If he's not at home, just where has he gone to that he can't be called back from?"

"Let me remind you of the facts of the case," said Stupid Yü. "There's no use pretending that you're:

Still asleep in dreamland.

We've just been beaten in the yamen of the Provincial Surveillance Commission and then thrown out into the street. Right now, they're demanding that the Third Master make a personal appearance before the bench."

They then pulled up their clothes, exposing their thighs for Yung-ting to see, and told him to go back inside and report on the situation.

"After all," they went on to say, "the fact that we've been subjected to a beating on his account is no trivial matter."

Each and every one of them then proceeded to recline on the benches and give vent to moans and cries of pain.

As a result, Wang the Third became even more fearful of coming out and pleaded with his mother, saying, "Can't you, somehow or other, find a way of rescuing me from this situation?"

"I'm only a woman," responded Lady Lin. "How should I know how to go about persuading anyone to pull strings on your behalf?"

After he had pleaded with her for what seemed like half a day, they learned that the gang out in the reception room were getting restive and were demanding to speak with the venerable lady of the house.

Lady Lin did not go out but spoke to them from the other side of the standing screen, saying, "You will have to be patient. The fact of the matter is that he is out on our country estate and is not at home; but I will send a servant to go and summon him."

"Venerable Lady," said Trifler Chang, "you'd do well to send someone after him as soon as possible. If this boil is not lanced it will ooze pus, and letting it fester is not the thing to do. It is on his account that we have suffered this beating. When His Honor dismissed us just now, he insisted that he be turned over to the court. If he does not appear:

There can be no hope of peace,⁴² for anyone involved, and matters can only go from bad to worse."

Upon hearing this, Lady Lin lost no time in sending a page boy out to serve them with tea. Wang the Third, for his part, was as scared as the devil and pressed his mother, once again, to find someone to pull strings on his behalf.

Only after he became frantic did Lady Lin say to him, "Auntie Wen just happens to be acquainted with the household of Judicial Commissioner Hsi-men Ch'ing. Years ago, she was the go-between who proposed the betrothal of his daughter, so she is familiar with their household."

"If she is acquainted with the judicial commissioner," said Wang the Third, "send a page boy to invite her here as quickly as possible.”

“Ever since you criticized her on a former occasion,” said Lady Lin, “she’s been miffed and has stopped coming over here. Under the circumstances, how can we invite her? She’s unlikely to come.”

“My good mother,” said Wang the Third, “things have reached the crisis stage. Invite her here, and I will humble myself so far as to beg her pardon.”

Lady Lin then agreed to send Yung-ting on this errand, saying, “Go out the rear gate as quietly as possible, and invite Auntie Wen to come over here.”

Wang the Third implored her, again and again, saying, “Auntie Wen, if you are acquainted with the judicial commissioner, His Honor Hsi-men Ch’ing, pray use whatever influence you can to rescue me from this predicament.”

Auntie Wen deliberately made a specious show of emphasizing the difficulties involved, saying, “Although it is true that, in the past, it was I who proposed the betrothal of his daughter, it has been some years now since I have had any occasion to cross his threshold. When it comes to such prominent families, with their:

Vast courtyards and secluded mansions,
I don’t venture to trouble them.”

Wang the Third hastily knelt down in front of her and said, “Auntie Wen:

You shall have an ample reward;⁴³

I will never dare to forget it.

That bunch of people up front are insisting that I appear in court. How can I afford to do that?”

Auntie Wen kept her eyes fixed on his mother, who eventually said, “You might as well see if you can intervene on his behalf.”

“There’s no point in my going by myself,” said Auntie Wen. “Third Master, you must put on formal attire and let me take you to visit His Honor Hsi-men Ch’ing’s house in person. If you will pay your respects to him and plead with him, while I speak up from the sidelines on your behalf, I guarantee that this problem, great as it is, can be brought to a successful conclusion.”

“Right now,” said Wang the Third, “that bunch of characters up front are pressing their demands most vociferously. If they should happen to catch sight of me, what would I do?”

“As for that problem,” said Auntie Wen:

“What’s the difficulty there?⁴⁴

Let me go out and see what I can do to placate them. If you will provide wine and meat, refreshments and tea, they can be beguiled into partaking of them, while I surreptitiously sneak you out by the rear gate, fulfill our mission, and return, without their having so much as an inkling of what we are about.”

Auntie Wen, thereupon, went out to the front reception room, bowed twice to the assembled group, and said, “The lady of the house has asked me to come out and respectfully explain to you gentlemen that the Third Master has really gone to their country estate and is not at home. She has sent someone to ask him to come back, and he should be here sometime soon if you will only consent to remain sitting here a little while longer. It’s a pity that your implication in this affair has resulted in your suffering such punishment and vituperation; and your feelings are just as understandable as the fact that:

We are all dependent on salt and rice.

When the Third Master returns, he will surely treat you with the consideration you deserve.

No matter how egregiously wrong a verdict may be,

The men deputed to carry it out are not to blame.⁴⁵

After all, the only thing everybody wants is to settle the matter amicably.

Since you are here under official orders,

You have no choice but to do as directed.⁴⁶

Once the Third Master appears, this problem, great as it is, can be brought to a successful conclusion.”

At this, the group of them responded as with a single voice, saying, “It is Auntie Wen who truly understands the situation. If you had only come out earlier and spoken to us in such a reasonable way, we would not have become as agitated as all this. Instead, we were told, in the most obdurate terms, that he was not at home, as though they believed that this was merely a pickle that we had gotten ourselves into, when, in fact, it was he who was actually responsible for the fact that we were subjected to a judicial beating. Do you really think that when the authorities demand your appearance, you can merely pretend not to be at home, and continue:

Drinking wine or eating meat, while getting others to suffer in your stead? Auntie Wen, you are amenable to reason. Since you’ve come out to speak to us, we can suggest a way of coping with the situation. All they need to do is spend some money to purchase a little favorable influence, and the matter can be settled to everyone’s satisfaction. If you had not come out to parley with us, the matter would certainly have had to be adjudicated. A yamen charged with penal investigations is not likely to drop the case for nothing.”

“What you gentlemen say makes sense,” responded Auntie Wen. “If you will remain sitting here a while longer, I’ll speak to the lady, and also have her provide some wine and refreshments for you. You’ve already been here for half a day and must be hungry.”

“It is only our Auntie Wen,” they said with one voice, “who really:

Understands man’s vicissitudes.⁴⁷

The truth of the matter is that ever since we were driven out of the yamen, we haven’t had so much as a taste of yellow soup.”

Auntie Wen then returned to the rear of the compound and saw to the purchase of two mace of silver’s worth of wine, and a mace of silver's worth of other refreshments, including pork, lamb, and beef, which were duly chopped up to fill several large platters, and taken out to serve to them. Thus she succeeded in inveigling them into turning their attention to feasting upon these:

Unlimited quantities of meat and wine, in the front reception room.

Meanwhile, Wang the Third put on his scholar's cap and robe, wrote out a message on a calling card, and, with Auntie Wen leading the way, donned his eye-shades, sneaked inconspicuously out the rear gate, and set out to walk to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence.

When they arrived at the front gate, P'ing-an, who recognized Auntie Wen, said, "Father has been in the front reception hall, but has just gone inside. What does Auntie Wen wish to speak to him about?"

Auntie Wen handed him Wang the Third's calling card and said, "Brother, may I trouble you to report this gentleman's arrival."

Hastily turning to Wang the Third, she asked him for two mace of silver and handed it to P'ing-an. Only then did he consent to go inside and report the situation to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing looked at the accordion-bound calling card, he saw that it read, "Your humble pupil Wang Ts'ai:

Presents his compliments with a hundred salutations."⁴⁸

He first called in Auntie Wen to interrogate her about the situation and then opened the latticed door to the great reception hall and sent a page boy to invite Wang the Third to come in. When the attendants in the great reception hall hastily lifted aside the portiere that was hanging over the door to keep in the heat, they revealed that Hsi-men Ch'ing, with a "loyal and tranquil hat" on his head, and dressed in informal garb, was coming out to receive him.

Upon seeing that Wang the Third was formally attired, Hsi-men Ch'ing made a point of saying, "Auntie Wen, why didn't you tell me beforehand? I'm here in my informal clothes."

He then turned to his attendants, saying, "Bring me my formal clothing."

This threw Wang the Third into such consternation that he stepped forward to stop him, exclaiming, "Distinguished elder, make yourself easy. Your humble junior has made bold to come and impose upon you. How could I presume to put you to any inconvenience?"

Upon entering the reception hall, Wang the Third made a point of asking Hsi-men Ch'ing to assume the position of honor so that he could kowtow to him, but Hsi-men Ch'ing repeatedly demurred, saying with a smile, "This is my humble abode, after all."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then seized the initiative by paying the first reverence to his visitor.

"Your humble junior," said Wang the Third, "is guilty of a transgression. I have long been an admirer of yours but have failed to pay you my respects."

"Let us both dispense with further formalities," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Wang the Third, however, persisted in begging Hsi-men Ch'ing to accept his obeisance, saying, "As your humble junior, it is only appropriate that my venerable elder should accept my obeisance in order to atone for my failure to pay you my respects any earlier."

After an exchange of polite demurrals, Hsi-men Ch'ing finally permitted him to kowtow to him twice, after which he was offered a seat and sat down respectfully on the edge of his chair.

After a little while, tea was served, and Wang the Third saw that in Hsi-men Ch'ing's reception hall:

Brocaded standing screens were arrayed;

on the four walls were suspended scrolls depicting landscapes in golds and greens; the chairs were adorned with inlaid patterns and draped with green brocaded silk; while their seats were provided with sable cushions; and beneath them:

The entire floor was covered with rugs.⁴⁹

In the middle of the room there stood a four-cornered brazier of yellow brass, polished:

With a glitter that rivaled the sun's.

Under the plaque over the door was an inscription reading "Bestowed by Imperial Favor" in the distinctive calligraphy of Mi Fu.⁵⁰

Upon surveying these surroundings, Wang the Third appeared somewhat more composed, as he addressed Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Your humble junior has a matter that he is reluctant to trouble Your Eminence with."

So saying, he reached into his sleeve to extract his written statement of the case and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, getting up from his seat in order to do so, and kneeling down in front of him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing reached out a hand to help him up, saying, "My worthy acquaintance, if you have something to say to me, there is no reason not to say it."

Wang the Third then said, "Your humble junior is devoid of talent and is genuinely guilty of an offense. It is my earnest hope that my venerable elder, out of consideration for the position of my late father as a high-ranking military official, will consent to be lenient toward your humble junior's ignorant offense. If you will but allow him to preserve his sense of shame by relieving him of the necessity to appear in court, you will spare your humble junior from imminent death and confer upon him the good fortune of a return to life. He will:

Carry rings and knot grass in order to repay you,⁵¹

And awaits your decision in fear and trepidation."⁵²

When Hsi-men Ch'ing opened the document and observed that it contained the names of the five "cribbers," Trifler Chang and the rest, he said, "As for this bunch of 'bare sticks,' I have already dealt with them in the yamen today by punishing them severely and then letting them go. What business do they have trying to put the bite on you?"

"They are demanding that I do thus and so," said Wang the Third. "They claim that my venerable elder, after presiding over their punishment in the yamen, drove them out with the promise that your humble junior would also be required to appear in court. They have chosen to camp out in my home, where they are swearing oaths and raising a ruckus, and demanding monetary compensation, so that:

Peaceful existence is utterly impossible.⁵³

Having no other recourse, I have come to my venerable elder's home to acknowledge my guilt."

So saying, he also handed over his list of proposed gifts.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw it, he said, "Whoever heard of such a thing?"

He then went on to say, "This bunch of 'bare sticks' are truly detestable. I actually let them off, so what business do they have going anywhere else to make trouble?"

Giving the list of proposed gifts back to Wang the Third, he continued, "My worthy acquaintance, please return home. I won't keep you any longer. Right now, I will dispatch people forthwith to arrest this bunch of 'bare sticks,' and, in days to come, I am prepared to put myself at your disposal."

"How could I presume upon such a thing?" responded Wang the Third. "Since my venerable elder has seen fit not to reject my request, I will be sure to return to your door in the future in order to express my humble thanks."

So saying, with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude,

he started out the door.

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw him off as far as the second gate before saying, "Since I am wearing my informal clothes, it would not be appropriate for me to escort you any further."

Wang the Third continued out through the main gate, put his eye-shades back on, and went his way, accompanied by a page boy, while Auntie Wen requested a further word with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Don't do anything to alarm them," Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed her. "I will dispatch people to arrest them right away."

Auntie Wen caught up with Wang the Third, and the two of them made their way surreptitiously back into the house.

Unbeknownst to them, Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly dispatched an adjutant and four orderlies, who marched straight into Imperial Commissioner Wang's residence, where they found the bunch of 'bare sticks' drinking wine and raising a ruckus as before. When these functionaries barged in and:

Without permitting any further explanation, proceeded to arrest them, and put them in handcuffs, they were so frightened:

Their complexions turned the color of dirt.⁵⁴

"Wang the Third has played a nice trick on us," they objected. "He induced us to stay put in his house, while reversing the angle of the hoe and turning us over like the clods that we are."

The orderlies and the adjutant took them to task, saying, "You characters had better stop talking such nonsense. What good will it do you? Each of you should be preparing to plead for his life in front of His Honor. That would be more like it."

"What you gentlemen suggest is correct," responded Trifler Chang.

Before long, they were all escorted under guard to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence, where the orderlies at the gate, and P'ing-an as well, all stuck out their hands and demanded a bribe before they would go inside and announce their arrival. The bunch of them had no recourse but to divest themselves of their jackets, or take the hairnet rings off their heads, to comply with these demands, before they were directed to proceed inside. After what seemed like half a day, Hsi-men Ch'ing came out and seated himself in the reception hall as though he were presiding over a court of law, while the adjutant ushered the culprits in and directed them to kneel at the foot of the hall.

Hsi-men Ch'ing upbraided them, saying, "What am I to do with you bunch of 'bare sticks'? I treated you leniently, after all, so what business did you have claiming to speak for my yamen, and going to his home in the attempt to extort money from him? Tell me the truth. Just how much money did you manage to extort? If you don't tell me, I'll order my attendants to put the squeezers on you and give you a real squeezing."

He had no sooner uttered these words than the orderlies in attendance promptly brought out five or six sets of brand new squeezers and stood ready to apply them.

Trifler Chang and the rest of them had no recourse but to kowtow to him in their abased position and plead with him, saying, "Your humble servants did not extort so much as a candareen in the way of compensation from anybody. All we did was to relate the fact that we had been driven out of the yamen, and request the opportunity to explain the situation to him. His household even provided wine and food for our entertainment. We never attempted to extort anything from him."

"You never should have gone to his home in the first place," pronounced Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You bunch of 'bare sticks' make it your business to take advantage of young men of good family and always have your hands out for whatever you can get out of them. Such conduct is truly reprehensible. As long as you won't confess the truth, I'll have you taken to the yamen and incarcerated there. Tomorrow, I'll subject you to a severe interrogation, obtain your confessions, and sentence you to public exposure in the cangue."

The group of them, as one man, pled for mercy as they wept, saying, "Your Heavenly Honor, save our lives, we pray. Your humble servants will never presume to approach his door again in order to make trouble for him. Not to mention public exposure, to imprison us in these cold winter months is tantamount to a death sentence."

"What am I to do with you 'bare sticks'?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I tell you that if I let you go, I expect you to:

Cleanse your hearts and correct your faults, devoting yourselves to making an honest living. You must cease:

Colluding with the bordellos in the quarter, to lead young men astray and cheat them out of their possessions. If you are ever haled before my yamen again, I will have you all beaten to death."

He then shouted, "Get out of here," and the bunch of them, feeling lucky to have escaped with their lives, flew outside as fast as they could go. Truly:

Breaking to pieces the jade cage,
the phoenix flies away;
Smashing apart the metal padlock,
the dragon breaks free.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, having thus disposed of the bunch of them, returned to the rear compound, where Yüeh-niang asked him, "Was this something to do with Wang the Third?"

"It does indeed have to do with the third son of Imperial Commissioner Wang," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the same one who was responsible for that fix that Li Kuei-chieh got herself into some time ago. And today, that lousy little whore has not changed her ways but has taken up with him again. He has been maintaining her as his mistress for a fee of thirty taels of silver a month. No wonder she has been hoodwinking me all this time. But what she did not anticipate was that there was an insider involved who explained the situation to me, so that, yesterday, I dispatched some minions to apprehend this bunch of scamps and bring them before me in the yamen, where I had them put in the squeezers and subjected to a beating. But who could have anticipated that this bunch of scamps would go to his home and kick up a fuss in the hope of shaking him down for a few taels of silver? Fearing that his presence would be demanded in the yamen, and never having appeared in court before, he was thrown into such consternation that he importuned Auntie Wen into coming with a written offer of fifty taels of silver if I would intervene on his behalf. Just now, I had these characters brought back before me here and bombarded them with enough in the way of empty threats to keep them from bothering him anymore.

"His family is unfortunate to have spawned such an unworthy young man. Your ancestors established a firm foundation for the household, serving as imperial commissioners, and you are currently enrolled in the Military School, but you have chosen not to pursue the opportunities for success that are yours for the asking. You deliberately neglect the wife you have at home, though she is as pretty as a sprig of blossoms, the niece of Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch'ên in the Eastern Capital, paying her no heed, while, day and night, you choose instead to tag along after this bunch of 'bare sticks,' giving yourself over to debauchery in the licensed quarter. He has even gone so far as to pawn his wife's jewelry when in need of spending money. This year, he is no more than twenty years old, still only a youngster, but he will never amount to anything."

Yüeh-niang responded, "Why don't you:

Piddle a bladderful of piss, and
Take a look at your own reflection?

You're like:

A raven scoffing at the blackness of a pig.⁵⁵

Truly:

The lampstand casts no light upon itself.⁵⁶

You may well think you have the capacity to amount to something yourself, but:

You too have drunk water from that well.
There's nothing you won't do.

What's so pure about your own conduct that you should have the right to criticize the conduct of others?"

With these few words she managed to reduce Hsi-men Ch'ing to silence.

Just as their meal was being served to them, the page boy Lai-an came in and reported, "Master Ying the Second is here."

"Ask him to have a seat in the studio," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll be right there."

Wang Ching promptly proceeded to open the door to the studio by the front reception hall, and Ying Po-chüeh went inside and sat down on a chair beside the heated k'ang. Sometime later, Hsi-men Ch'ing came outside, exchanged salutations with him, and then sat down on the k'ang so the two of them could have a chat together.

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "how is it that, the day before yesterday, when we were at Hsieh Hsi-ta's place, you got up to go so early?"

"I had to get an early start the following day," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've been busy at the yamen for days on end. Moreover, since I am subject to an impending merit evaluation, I have had to send someone to the Eastern Capital to see if he could pick up any news of the outcome. I am scarcely to be compared with the likes of you who have nothing else to do."

"Brother," continued Ying Po-chüeh, "have you really been tied up at the yamen for days on end?"

"Not a day goes by without something to keep me busy," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Wang the Third tells me," went on Ying Po-chüeh, "that you dispatched people from the yamen on the evening of the tenth and arrested Trifler Chang and company, all five of them, at Li Kuei-chieh's place, allowing only Blabbermouth Sun and Pockmarked Chu to escape. This morning, moreover, you had them brought before you at the yamen and subjected them to a beating before throwing them out. The bunch of them have all subsequently gone to the residence of Imperial Commissioner Wang. Why have you kept me in the dark and failed to tell me about it?"

"You silly dog!" expostulated Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Whoever told you such a thing? You must have heard incorrectly. It wasn't my yamen, but it may have been the office of Chou Hsiu, the commandant of the Regional Military Command."

"The office of the Regional Military Command," opined Ying Po-chüeh, "would hardly concern itself with such trivial matters."

"I fear then," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it must have been someone from the district yamen who arrested them."

"That's not the case," said Ying Po-chüeh. "This morning, Li Ming told me that the members of their whole establishment were scared out of their wits, and that Li Kuei-chieh was so frightened that she took to her bed and hasn't gotten up and about for the last two days, simply keeping to her k'ang. They feared that, once again, it was men who had been sent down from the Eastern Capital to make the arrests. Only this morning, upon making inquiries, did they discover that it was the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission that had ordered the arrests."

"I haven't really been to the yamen the last few days," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and don't know anything about it. I've sworn an oath not to have anything further to do with Li Kuei-chieh, so what do I care if she has chosen to get herself into a predicament that scares her into taking to her bed?"

Ying Po-chüeh saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing's face was puffed out as though he were trying to contain a laugh and said, "Brother, what sort of a person are you, that you should even try to pull the wool over my eyes, and keep me in the dark? Since Li Ming told me about things today, I understand what you're up to in letting Pockmarked Chu and Blabbermouth Sun off the hook. After all, a judicial yamen like yours is unlikely to let people escape so easily. This is a case of your contriving things so that:

When the sheep is beaten, the colt and donkey tremble.

You just wanted to put the fear of God into Li Kuei-chieh's outfit so they would be reminded of what you're capable of. If you had dragged everyone involved into the yamen, you would have ruptured your relationships with them and created a lot of bad feelings.

Although you have taken the first step,

You are not obliged to take the second, and, as a result, right now, when Blabbermouth Sun and Pockmarked Chu run into you, they are bound to feel somewhat discomfited. This scheme of yours is an instance of:

Conspicuously repairing the cliffside roadways,

While surreptitiously emerging at Ch'en-ts'ang.⁵⁷

I trust you will not take offense, Brother, if I say that this is a brilliant ploy on your part. As the saying goes:

A Perfected Being does not reveal himself as such;

Were he to do so, he would not be a Perfected Being.⁵⁸

If you were openly to play a trick of this kind, you would reveal your true colors and not be the clever character that you are. Brother, you are truly a master strategist and a man of capacious vision."

On hearing these few words, Hsi-men Ch'ing broke out laughing and said, "Since when am I any master strategist?"

"My guess would be," said Ying Po-chüeh, "that there certainly must have been some insider who told you the whole story. If not, how could you ever have ascertained the facts so accurately, or been able to employ such:

Devices beyond the ken of ghosts or spirits?"⁵⁹

"You silly dog!" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"The best way to avoid being found out,

Is not to do it in the first place."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "at present, you would be well advised not to demand Wang the Third's appearance in court, that's all."

"Who is demanding that he do any such thing?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Originally, when the functionaries presented the bill of particulars about the case, I personally struck out the names of Wang the Third, Pockmarked Chu, and Blabbermouth Sun, as well as those of Li Kuei-chieh and Ch'in Yü-chih, ordering them only to arrest that bunch of 'bare sticks.'"

"So why are they still bothering him right now?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"The truth of the matter is," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that they expected to be able to extort a few taels of silver out of him. How could they have anticipated that, just now, he would personally come to pay me a visit, kowtow to me, and offer an apology for his misbehavior? I consequently sent people to round up those 'bare sticks' and threatened to sentence them to public exposure in the cangue, whereupon they all pled for mercy and repeatedly promised that they would never dare make demands upon him again. Wang the Third, for his part, addressing me again and again as his venerable elder, presented me with a gift card offering me fifty taels of silver. I refused to accept anything from him, but he promised that he would invite me to his place sometime soon in order to express his gratitude."

"Really, he actually came to your place to apologize for his misbehavior?" asked Ying Po-chüeh in astonishment.

"Surely you don't suggest that I would deceive you," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, who then called for Wang Ching and told him, "Go fetch that calling card from Wang the Third and show it to Master Ying the Second."

Wang Ching went back to the master suite and brought out the calling card, which read, "Your humble pupil Wang Ts'ai:

Presents his compliments with a hundred salutations."

When Ying Po-chüeh saw this, all he could do was to exclaim:

Expressing the most fulsome admiration,

“Brother, your schemes are:

Both marvelous and inscrutable.”

“If you run into any of them,” Hsi-men Ch’ing admonished Ying Po-chüeh, “don’t reveal the fact that I had any prior knowledge of the situation.”

“I understand,” said Ying Po-chüeh:

“The secret must not be disclosed.

How could I presume to say anything about it?”

After they had visited together for a while, and consumed a serving of tea, Ying Po-chüeh said, “Brother, I’d better be on my way. If, by any chance, Blabbermouth Sun and Pockmarked Chu should find their way here, don’t tell them that I’ve been to see you.”

“If they should come here,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “I won’t even receive them, but have the servants report that I’m not at home.”

He then called in the people responsible for the front gate and told them, “If either of those persons should show up, simply report that I am not at home.”

From this time on, Hsi-men Ch’ing refused to have anything more to do with Li Kuei-chieh and, when entertaining at home, no longer engaged Li Ming to sing for the company, so his relations with the Li Family Establishment became cool. Truly:

After last night’s rainfall along the Flower-washing Stream;⁶⁰

The green willows and fragrant verdure⁶¹ remain for whom to see?⁶²

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Who is able to visit the T’ien-t’ai Mountains in pursuit of immortal maidens?⁶³

The Three Isles of the Blest remain invisible, hidden amid the waves of the sea.⁶⁴

To vanish inside a nobleman’s gates is to be as unreachable as the ocean depths;

From this point on, one’s lover might as well be a stranger along the highway.⁶⁵

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 70

HSI-MEN CH'ING'S SUCCESSFUL EFFORTS PROCURE HIM A PROMOTION; ASSEMBLED OFFICIALS REPORT BEFORE DEFENDER-IN-CHIEF CHU MIEN

Last night, carried by the west wind, drums and bugles resounded;
At daybreak, in the bitter chill, one shivers under the cold felt.
Wrapped in impenetrable mist, the ground appears entirely invisible;
Spreading vastly in all four directions,
all one can see is the sky.
Fancy accommodations, under such desolate conditions, are not available;
Even the hero Li Kuang was forced to tarry at the Pa-ling relay station.¹
My patron, a virtual embodiment of Spring,² dispenses oceanlike favors;
May he set aside some of his residual warmth to bestow upon this sojourner.

THE STORY GOES that, from this time on, Hsi-men Ch'ing broke off relations with Li Kuei-chieh. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when the courier arrived at Judicial Commissioner Lin Ch'eng-hsün's place in Huai-ch'ing prefecture to inquire about the news, the commissioner gave him a sealed copy of the announcement of official promotions in the government gazette and rewarded him with five taels of silver. The courier set out on his return journey that very night and, upon arriving home, turned over the sealed material to the two judicial commissioners.

In the reception hall of the yamen, Hsia Yen-ling opened the envelope and, together with Hsi-men Ch'ing, perused the formal notification of the results of the merit evaluation for the members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, the relevant parts of which read as follows:

Memorial from the Ministry of War

In re: The Strict Merit Evaluation of the Members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, as Ordained by Explicit Imperial Command, in Order to Clarify the Grounds of Motivation and Discipline, and Glorify Your Majesty's Sage Administration

Submitted by Chu Mien, Defender-in-Chief in Charge of all the Officers and Staff of the Embroidered Uniform Guard Unit of the Imperial Insignia Guard, and Concurrently Grand Guardian, and Grand Guardian of the Heir Apparent

With regard to the above-mentioned evaluation of the officers of the Imperial Guard, this senior official will submit a report on his own conduct. As for the remainder, including the two divisions of detectives attached to the Imperial Prison under the jurisdiction of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, and the investigators, inspectors, and surveillance commissioners attached thereto, the director of the horse pasturages of the imperial domain and the inner and outer Capital Surveillance Commissions, as well as the battalion and company commanders serving under them, and the judges of the military guards, etc., they have all been classified on the basis of the dossiers that indicate whether their posts are hereditary, due to routine promotion, promotion for merit, privilege, or purchase. On the basis of their seniority and qualifications, they have all been fairly evaluated as to their worthiness, or lack thereof, and the results are hereby reported to Your Majesty with the request that they be sent to the appropriate board for further discussion as to the appropriate promotions, demotions, transfers, or dismissals.

This memorial elicited an imperial rescript that read as follows:

Upon being returned to the Ministry of War, let this memorial be:

Respectfully received and respectfully acted upon.

A copy of this edict was duly received by the Office of Scrutiny, and transmitted to the above ministry. Upon its perusal by the Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien, in accordance with established precedent, the said official proceeded to do everything in his power to demonstrate his loyalty by conducting an impartial evaluation. It is his responsibility to determine the worthiness, or lack thereof, of all the military officials subordinate to him, whether serving in or outside the capital, on the basis of their dossiers and public opinion, while ensuring that the reports he has received on them are both honest and without prejudice. By so doing, the said official exhibits his awareness of his proximity to the imperial presence, on the one hand, and his loyal concern for the welfare of the state, on the other. It goes without saying that differentiating into categories those who deserve encouragement, while distinguishing between the worthy and the unworthy in an orderly manner,³ provides motivation for human ambition and accords with the public's sense of justice. But magnanimity and severity, rewards and punishments, are the prerogative of Your Majesty and, upon receipt of Your mandate, will be meted out in accordance with precedent. It is to be hoped that, if the evaluations are cogent, they will command general assent, and if redundant posts are eliminated, bureaucratic discipline will be enhanced.

The imperial rescript elicited by this memorial read:

Let this memorial be respectfully received and the recommendations therein be enacted as proposed.

The relevant parts of the evaluation read as follows:

As for the judicial commissioner of the Shantung Provincial Surveillance Commission, and concurrently battalion commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, Hsia Yen-ling, his qualifications and reputation are long-standing, and his talent and experience are well established. In the past, when in charge of herds in the horse pasturages of the imperial domain, the area of his jurisdiction was tranquil; and now that he presides over judicial matters in Shantung, his reputation for effective government is outstanding. It is appropriate that his ambitions should be encouraged by promotion to the post of commander of the escort for imperial processions.

As for the assistant judicial commissioner, and concurrently battalion vice-commander, Hsi-men Ch'ing, his abilities and initiative have long been acknowledged to be exceptional. Since his family is affluent, he has not been acquisitive in office. He is diligent and industrious in his support of the national interest, and his censorial work has been meritorious. In facilitating the Divine Shipments of the Flower and Rock Convoys he has scrupulously avoided any peculation. For his administration of the laws he is universally admired by the people of Shantung. It is appropriate that he be promoted to the post of full commissioner in order to preside over the judicial system.

As for the commissioner of the Huai-ch'ing office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, and battalion commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, Lin Ch'eng-hsün, having been an assiduous student in his youth, he has won a place in the military recruitment examinations, entitling him to succeed to a hereditary office. He is a man of no ordinary ambition, who is meticulous in performing his judicial functions. It is appropriate that he be encouraged by selection for a higher position.

As for the assistant judicial commissioner and battalion vice commander Hsieh En, he exhibits the effects of old age and is inconsistent in the way he dispenses lenience and severity. Previously, when he served in the ranks, his performance was respectable enough, but since he has occupied a judicial office, his incapacity for the position has become increasingly evident. It is appropriate that he be cashiered and dismissed from office.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that he was to be promoted to the post of full judicial commissioner:

His heart was filled with great joy;⁴

but when Hsia Yen-ling saw that he was to be promoted to the post of commander of the escort for imperial processions, he had nothing to say for what seemed like half a day, and:

The color drained out of his visage.⁵

They then opened and read the enclosed copy of a memorial from the Ministry of Works, submitted upon the completion of the Divine Shipments of the Flower and Rock Convoys, that read as follows:

Memorial from the Ministry of Works

In re: The Arrival in the Capital of the Divine Shipments of the Flower and Rock Convoys Is an Occasion for Celestial and Human Celebration. We Urgently Request a Demonstration of Your Majesty's Benevolence in Deigning to Bestow the Appropriate Rewards, in Order to Relieve the Distress of the Masses,⁶ While Broadening the Scope of Your Sage Magnanimity

The imperial rescript elicited by this memorial read:

These Divine Shipments of the Flower and Rock Convoys, which are intended to supply the needs of the Forbidden City, and facilitate the completion of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, have been carried out at Our behest, and enhanced Our gratification. You have exerted your efforts to assist Us in Our pursuit of the ultimate goal of serving the school of the Mysterious Origin.

In the localities through which the Flower and Rock Convoys passed, it is acknowledged that the common people have been made to suffer privation. It is hereby ordered that the offices of the grand coordinators and regional investigating censors should clearly investigate the facts⁷ and remit one-half of the annual land taxes due this year from the affected regions. As for the embankments and dikes that have been destroyed, your ministry must send officials to join with the grand coordinators and censors in having them repaired forthwith. When this work is completed, we will depute the palace attendant Meng Ch'ang-ling⁸ to go to the areas in question and offer a sacrifice on Our behalf.

Ts'ai Ching, Li Pang-yen, Wang Wei,⁹ Cheng Chü-chung,¹⁰ and Kao Ch'iu, who lend their support to Our Person by serving in the Inner Court, have all been distinguished for their meritorious efforts in facilitating this undertaking. Let Ts'ai Ching be granted the title of grand preceptor, Li Pang-yen be granted the titles of pillar of state and grand preceptor of the heir apparent, Wang Wei be granted the title of grand mentor, and Cheng Chü-chung and Kao Ch'iu be granted the title of grand guardian; and let each of them be rewarded with fifty taels of silver and enough fabric to supply both exterior and lining for four sets of clothing. Let Ts'ai Yu also be granted the privilege of having his son, Ts'ai Hsing,¹¹ appointed as director of the Palace Administration.

The preceptor of state, Lin Ling-su,¹² clearly understands what We are hoping to accomplish by protecting the realm, proclaiming the means of transformation, conveying the Divine Shipments from a distance, and launching a northern expedition against the barbarian invaders, all of which things are truly undertaken with divine sanction. Let him be awarded the additional rank of Earl of Loyalty and Filiality, with an annual stipend of a thousand piculs of grain, be presented with a dragon robe featuring a roundel with the motif of a full-face coiled dragon,¹³ be granted the privilege of riding into the palace in a sedan chair, and be rewarded further with the titles the Supreme Patriarch of the Jade Perfected,¹⁴ the Perfect Man of Profound Lucidity, Mysterious Subtlety, and Broad Virtue, the Feathered Sojourner from the Golden Portal,¹⁵ and the Master of Penetrating Perfection, Realized Numinousness, and Mysterious Subtlety.¹⁶

Chu Mien and Huang Ching-ch'en have shown commendable loyalty and diligence in supervising the Divine Shipments of the Flower and Rock Convoys. Let Chu Mien be granted the additional titles of grand mentor and grand mentor of the heir apparent, and Huang Ching-ch'en be granted the title of defender-in-chief of the Palace Command and put in charge of the Supervisorate of Palace Transport. Let each of them also be granted the privilege of having one son appointed battalion commander in the Imperial Insignia Guard.

Let the palace attendants Li Yen, Meng Ch'ang-ling, Chia Hsiang, Ho Hsin, and Lan Ts'ung-hsi¹⁷ be granted the title of the Five Court Attendants of the Yen-fu Palace.¹⁸ Let them each be presented with a python robe and a jade girdle, and be granted the privilege of having one younger brother or nephew appointed to the substantive post of battalion vice commander in the Imperial Insignia Guard.

Let the minister of rites Chang Pang-ch'ang,¹⁹ the left vice minister of rites and academician Ts'ai Yu, the right vice minister of rites Pai Shih-chung,²⁰ the minister of war Yü Shen, and the minister of works Lin Shu²¹ all be granted the title of grand guardian of the heir apparent, and let each of them be further rewarded with forty taels of silver and enough variegated satin to supply both exterior and lining for two sets of clothing.

Let the grand coordinator of Liang-Che, and concurrently assistant censor-in-chief, Chang Ko,²² be promoted to the post of right vice minister of the Ministry of Works. Let the grand coordinator of Shantung, and concurrently censor-in-chief, Hou Meng be promoted to the post of chief minister of the Court of Imperial Sacrifices. Let the regional investigating censors of Liang-Che and Shantung, Yin Taliang²³ and Sung Ch'iao-nien, as well as the secretaries of the Bureau of Irrigation and Transportation in the Ministry of Works, An Ch'en and Wu Hsün, each be promoted one class in rank, and be rewarded with twenty taels of silver.

Let the battalion commanders who facilitated the Divine Shipments of the Flower and Rock Convoys Wei Ch'eng-hsün, Hsü Hsiang, Yang T'ing-p'ei, Ssu Feng-i, Chao Yu-lan, Fu T'ien-tse, Hsi-men Ch'ing, T'ien Chiu-kao, etc., each be promoted one class in rank.

Let the palace attendants Sung T'ui, etc., and the commanders of training divisions Wang Yu, etc., be rewarded with ten taels of silver; the battalion officers Hsüeh Hsien-chung, etc., be rewarded with five taels of silver; and the commandants Ch'ang Yü, etc., be rewarded with two lengths of silk.

Let these orders be directed to the attention of the appropriate offices.

When Hsia Yen-ling and Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished reading these documents, they left the yamen and returned home.

That afternoon, Wang the Third sent Yung-ting and Auntie Wen to deliver a letter box containing a gold-flecked accordion-bound invitation to Hsi-men Ch'ing, inviting him to a dinner party in his mansion on the eleventh day of the month as a meager expression of gratitude for the favor he had shown him. Upon receiving this missive, Hsi-men Ch'ing was:

Unable to contain his delight, and assumed that it would not be long before Wang the Third's wife fell into his hands.

Who could have anticipated, however, that on the evening of the tenth a formal notification arrived from the Registry Office of the Embroidered Uniform Guard in the Eastern Capital, that read:

For the information of the judicial officers of all the provinces.

You must proceed to the capital as quickly as possible in order to arrive in time to present your memorials of gratitude to the throne at an audience on the Winter Solstice.

This order is not to be disobeyed, or

You will suffer for your culpability.²⁴

After having read this, the next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the yamen and, together with Hsia Yen-ling, wrote acknowledgments in accordion-bound albums and sent them off with the courier. But no more of this.

Each of them then returned to their homes, got together their luggage, prepared the customary presentation gifts, and arranged with each other to set out without delay.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Tai-an to summon Auntie Wen and told her to inform Wang the Third that he would be unable to make it to the dinner party to which he had been invited on the eleventh, because, thus and so, he had to go to the capital to attend an audience and express his gratitude to the throne.

Upon hearing this, Wang the Third said, "If my venerable elder has business to attend to, I will be happy to wait until his return before extending another invitation with the utmost sincerity."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then summoned Pen the Fourth, told him that he wanted him to accompany him on the trip, and gave him five taels of silver to cover his household expenses while he was away. He left Ch'un-hung behind to look after the household but took Tai-an and Wang Ching with him to attend to his needs on the road. He also borrowed four police officers and four ponies from Commandant Chou Hsiu, saw that the luggage was properly packed up, and arranged for a closed sedan chair, a horse, and orderlies to carry the sedan chair. Hsia Yen-ling, for his part, was accompanied by his servant Hsia Shou. The two officials, between them, had an entourage of more than twenty persons.

They set out from Ch'ing-ho district on the twelfth day of the month.

It was winter when the days are short, and

They traveled both by day and by night.

When they reached Huai-ch'ing prefecture in Huai-hsi and called upon Battalion Commander Lin Ch'eng-hsün, they found that he had already departed for the Eastern Capital. Along the way:

When cold, they sat in their sedan chairs;

When warm, they made their way on horseback.

Each morning they tramped the purple road and red dust;²⁵

Every evening they stayed in relay stations or in inns.

Truly:

When thoughts are pressing one wants to wave
the blue-felt banner;

When the mind is eager one beats to tatters
the purple-cord whip.

To make a long story short, when they arrived in the Eastern Capital and entered by way of the Myriad Years Gate, Hsi-men Ch'ing wanted to separate, intending to go stay at the Hsiang-kuo Temple, or Temple of the Protector of the State,²⁶ but Hsia Yen-ling would not agree, insisting that he come and stay with his relative, Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü. Hsi-men Ch'ing thus felt constrained to prepare a calling card and send it ahead for presentation to his prospective host.

When they arrived, Privy Councilor Ts'ui was at home and came out to greet them. After they had entered the reception hall and exchanged the customary amenities of introduction, commented on the weather, and expressed:

The sentiments they had felt while apart, they dusted themselves off and sat down for a serving of tea, whereupon their host saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing with clasped hands and asked him for his distinguished courtesy name.

"My courtesy name is Ssu-ch'üan," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He then went on to inquire, "May I ask your distinguished courtesy name, venerable sir?"

Privy Councilor Ts'ui replied, "Your pupil is unsophisticated by nature and lives in idle seclusion. My humble name is Shou-yü, and my courtesy name is Hsün-chai, or Unassuming Studio."

He then went on to say, "My relative, Hsia Yen-ling, has long sung the praises of your surpassing virtue and acknowledged his dependence on your support. Your single-minded cooperation could not have been more generous."

"I am hardly deserving of such praise," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I have constantly benefitted from his instruction. And now that he has been elevated to a senior position in the capital, his opportunities for further advancement can only be enhanced. He is to be congratulated! He is to be congratulated!"

"How can you say such a thing?" exclaimed Hsia Yen-ling.

"Though one may possess the tools for the task,

It is better to wait for the times to be right."²⁷

"What Ssu-ch'üan says is quite right," opined Privy Councilor Ts'ui. "Your status being what it is, it cannot be otherwise."

At the conclusion of this conversational exchange they all laughed. It was not long before their luggage was stored away, and as evening fell, Privy Councilor Ts'ui ordered his servants to set up a table and provide them with something to eat. Needless to say, the fare consisted of fruits, wine, seasonal delicacies, and the like, but there is no need to describe this in detail. That night, the two of them slept in Privy Councilor Ts'ui's home. But no more of this.

Early the next morning, they each got ready their gifts and calling cards and set off, accompanied by their attendants, to pay their respects at the mansion of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching. That day the grand preceptor had not yet returned from the Secretariat. The officials and functionaries who had assembled in front of the mansion were like:

Swarming bees and gathering ants,²⁸

Jammed together into an indivisible mass.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Hsia Yen-ling persuaded the functionaries in charge of the gate to take their calling cards inside by presenting them with two packets of silver.

When Majordomo Chai Ch'ien saw their cards, he came out to greet them and invited them into his private residence at the front of the mansion. Hsia Yen-ling began by introducing himself, after which, Hsi-men Ch'ing and Chai Ch'ien exchanged the customary amenities and alluded to the correspondence between them that had occurred since their last meeting. Only then did they sit down in the positions appropriate for host and guests.

Hsia Yen-ling was the first to present his list of gifts, which consisted of two bolts of cloud-crane brocade and two bolts of variegated satin for the grand preceptor, along with ten taels of silver for Chai Ch'ien. Hsi-men Ch'ing's list of presents for the grand preceptor consisted of a crimson variegated python robe, a jet, figured, round-collared robe emblazoned with a mandarin square that featured a *tou-niu*²⁹ design, and two bolts of capital brocade. His personal gifts to Chai Ch'ien consisted of a bolt of black velvet decorated with a cloud pattern in green thread, and thirty taels of silver. Chai Ch'ien ordered his attendants to take the gifts for the grand preceptor into the mansion and see that they were properly registered. The only item that he agreed to accept for himself was the bolt of cloud-patterned velvet presented by Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He refused to accept the thirty taels of silver from Hsi-men Ch'ing and the ten taels of silver from Hsia Yen-ling, saying, "Whoever heard of such a thing? Were I to do so, it would violate the feeling of intimacy between us."

He then ordered his attendants to set up a table and serve them a meal, saying, "Today His Majesty is dedicating the plaques to be installed in the newly completed Mount Ken Imperial Park, and His Honor has gone out to the Precious Tablet Temple of Highest Clarity³⁰ in order to preside over the sacrifices. The ceremony will not be over until this afternoon, and, when he gets home, he plans to go with His Honor Li Pang-yen to attend a party at the home of the distaff relative of the imperial family, Cheng Chü-chung. I fear that if my kinsman and Judicial Commissioner Hsia wait for him, it will only interfere with your other activities. Whenever His Honor happens to be free, I will undertake to inform him of your presence. It's all the same, one way or the other."

"We are grateful for my kinsman's efforts on our behalf," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If you do that, it will be fine by us."

Chai Ch'ien went on to ask, "Where is my kinsman staying?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing then explained that they were staying in the home of Hsia Yen-ling's relative, Ts'ui Shou-yü.

It was not long before a table was formally set up, and soup, rice, and assorted delicacies were simultaneously served up in:

Large platters and large bowls.

These were all delicious fried and roasted specialties prepared by the Court of Imperial Entertainments:

Than which there were no finer.

After they had each consumed three cups of wine, served in golden goblets, they were prepared to say their farewells and get up to go, but Chai Ch'ien endeavored to retain them a little longer and ordered his attendants to pour another serving of wine.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then inquired, "Kinsman, when are we scheduled to appear at the imperial audience?"

"Kinsman," replied Chai Ch'ien, "your case differs from that of His Honor Hsia. His Honor is now a senior official serving in the capital, and his case falls into a different category. You will appear at the audience together with the newly appointed assistant battalion commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, the nephew of Eunuch Director Ho Hsin, Ho Yung-shou. He will take your place as assistant judicial commissioner, since you are now the chief commissioner, so the two of you will be colleagues. He has already presented his memorial of gratitude, so, as soon as you have appeared at an audience and presented your memorial, the two of you can go together to receive your orders of appointment. You might as well arrange to do everything in concert with him."

When Hsia Yen-ling heard this, he did not have a single word to say.

Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Kinsman, let me ask you, since you are knowledgeable about such things, how would it be if I were to wait until after the Emperor has returned from performing the Suburban Sacrifice to Heaven on the day of the winter solstice to attend an audience?"

"Kinsman," responded Chai Ch'ien, "you ought not to wait that long. On the day of the winter solstice, when His Majesty has returned from performing the Suburban Sacrifice to Heaven, and the officials from the entire empire have offered their congratulatory memorials, a banquet will be held to celebrate the completion of the ceremony. Are you willing to wait until after that? The best thing for you to do is to go and report your name to the Court of State Ceremonial today, and then submit your individual memorial of gratitude to the throne at the early audience tomorrow morning. Then, on the day of the winter solstice, after Chu Mien, the senior official of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, has led the officials under his jurisdiction in submitting a joint memorial of gratitude to the throne, you can collect your orders of appointment and set out for home."

Hsi-men Ch'ing expressed his gratitude, saying, "I thank my kinsman for his advice.

What can I do to be worthy of such largess?"

When they were on the verge of departure, Chai Ch'ien took Hsi-men Ch'ing aside to have a word with him in private and reproached him severely, saying, "In the letter that I sent you a while ago, I insisted that the matter of your impending promotion should be kept strictly confidential and not be divulged to any of your colleagues. How is it then that my kinsman spoke of it to His Honor Hsia Yen-ling, with the result that he solicited a note from Perfect Man Lin Ling-su, bringing pressure to bear on Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien? The defender-in-chief then took the matter up with His Honor the grand preceptor, telling him that Hsia Yen-ling did not wish to be transferred to the capital as commander of the escort for imperial processions and preferred to remain in his current post as judicial commissioner for another three years. Eunuch Director Ho Hsin, who also serves in the Inner Court, in his turn, sought the aid of Consort An, née Liu,³¹ the favorite of the Emperor, in seeing that an order was issued appointing his nephew, Ho Yung-shou, to replace you as assistant judicial commissioner in Shantung, and personally spoke to the grand preceptor and Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien about it. Thus, the favors sought on the two sides were in direct conflict with each other, and His Honor was put in an extremely difficult position. If I had not been able to insistently maintain your interest before His Honor, so that he ended by turning down Perfect Man Lin Ling-su's request, my kinsman might well have been pushed aside."

This speech had the effect of throwing Hsi-men Ch'ing into such consternation that he hastily performed an obeisance to Chai Ch'ien, saying, "I am profoundly indebted to my kinsman for his magnanimity. But I didn't speak to anyone about this matter. As for the gentleman in question, how could he ever have learned of it?"

Chai Ch'ien responded, "It has always been true that:

If critical matters are not kept secret harm will result.³²

In the future, I trust that my kinsman will be more discreet about things. That's all."

At this point, Hsi-men Ch'ing, with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude,

rejoined Hsia Yen-ling, and, after saying farewell, they made their departure. Upon arriving back at the home of Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü, Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Pen the Fourth to report his name to the Court of State Ceremonial.

The next day, he and Hsia Yen-ling both went into the palace to attend the audience, dressed in their black gowns and official caps and girdles. Who could have anticipated that as they were coming out through the main gate to the palace after submitting their memorials of gratitude to the throne and were walking past the gate tower on the west, what should they see but a black-clad lictor who came forward and asked, "Which of you is His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing, the judicial commissioner of Shantung?"

Pen the Fourth asked him, "Who have you come from?"

"I come from Eunuch Director Ho Hsin of the Directorate for Buildings in the Palace Treasury," he replied, "who would like to have a word with His Honor."

Before he had even finished speaking, what should they see but a eunuch director, dressed in a crimson python robe, with a "three mountain hat"³³ on his head, and white-soled black boots on his feet, who approached them from the imperial roadway, and called out in an assertive voice, saying, "I would like to issue an invitation to His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, parted company with Hsia Yen-ling and allowed himself to be conducted into an orderly room for the use of officers on duty that was located nearby. It was fitted with clear windows and translucent latticework, the fire in the brazier inside made it comfortably warm, and the table was laden with partitioned boxes for the serving of assorted delicacies. When they confronted each other inside, the eunuch saluted him with a bow, and Hsi-men Ch'ing hastened to bend his back and return the compliment.

The eunuch then said, "Your Honor doesn't know me, but I am Eunuch Director Ho Hsin of the Directorate for Buildings in the Palace Treasury and serve as an attendant in the fourth building of the Yen-ning Palace, the residence of Consort Tuan, née Feng.³⁴ The other day, when the palace construction was completed, the Lord of Ten Thousand Years rewarded me by appointing my nephew, Ho Yung-shou, to the position of battalion vice-commander in the Left Guard of the Embroidered Uniform Guard unit of the Imperial Insignia Guard, so he will serve as assistant judicial commissioner in your jurisdiction and will be a colleague of yours."

"So you are the venerable Eunuch Director Ho Hsin," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I did not recognize you. Forgive me. Forgive me."

He then bowed to him again and said, "In these precincts of the Forbidden City I cannot presume to make a proper obeisance to you. Permit me to call upon you in your private residence someday soon and pay my respects."

Thereupon, the customary amenities having been performed, his host offered him a seat, and a servant presented them with tea, served with raised saucers on a platter of cinnabar-red lacquer decorated with gold tracery. When they had finished their tea, the lids were removed from the partitioned boxes on the table, exposing a rich supply of soup and rice and other delicacies, and they were provided with cups and chopsticks.

The Eunuch Ho Hsin Treats a Guest in a Palace Building

"There is no need for small cups," said Eunuch Director Ho Hsin. "I am aware that Your Honor has just come from an audience, and the weather is cold. Were I to entertain you with small cups, while offering you no more than this meager fare, it would be an affront to Your Honor. What you need is a pick-me-up."³⁵

"I ought not to impose upon you to such an extent," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Eunuch Director Ho thereupon filled a large cup to the brim and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I am much obliged to you, venerable sir," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and your pupil will be happy to accept what you proffer. The only thing is that, upon leaving your presence, I must meet with other officials and pay my respects at the ministry. If my face is flushed from drinking:

It would hardly be appropriate."³⁶

"Drink two cups to ward off the cold," said Eunuch Director Ho. "What harm can it do?"

He then went on to say, "My nephew is young, and unfamiliar with judicial matters. I hope that, for my sake, Your Honor will agree to afford him guidance in all things when he takes his place among your colleagues."

"How could I be so presumptuous?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "There is no need for such modesty on your part, venerable sir. My new colleague, your distinguished nephew, may be young, but:

Status affects character as nurture affects health."³⁷

It is only natural that:

Good fortune serves to stimulate the intelligence.”³⁸

“That’s a fine way to talk!” said Eunuch Director Ho. “As the sayings go:

Even if one studies for a lifetime, areas of ignorance will remain.”³⁹

The affairs of this world are as profuse as the hairs of an ox;

Even Confucius himself could not master more than a leg’s worth.

I fear there are things he didn’t know.

At all events, Your Honor must try to explain matters to him.”

“Your pupil will endeavor to obey your instructions,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing.

He then went on to ask, “Venerable sir, where is your private residence located? Your pupil would like to come there to pay his respects.”

Eunuch Director Ho replied, “My humble abode is located in the Wen-hua fang, or Cultural Florescence precinct, to the east of the Heavenly River Bridge. It can be identified by the two stone lions that serve as a mounting platform outside the gate.”

He then went on to ask, “Where is Your Honor staying? I would like to send the new official in my household over to pay you his respects.”

“Your pupil,” Hsi-men Ch’ing replied, “is lodging temporarily in the home of Privy Councilor Ts’ui Shou-yü.”

After they had exchanged addresses, Hsi-men Ch’ing consumed a large cup of the proffered pick-me-up and then got up to go.

Eunuch Director Ho Hsin saw him to the door and saluted him with clasped hands, saying, “With regard to what I spoke of to you just now, I hope that Your Honor will consent to look out for my nephew in all things. He is waiting to accompany you when you submit your memorial of gratitude and go to proffer the customary gifts to Chu Mien, the senior official of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, after which you can go together to collect your orders of appointment.”

“Venerable sir,” responded Hsi-men Ch’ing, “there is no need for you to instruct me any further. Your pupil understands the situation.”

Thereupon, he exited the gate of the Forbidden City and went to report to the Ministry of War, where he ran into Hsia Yen-ling and joined him in going to pay his respects to the appropriate officials. By the time he had gone to formally present himself to Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien, handed in his curriculum vitae, applied for his order of appointment, and reported to the Registry Office and the other appropriate officials, it was already late in the afternoon. Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, for his part, had changed into the uniform of his new position as commander of the escort for imperial processions, prepared his own curriculum vitae, formally presented himself to Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien, where he was excused from having to kowtow, and selected a date for his assumption of office in the Southern Yamen, the headquarters of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

When Hsia Yen-ling came out the door of the ministry, he found that Hsi-men Ch’ing was there waiting for him, though he hesitated to ride alongside him, and suggested that he be the first to mount. Hsia Yen-ling protested at this and insisted that they ride side by side.

Hsi-men Ch’ing addressed him as his superior in rank, but Hsia Yen-ling objected, saying, “Ssu-ch’üan, the two of us are former colleagues, after all. How can you start addressing me that way?”

“Our differences in status have been determined,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“It is only natural.

There is no need for such modesty on your part.”

He then went on to ask, “Since Your Honor has been raised to such an exalted position and will not be returning to Shantung, when are you going to send for your esteemed dependents?”

“I would like to move them here as soon as possible,” said Hsia Yen-ling, “but were I to do so, there would be no one to look after my property there. Right now, I plan to stay temporarily at my relative’s place until after the New Year’s celebrations, and send someone to fetch the members of my household then. Meanwhile, I hope that my colleague will consent to look after them, early and late. If anyone is interested in purchasing my property, I hope that my colleague will take care of it on my behalf. I should be very grateful were you to do so.”

“Your pupil will endeavor to obey your instructions,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “May I ask what your property is worth?”

“That house of mine,” replied Hsia Yen-ling, “was originally purchased from Eunuch Director Hsü for 1,200 taels. I subsequently had an extra story built in the rear, and the cost of the improvements came to 200 taels. Right now, I would be willing to let it go for the original purchase price.”

“Since my distinguished colleague has confided in me,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “if anyone should ask me about it, I will be able to answer without letting you down.”

“The only thing is, I fear I am putting my colleague to a lot of trouble,” responded Hsia Yen-ling.

When the two of them arrived back at the home of Ts’ui Shou-yü, Wang Ching approached them and reported, “His Honor, the newly appointed official Ho Yung-shou, came to pay you a visit. When he had dismounted and come into the reception hall, I told him that you had not yet returned from the Ministry of War. His Honor Ho said to give you his best regards. He also left calling cards for His Honor Hsia, and His Honor Ts'ui, and, at noon, he sent someone to deliver two pieces of satin brocade together with a calling card of safflower red paper."

He then showed these to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who saw that the card read, "The enclosed two satin kerchiefs are deferentially presented as a token of his respect by your humble colleague and student, Ho Yung-shou."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had read this message, he promptly told Wang Ching to wrap up and seal two round-collared robes made in Nanking, featuring mandarin squares with variegated embroidered lions. After writing out a gift card, and having something to eat, he set off immediately for Eunuch Director Ho's home in order to pay a return visit.

Upon Hsi-men Ch'ing's arrival at the reception hall, Ho Yung-shou hurriedly straightened his clothing and came out to welcome him. He was wearing a variegated, figured, round-collared robe of jet cloud-patterned velvet, featuring a mandarin square with an embroidered lion; black shoes with black silk uppers; and a girdle with a decorative plaque of gilded tortoiseshell around his waist. He was not more than nineteen years old.

His face looked as though it were powdered;

He was bright-eyed and clean-cut; and

His lips looked as though they were rouged.⁴⁰

Hastening down the steps to greet his visitor, he proceeded to bow and scrape in the most deferential manner, exhibiting the utmost in the way of modesty and respect. As Hsi-men Ch'ing ascended the steps, the household servants hurried to lift aside the portiere, giving a welcoming shout as they waited upon him, fore and aft.

When the two of them had entered the reception hall and exchanged formal greetings, Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Tai-an to open the box containing the robes he had prepared; proceeded to proffer:

The customary presentation gifts;

and kowtowed, saying, "When you deigned to pay me a visit a while ago and bestowed such lavish gifts upon me, I fear I was not there to welcome you. And, this morning, the venerable gentleman, your uncle, treated me to a repast in his orderly room, for which consideration I could not be more grateful."

Ho Yung-shou hastened to kowtow in return, saying, "Having received this trifling appointment, which entitles me to become a colleague of yours, I look forward to being the beneficiary of your instruction.

Such good fortune would suffice for three lives.

I went to pay you my respects a while ago but failed to see you, and now you have deigned to demonstrate your good will by:

Shedding glory on my humble abode."

He then ordered his attendants to put away the gifts. In the meantime, he pulled up some formal seats, upholstered in deerskin, and the two of them sat down in the positions of host and guest. His attendants served them with tea, and Ho Yung-shou bowed deeply as he presented a cup to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who got up from his seat and returned his salutation. As they were drinking their tea, they asked after each other's courtesy names.

"Your pupil's courtesy name is Ssu-ch'üan," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

To which Ho Yung-shou responded, "Your pupil's courtesy name is T'iench'üan, or Heavenly Spring."

He then went on to ask, "Has my colleague already paid his respects to the officials at the Ministry of War today?"

"Upon coming out of the Forbidden City after being entertained by your venerable uncle," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I reported to the Ministry of War, paid my formal respects to the commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, applied for my order of appointment, and reported to the other appropriate officials. When I returned, I saw your calling card and learned that you had condescended to pay me a visit. The fact that I was not there to welcome you has left me feeling:

Scarcely able to conquer my fear and trepidation."⁴¹

"Not knowing that my colleague had arrived," said Ho Yung-shou, "your pupil was tardy in paying his respects."

He then went on to ask, "Did my colleague and His Honor Hsia Yen-ling attend the audience this morning?"

"Hsia Yen-ling has now been promoted to the post of commander of the escort for imperial processions," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He and I attended the audience together this morning and expressed our gratitude for our new appointments. But when we reported to the Ministry of War to pay our respects to our superiors, he handed in his own documents and was interviewed separately."

When he had finished questioning him, Ho Yung-shou went on to say, "Since we have had a chance to consult together today, when do you think we should go to present our customary gifts to His Honor the defender-in-chief of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, preparatory to receiving our orders of appointment?"

"According to my kinsman Chai Ch'ien," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we should go first to the home of the defender-in-chief to present our gifts, before presenting our memorials of gratitude at the great audience. After that, we should proceed to report to the office of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, where we will receive our orders of appointment together with the rest."

"Since that is what my colleague suggests," said Ho Yung-shou, "let us prepare our gifts and go to present them early tomorrow morning."

Thereupon, the two of them went over their respective gifts together. Ho Yung-shou's consisted of two python robes and a jade girdle. Hsi-men Ch'ing's consisted of a length of scarlet satin brocade, emblazoned with a mandarin square that featured an embroidered ch'i-lin,⁴² a python robe of blue silk, as well as a chatelaine of gold-embossed jade. Each of them also agreed to present four jugs of Chin-hua wine, and they arranged to go together to assemble in front of Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien's residence the following morning. Once these arrangements had been agreed upon, and they had consumed two servings of tea, Hsi-men Ch'ing took his leave and returned to Ts'ui Shou-yü's dwelling. He did not confide anything about these plans to Hsia Yen-ling. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

Early the next morning, Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to Ho Yung-shou's place, where he found that his host had already prepared a small repast, along with a pick-me-up, which was duly served in:

Large platters and large bowls, as neatly as could be. Even their servants were enabled to eat their fill. After finishing their meal, they went together to assemble before the front gate of Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien's residence, where they found that Pen the Fourth and a servant from the Ho household, who had gone ahead with the gifts, had already been waiting for them for some time.

At this time, Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien had recently been promoted to the rank of grand guardian, and Emperor Hui-tsung had deputed him to go to the Southern Altar, the site of the Suburban Sacrifice to Heaven, in order to preside over the inspection of the sacrificial animals, preparatory to the ceremony on the day of the winter solstice. He had not yet returned from this mission, and the area outside the gate of his residence was rendered black by the number of officials and functionaries who were gathered there in order to present him with congratulatory gifts, who were so closely packed together that it felt as though they were:

Locked tight in an iron bucket.

Ho Yung-shou, together with Hsi-men Ch'ing, dismounted and sat down to wait in the home of an acquaintance of his that was located nearby, while sending a servant to listen for the sound of the criers that would precede the entourage of the defender-in-chief, so that he could come back and report on his impending arrival.

Their wait extended until the early afternoon, at which time they suddenly saw a man flying along on horseback, who announced, "His Honor is on his way back from inspecting the sacrificial animals. He has already entered the city through the Southern Breeze Gate⁴³ and has ordered that casual onlookers should be cleared out of the way."

Not long afterwards, another mounted courier appeared and reported, "His Honor has already crossed the Heavenly River Bridge."

At this juncture, the first contingent of chefs, together with their tea boxes and partitioned food boxes, passed by. It was only after what seemed like another half day had elapsed that a squad of cavalry, with their identifying insignia, appeared in the distance.

These officers all wore iron helmets on their heads, Decorated with chain patterns and emblazoned with the character for courage;

Their torsos were clad in hauberks of nankeen,
stiffened with carved lacquer;

Over which they wore jackets of blue satin with narrow sleeves and flowered roundels,

Held in place with red chiffon cummerbunds,
On top of battle skirts of green deerskin adorned with drawnwork aquatic creatures;

While their feet were shod with four-seamed tight-fitting black boots.

Their bows were adorned with painted magpies;

Their arrows were fitted with eagle feathers;⁴⁴

And in brocade bags across their shoulders they bore blue command standards in gilt lettering.

Truly:

The men look like fierce tigers;

The horses rival flying dragons.⁴⁵

Before long, a squad of soldiers bearing blue flags passed by, enclosing between them a squad of adjutants, dressed in black. Each and every one of them was:

Lanky and large-sized,

Ruthless and menacing.

On their heads they sported jet-black caps,

On their bodies they wore long black gowns,

Their feet were clad in dark brown

leather-soled boots,

At their waists there were hanging tiger-head tallies.⁴⁶

Mounted on their horses, truly:

Their air was awe-inspiring,⁴⁷

Their appearance was imposing.

Before long, when these three squads of cavalry, with their identifying insignia, had passed by, what should they hear but the approaching sound of shouting to clear the way. The outriders who were creating this din were all:

Officers of the Imperial Insignia Guard,
Orderlies on assignment for the occasion,
More than six feet in stature, and
Broad-shouldered as they come.
Each of them wore a tall black cylindrical hat,
All were toggled out in puttees and black boots.
In their left hands they wielded rattan canes,
While their right hands hiked up their clothes.

As these outriders advanced, continuously shouting to clear the way, the people in the roadway ahead of them were:

Truly frightened out of their wits;
Suddenly the streets were deserted.

After the squad of outriders had passed, they were followed by two additional contingents of guardsmen, who were succeeded in turn by a squad of twenty detectives in black livery, spread out on either side of the street like the wings of a formation of wild geese, all of whom were tall and sturdy in stature. They were uniformly:

Stout-waisted thick-stomached types;
Golden-eyed brown-bearded specimens.
Each of them was as rapacious and cruel as a tiger;
None of them was capable of showing the least pity.

In the wake of these ten pairs of black-liveried guardsmen appeared an open sedan chair, carried by eight bearers, accompanied by eight outriders, in which Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien was seated.

Wearing on his head the black silk hat of an official,
His body was clad in a robe of crimson velvet with a tou-niu mandarin square;
His waist was enclosed in a four-finger-wide girdle with an openwork plaque of white jade from the Ch'u Mountains,⁴⁸

His feet were shod in black boots;
At his midriff there hung the ivory insignia of a grand guardian and a fish-shaped key of yellow gold,

Affixed to his hat were a dangling sable tail and a golden cicada,⁴⁹

His feet were firmly planted on a footrest draped in tiger skin.

The bearers bore his sedan chair so high that it was three feet off the ground.

It was preceded by two household servants, one on either side, clad in blue satin, and girdles with rhinoceros horn plaques,

And was followed by yet another squad of cavalry, carrying six identifying insignia, and six more blue command standards,

Who kept close at hand in order to receive orders.

Behind these there came several tens of others, riding fine steeds with jeweled saddles,
jade bridles, and golden stirrups,

All of whom were majordomos, factotums, file clerks, clerical subofficials, or scribes;

One and all of whom were gilded and pampered youths from influential households,

Who were motivated only by lust and avarice,

Utterly indifferent to regulations and laws.

In rapid succession, one squad after another arrived in front of the defender-in-chief's residence, where they arrayed themselves in a straight line. The onlookers fell silent and stayed out of the way, not one of them daring to cough. The assembled officials and functionaries who had come to offer their gifts rendered the area black as they knelt down by the side of the road.

After some time, when the sedan chair of the defender-in-chief arrived before them, his attendants shouted, "Stand up, and remain at attention!" To which the assembled crowd assented with a single shout. Truly:

The sound shook the cloudy empyrean.

To the east, all that could be heard was a steady beat as:

Drums and music began to sound.

It so happens that the six senior officers in his yamen, on learning that the defender-in-chief had been elevated to the rank of grand master of the imperial household, and grand guardian, and been granted the privilege of having a son appointed battalion commander in the Imperial Insignia Guard, had all prepared lavish gifts, including wine and ingredients for a feast, and assembled in order to proffer their congratulations. For this reason, there were quite a few officials from the Music Office in attendance, who had begun to strike up their music. No sooner did the defender-in-chief descend from his sedan chair than the music came to a halt, and the various officials and functionaries made ready to present themselves.

All of a sudden, shouting to clear the way was heard, and a servitor in black livery, holding two red calling cards in his hand, came flying up on horseback and handed them to the guards at the gate, saying, "The minister of rites Chang Pang-ch'ang, and His Honor the academician Ts'ai Yu, are coming to pay their respects."

This information was promptly conveyed inside. Before long, their sedan chairs showed up at the gate, and the minister Chang Pang-ch'ang and vice minister Ts'ai Yu, wearing scarlet ceremonial robes with mandarin squares featuring embroidered peacocks, one of them sporting a girdle with a plaque of rhinoceros horn, and the other a girdle with a plaque of gold, went inside to pay their respects.

After they had been entertained with tea and seen on their way, the minister of personnel Wang Tsu-tao,⁵⁰ the left vice minister Han Lü, and the right vice minister Yin Ching⁵¹ also came to pay their respects to Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien.

After they had been entertained with tea and seen on their way, the imperial relative and Duke of Chia, Chao I, the military affairs commissioner Cheng Chü-chung, and the commandant-escort and director of the Court of the Imperial Clan, Wang Shen, clad in nankeen robes with jade girdles, also came to pay their respects. Of the three, Cheng Chü-chung alone rode in a sedan chair, the other two being mounted on horseback.

After they had been seen off, the six senior officers in the defender-in-chief's yamen arrived, surrounded by criers proclaiming the protocol, and drawn up in appropriate order. The first of these was the superintendent of justice for the two townships of the Eastern Capital, Sun Jung;⁵² the second was the chief inspector, Liang Ying-lung; the third was the director of the Office of Herds in the Inner and Outer Demesnes of the Court of the Imperial Stud, the nephew of Defender-in-Chief T'ung Kuan, T'ung T'ien-yin; the fourth was the surveillance commissioner of the thirteen gates of the capital city, Huang Ching-ch'en; the fifth was the commander of the Capital Training Divisions and capital security commissioner, Tou Chien;⁵³ and the sixth was the ward-inspecting commandant of the inner and outer precincts of the Eastern Capital, Ch'en Tsung-shan. All of them were garbed in crimson robes and wore hats adorned with dangling sable tails and golden cicadas. Only Sun Jung, who held the rank of grand guardian of the heir apparent, wore a jade girdle, while the rest of them wore girdles of gold. When they dismounted and went inside, each of them took with him gifts of gold currency and bolts of fabric.

After a little while, the sound of music was heard, as the group of senior officers, wearing floral ornaments of gold, and jade girdles, exchanged toasts with Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien. Beneath the steps:

Strains of classic melodies saturate the ears;

Tones of woodwinds and strings are harmonious.

Truly:

The tables, ten-foot square, are laden with food;

Served amid clustering flowers upon brocade mats.

What did this conspicuous display of the defender-in-chief's wealth and distinction look like? Behold:

He holds a position of the first rank;⁵⁴

His office is one of the three highest.⁵⁵

In his majestic reception hall,

The days are long and the bell-cords are silent;

In the vast minister's mansion,⁵⁶

The clepsydras are mute and the halberds arrayed.

The forest flowers of colored paper rival those of spring;

The pearls hanging from the drapery light the evening hours.⁵⁷

Fragrant and aromatic,

Otter's marrow has been newly compounded with "hundred-blend" incense;⁵⁸

In serried profusion,

Tripods with dragon motifs and seal script are worth thousands in gold.

The bedclothes are half embroidered with kingfisher feathers;
The pillows are emblazoned with the “eight treasures” in coral.
From time to time, one hears the tinkling of jade girdle pendants;
One’s vision is focused on the glittering of the moving lanterns.
With their tiger-head tallies and jade insignia,
The armored ranks in the forecourt are formidable;
With their ivory clappers and silver psalteries,⁵⁹
The production of the puppet show is entertaining.⁶⁰
All day long, those who come to pay their regards,
Consist only of noble scions or royal princelings;
Year after year, those who cultivate his company,
Are noblemen or relatives of the imperial family.
When singing girls perform their songs,⁶¹
One is amazed at the repertory of three thousand pieces;
When the mica screens are pulled aside,⁶²
There suddenly appear twelve girls with gold hairpins.⁶³
Where the lotus blossoms are in bloom,
The frolicking fish in the pond do not startle the beholder;
Where birdcages are suspended on high,
The coquettish fowl beneath the eaves engage in conversation.
What do such persons know of the arts of compromise or reconciliation?
All they are familiar with are the ways of toadying and sycophancy.

Truly:

In humorous conversation they initiate hostilities;
With idle boasts they disturb the national safety.
When they issue spurious decrees,
The eight chief officials in the realm
bow in acquiescence;
When they employ clever arguments,
The Emperor in his nine-gated palace⁶⁴ nods his head in consent.
By initiating the Flower and Rock Convoys,
He has inflicted calamity upon the Chiang-nan and the Huai-pei regions;
By seizing boxwood to offer to the throne,
He has exhausted both the national treasury and the people’s resources.
Among those who serve at court there are none whose hearts have not been chilled;
Among the ranks of men of integrity there are none who are not holding their breath.

Truly:

In the capital precincts he ranks first among the wielders of power;
Among the wealthy and prominent of this world⁶⁵
he is without an equal.⁶⁶

In a little while, when the toasting was over, they all sat down in their places, and a troupe of five actors came forward. To the accompaniment of psaltery, mandola, p'i-p'a, metallophone, harp, and clappers inlaid with red ivory, they proceeded to perform the song suite in the Cheng-kung mode that begins with the tune “Decorous and Pretty.” Truly:

The enduring tones linger around the rafters;

To a surge of pure melody and lovely harmony.

Enjoying wealth and distinction,
The recipient of imperial favor;⁶⁷
Having risen from bleak poverty,
You occupy an exalted position.
Wielding the scales of power, your authority dominates the capital;
Relying on imperial favor, you endeavor to deceive our sovereign,
In total disregard of benevolence or righteousness.

TO THE TUNE “PLAYING WITH A BROCADE BALL”

You employ corvée labor to construct ponds,
You buy landed estates for your descendants.
In your every endeavor, you explore only the means of insuring your own benefit;
In your treacherous greed, what do you care if Yüeh suffers while Ch'in prospers?⁶⁸
Those who curry favor with you reach instant distinction;
Those who offend you find that their lives are endangered.
Envious of the worthy and talented,
You prefer the intimacy of the petty minded.
Motivated only by personal grudges, you show total disregard for the public interest.
You keep the Emperor in his nine-gated palace entirely in the dark,
While allowing the people within the four seas to descend into chaos.
But, as the saying goes, Heaven's net only seems to be loose.⁶⁹

TO THE TUNE “THE LUCKY GRADUATE”

With your clever words, you seek to elicit the transient amusement of the ruler;
But do not exert loyal effort toward achieving harmony among the myriad states.
You only try to subvert the work of real heroes in order to deceive the world.
Vainly scratching an itch through the hide of your boot;⁷⁰
Exhibiting the same symptoms that you pretend to cure;⁷¹
You show no concern whatever for Heavenly principle.

TO THE TUNE “PLAYING WITH A BROCADE BALL”

You have the intent of Chao Kao of the Ch'in dynasty in pointing to a deer;⁷²
And the design of T'u-an Ku in loosing his dog.⁷³
You would emulate Wang Mang of the Han dynasty in your disloyal objectives;⁷⁴
And deserve the same fate as the traitor Tung Cho whose navel was set on fire.⁷⁵
Wherever you move, you are accompanied by pipes and strings;
When you go out the gate, you are protected by armed guards.
When you enter the court, the hundred officials are rigid with apprehension;
Relying on the ruler, you usurp the tiger's might in flaunting your authority.⁷⁶
There are no few clients who abase themselves to cater to your perfidious cabal;
But who is there willing to wield his sword to execute the toadying villains,
Rather than letting them do as they please?

CODA

Your designation as a minister is not found beneath the golden goblet;⁷⁷
But in the works of historians your faults will be duly enumerated.
What do you know of reconciling yin and yang?⁷⁸ or nurturing the vital energy?
All you can do is betray the country and make pacts with foreign barbarians.
You have no right to the jade girdle and gold fish⁷⁹ suspended from your python robe;

Accepting emolument without achievement, you should be ashamed to sleep and to eat.
As long as power remains in your hands,
people will be afraid of you;
But when catastrophe descends upon you, it will be too late to repent.⁸⁰
All the bamboo on the southern hills would not suffice on which to enumerate your crimes;
When the waves on the eastern ocean are completely dry your stench of infamy will remain.⁸¹
It will be perpetuated for a myriad years,⁸²
Forevermore inducing people to revile you.⁸³

On this occasion, after:

Three rounds of wine had been offered, and

One suite of songs had been performed, the six senior officers got up to go, and Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien escorted them on their way out.

When he returned to the reception hall, the sound of music was temporarily suspended, and the majordomo prepared to announce the names of the officials from their various jurisdictions as they came in to pay their respects to him. Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien ordered his attendants to bring in his desk and then took his seat on a folding chair upholstered in tiger skin.

He first ordered that the contingent of meritorious imperial relatives, prominent eunuchs, and high officials, together with their servitors and clerks, who had come to present their gifts, should be admitted.

It was not long before they were sent on their way and were succeeded by the contingent of secretaries attached to the headquarters of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, the officers from the Southern and Northern Yemens of that organization, the two detective bureaus with their five offices and seven departments, the investigators, inspectors, surveillance commissioners, and supervisors, the director of the horse pasturages of the imperial domain, the commander of the escort for imperial processions, the prison warden, the battalion and company commanders, and so forth. The leaders at the head of each of these categories were supplied with accordion-bound albums containing the credentials of their subordinates, which they duly handed up before being dismissed.

Only then were the judicial commissioners of the Two-Huai regions, the Two-Che regions, Shantung, Shansi, Kuan-tung, Kuan-hsi, Ho-tung, Hopei, Fukien, Kuang-nan, Szechwan, all thirteen provinces, ordered to present themselves in turn.⁸⁴ Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou were in the fifth group, and when their presents were carried in, the majordomo saw to it that Eunuch Director Ho Hsin's calling card was placed conspicuously on the defender-in-chief's desk.

As the two of them stood beneath the steps, waiting for their names to be called, Hsi-men Ch'ing lifted up his head to look around and saw that in front of him was a spacious thirty-foot-wide structure, with a double-eaved, sloping, gable and hip roof, and exposed supporting beams beneath the corners.⁸⁵ Its beaded blinds were rolled high,⁸⁶ and it was surrounded on all sides by a green balustrade.⁸⁷ A vermilion plaque was suspended over the lintel that had been presented by Emperor Hui-tung himself and was inscribed in the imperial hand with four gold characters as large as dippers, which read "Hall of the Commander of the Imperial Insignia Guard." This was the home of the Emperor's eyes and ears, teeth and claws; the headquarters of his secret police. Any commoner who found himself there could expect to be executed. Six anterooms were arrayed on either side of the interior.

The steps were wide and spacious, and

The courtyard was secluded and imposing.

Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien, attired in his crimson robe, was seated at the head of the steps, and, before long, he summoned them before him. The two of them obediently ascended the steps until they stood under the eaves, where they bent their bodies to pay their respects, kneeling down and kowtowing four times, as they awaited their instructions.

Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien remarked, "As for you two battalion commanders, what need was there for you to have your kinsman Eunuch Director Ho Hsin present me with these gifts?"

After ordering his attendants to put them away, he went on to say, "As long as you conscientiously carry out your official duties in the area of your jurisdiction, I, for my part, will see that you are treated fairly. After you have attended the great audience and submitted your memorials of gratitude, you can come back to the office to receive your orders of appointment, and proceed to your posts."

The two of them assented with one voice, after which the attendants called out, "You are dismissed," and they made their way out through the postern gate on the left.

As they exited the main gate and waited for Pen the Fourth and the others to come out with the empty gift boxes so they could be on their way, they suddenly noticed a messenger, who flew up on horseback, carrying a calling card of safflower red paper, and reported, "His Honor Wang and His Honor Kao are about to arrive."

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou then ducked inside someone's gateway so they could observe what took place. It was not long before the soldiers preceding them shouted to clear the way, and the two dignitaries appeared:

Accompanied by a contingent of mounted horsemen,

Overflowing the streets and blocking the alleys.

Whom should they see, garbed in crimson robes with jade girdles, and riding in sedan chairs, but Wang Wei, the supreme commander of the 800,000 imperial guards in the Capital Training Divisions and Duke of Lung-hsi, and Kao Ch'iu, the defender-in-chief of the Inspired Strategy Corps of the Imperial Bodyguard. Upon their arrival, the officials from the various provinces who had come to pay their respects all surged outside, and the newcomers were lost to sight.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou waited for some time until Pen the Fourth came out with the empty gift boxes. Only then did the two of them withdraw to a secluded spot, order their attendants to bring up their horses, mount their steeds, and go back to their lodgings.

Truly:

Solely because the wicked and sycophantic occupied positions of power,
It was only appropriate that the Central Plain should become soaked in blood.⁸⁸

The Two Judicial Commissioners Report before Chu Mien

Gentle reader take note:

Just as womenfolk may ruin a household,
Petty men may reduce the realm to chaos;
It is only natural.

The perspicacious already foresaw that this bunch of traitors were bound to overturn the empire, and, sure enough, at the expiration of the Hsüan-ho reign period, Emperor Hui-tsung and Emperor Ch'in-tsung were taken north in captivity, Emperor Kao-tsung fled south, and the empire fell into the hands of the barbarians. Surely, this outcome is to be profoundly lamented. The reflections that arise in the mind of the historian cannot be exhausted. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Calamitous are the deeds of those who abuse their power and betray the national interest;⁸⁹
When founding a dynasty or inheriting a household, one must strive to keep petty men at bay.
Though the "six traitors" may all have been executed, that is hardly worthy of consideration;⁹⁰
It did not mitigate the plight of the two emperors as they suffered exile and confinement.⁹¹

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 71

LI P'ING-ERH APPEARS IN A DREAM IN BATTALION COMMANDER HO'S HOUSE; THE JUDICIAL COMMISSIONERS PRESENT THEIR MEMORIALS AT THE AUDIENCE

Let me temporarily cease strumming the zither that rests upon my knee;
In order to idly rehearse the past events that are recorded in history.
One cannot but admire the worthy rulers who are both diligent and thrifty;
While deeply sorrowing at the mediocre monarchs who indulge in debauchery.
Those who maintain peace and stability seek out men of worth and wisdom;
While those who only engender chaos fraternize with sycophantic ministers.
If one exposes the many factors that result in either success or failure;
As with "lofty mountains and flowing waters,"¹
the attuned will understand.²

THE STORY GOES that when Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou arrived back on the main thoroughfare, Ho Yung-shou first sent someone to report to Eunuch Director Ho Hsin and then invited Hsi-men Ch'ing to come back to their home for a meal. Hsi-men Ch'ing repeatedly demurred, but Ho Yung-shou had one of his attendants take hold of his horse's bit with his hand, while he said to him, "Your pupil has another matter which he needs to discuss with you."

Thereupon, they proceeded to ride side by side until they dismounted in front of Ho Hsin's house, while Pen the Fourth and the carriers of the empty gift boxes went straight back to the home of Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü.

It so happens that Ho Yung-shou had made prior arrangements for a lavish feast that was awaiting them at his home. When they entered the reception hall, behold:

Screens display their peacock's tails,
Cushions conceal their hibiscus blossoms.
Animal-shaped briquettes are smoldering,
Amid the fragrance from a golden brazier.

In the middle of the hall, at the upper end of the room, there was a single table setting, with another one facing it below, and yet another set up on the eastern side.

Platters are piled with exotic fruits,
Blossoms are displayed in golden vases.
The tables and chairs are spic-and-span,³
The standing screens are neatly arrayed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing inquired, "Who is my colleague entertaining today?"

"My uncle, the eunuch director, has taken the day off," Ho Yung-shou replied, "and would like to entertain my colleague with a meal."

"For you to put yourself to such trouble on my behalf," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is scarcely fitting among colleagues."

Ho Yung-shou laughed, saying, "It was my uncle's idea to prepare this meager repast, in the hope that you would condescend to offer me the benefit of your instruction."

After they had consumed a serving of tea, Hsi-men Ch'ing asked when he could pay his respects to the old gentleman.

"My uncle will be here any minute now," replied Ho Yung-shou.

It was not long before Eunuch Director Ho Hsin came out from the rear of the residence. He was wearing a python robe of green velvet, an official hat, black boots, and a jeweled chatelaine.

Hsi-men Ch'ing prostrated himself preparatory to kowtowing four times as a sign of respect, saying as he did so, "Pray accept my obeisance," but Eunuch Director Ho Hsin demurred, saying, "That will never do."

"Your pupil and your nephew Ho Yung-shou are colleagues of a younger generation," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Whereas you, venerable sir:

Are exalted in both age and virtue, and serve as a prominent eunuch. It is only appropriate that you should accept my obeisance.”

They dickered politely for a while before Ho Hsin agreed to accept a half kowtow from him, after which, he ushered Hsi-men Ch'ing to the seat of honor, while he prepared to take the position of host, and indicated to Ho Yung-shou that he should occupy the place on the side.

“Venerable sir,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “that will never do. Since your nephew and I are colleagues, how can he be relegated to the side? If it were just a case of you and your nephew, it might be all right, but for your pupil to occupy such a preferential position would never do.”

Ho Hsin was greatly pleased by this and said, “Your Honor is well-versed in etiquette. In that case, I'll presume to take the grand secretary's position adjacent to the throne and allow my nephew, the new official, to play the role of host vis-à-vis Your Honor.”

“Such an arrangement,” responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, “would be more comfortable for your pupil.”

Thereupon, they all exchanged the customary amenities and sat down.

Ho Hsin ordered, “Attendants, add some new charcoal to the brazier. The weather's rather cold today.”

Before long, the servants brought in a package of finely polished charcoal for interior heating purposes and dumped it into the four-cornered brazier of yellow brass that stood in the center of the room. They also let down the translucent, oilpaper, heat-holding drapes at the door of the room, which let in the flickering sunlight so that everything was brightly illuminated.

“Your Honor,” said Ho Hsin, “pray divest yourself of your formal outer garments.”

“Your pupil doesn't have anything appropriate on underneath,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing. “I'll send a servant to fetch something from my lodgings.”

“There's no need for you to send for anything,” said Ho Hsin.

Then, turning to his attendants, he told them to take Hsi-men Ch'ing's outer garments and said, “Fetch that green velvet flying fish python robe⁴ that I've been wearing for His Honor to put on.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, “That is part of your official regalia, venerable sir. How could your pupil presume to wear it?”

“Go ahead and put it on, Your Honor,” said Ho Hsin. “What is there to be afraid of? The other day the Lord of Ten Thousand Years bestowed a regular python robe on me, so I will no longer be wearing it. In fact, I will donate it to Your Honor to wear over your other clothes.”

It was not long before the attendants came out with it. Hsi-men Ch'ing unfastened his girdle and took off his round-collared gown, handing it over to Tai-an. He then put on the flying fish python robe and bowed to Ho Hsin in order to express his thanks. He went on to ask Ho Yung-shou to take off his outer clothing in order to keep him company. At this point, another serving of tea was brought out, and they drank it together.

Ho Hsin then said, “Have the household musicians come out.”

It so happens that he maintained a troupe of twelve household musicians who had been taught to perform on musical instruments. Led by their two instructors, they duly came out and kowtowed to the company. Ho Hsin ordered that the bronze gong and bronze drum be brought out and set up at the lower end of the hall, and the musical performance began. Truly:

The sound shakes the cloudy empyrean;

The tones startle both fish and birds.

After this prelude, the attendants served the feast and they were invited to take their places.

Eunuch Director Ho Hsin prepared to offer a drink to Hsi-men Ch'ing, but he hastily protested, saying, “Venerable sir, please make yourself easy. My colleague can do the honors on your behalf. It will suffice merely to provide the goblet and chopsticks at my place.”

“I insist on offering Your Honor a drink,” said Ho Hsin. “This newly appointed official from my household:

Upon first entering the bulrushes,

Has no way of gauging their depth.⁵

It is my fervent hope that, in all things, Your Honor will do what you can to uphold his interests. That would be most gratifying.”

“Venerable sir,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “how can you talk that way? As the saying goes:

The fellow feeling between colleagues endures for three generations.

Your pupil is also much indebted to your diffracted radiance. How could we not:

Do our best to help each other out?”⁶

“Well said! Well said!” responded Ho Hsin. “It is, indeed, our duty to:

Cooperate in the ruler's service,

By coming to each other's support.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing did not wait for Ho Hsin to hand him the cup but went forward to accept it and put it down at his place. He then responded by offering two cups in return, which he put down at the places of Ho Yung-shou and Ho Hsin. After they had all bowed to each other, they sat down.

When the musical prelude was completed, three of the household musicians, together with their two instructors, came forward with their:

Silver psaltery, ivory clappers,
Three-string guitar, and p'i-p'a, and performed the song suite in the Cheng-kung mode that begins with the tune “Decorous and Pretty.”⁷

The Crystal Palace,
Mermaid silk drapes;
Moonlight illumines the Crystal Palace,
Cold penetrates the mermaid silk drapes.
It is late at night, and We are unable to sleep upon Our dragon couch.
Leaving the palace gate, We venture out onto the streets of the capital,
Upon which windblown snow is falling.

TO THE TUNE “PLAYING WITH A BROCADE BALL”

It is like the flitter of fluttering butterfly wings;
It resembles the tumbling of carefree willow catkins.
Frozen flakes dance, as the swirling wind blows them about;
Treading fragments of alabaster, Our steps are impulsive.
Snow covers the sleeves of Our white scholar’s gown;
The wind rumples Our commoner’s black silk skullcap.
Suddenly looking back, We gaze fixedly on the phoenix towers of the palace;
Utterly unable to discern the mandarin ducks of azure
vitreous tile on the eaves.
In no time at all, the nine-gated palace halls appear to be paved with silver;
In half an instant, the infinite expanse of the world⁸ seems mantled in jade;
It looks just as though the entire realm is completely enveloped in powder.

TO THE TUNE “THE LUCKY GRADUATE”

We see that the double doors of the minister’s mansion are locked tight as an iron bucket.
And proceed to give a resounding blow to the rings of the two animal-head-shaped knockers.
The person knocking at your gate is Chao the Elder, who resides in front of the Myriad Years Mount.⁹
Is your master entertaining anyone in his chamber?
So, he’s reading works of literature by lamplight.
We have come expressly to hear him explicate them.

TO THE TUNE “LAZYBONES”

Braving the cold wind and enduring the frozen snow,
We have come to pay him a visit.
There are some confidential matters that We urgently feel the need to discuss with him.
What are you so flustered about, being as you are a sophisticated public servant?
You can skip the obeisance, Our grand councilor, who has attracted so many worthies.
This is the residence of one of the Three Dukes, who presides over the vessels of state;
Not the abode of one who has taken the tonsure, such as Tripitaka¹⁰ of the T’ang dynasty.
We will take this proffered seat in order to listen to your expounding of the classics.
But, as for your servant, We don’t wish to have him about our ears offering more tea.

TO THE TUNE “THE LUCKY GRADUATE”

We will not emulate Emperor Kao-tsu of the Han dynasty who resided in the Wei-yang Palace;¹¹
Nor the T’ang dynasty Son of Heaven who spent the night sleeping in the Chin-yang Palace,¹² Merely anxious to share the gilded phoenix pillow, when the kingfisher-hued quilt felt chilly.¹³
We are only interested in learning about Fu Yüeh;¹⁴
Rather than dreaming of the meeting at Kao-t’ang.
This is the proper business of anyone who aspires to the position of a ruler.

TO THE TUNE “PLAYING WITH A BROCADE BALL”

Since We occupy the unique position of the ruler over all within the Four Seas,
We must devote Ourselves to upholding the Three Bonds and observing the Five Constants.¹⁵
In the years of Our youth, We dedicated Ourselves to mastering the spear and quarterstaff;

But Our only regret is that We failed to penetrate the gates of the school of Confucius.
How many chapters are there in the Book of Documents?
How many poems in all are there in the Book of Songs?
Through the explication of the Book of Rites, one can learn modesty and accommodation;
By discussion of the Spring and Autumn Annals, one can discern the lessons of the past.
We would learn from the examples of the rulers Yü, T'ang,
Wen, and Wu;¹⁶ in emulating Yao and Shun;¹⁷
You live up to Fang Hsüan-ling, Tu Ju-hui, Hsiao Ho, and Ts'ao Shen,¹⁸ who helped found the Han and T'ang.
We depend upon you to undertake responsibility for the ministerial task of reconciling yin and yang.

TO THE TUNE "THE LUCKY GRADUATE"

You maintain that by relying on The Analects of Confucius one may establish one's authority at court;
And that even half of that text may suffice to gain control over the mountains and rivers of the realm.¹⁹
The way of the Sage is comparable to that of Heaven itself, in that it is immeasurable in extent.
To listen to your explication of the classics in front of the crimson curtain,²⁰
Is certainly superior to a banquet at which the host provides singing girls in red.²¹
By the time your discourse is over, Our spirit is purified and Our energy enhanced.²²

TO THE TUNE "PLAYING WITH A BROCADE BALL"

On silver candlesticks the painted candles are bright;
From golden censers waft calligraphic fumes of incense.
We ought not to put Our elder brother to the trouble of pouring the vintage wine himself;
And it is hardly necessary for Our sister-in-law to offer Us a goblet of "sunset clouds."
You say that "A wife who has shared one's poverty-stricken fare must never be abandoned";
We too remember that "The friends one makes while poor and mean must never be forgotten."²³
As the sayings go, "Outer strength is no match for inner strength";²⁴
"If a wife is worthy, her husband will be able to avoid calamity."²⁵
Our relationship with you resembles that between T'ai-chia and I Yin;²⁶
Your union with your wife is like that of Liang
Hung and Meng Kuang.²⁷
We only hope that your good fortune and longevity will be prolonged.²⁸

TO THE TUNE "THE LUCKY GRADUATE"

Whenever We try to sleep, We cannot avoid thinking of early rulers and later rulers;
No sooner do Our eyes close than we are obsessed with why states rise and states fall.
For this reason, by day and by night We cannot sleep,²⁹ pondering a myriad courses of action.
It is not a case of "When happy one dislikes
the shortness of the night";
Nor an instance of "When lonely one hates it that the watches are so long."³⁰
There are so many things to feel worried about.

TO THE TUNE "PLAYING WITH A BROCADE BALL"

We worry about soldiers at their posts who lack adequate clothing;
We worry about families that lack sufficient grain for the next day.³¹
We worry about the poor who sleep by day in their secluded alleys;
We worry about the students who doze at night before unheated windows;
We worry about resentful wives and husbands complaining of the cold;
We worry about the carters forced to drive a myriad li in search of trade;
We worry about the boatmen on the rivers, threatened by wind and waves;
We worry about the starving children who cry out for their mothers;

We worry about the worthy commoners who lack a means of livelihood;
We worry about those who hasten to the battle in their coats of mail.
The mention of these things cannot but cause Us to sigh with sorrow.

TO THE TUNE "THE LUCKY GRADUATE"?

Worry about the hardships of the people disrupts
Our rest and racks Our brains;³²
Concern for the size of the empire occupies Our thoughts in sleep and in dreams.
At present, T'ai-yüan prefecture to the north is still ruled by the House of Liu.³³
We intend to temporarily abandon the vermilion phoenix gates of Our palace;
Personally take Our place within the blue-green oiled curtains of Our carriage;
And initiate Our campaign by taking the city of Shang-tang in Ho-tung province.

TO THE TUNE "PLAYING WITH A BROCADE BALL"

You speak of the rulers Ch'ien Ch'u of Wu-Yüeh³⁴ and Li Yü of the Southern T'ang;³⁵
As well as Liu Ch'ang of the Southern Han³⁶ and Meng Ch'ang of the Later Shu.³⁷
None of them exercises benevolent rule, causing their citizenry to lose hope;³⁸
When they practice tyranny, they bring calamity down upon their populations.
Whom should We depute to pacify Szechwan
in the West;
Whom should we direct to restore order to the Two-Kuang?
The conquest of the kingdom of Wu-yüeh will require a general of renown;
The subjugation of Chiang-nan will call for someone who is loyal and true.
Extending the borders of the realm will require someone like a pillar of white jade holding up the sky;³⁹ Setting the universe to rights will demand an individual like a bridge of yellow gold spanning the sea.⁴⁰
Pray give it your most careful consideration.

TO THE TUNE "TAKING OFF THE COTTON GOWN"⁴¹

In order to take Chin-ling you must speedily cross the Yangtze River.⁴²
When you get to Ch'ien-t'ang you must pacify that area of the country.⁴³
In Szechwan to the west you must not be daunted by the state of the cliffside roadways.⁴⁴
In the territories of the southern barbarians you must confront the poisonous miasmas.⁴⁵

TO THE TUNE "EXHILARATED BY PEACE"

In battle you must disperse the tiger-and-wolf-like foe;
Personally experiencing the hardships of wind and frost.
You must use The Six Tactics and *The Three Strategies*⁴⁶
in order to stabilize the frontiers,
While holding the seals of supreme military commanders.
We hope that when you don your coats of mail, thus enhancing your prowess;
Your horses, flaunting their jade bridles, will be impossible to obstruct;
And the drumbeat of whips on your golden stirrups⁴⁷
will proclaim victory,
As you lead your armies in triumph back to Pien-liang.

PARACODA⁴⁸

Anyone who complies with Heaven's will; understands should be spared.

Anyone who imposes a tyrannical regime; opposes the imperial forces; and tries to show off his prowess and demonstrate his might,⁵⁰ must be destroyed.
Do not rob the people of their wealth;⁵¹

Do not exterminate the people's lives;⁵²
Do not debauch the people's womenfolk;
Do not set fire to the people's homes.
Treat your men and horses with consideration, combining mercy and justice;
See that they are properly paid and fed, with clear rewards and punishments.
Protect the city walls and moats, pursue the

Along the highways, put up posters in order to help pacify the populace;
Initiate welfare programs where needed, and open up the public granaries.

CODA

We await the day when, in formal attire and with respectful mien, We may proceed to the Ling-yen Pavilion⁵³ and have the portraits of you meritorious officials publicly displayed.
You must not fail to be worthy of having your names engraved on metal and stone, and inscribed on bells and tripods, so that the fragrance of your fame may be perpetuated in history.
Your use of your forces displays good generalship;
You possess strategic ability and possess courage.
By gazing upward to contemplate astronomical phenomena⁵⁴ you may predict events from the stars;
By gazing downward to examine the mountains and rivers you may evaluate the lay of the land.
In proceeding to battle you must first ascertain which of the nine terrains is relevant;⁵⁵
In determining the outcome of a conflict you must rely on the five types of secret agents.⁵⁶
In daylight battles you must employ flags and pennants;
In nighttime battles you must deploy fires and drums.⁵⁷
In infantry battles you must use smoke screens to disguise your deployments;
In naval conflicts you must adjust to the wind in using your sails and oars.
When irregular and regular tactics abet each other,⁵⁸ your military strength is enhanced;
When benevolence and wisdom are practiced together,
no amount of valor can resist them.
We delegate Our authority to you generals, so that you may pacify the four quarters;
To second-guess our supreme commanders while seated on the throne would invite chaos.
We hope you will send urgent memorials announcing your achievements on the frontier;
So we may all rejoice at the attainment of peace
as you head back for the capital.
Before We begin to allot land and bestow fiefdoms⁵⁹ in granting you titles of nobility,
We will first see to it that the troops under your various commands are amply rewarded.⁶⁰

When the household musicians had finished performing the song suite, they withdrew. After:

Several rounds of wine had been consumed, and

Two main courses had been served, it gradually grew toward evening, and the lamps were lighted.

Hsi-men Ch'ing summoned Tai-an and instructed him to offer gratuities to the chef and the various musicians who had performed for them and then got up to go, saying, "Your pupil has imposed upon your hospitality all day long. It is time for me to take my leave."

But the venerable eunuch was unwilling to let him go, saying, "The reason I took the day off, today, was that I wanted to benefit from Your Honor's instruction. I haven't provided anything special in the way of entertainment, but only an opportunity for us to talk together. I fear Your Honor may still be hungry."

"Having just enjoyed the luxurious repast that you provided, venerable sir," protested Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how can you possibly suggest that I should still be hungry? Your pupil merely needs to return to his lodgings to get some rest. Tomorrow morning, I must join your nephew in reporting to the Ministry of War in order to receive our orders of appointment and register our names."

"In that case," responded Eunuch Director Ho Hsin, "there is no need for Your Honor to return to your lodgings. You can spend the night here at my place, which will make it more convenient for you and the newly appointed official from my household to go take care of your business in the morning. May I venture to ask, where are you staying at present?"

"Your pupil," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is lodging for the time being in the home of my colleague Hsia Yen-ling's relative Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü, and all of my luggage is there."

"That's no problem," said Ho Hsin. "You Honor might just as well send someone to go fetch your luggage and bring it here, where I can put you up for a few days. How would that be? In my back garden there are several small rooms that are pleasantly secluded. If you agree to this proposal, it will make it more convenient for you and my nephew to conduct your business. That would be a better arrangement than if you stay somewhere else, since you'll both be in the same place."

"To stay here would be fine by me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "My only fear is that Hsia Yen-ling might take it amiss and think that your pupil is slighting him."

"In this day and age," responded Ho Hsin, "as the saying goes:

If one's colleague forfeits his office in the morning,

One is no longer obliged to bow to him in the evening.⁶¹

The yamen is just like a puppet theater. Though you were initially a colleague of his, now that the previous official has left, his replacement is ready to:

Assume his position and carry out his duties.⁶²

He no longer has anything to do with it. If he were to interpret it that way, it would only show how little he understands the way of the world. Today, I am determined to spend the evening with Your Honor and simply won't let you go."

He then called for his attendants and ordered them, "Have some tables set up forthwith in the room below, and see to it that the servants of His Honor Hsi-men are provided with food and wine. Afterwards, send some people from our household to accompany them in going to bring his luggage back here. Also, issue instructions to have the chamber in the west courtyard in the back garden swept clean and provided with bedding. And light some charcoal under the k'ang."

From in the hall a single call;

Below the steps a hundred yeps.

The attendants assented obsequiously and set out about their tasks.

"That is extremely kind of you, venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but your pupil is still concerned lest he offend Hsia Yen-ling."

"Don't talk such rot!" said Ho Hsin. "He no longer serves in your yamen.

He who occupies no post in an office,

Has no right to discuss its policies.⁶³

He is now responsible for the depot in which the imperial equipage is stored and no longer has any say with regard to the provincial judicial commissions. He is in no position to feel offended by you."

Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation,

he ordered that, after Tai-an and the grooms tending the horses had been provided with food and wine, several soldiers should also be dispatched, equipped with ropes and carrying poles, to proceed to the home of Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü and bring back Hsi-men Ch'ing's luggage.

Ho Hsin then went on to say, "There is another favor I would like to ask of Your Honor. When my nephew, the newly appointed official, arrives at his place of office, I hope that Your Honor will consent to help him find a house to live in, so that it will be convenient for him to send for his dependents later on. I'll have him accompany Your Honor on your way back, and then, after he has found a home, I'll arrange to send his dependents off to join him. There are not a lot of them, but, including several families of servants, there will be twenty or thirty persons, in all."

"When your nephew is gone," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "who will there be to look after this house of yours, venerable sir?"

"There are two adopted nephews in my household," said Ho Hsin. "The second one, whose name is Ho Yung-fu, is currently residing on my country estate. I'll ask him to come and reside here."

"Venerable sir," asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how much silver are you willing to spend on a place for your nephew?"

"It will probably require a place costing more than a thousand taels of silver to accommodate them all," responded Ho Hsin.

"My colleague Hsia Yen-ling," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "now that he has a capital appointment, will not be going back to Ch'ing-ho and will have to dispose of the house he owns there. Venerable sir, why don't you purchase that place of his in order to provide a house for your nephew? That would be a good move, since it would:

Accomplish two objectives with a single act.

His house has a fifty-four-foot-wide frontage and five interior courtyards, receding along a vertical axis. Inside the ceremonial gate there is a large reception hall with vaulted stag's head roofs over the galleries connecting it to the anterooms on either side of the courtyard. In the rear there are located residential quarters, ornamental pavilions, and a host of other rooms on all sides, with passageways leading between them. It is more than spacious enough to accommodate your nephew."

"What price does he expect to get for it?" asked Ho Hsin.

"He has told me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that he originally paid twelve hundred taels for it, and that he has since added two flat-roofed rooms to the rear, and erected an ornamental pavilion. However, if you would like to acquire it, venerable sir, he would probably let you have it for whatever you are prepared to offer."

"I'm putting the matter in Your Honor's hands," said Ho Hsin. "Whatever Your Honor proposes will be all right with me. Since I am at home today, why don't you send someone to speak to him and ask for the loan of the original deed of sale, so that I can take a look at it? It would be a rare stroke of luck to succeed in locating a house so that my nephew will have a place to stay when he assumes his new office.”

Before long, whom should they see but Tai-an and the other servants who came back to report that they had fetched the luggage.

Hsi-men Ch'ing asked, “Did Pen the Fourth and Wang Ching come back with you or not?”

“Wang Ching is already here, having overseen the transport of the trunks of clothing and other luggage,” reported Tai-an. “The sedan chair is still there, and Pen the Fourth remained to look after it.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon:

Whispered into his ear in a low voice,

Thus and thus, and

So and so,

saying, “Take my calling card and request that His Honor Hsia Yen-ling loan me the original deed of sale for that place of his, so that Eunuch Director Ho Hsin can examine it; and bring Pen the Fourth back with you.”

Tai-an assented and set off on this errand.

It was not long before Pen the Fourth, wearing black livery and a commoner's informal skullcap, came back with Tai-an, who handed the deed of sale to Hsi-men Ch'ing and reported, “His Honor Hsia Yen-ling responded to your request by saying, ‘Since it is the venerable eunuch Ho Hsin who is interested in my place, how can I put a price on it?’ This is the original deed of sale that I have brought back with me. He also said that he had spent a good deal of money on making improvements to the property, but that he would go along with whatever Your Honor proposes.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing handed the original deed of sale to Ho Hsin, who read it over and saw that the purchase price was stated to be twelve hundred taels.

“I imagine he must have resided in this house for some years by now,” he said, “so the interior can hardly help showing some signs of wear and tear, which would offset whatever he may have spent on improvements. Out of respect for Your Honor, however, I am willing to invest in the property on my nephew's behalf and am prepared to pay the original purchase price.”

On hearing this, Pen the Fourth hastily knelt down in front of him and said, “What Your Honor proposes is appropriate. It has always been true that:

You must be ready to spend lavishly,

In order to acquire a good property.

In a thousand years a dwelling may have a hundred owners,⁶⁴

But each time it is refurbished it will be as good as new.”⁶⁵

When Eunuch Director Ho Hsin heard these words, he was utterly captivated and exclaimed, “Where do you come from? This character certainly has a way with words. As the saying goes:

Those who would accomplish great things, do not balk at petty outlays.⁶⁶

What he says is right enough. What is his name?”

“He is one of my managers,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “and he is called Pen the Fourth.”

“Well then,” Ho Hsin said to him, “since we don't yet have an intermediary, you can serve as our middleman, and go request a deed of sale on my behalf. Since today is a propitious day for such a transaction, I might as well proceed to weigh out the silver for him forthwith.”

“It's already late right now,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing. “You might as well wait until tomorrow.”

“At the fifth watch I have to report for early duty in the palace,” explained Eunuch Director Ho Hsin, “and tomorrow is the day of the great audience. I might as well wrap the matter up by turning the silver over to him today and thereby conclude the matter.”

“At what time will the imperial equipage leave the palace tomorrow?” asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

“The imperial equipage will leave the palace in order to proceed to the Altar of Heaven at 11:00 tonight,” said Ho Hsin. “The Suburban Sacrifice should be over by 1:00 AM at the end of the third watch. By 4:30 AM the imperial equipage will have returned to the palace for the serving of a morning meal, after which the Emperor will emerge to preside over the audience in the main hall of the palace, and receive the congratulations of the assembled officials. The various bureaucratic offices of the entire empire will all submit memorials in celebration of the winter solstice. On the following day, a banquet will be held for the principal civil and military officials of the capital to celebrate the completion of the ceremony. Since the two of you are outer officials, serving in the provinces, once you have submitted your memorials at the great audience, there will be nothing more for you to do.”

When he had finished speaking, Ho Hsin instructed his nephew Ho Yung-shou, the newly appointed battalion commander, to go back to the interior of the residence and bring out twenty-four large silver ingots weighing fifty taels apiece, and put them in food boxes for carrying. He then deputed two household servants to accompany Pen the Fourth and Tai-an in escorting them to Privy Councillor Ts'ui Shou-yü's house and delivering them to Hsia Yen-ling.

When Hsia Yen-ling saw that they had brought the silver for him, he was utterly delighted and immediately wrote out a deed of sale in his own hand and turned it over to Pen the Fourth and his companions. When they took this back and delivered it to Eunuch Director Ho Hsin, he was:

Unable to contain his delight, and rewarded Pen the Fourth with ten taels of silver, and Tai-an and Wang Ching with three taels each.

"They're only youngsters," protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You ought not to reward them so lavishly."

"I'm just offhandedly giving them enough with which to buy something to eat," responded Ho Hsin.

The three recipients kowtowed to him in gratitude, and Ho Hsin ordered that they also be provided with food and wine.

He then turned to Hsi-men Ch'ing and bowed twice, saying, "This outcome is entirely due to Your Honor's diffracted radiance."

"Whoever heard of such a thing?" protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It is really owing to your golden reputation."

Ho Hsin went on to say, "I hope that Your Honor will speak to Hsia Yen-ling and urge him to vacate that place of his as soon as convenient, so that my nephew's dependents can prepare for their departure."

"Your pupil will certainly speak to him," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and urge him to vacate the premises as soon as possible. My new colleague, your nephew, when he first arrives, can stay temporarily in the residential quarters of the yamen for a few days, until Hsia Yen-ling's dependents have moved to the capital, and the place has been put in order. It will not be too late if my colleague's dependents delay their departure until then."

"It should be possible to carry out whatever renovations are necessary by the end of the New Year's celebrations," said Ho Hsin. "It would be best for my nephew's dependents to make their move at that time. It will not be convenient if they have to stay in the yamen for too long."

As their conversation continued, it was already the second watch of the night, and Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Venerable sir, let us say good night. Your pupil:

Cannot handle the effects of the drink."

Only then did Eunuch Director Ho Hsin consent to call it a night and retreat to his heated chamber in the rear of the house.

Meanwhile, Ho Yung-shou called for the household musicians to perform for them again and proceeded to play a game of pitch-pot with Hsi-men Ch'ing. Only after they had continued drinking for a while longer did they get up and go back to the rear garden.

The accommodation provided for Hsi-men Ch'ing consisted of a three-room studio ranged along the northern end of the garden, which was surrounded on all four sides by a whitewashed wall, and enhanced with terraces and kiosks, ornamental rock formations, potted miniature plants, flowers and trees. Inside the studio:

Crimson candles blazed on high;

Drapes enclosed layered quilts.

Brocaded curtains set off Japanese screens decorated with gold tracery;

Zithers, books, tables, and mats enhanced the air of elegant seclusion.

The kingfisher blinds hung low;

The furnishings were faultless.

On the stove, tea was steeping in a precious pot;

Within the censer, cakes of musk were smoldering.

Ho Yung-shou continued to make small talk with Hsi-men Ch'ing, and, sometime later, a servant lad served them with tea. Only then did Ho Yung-shou say good night and go back to his own quarters in the rear of the house. Hsi-men Ch'ing warmed himself at the stove for a while before he finally disposed of his headgear:

Took off his clothes and went to bed.⁶⁷

Wang Ching and Tai-an helped him off with his boots and stockings, put out the lamps and candles, and prepared to sleep after laying out their bedding on a heated k'ang at the lower end of the room.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was somewhat inebriated. As he lay on the pillow, he observed that his quilts and mattresses were of satin and brocade, his bed curtains were of embroidered sable, and the bed itself was like a heated alcove decorated with gold tracery. As he lay under his quilt, he saw that:

The window was illuminated by moonlight,

and:

He tossed first this way and then that, unable to get to sleep. After a while, as he listened to the steady dripping of the clepsydra and watched the quiet movements of the flower shadows, he became aware that the cold wind was rattling the papered window panes. His feeling of loneliness was exacerbated by the fact that he had been away from home for some time, and he was on the verge of inviting Wang Ching to come sleep with him.

All of a sudden, he heard the faint sound of a woman's voice outside the window and, hastily donning a robe and getting out of bed, slipped on his shoes and stockings and cautiously opened the door to see who it was. Lo and behold, it was Li P'ing-erh:

With misty locks and cloudy tresses,

Faintly made up, lovely and elegant.

A well-worn plain white gown veiled her snow-white body;

Soft light-yellow stockings set off her upturned shoe-tips.⁶⁸

Lightly moving her lotus feet,
 She appeared beneath the moon.
 As soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing saw her, he:
 Took her into the room,⁶⁹
 Embraced her, and wept,⁷⁰
 saying, "Darling, what are you doing here?"
 "I've come looking for you," said Li P'ing-erh, "in order to tell you that I've found a new home. I especially wanted to see you tonight because I'll be moving in before long."
 "Where is this home of yours located?" Hsi-men Ch'ing inquired anxiously.
 "It's not far away at all," replied Li P'ing-erh. "If you go out from here, it's located on Potter's Alley, off the east side of the main thoroughfare."
 When they had finished speaking, she and Hsi-men Ch'ing:
 Enfolded each other in a mutual embrace,⁷¹
 Got into bed to play at clouds and rain,⁷² and experienced scarcely endurable transports of delight. Once it was over, she:
 Adjusted her attire, redid her chignon, but Hesitated reluctantly to part from him.⁷³
 Li P'ing-erh repeatedly enjoined Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "My Brother, be sure you remember to abstain from late night drinking parties, and return home as early as possible. That wretch of mine is forever on the lookout for a means of bringing you to grief. Whatever you do, don't forget these words of mine. You must keep them constantly in mind."
 When she had finished speaking, she took Hsi-men Ch'ing by the hand and urged him to see her on her way home. When they arrived out on the main thoroughfare, he saw that:
 The moonlight was as bright as day.⁷⁴
 Sure enough, when they headed east past the memorial arch, they arrived at a small alley and, almost immediately thereafter, came to a double-leaved gate of white planks.
 Li P'ing-erh pointed it out, saying, "This is my home."
 No sooner had she finished speaking, than she:
 Shook herself loose and went inside.
 Hsi-men Ch'ing hastily stepped forward to stop her but suddenly awoke with a start to find that it was but:
 A dream of the Southern Branch.
 All he could see was:
 The moonbeams slanting across the window, and
 The rising shadows of the flowering branches.
 Feeling the bedding beneath him, Hsi-men Ching found that:
 His flow of semen covered the mat,
 Her fragrance saturated the quilt,
 The taste of her saliva was sweet.
 Grieving over her was of no avail,
 His anguish could not be overcome.⁷⁵
 Truly:
 The good things of this world are none too enduring;
 Colored clouds are prone to scatter and glass is brittle.
 There is a poem that testifies to this:
 The jade firmament is somewhat nebulous,
 pervaded as it is by frost;

Li P'ing-erh Appears in a Dream in Ho Yung-shou's House

Faint moonlight penetrates the casement, as his dreaming soul awakes.
In desolation, he tries to go to sleep until he can try no longer;
How he hates it that the torpid rooster refuses to announce the dawn. ⁷⁶

Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Tossed first this way and then that, waiting for the rooster to crow, and longing for the break of day. But, when the day finally broke, he had dozed off.

Early in the morning, the page boys in Ho Yung-shou's house got up and waited on Hsi-men Ch'ing with hot water and towels so he could wash his face. After Wang Ching and Tai-an had helped Hsi-men Ch'ing to comb his hair and perform his ablutions, Ho Yung-shou came out to keep him company. When they had drunk a serving of ginger-flavored tea, he had a table set up and invited Hsi-men Ch'ing to have some congee.

"Why has the old gentleman not appeared?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked.

"My venerable uncle had to report for duty in the palace at the fifth watch," Ho Yung-shou replied.

In no time at all, the congee was served as they sat around the brazier, accompanied by four saucers of tastefully presented appetizers, and four large bowls of stewed meats. When they had finished eating the congee, a wine-laced pick-me-up containing pork meatballs, eggs, and wonton was served, with gold spoons and carved lacquer cups encased with silver. As they ate, they ordered their servants to go outside and prepare their horses.

Ho Yung-shou and Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded, dressed in formal attire and attended by their servitors, to go into the Forbidden City and report to the Ministry of War. When they came out, they separated, as Ho Yung-shou headed for home, while Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the Hsiang-kuo Temple to pay a call on Abbot Chih-yün. The abbot retained him for a vegetarian repast, but Hsi-men Ch'ing ate only a single delicacy himself, conferring the remainder on his attendants.

When they left the temple, Tai-an was carrying some satins and brocades in a felt bag as they went along East Street, intending to go to Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü's residence in order to pay a congratulatory visit to Hsia Yen-ling. On their way there, halfway through Potter's Alley, Hsi-men Ch'ing actually saw a double-leaved gate of white planks, exactly like the one he had seen in his dream.

Hsi-men Ch'ing unobtrusively sent Tai-an to ask the old woman who sold bean curd next-door who the house belonged to, and the old woman replied, "It is the home of Commander Yüan."

On hearing this, Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Could not suppress a sigh of astonishment.

When they arrived at the residence of Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü, Hsia Yen-ling was in the process of leading out his horse in order to go pay a social call. When he saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived, he told his attendants to take the horse aside and invited him into the reception hall, where they bowed to each other and exchanged the customary amenities. Hsi-men Ch'ing told Tai-an to bring out his congratulatory gifts, consisting of a length of brocaded damask on a blue ground and a length of variegated satin.

"Your pupil has not yet had the chance to congratulate his colleague," said Hsia Yen-ling, "but has allowed you to anticipate me. And yesterday, you also went to a good deal of trouble on my behalf with regard to the disposition of my humble abode.

My gratitude knows no bounds."

"Eunuch Director Ho Hsin asked your pupil to assist him in finding a house for his nephew," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and since Your Honor had asked me to help with the disposition of your property, I mentioned it's availability to him. Ho Hsin having expressed an interest in purchasing it, your pupil could scarcely have refrained from helping to complete the transaction, and when I sent for the original deed of sale, and he had perused it, he readily consented to pay the original purchase price. It is the nature of eunuchs to be impulsive, expecting:

Bridges to be built while they wait on horseback, that accounts for this successful conclusion. It is a stroke of good luck for Your Honor."

When he had finished speaking, they had a laugh together.

"I haven't yet had a chance to repay Ho Yung-shou's visit," said Hsia Yen-ling.

He then went on to ask, "Is he going to accompany my colleague on his return trip?"

"He has already agreed to travel with your pupil," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He will send for his dependents later. Last night the venerable eunuch made a point of asking me to urge Your Honor to vacate the premises as soon as possible, so that his nephew can arrange for his dependents to join him. At present, he is planning to stay temporarily in the yamen for a few days."

"Your pupil will not procrastinate about it," Hsia Yen-ling assured him. "As soon as I succeed in finding a place here, I will send someone to fetch my dependents. I should be able to manage it by early next month."

When they had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing got up to go and left a calling card for Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü.

"I would like to retain my colleague for a longer visit," said Hsia Yen-ling, "but we are both only sojourners here. You know how it is."

He then escorted Hsi-men Ch'ing outside, where he mounted his horse and returned to the home of Ho Yung-shou.

Ho Yung-shou had already seen to the preparation of a noon repast and was waiting for him there.

Hsi-men Ch'ing told him everything that Hsia Yen-ling had said, explaining that he would undertake to have his property in Ch'ing-ho vacated by early next month, so that Ho Yung-shou could arrange to have his dependents move in at that time.

Ho Yung-shou was delighted to hear this and thanked him, saying, "This is but a further demonstration of my colleague's concern for my welfare."

After their meal, the two of them were in the reception hall playing a board game together, when an attendant suddenly came in and announced, "His Honor Chai Ch'ien from the grand preceptor's mansion has sent people to deliver a gift for the road to you. They went looking for you at the home of Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü, but he sent them on here to find you."

Thereupon, he handed over a calling card of safflower red paper, with a list of presents that read, "The enclosed one length of satin brocade, one length of cloud-patterned linen, one freshly slaughtered pig, one northern sheep, two jars of wine from the imperial palace, and two boxes of sweetmeats are deferentially presented as a token of his respect by your kinsman Chai Ch'ien."

Upon speaking to the messenger, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "I am once again the recipient of His Honor Chai Ch'ien's generosity."

He then accepted the presents, wrote a card in reply, rewarded the messenger with two taels of silver, and the bearers of the gift boxes with five mace of silver each; saying to the messenger as he did so, "I am inconvenienced by being away from home and fear that this paltry compensation may be regarded as a slight."

The messenger promptly took the gratuity, though protesting the while, "Your servant dares not presume to accept it."

"Inadequate as it is," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it should suffice to buy you a cup of wine."

Only then did the messenger kowtow in gratitude and formally accept it.

At this point, Wang Ching, who was standing beside Hsi-men Ch'ing, interjected in a low voice, "My elder sister enjoined me to go to the grand preceptor's residence in order to visit Ai-chieh and entrusted me with some things for her."

"What things are those?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"They are two pairs of shoes and foot bindings made for her by my sister at home," replied Wang Ching.

"If that's all, it will hardly be adequate," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Then, turning to Tai-an, he said, "In my leather trunk, there are some rose hip-flavored pastries that I brought with me. Take two containers of them and put them into a small gift box decorated with gold tracery."

He then wrote out a card to go with them and handed it to Wang Ching, who had put on his black livery, telling him to go back to Chai Ch'ien's residence with the messenger and pay a visit to Ai-chieh. But no more of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded to write out a card and sent the sheep and one of the jars of wine to Privy Councilor Ts'ui Shou-yü to thank him for his hospitality, while arranging to have the pig, the other jar of wine, and the two boxes of sweetmeats taken back to the rear of the residence for the delectation of the venerable Eunuch Director Ho Hsin; saying as he did so, "I have put you here to quite a lot of trouble."

This threw Ho Yung-shou into such consternation that he hastily bowed in thanks, saying, "My colleague, you and I are like members of the same family. What need is there for you to do all this?"

To resume our story, when Wang Ching arrived at the grand preceptor's mansion, he invited Han Ai-chieh to come out and paid his respects to her in the outer reception hall. She was adorned as resplendently as:

A tree of jade in a forest of alabaster,⁷⁷ quite unlike the appearance she had presented in her old home, and had also increased considerably in stature. She arranged for him to be entertained with food and wine and, having noticed that he seemed to be rather thinly clad, presented him with a sable cloak lined with ultramarine satin, and five taels of silver. When he returned to report on his trip, he showed these gifts to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who expressed his gratification.

As Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou continued playing their board game, they suddenly heard the sound of outriders clearing the road, and a gatekeeper came in to report that His Honor Hsia Yen-ling had come to pay his respects and presented two calling cards from him. The two of them hastily adjusted their attire and welcomed him into the reception hall, where they exchanged the customary amenities, and Ho Yung-shou thanked him for his agreement to sell his property the day before. Hsia Yen-ling had brought with him a pair of satin kerchiefs to present to the two of them as congratulatory gifts, and Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou thanked him repeatedly and turned them over to their servants to put away. He also presented Pen the Fourth, Tai-an, and Wang Ching with a gratuity of ten taels of silver. As they sat down in the positions appropriate for guests and host, and tea was served, they chatted about the weather.

Hsia Yen-ling then asked, "Might I invite the venerable eunuch to come out so that I can pay him my respects?"

"My uncle is on duty in the palace at present," responded Ho Yung-shou.

Hsia Yen-ling left behind a red accordion-bound calling card, saying, "Please convey my regards to the venerable eunuch. I have been tardy in paying my respects. Pray forgive me."

When he had finished speaking, he said goodbye, got up, and departed.

Ho Yung-shou, for his part, promptly prepared a bolt of satin brocade as a congratulatory gift for Hsia Yen-ling and dispatched someone to deliver it. But no more of this.

That evening, Ho Yung-shou also entertained Hsi-men Ch'ing to a late-night drinking party in his heated chamber in the rear garden. The household musicians sang for them until the second watch before they went to bed.

Concerned about the wet dream he had had the night before, Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Wang Ching to bring his bedding inside that evening and sleep on the floor of the studio. When the night was half over, he called him onto his own bed and proceeded to embrace his naked body under the bedclothes:

Stuck out his clove-shaped tongue, and Mingled his sweet spittle with his.

Truly:

Failing to consummate his assignation with Ts'ui Ying-ying;
He settled for a tryst with Hung-niang to relieve his lust.⁷⁸

Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next morning, he arose at the fifth watch and set out with Ho Yung-shou, accompanied by their servants, to attend the audience in the palace. They first proceeded to the Tai-lou Yüan, or Clepsydra Waiting-Hall, where they waited until the Tung-hua Men, or Eastern Floriate Gate, of the Forbidden City opened, when they proceeded to enter the imperial precincts. Behold:

The stars are still visible in the sky, as the palace clepsydra runs out;⁷⁹

The jade girdle ornaments of the courtiers sound a tinkling shan-shan.

Blossoms brush against swords and halberds as the stars begin to sink;

Pennants sweep away the willows, on which the dew is not yet dry.⁸⁰

Amid the glow of an auspicious nimbus, they gaze upon the Emperor;

An exhalation of propitious vapor envelops
the thousand officials.
If you wish to foresee the sentiments of the Son of Heaven this day;
Gaze afar at the purple vapor emanating from the Isles of the Blest.

In a little while, behold:

The portals of the Forbidden City are opened,
To the harmonious clanging of phoenix
girdle pendants;
The doors of the celestial palace are parted, Making visible the majestic regalia of the dragon robe.
On this day of prolonged prosperity and extended peace,⁸¹
We celebrate the dawning of an era of auspicious joy.⁸²

At that time, the Son of Heaven had already returned from presiding over the Southern Suburban Sacrifice to Heaven, and the civil and military officials had all assembled at court to await his appearance at the great audience.⁸³ Before long, after the tolling of a bell, the equipage of the Son of Heaven emerged from the palace, and he ascended to the Great Hall for Veneration of Governance to accept the congratulations of the hundred officials. Shortly thereafter:

The incense burners commenced their revolution;
The drapes were raised and the flabella parted.⁸⁴

What did the imposing ceremonial of the imperial audience that day look like? Behold:

The imperial aura is clear and peaceful,
Genial and agreeable, like an enveloping mist;
The resplendent sun dominates the void,
Voluminous and rising, clouds of vapor linger.
Nebulous and indistinct,
The dragon towers and phoenix pavilions,⁸⁵
Are enveloped with a fragrant haze;
Pervading and spreading,⁸⁶
The pearly palaces and jeweled halls,⁸⁷
Reflect the glow of morning clouds.
The Ta-ch'ing Hall,
The Ch'ung-ch'ing Hall,
The Wen-te Hall, and
The Chi-hsien Hall,
Sparkle and glisten;⁸⁸
Their golds and greens blending their hues.
The Ch'ien-ming Palace,
The K'un-ning Palace,
The Chao-yang Palace,
The Ho-pi Palace, and
The Ch'ing-ning Palace,
Shimmer and shine;
Their reds and greens glowing brilliantly.
Bleakly and coldly,⁸⁹
The sun illumines the jade flagstones and carved balustrades;⁹⁰
Drifting and floating,
The mist enshrouds the gilded rafters and the painted beams.
Within purple portals and yellow chambers,

In precious tripods, billowing and streaming,
Aloeswood incense smolders;
Along crimson steps and maroon stairways,
On jade terraces, brightly and resplendently,⁹¹
Painted candles burn high.
Lung-lung tung-tung,
The Heaven-shaking drums beat out a triple paradiddle;
K'eng-k'eng hung-hung,
The Ch'ang-lo Palace bell tolls
a hundred eight times.
Entangled and confused,⁹²
Sword-bearing guardsmen bump into each other;
Thronging and swarming,
Dragon and tiger flags swirl about in disorder.
Soldiers with brocade robes and floriate caps,⁹³
Bearing round baldachins and square baldachins,
Array themselves both in front and behind;
Officers with jade tallies and dragon banners,
Driving in gilded carriages and jade carriages,
Deploy themselves both to left and to right.

Also to be seen are:

Vertically held maces, and Horizontally held maces,
By threes and by twos;⁹⁴
Paired dragon flabella, and Single dragon flabella,
Doubled and redoubled.⁹⁵
Squad by squad and troop by troop,⁹⁶
Horses with gold saddles, and Horses with jade bridles,
Display their discipline;
Brace by brace and pair by pair,⁹⁷
Cabin-bearing elephants, and Cart-pulling elephants,
Show their prodigiousness.
The elite guardsmen protecting the hall,⁹⁸
Each and every one of them lanky and large-sized, comparable to celestial deities,
Are clothed in plates of gilded armor;
The palace wardens securing the audience,
Every single one of them rigorously disciplined, resembling terrestrial spirits,
Are armed with florally incised swords.
Rigid and ordered,⁹⁹
Within the gate of the hall are arrayed the ceremonial supervisors,
Each of them wearing a high judicial cap,
Holding his tablet in front of his chest,¹⁰⁰
Straight and proper,
Beside the inclined stairway are standing the assembled officials,

Each of them in a brightly brocaded robe,
 Ready to receive announcements and edicts.
 Within the golden hall, in plenteous profusion,¹⁰¹
 Ornamented flabella open simultaneously;
 Before the decorated rafters, deftly and gently,¹⁰²
 The beaded blinds have been rolled high.¹⁰³
 Atop the bell tower, chiao-chiao yüeh-yüeh,
 Herald's proclaim the dawn three times;
 In front of the jade stairs, la-la kua-kua,
 Silence-commanding whips crack thrice.
 Rigorously disciplined,
 Beside the sculpted dragons,
 Arrayed in official regalia,
 There stand holders of the five noble ranks;
 Majestic and inspiring,¹⁰⁴
 Seated on his dragon throne,
 Resting on a brocade cushion,
 They look upon the Lord of a Myriad Chariots.¹⁰⁵
 Gazing at him from a distance:¹⁰⁶
 On his head he wears the flat-topped crown with twelve tassels,¹⁰⁷
 His body is clad in a yellow ocher imperial dragon robe,
 His waist is bound by a girdle adorned with Indigo Field jade,¹⁰⁸
 On his feet he wears thick-soled, polished, black leather boots,
 In his hands he grasps a tablet of white jade inlaid with gold,
 At his back stands a nine thunder cloud, dragon and phoenix screen.

Truly:

On a clear day the green latticed doors of the palace open wide;
 A celestial breeze broadcasts the aroma of the imperial incense.¹⁰⁹
 A thousand strands of auspicious vapor¹¹⁰ float by the golden gates;
 While a solitary crimson-colored cloud¹¹¹
 envelops the Jade Emperor.¹¹²

This emperor was born with:

The eyebrows of Yao and the eyes of Shun,
 The back of Yü and the shoulders of T'ang.¹¹³
 If one were to describe this emperor:
 His talents were superior to those of other men,
 He was skilled at extemporaneous poetic rhyming,
 He was able to tally herds of sheep at a glance.¹¹⁴
 He was as good as Wen T'ung at painting inkwash bamboos,¹¹⁵
 And as skillful as Hsüeh Chi at dashing off calligraphy.¹¹⁶
 He was versed in the books of the three religions,
 And acquainted with the texts of the Nine Schools.
 Indulgent in pleasure, by day and by night,
 He was just like the ruler of Chien-ko, Meng Ch'ang of the Later Shu dynasty;¹¹⁷

In love of beauty and addiction to the cup,
He was much like the ruler of Chin-ling, Ch'en Shu-pao of the Ch'en dynasty.¹¹⁸

During the twenty-six years after he ascended the throne at the age of seventeen, he changed the titles of his reign periods six times, starting with Chien-chung ching-kuo, and continuing with Ch'ung-ning, Ta-kuan, Cheng-ho, Ch'ung-ho, and Hsüan-ho.¹¹⁹

That day, when the Emperor had ascended the throne, and the silence-commanding whips had cracked, the civil and military officials in the wake of the nine ministers and four directors,¹²⁰ holding their tablets in front of their chests, mounted the red steps leading up to the dais, performed the ceremony of five obeisances and three kowtows,¹²¹ and presented their memorials.

When they had finished doing so, the eunuch who held the post of palace foreman, with his body clad in a close-fitting purple gown, and his waist encircled with a gold-embossed girdle, strode out to the head of the golden stairs and orally proclaimed an imperial edict,¹²² saying, "It is now twenty years since We acceded to the throne.¹²³ The Mount Ken Imperial Park has been completed, and Heaven has vouchsafed propitious omens. This day inaugurates the dawn of an auspicious era, the benefits of which We intend to share with all of you gentlemen."

Before he had even finished speaking, a great minister at the head of the gathered ranks stepped forward:

His court boots resound upon the ground,
The sleeves of his robe stir the breeze.
If you do not know his official rank,
His jade girdle proclaims his status.

When the assembled officials looked at him, it turned out to be the left grand councilor, grand academician of the Hall for Veneration of Governance, minister of personnel, grand preceptor, and Duke of Lu, Ts'ai Ching.

Wearing his official headgear and holding his ivory tablet,¹²⁴ he prostrated himself upon the golden stairs¹²⁵ and kowtowed, saying, "May Your Majesty live ten thousand years, ten thousand years, ten thousand times ten thousand years!¹²⁶ Your minister and his cohorts, in sincere fear and trepidation, kowtow and render their obeisance.¹²⁷ We respectfully observe that during the twenty years since Your Majesty acceded to the throne:

The sea-girt realm has been at peace,¹²⁸
The whole empire has been prosperous.
Exalted Heaven, having observed this,¹²⁹
Has produced untold auspicious omens:
The sun has radiated double coronas,
The stars have shone notably bright,
The seas have expanded their extent.
Your Sage Majesty holds the celestial mandate,
Ensuring You of a reign of ten thousand years.
Heaven will be stable,
Earth will be pacific,
People will be serene.
The size of the realm and solidity of the dynasty,
Only enhance the probability of a perpetual reign.
The Three Border Regions have benefited from a cessation of warfare;
The myriad states have come to pay court¹³⁰ before the celestial portals.
Mount Ken towers athwart the empyrean,¹³¹
The Jade Capital flaunts its elegance.
The Precious Registers conferring the mandate are exhibited before the palace gates;
The Scarlet Empyrean Tower soars loftily into the sky above the celestial structures.¹³²
How fortunate Your minister and his cohorts are,
To have the joy of living in this exalted reign,
And associating with such brilliant compatriots.
May Your Majesty profit eternally from the three wishes of the border guard at Hua;¹³³
And reap the constant benefits of the light shed upon You by the sun and the moon.

Unable to overcome our extreme trepidation on gazing upward at the celestial and sage presence of Your Majesty,¹³⁴
We humbly submit this eulogy for Your attention.”

After some time, an imperial rescript was proclaimed, saying, “The eulogy submitted by Our worthy minister only accentuates his loyalty and sincerity, while serving to enhance Our gratification. We hereby decree that the coming year will be the first year of the Ch’ung-ho reign period. On the first day of the first month, We shall formally accept the newly created seal of state known as the Mandate Determining Seal,¹³⁵ declare a general amnesty, and issue rewards to Our ministers in accordance with their ranks.”

When Grand Preceptor Ts’ai Ching had descended the steps after receiving the rescript in response to his eulogy, the eunuch who held the post of palace foreman proclaimed the Emperor’s command, saying:

“If you have a report to make, proceed forthwith;
If not, roll up the blinds and depart the court.”¹³⁶

Before he had finished speaking, what should they see but a man who:

Stepped forward out of the ranks,
His tablet lowered and body bent,¹³⁷
Garbed in red, with an ivory tablet,
Wearing a jade girdle and gold fish, and proceeded to prostrate himself on the golden stairs, stating, “Your minister, Grand Master of the Imperial Household, Defender-in-Chief of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, Grand Guardian, and Grand Guardian of the Heir Apparent, Chu Mien, hereby presents before Your Majesty the twenty-six judicial commissioners kneeling behind me, Chang Lung and company, from the thirteen provinces of the empire, the Two-Huai regions, the Two-Che regions, Shantung, Shansi, Honan, Hopei, Kuan-tung, Kuan-hsi, Fukien, Kuang-nan, and Szechwan. They have been evaluated according to precedent, and recommended for either promotion or reassignment, and are here waiting to receive their credentials. Since it is mandated that these recommendations be presented before Your Majesty, and I lack the presumption to act on my own,¹³⁸ I request the issuance of a rescript to decide the matter.”¹³⁹

In response to this request, an imperial rescript approving the recommendations according to precedent was duly proclaimed. After Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien had descended the steps upon receiving the rescript, the Son of Heaven, with one flip of his sleeves, dismissed the assembled ministers, got into his carriage, and returned to the palace, while the officials, divided into their civil and military ranks, exited the Forbidden City through the Tuan-li Gate, or Gate of Correct Protocol. The twelve trained elephants from the imperial entourage preceded them without the help of their attendants, and the elite guardsmen followed in their wake as they went their separate ways.

All that can be heard is the clinking of armor,
As the sword-bearing guardsmen,
And the red-clad palace guards,
Emerge simultaneously.
All that can be seen is the glint of poleaxes,
Where outside of the palace gate,
Carriages and horses are arrayed,
And guardsmen lined up.
The shouting of men resembles,
The turmoil of oceans and crashing of breakers;
The neighing of horses is like,
The collapse of mountains and cracking of earth.¹⁴⁰

The crowd of judicial commissioners all emerged from the palace grounds, mounted their horses, and proceeded to the headquarters of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, where they congregated as closely as though they were:

Locked tight in an iron bucket.

Before long, whom should they see but a seal-keeper, who came out with his badge of office in hand and announced, “His Honor the defender-in-chief will not return to the yamen today. His sedan chair is already waiting for him just inside the Hsi-hua Men, or Western Floriate Gate, and he is about to set out for the mansions of His Honor Ts’ai Ching and His Honor Li Pang-yen in order to join them in celebrating the winter solstice.”

As a result, the assembled officials all scattered, and Hsi-men Ch’ing and Ho Yung-shou returned to the residence of Eunuch Director Ho Hsin, where they spent the night.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch’ing reported back to the Ministry of War to receive his orders of appointment and register his name with the appropriate offices, along with the other expectant officials, after which, he collected what was left of his belongings, packed his luggage, and prepared to set out together with Ho Yung-shou.

Defender-in-Chief Chu Presents a Memorial to the Throne

That evening, Eunuch Director Ho Hsin put on a farewell party for them, during which he said to Ho Yung-shou, "See that you seek the advice of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing in everything, lest, by acting on your own, you should fail in your social obligations."

On the twenty-first day of the eleventh month, they started off from the Eastern Capital, with some twenty attendants between them in their entourage, and set out on the high road to Shantung.

They had already embarked upon:

The ninety coldest days of the winter season,
A time when drops of water turn into icicles.

Along the way, they encountered nothing but:

Empty suburbs and deserted roads,
Desiccated trees and cold ravens.¹⁴¹

In the sparse woods the pale sun sheds a slanting glow;

The evening snow and cold clouds obscure the dusky ford.

Before one mountain is surmounted another comes in view;¹⁴²

By the time one village is passed another comes in sight.

When they had crossed the Yellow River and reached the customs station at Pa-chiao Chen, all of a sudden, they were confronted with a violent windstorm. Behold:

It is not the roaring of tigers,
Nor is it the droning of dragons.
With a sudden rush, a frigid blast strikes the face;

With a violent sough, a cold wind beleaguers them.

Still too weak to strip the willows or bring blossoms out;

Concealed within it are water sprites and mountain goblins.¹⁴³

At the outset, it is utterly devoid of either trace or shadow;¹⁴⁴

But afterwards, it rolls away the mists and effaces the clouds.

It is so alarming that:

Along willow-lined embankments, the seagulls fly away in pairs;

On banks of red smartweed, the mandarin ducks take off together.

Just see the way it:

Penetrates gauze windows,
Extinguishes silver lamps,
Permeates painted bowers,
Pervades silken garments.

In its frenzied dancing, it blows down the blossoms and bends the willows;

In its somber ferocity, it sets stones in motion and raises clouds of sand.¹⁴⁵

In its boundless obscurity,

It blows the great trees into sounding with repeated blasts;

In its whistling cacophony,

It startles a solitary wild goose into sheltering in a ditch.

In no time at all:

The sand and the rocks strike the ground,
And clouds of dirt obscure the heavens;¹⁴⁶
When the sand and rocks strike the ground,
It is just like the unexpected arrival of a skyful of opportune rain;

When clouds of dirt obscure the heavens,
It is like the dust raised by the approach of a million fierce troops.¹⁴⁷

It has the effect of:

Driving the old village fisherman into ceasing his angling,

Packing up his gear, and racing toward home;
And causing the mountain woodcutter to lose his composure,

Put away his tools, and head for his cottage.

It is so frightening that:

The tigers and leopards in the hills,
 Pull in their heads,
 Conceal their tracks,
 And hide themselves in the ravines.
 It blows so hard that:
 The horned dragons deep in the oceans,
 Clench their claws,
 Curl up their tails,
 And fail to flaunt their ferocity.
 After blowing for some time,
 One notices that the rooftop tiles fly off like sparrows;
 After blustering for a while,
 It appears that the hillside stones have taken to flight.
 The rooftop tiles fly off like sparrows,
 Assaulting the traveling merchants into missing the track and losing their way;¹⁴⁸
 The hillside stones have taken to flight, Scaring the merchant ships into securing their hawsers and trimming their sails.
 Tall trees are blown down and uprooted;¹⁴⁹
 Short trees are divested of branch tips.

Just how strong is this wind? Truly:

It overturns the trees that protect the gates of Hell;
 It raises the dust on the summit of
 Feng-tu Mountain.¹⁵⁰
 Ch'ang-o hastily shuts the gates of the moon palace;
 Airborne Lieh-tzu, high in the void, appeals for help.
 It imperils the Jade Emperor's residence on the peak of Mount K'un-lun;
 It blows both the world and the universe¹⁵¹ into violent motion up and down.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou, riding in two closed sedan chairs with felt curtains, were so buffeted by the wind that they found it:

Difficult to proceed a step further.¹⁵²

They also observed that in the waning light they were in danger of being assaulted by criminal elements hiding in the woods. Ho Yung-shou, therefore, suggested to Hsi-men Ch'ing that they head for the next village to seek lodging for the night and proceed the next day when the wind had abated. After searching for what seemed like half a day, they saw in the distance an old monastery by the side of the road, located in a grove of bare willow trees, behind what remained of a crumbling wall. Behold:

By the stone steps the steles have toppled over and are covered by creepers;
 The zigzag galleries and the ancient halls have half fallen into decrepitude.
 Late at night the sojourners are devoid of either lamplight or braziers;
 As the moon sets they can only sigh at the monks engaged in meditation.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou went into the monastery to seek lodging for the night, they noticed a placard indicating that it was named the Yellow Dragon Monastery. On looking into the abbot's quarters, they saw that several monks were sitting there, engaged in meditation. There were no lamps or braziers to be seen, and the living quarters were in a state of dilapidation, some of the gaps in which were patched with woven bamboo. The abbot came out and greeted them with a Buddhist salutation, after which, he lighted a fire to heat some tea and cut some stalks of hay with which to feed their horses. In his luggage, Hsi-men Ching had brought some dried chicken, cured pork, biscuits, hardtack, and the like, which he and Ho Yung-shou managed to make a meal out of that night, while the abbot supplemented it by cooking up a potful of lentil-flavored congee for them, after eating which, they went to bed.

for the night.

The next day, when the wind had stopped and the weather had cleared, they rewarded the old monk with a tael of silver for his hospitality, took their leave, and continued on their journey to Shantung. Truly:

Galloping abroad upon the ruler's business,

they are undeterred by the effort;¹⁵³

Mountains and passes prolong the distance,¹⁵⁴

as they travel toward the capital.

Spending the night in an ancient monastery,

they lack fire for heat or meals;

It is quite enough to cause the wayfarers to be acutely perturbed at heart.

Chapter 72

WANG THE THIRD KOWTOWS TO HSI-MEN CH'ING AS HIS ADOPTED FATHER; YING PO-CHÜEH INTERCEDES TO ALLEVIATE THE GRIEVANCE OF LI MING

The cold and the heat impel each other forward¹ as spring gives place to autumn;
Both for those abroad, and those remaining home,² their feelings remain persistent.
In the cold season, the traveler is plagued by the hardships of wind and frost;
Beset by obstacles, the ruler's loyal servant³ allows his teardrops to overflow.
Endangered by the wind and the waves, he knows not whether he will float or sink;
But meeting with a beauty or enjoying a drink⁴ may serve to alleviate his sorrow.
A snail's-horn of fame, a fly's-head of profit,⁵ have never ceased to be alluring;
How often have they led the black-haired youth to scoff at the white-haired elder.⁶

THE STORY GOES that Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou continued on their journey. But no more of this.

We return instead to the story of Wu Yüeh-niang back at home. It happened that during Hsi-men Ch'ing's former trip to the Eastern Capital, Ch'en Ching-chi was spotted by the wet nurse Ju-i having a drink with P'an Chin-lien in her room, and when Hsi-men Ch'ing came home, Yüeh-niang had borne the brunt of his anger, and they had had a falling out about it.⁷ For that reason, on this occasion when Hsi-men Ch'ing was away from home, Yüeh-niang refrained from doing any entertaining. Even when her brother and sister-in-law came to visit, she would not allow them to stay but sent them abruptly on their way. She instructed P'ing-an to keep the main gate closed unless there were some reason to open it, and she had the ceremonial gate that led into the second courtyard locked up every night. The members of her sorority of wives and concubines did not venture outside but remained in their quarters doing needlework. If Ch'en Ching-chi needed to fetch pawned garments from the storage loft in the rear compound, Yüeh-niang saw to it that either Ch'un-hung or Lai-an accompanied him both on his way in and on his way out. She constantly checked to see if the doors were properly secured and in everything presided over the household more strictly than had been her wont. For this reason, P'an Chin-lien was unable to carry on with Ch'en Ching-chi, and, because it had been the wet nurse Ju-i who had reported her former indiscretion to Yüeh-niang, she was constantly on bad terms with her.

One day, Yüeh-niang got out a considerable number of Hsi-men Ch'ing's undershirts and underpants and handed them over to Ju-i, suggesting that she get Auntie Han to help her in seeing that they were properly washed and starched, and then hung outside to dry in Li P'ing-erh's quarters. Who could have anticipated that in Chin-lien's quarters next door Ch'un-mei was also engaged in laundering her mistress's clothing and was about to begin the process of beating her skirts in order to get them clean, so she sent Ch'iu-chü over to ask if she could borrow a laundry bat for the purpose.

Since Ju-i, along with Ying-ch'un, was engaged in beating Hsi-men Ch'ing's underwear at the time, she refused to give it to her, saying, "You borrowed a laundry bat for your own use just the other day, and here you are asking for it again. Auntie Han, here, is using it right now to beat Father's underpants and undershirts."

Ch'iu-chü, in a fit of temper, angrily marched next door and said to Ch'un-mei, "You insisted on sending me over to borrow it for no good reason, and now they won't let me have it. Ying-ch'un actually said, 'Take it then,' but Ju-i stopped her and refused to let me have it."

"Ai-ya! Ai-ya!" Ch'un-mei exclaimed. "How can she be so uncooperative? It seems as though:

Even in broad daylight, one can't borrow an empty oil lamp from her.

Who knows but what Mother may also expect me to launder her foot bindings after I get through starching this yellow damask skirt of hers. If I ask that woman to lend us a laundry bat but she refuses to let me have it, when I've done washing Mother's things, what am I going to beat them with?"

She then said to Ch'iu-chü, "You'd better go back to the rear compound and see if they have a laundry bat we could use."

When P'an Chin-lien, who was sitting on the k'ang in her room, engaged in putting on her foot bindings, happened to overhear this, she asked, "What's going on?"

Ch'un-mei then told her the whole story of how she had tried to borrow a laundry bat, but Ju-i had refused to give it to her.

Because Chin-lien harbored a long-standing grudge against her, this was just the pretext she had been looking for, and she reviled her, saying, "That lousy whore! How could she refuse to give it to you? You'd better go yourself to demand it of her. And if she refuses, it will be all right to give that whore a piece of your mind."

Ch'un-mei, who was in the prime of youth and needed no urging, set off in a fit of rage for Li P'ing-erh's quarters, where she arrived like a gust of wind, saying, "Just who do you take to be an outsider in this household, anyway, that you should refuse to let her have a laundry bat when she asks for it? It would seem that yet another mistress has emerged out of nowhere in these quarters."

"Ai-ya! Ai-ya!" exclaimed Ju-i. "The laundry bat is right here. Go ahead and take it if you need to. Who do you think is monopolizing it here, anyway, that you should feel justified in getting so angry about it? The First Lady has instructed me that when Auntie Han, here, has finished starching these undershirts and cotton briefs of Father's they should be taken out and beaten with the laundry bat. When Ch'iu-chü came and asked for it, I said to her, 'Wait until I've finished giving these clothes of Father's a couple of strokes with the bat, after which you can take it for your own use.' She has grossly misrepresented the case in claiming that I refused to give it to her. Fortunately, Sister Ying-ch'un is here and can be my witness."

Who could have anticipated that Chin-lien had followed right behind Ch'un-mei and started to curse Ju-i, saying, "That's enough of your lip, woman! Since your mistress died, you act as though you have taken over her place in these quarters, and that Father won't be satisfied to have anyone but you take care of his intimate clothing for him. The rest of us wives might just as well be dead, since only you are fit to launder and starch his clothes for him. You think that by adopting this strategy you can lord it over the rest of us, do you? Well, I'm:

Quite inured to such alarms."

"Fifth Lady, how can you say such a thing?" protested Ju-i. "If the First Lady had not instructed us to do so, do you really think we would have had the nerve to insist on being the only ones to take care of Father's things for him?"

"Why you lousy splay-legged, man-hunting whore!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "You still insist on defending yourself, do you? Who is it that served Father with tea and adjusted his bedding for him in the middle of the night? And who talked him into having a jacket made for her? You think the things you're up to behind our backs are unknown to me, do you? Even if your furtive shenanigans should result in a pregnancy, I won't be intimidated by you."

"His legitimate consort and her son both came to grief," said Ju-i.

"Where can I hope to get to?"

If Chin-lien had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them:

A fire blazed up in her heart, and

Her powdered face became suffused with red.

Striding forward, she grabbed hold of the woman's hair with one hand and proceeded to thump her in the belly with the other until Auntie Han intervened and succeeded in separating them.

"You shameless whore! You man-baiting whore!" Chin-lien cursed. "Here we all are, bored enough to scream as it is, and you come along trying to seduce our husband. What role do you think you play in these quarters anyway? You're simply a reincarnation of Lai-wang's wife; but I'm not afraid of you."

Ju-i, weeping on the one hand, and trying to straighten her hair on the other, responded by saying, "I'm a latecomer here and know nothing of any Lai-wang's wife. All I know is that I serve as a wet nurse in Father's household."

"If you're a wet nurse," said Chin-lien, "you ought to confine yourself to being a wet nurse, instead of preening yourself on your ability to play the preternatural role of:

The fox who flaunted the tiger's might,⁸ in these quarters.

As an old hand at snaring wild geese,⁹ I'll hardly let you get away with any of your devilish tricks."

As she continued to curse away, who should appear but Meng Yü-lou, who came strolling out from the rear compound and intervened, saying, "Sister Six, I invited you to come back to my place for a board game. Why haven't you come, instead of getting into a brawl over something here?"

She then grabbed hold of Chin-lien with one hand, dragged her back to her quarters, and sat her down, saying, "Tell me, what's it all about?"

Chin-lien allowed her anger to gradually subside, and Ch'un-mei served them with tea, while drinking which she said, "Just look. That lousy whore has made me so angry my hands are cold, and I can hardly lift my tea cup."

She then went on to say, "I was in my quarters, engaged in sketching a design to be embroidered on a pair of shoes, when you sent Hsiao-luan to invite me over. I told her I'd come after lying down for a while, and I was reclining on the bed without having yet fallen asleep, when I became aware that this little piece of mine was anxious to beat the skirts she had been laundering for me. I told her, 'Why don't you beat these foot bindings of mine while you're at it?' After what seemed like half a day, I heard the sound of a dispute. She had sent Ch'iu-chü next door to borrow a laundry bat for this purpose, and Ju-i had refused to give it to her, grabbing it back out of her hands and saying, 'You borrowed a laundry bat for your own use just the other day, and now that you can't find it, you're here asking for it again. We're just about to use it to beat some clothes of Father's.' Upon hearing this, I became annoyed, and said to Ch'un-mei, 'You go there yourself and give that lousy whore a piece of your mind.' Since when has she found the nerve to lord it over other people this way? As though we would ever let her get away with it. Who does she think she is, putting on such airs in those quarters of hers? Just as though she had been weighty enough to risk breaking the carrying poles of the bridal palanquin on being brought into the household. Why you're not even a match for that wife of Lai-wang's. I chose to follow right behind Ch'un-mei, and when we got there, Ju-i was still spouting off, yakkety-yak, with that mouth of hers. I gave her a severe tongue-lashing, and if it hadn't been for Auntie Han, who stepped between us and obstinately insisted¹⁰ on dragging me away, I'd have hooked the guts of that lousy, shameless, man-baiting whore right out through her mouth. Does she really think she can pull the wool over our eyes in those quarters of hers by selling scallions for leeks and suchlike mischief? Have you ever seen the likes of our elder sister's irresponsibility? It's reminiscent of the way she indulged that lousy slave of a whore, Lai-wang's wife, to the point where she lost all sense of decorum, with the result that the two of us ended up:

P'an Chin-lien Thumps Chang Ju-i's Stomach with Her Fists

Feeling resentment and harboring hostility, toward each other. And after that, she had the nerve to besmirch me with the gross allegation that I was responsible for driving that slave out of the household. Now, once again, she's indulging this woman to the point that:

All the rules of propriety are turned upside down.¹¹

If you're a wet nurse, you ought to confine yourself to being a wet nurse, rather than being allowed to flaunt your:

Showy glamour and gaudy airs.

I'm really:

Not the sort of person to let dust be thrown in her eyes.

And as for that shameless good-for-nothing:

Nobody knows where the dead end up going to,

but he persists in frequenting her quarters. No matter where he's been, on coming home, he makes a point of going in there, bowing before her portrait, and muttering some mumbo jumbo of who knows what significance. During the night, if he happens to want some tea to drink, that whore gets up and bestirs herself to serve the tea to him, and even goes so far as to adjust his bedding for him. And, the next thing you know, the two of them are going at it together. She's nothing but an inveterate whore. When he calls for the maidservant to bring him some tea, who authorized you to insist upon:

Sticking your neck out and homing in,¹² that way, in your craving for a man? And how is it that, when she asked him for a jacket, that shameless good-for-nothing lost no time in going out to the shop, getting some silk fabric, and having it made into a jacket for her? And there's something else you don't know about. On the day of the final weekly commemoration of Li P'ing-erh's death, Father was persuaded to go into her quarters to burn some paper money and caught the maidservant and that woman sitting on the k'ang engaged in playing a game of jacks, which they hadn't had time to clear away before he came in. But, rather than raising any objection, he said, 'Go on playing if you like, and you needn't bother to send the offerings of dumplings and wine back to the rear compound. You can enjoy them yourselves.' For him to indulge her to such an extent was in recompense for what do you suppose? That whore responded by saying, 'Father, you can come and join us or not, as you see fit. We won't wait up for you.' What she could not have anticipated was that I chose to:

Take two or three strides, and walk right in on her, which startled her to such an extent that she was rendered:

Wide-eyed and speechless, whereupon she had nothing more to say. In the eyes of that good-for-nothing of ours, what kind of a decent woman is she, anyway? She's nothing but a lousy whore, and with a living husband to boot. And yet, you respond to her just like someone whose:

Hungry eyes have alighted on a melon skin;

and insist on sheltering her:

Regardless of the outcome for good or ill.¹³

The fact of the matter is, she's a good-for-nothing overripe peach with too much fire in her eyes. How could she be expected to pay any attention to the proprieties? That whore may allege that her husband is dead, but the other day, was that not her husband, with a baby boy in his arms, inquiring after her at the front gate? She's utterly:

Open-eyed and brazen-faced,¹⁴ in the way she tries to deceive people with her tricks. Just look at the way she persists in putting on the gaudy airs that she's so good at right in front of people's eyes, constantly altering her demeanor to suit the circumstances. You can tell from the way she carries on that she regards herself as a reincarnation of Li P'ing-erh. And meanwhile, our elder sister keeps to the rear compound:

Pretending to be both deaf and dumb, and criticizing anyone who opens her mouth about it."

When Meng Yü-lou had heard her out, she merely smiled.

Chin-lien said:

"Just as Nanking has its Shen Wan-san,¹⁵

Peking has its withered willows;

Just as a man has his reputation,

A tree has its shadow.

How can she fail to be aware that:

If one buries a body in the snow,

It will be exposed when it melts."¹⁶

"It was originally claimed that this woman had no husband," said Meng Yü-lou. "Where did this husband of hers appear from?"

Chin-lien responded, saying:

"If the day lacks wind, it will not be clear;

If people don't lie, they will never succeed.

If she had not resorted to deception, how could she have hoped to find employment? Remember what she looked like when she first came here. She had a ravenous-looking face, her yellow skin was sallow and withered, and she appeared to be:

Both impoverished and emaciated,¹⁷

but after two years of eating her fill, the lousy whore is robust enough to resort to her man-baiting tricks. If you don't attempt to restrain her, before you know it, she'll start:

Assuming privileges above her station;

and if, in due course, she should happen to produce a child, whose would it be?"

Meng Yü-lou laughed at this, saying, "Slavey Six, you surely don't lack the cunning to deal with it."

After sitting a while longer, the two of them went back to the rear compound to play a board game together. Truly:

The three luminaries cast shadows, but who can catch them;
The ten thousand things have no roots, they just arise of themselves.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

A mere handful of spring warmth suffices to stir nature into glory,
Bright crimsons and light greens¹⁸ begin to be engendered everywhere.
Even the wild plum blossom provides ample stimulation for enjoyment,
What need is there to insist upon having a tree of purple magnolias?¹⁹

To make a long story short, one day, in the afternoon, Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived back in Ch'ing-ho district and told Pen the Fourth and Wang Ching to take the luggage and go to the house before him, while he accompanied Ho Yung-shou to the yamen. After seeing that the residential quarters there were properly prepared and swept out in order to provide him with a place to stay, he mounted his horse and returned home.

Wu Yüeh-niang received him in the rear reception hall and proceeded to dust the dirt from the journey off his clothes and ladle out some water so he could wash his face. No sooner was he done with his ablutions than he ordered a maidservant to set up a table in the courtyard, where he:

Lit a full burner of incense, and proceeded to make a vow before the tablets representing Heaven and Earth.

"Why are you making such a vow?" Yüeh-niang asked.

"Not to mention anything else," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'm lucky to be alive."

He then proceeded to tell her about the events on the road during their return trip, saying, "Just yesterday, on the twenty-second day of the eleventh month, we had barely crossed the Yellow River and arrived at Pa-chiao Chen in I-shui district when we ran into a violent windstorm, so nasty that we were blinded by the blowing sand and quite unable to proceed any further. It was late in the day already, and we hadn't seen a soul for the last hundred li of our journey, which threw us all into consternation. On top of which, we had numerous saddlebags and trunks full of valuables and didn't know what to do if we were confronted by robbers. As we proceeded, we came upon an old monastery. Though it was already night, the monks there were so impoverished they didn't even have a lamp lighted. Each of us had some dry rations and hardtack with us, and the abbot not only lent us a light and cooked up a pot of lentil-flavored congee, which we shared between us, but also cut some fodder with which to feed our horses. I then spent the night, foot to foot, on a meditation platform with Ho Yung-shou. The next day, it was only after the wind had died down that we were able to set out again. These hardships were ten times more severe than those I encountered on my last trip to the capital. That time, although the weather was hot, it was not too bad; but this time, not only was the weather bitterly cold, but we had to put up with some fearful conditions. Fortunately, we were on level ground at the time. If we had encountered such a tempest on the Yellow River, who knows what we would have done. While I was still on the road, I made a vow that on the first day of the twelfth month I would sacrifice a pig and a sheep to Heaven and Earth."

"Why didn't you come straight home, just now," asked Yüeh-niang, "instead of going first to the yamen?"

"Hsia Yen-ling," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing, "has recently been promoted to the position of commander of the escort for imperial processions and will consequently no longer be returning here. Ho Yung-shou, the nephew of Eunuch Director Ho Hsin of the Directorate for Buildings in the Palace Treasury, has just been promoted to my former post as assistant judicial commissioner in the Ch'ing-ho office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission. He is not more than nineteen years old, just a little squirt of a youngster, and quite ignorant of the bureaucratic world. His uncle, the eunuch director, repeatedly urged me to look after him in all things and offer him the benefit of my experience. If I had not accompanied him to the yamen and arranged a place for him to stay, he wouldn't have known what to do. I have also made a deal for him to buy that house of Hsia Yen-ling's for twelve hundred taels of silver, but, for the time being, he will have to put up in the yamen until Hsia Yen-ling has vacated the premises, so he can arrange for his own dependents to move in.

"The other day, before we even left town, Hsia Yen-ling was unhappy about the prospect of being transferred to a position in the capital. Some unknown person must have leaked the news of our impending appointments to him. When we arrived in the capital, it turned out that he had previously spent who knows how much silver to solicit the intervention of Perfect Man Lin Ling-su at court, who informed Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien that Hsia Yen-ling wished to retain his rank of battalion commander and preferred to remain in his current post as judicial commissioner for another three years. Defender-in-Chief Chu Mien, accordingly, took the matter up with His Honor the grand preceptor, which put him in an extremely awkward position. If Kinsman Chai Ch'ien had not done everything in his power to maintain my interest, I would have been shunted aside. When I arrived there, Kinsman Chai Ch'ien was extremely annoyed with me and reproached me for not being able to keep a secret. I don't know who it could have been that leaked the information to him."

"You don't believe what I say," responded Yüeh-niang, "but you're altogether too impulsive in the way you carry on, just as if your legs were on fire. You can't keep anything to yourself but are always telling specious stories, first to this one, and then to that, giving people the impression that you're only:

Peddling your influence and parading your wealth.

Truly:

When the mindful plot against the unmindful,
How can the unprepared cope with the prepared?

Having already seen the way you carry on, people think they know what you're up to and can't be bothered to take you seriously. They are able to pursue their own interests on the quiet:

Just as easy as you please, without your knowing anything about it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to say, "When I was about to depart from the capital, Hsia Yen-ling repeatedly requested that I look after the welfare of his family, early and late. Someday soon, you ought to buy an appropriate gift and go pay a call on them."

"Since his wife's birthday is on the second day of the coming month," said Yüeh-niang, "I can accomplish both purposes by paying a call on her then. As I was saying, in the future, you ought to amend the reckless way you go about your business. As the sayings go:

On first meeting one should express no more than three-tenths of one's thoughts;
Never under any circumstances should one disclose the whole content of one's heart.
Even one's wife may harbor duplicitous intent,
Not to mention people in the world at large."

As they were talking, whom should they see but Tai-an, who came in and reported, "Pen the Fourth would like to know whether Father is ready to have him go to the home of His Honor Hsia in order to let them know what has happened, or not?"

"Tell him to go after he has had something to eat," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"He says he doesn't need to eat anything," replied Tai-an.

At this point, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh all trooped in to pay their respects, ask about his trip, and keep him company. Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to remember that when he had returned from his former trip to the Eastern Capital, Li P'ing-erh had also been among them, but today she was no longer there. Without more ado, he went out to her quarters in the front compound, bowed before her spirit tablet, and shed a few tears, after which Ju-i, Ying-ch'un, and Hsiu-ch'un all came forward and kowtowed to him.

Yüeh-niang lost no time in sending Hsiao-yü out to invite him back to the rear compound for a meal. When he had finished eating, he ordered that four taels of silver should be provided to reward the officers who had looked after the ponies on his trip, and he also wrote a calling card thanking Commandant Chou Hsiu for their loan. In addition, he told Lai-hsing to procure a half-carass of pork, a half-carass of mutton, forty catties of white flour, a package of white rice, a jar of wine, two legs of smoked pork, two geese, ten chickens, kindling and charcoal, and appropriate amounts of cooking oil, salt, vinegar, and the like, to be delivered to Ho Yung-shou as a welcome gift to provide for his needs. He also engaged the services of a chef to cater to him there.

Just as these provisions were being collected in the reception hall, preparatory to Tai-an's delivering them, Ch'in-t'ung suddenly came in and said, "Master Wen and Ying the Second have come to pay you a visit."

"Invite them to come in," Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly responded.

Licentiate Wen, wearing a gown of green satin, cut like the robe of a Taoist priest, and Ying Po-chüeh, in a jacket of purple velvet, came in from the front compound to pay their respects to Hsi-men Ch'ing. Bowing repeatedly in greeting, they asked him about the hardships of wind and frost he had been exposed to on his journey.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, for his part, said, "I am grateful to you two gentlemen for keeping an eye on my home, early and late."

"Not only did I keep an eye on your home," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but this morning, when I was about to get up, I suddenly heard the chattering of auspicious magpies on the roof of the house. My wife anticipated me by saying, 'I imagine it's an indication that His Honor has returned home. Why don't you go take a look?' To which I replied, 'Brother departed on the twelfth, and it's only been half a month or so since then. How could he get back so quickly? Every third day I go by there to ask after him, but I haven't heard any news as yet.' 'No matter whether he's come back or not,' said my wife, 'why don't you go take a look?' And she urged me to get dressed. When I arrived at your place, I was surprised to hear that Brother had actually returned, and when I ventured across the street to call on the venerable Master Wen, I found that he, too, was just putting on his clothes. 'Why don't I go over there with you, venerable sir?' he said."

Ying Po-chüeh then went on to ask whom he had encountered on the road to the Eastern Capital. He also noticed that there were quantities of foodstuffs, wine, rice, and so forth, packed up and resting on the stylobate outside the reception hall, and asked, "Who are these for?"

"They are for my new colleague, His Honor Ho Yung-shou," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He accompanied me on my return trip, but his dependents have not arrived yet, so he is staying temporarily in the yamen. I am sending these things to him as a gift to provide for his needs while he is there. I am also sending him a card inviting him to come over tomorrow for a welcoming party after the hardships of the road. I'm not planning to invite anyone else, but I hope that you two gentlemen and my brother-in-law Wu K'ai will be able to come and keep him company."

"There is one problem," said Ying Po-chüeh. "Your brother-in-law Wu K'ai, like you, Brother, are both officials, and Master Wen, here, wears a square-cut scholar's cap, while I am only entitled to wear a commoner's skullcap. How can I be comfortable socializing with him? Who knows what he will make of me? Will I not be merely an object of amusement in his eyes?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "In that case, I'll lend you my newly purchased silk 'loyal and tranquil hat' to wear, and if he should ask you about it, you can say that you are my eldest son. How would that be?"

They all had a laugh at this.

"To get serious about it," continued Ying Po-chüeh, "my head size is eight and three-tenths inches, so I couldn't wear any hat of yours."

Licentiate Wen chimed in, saying, "Your pupil's head size is also eight and three-tenths inches; so how would it be if I lent you my square-cut scholar's cap to wear?"

"Venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you mustn't lend it to him. If he gets used to borrowing it, he might violate protocol by forgetfully showing up with it when reporting for duty at the local office of the Board of Rites, and you would be implicated."

"What a thing to say, venerable sir!" laughed Licentiate Wen. "What a thing to say! No doubt I'd end up being dragged into the soup with him."

At this point, a servant served them with tea, and after they had drunk it, Licentiate Wen inquired, "So His Honor Hsia Yen-ling has received a capital appointment and will not be coming back here anymore?"

"He has been elevated to the position of a senior official," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "As the commander of the escort for imperial processions, he is entitled to wear a mandarin square featuring a ch'i-lin,²⁰ and wield a rattan cane. As the holder of such an illustrious position in the capital, why should he return here?"

Before long, after the invitation had been written, the gifts had been carried outside, and Hsi-men Ch'ing had deputed Tai-an to take charge of their delivery, he conducted Licentiate Wen and Ying Po-chüeh into an anteroom where they could sit down on a heated k'ang, and warm themselves at a brazier. He also dispatched Ch'in-t'ung to the licensed quarter to engage the services of the four boy actors, Wu Hui, Cheng Ch'un, Cheng Feng, and Tso Shun, who were to report for duty early the next day. He then arranged to have a table set up so he could keep his two guests company for a drink of wine.

When Lai-an had brought the table in and set it up, Hsi-men Ch'ing said to him, "Bring another place setting of goblet and chopsticks, and invite my son-in-law to join us."

In due course, Ch'en Ching-chi came in, bowed to the company, and took a seat to one side. The four of them sat down together around the brazier and proceeded to pour the wine, after which, they fell to talking about Hsi-men Ch'ing's adventures on the road.

"Brother," opined Ying Po-chüeh, "you must have a good heart. Since:

One case of good fortune can override a hundred calamities,²¹

even if there had been highwaymen about at the time, the threat they posed would naturally have been dissipated."

Licentiate Wen chimed in, saying:

"If good men were to rule a state for a hundred years, they could put an end to violence and killing."²²

Quite aside from the fact, venerable sir, that you are forever galloping abroad upon the ruler's business, High Heaven will not permit good people to suffer injury."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked, "Did anything of importance happen at home during my absence?"

"After Father's departure," replied Ch'en Ching-chi, "nothing particular happened at home. The only thing is that His Honor An Ch'en of the Ministry of Works sent people to ask after you twice. Yesterday they came again to ask me, and I told them that you had not returned yet."

As they were talking, whom should they see but Lai-an, who came in carrying a large platter of stuffed, chive-flavored, pork dumplings. Hsi-men Ch'ing kept them company as they ate but had only had time to eat one dumpling for himself, when P'ing-an came in and announced that two clerks from the yamen office and a group of adjutants had come to report on something. Hsi-men Ch'ing went out to the reception hall, where he remained standing, and ordered them to come in.

The two clerks knelt down in front of him and asked, "If it please Your Honor, on what day do you intend to assume your new office? And how much in the way of public funds should be drawn upon for the occasion?"

"Just do as you have been accustomed to do in the past," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Last year," said the clerks, "Your Honor was the only one to assume office. But now, not only has Your Honor been promoted to the post of judicial commissioner, but His Honor Ho Yung-shou is also assuming office as assistant judicial commissioner. Since these two events are occurring together, the normal precedents do not apply."

"In that case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can spend another ten taels of silver for the occasion, making a total of thirty taels in all."

The two clerks assented and were on their way out when Hsi-men Ch'ing called them back and said, "As for the day on which to schedule our formal assumption of office, you can ask His Honor Ho Yung-shou when he would like it to be."

"His Honor Ho Yung-shou has already determined that he would like it to be on the twenty-fifth,"²³ the two clerks reported.

"In that case," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can go ahead and prepare for it then."

The two of them then proceeded to draw the specified amount of silver and expend it on arranging the necessary table settings, and purchasing provisions for the occasion.

Sometime later, Ch'iao Hung also came by to pay his respects and proffer his congratulations. Hsi-men Ch'ing invited him to stay for a visit, but he declined and, after drinking a serving of tea, got up and departed. Hsi-men Ch'ing continued to keep his two guests company until lamplighting time before the party broke up, after which, he went back to Yüeh-niang's quarters, where he spent the night. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, preparations were set in order for the party to welcome Ho Yung-shou after the hardships of his trip.

Auntie Wen had also learned of Hsi-men Ch'ing's homecoming by this time and mentioned it to Wang the Third, who immediately prepared a calling card inviting him to come over for a visit. Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by arranging for the purchase of two sets of pig's trotters, two fresh fish, two roast ducks, and a jar of southern wine, and sending Tai-an to deliver them as a belated birthday present for Lady Lin. Tai-an was rewarded for his efforts with a gratuity of three mace of silver. But no more of this.

In the main reception hall the preparations for the party were complete.

The brocade screens dazzled the eyes,
The tables and chairs were spic-and-span,
The floor was covered with brocade carpets,
Landscapes by famous artists adorned the walls.

Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, and Licentiate Wen all came ahead of time. Hsi-men Ch'ing joined them while tea was served and sent someone to remind Ho Yung-shou of his invitation. In a little while, the boy actors appeared and kowtowed to the company.

"Brother," inquired Ying Po-chüeh, "why did you not engage the services of Li Ming for this occasion?"

"He no longer frequents my household," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing, "so I no longer employ him."

"I guess you're still angry with them," said Ying Po-chüeh, but he did not pursue the matter further.

As they were talking, whom should they see but P'ing-an, who hastily came in with a calling card and reported, "His Honor Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command has come to pay his respects and has already dismounted."

At this, Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, Licentiate Wen, and Ying Po-chüeh all retired to an anteroom on the west side of the courtyard, while Hsi-men Ch'ing donned his official cap and girdle and went out to welcome his guest into the reception hall. After exchanging the customary amenities, Chou Hsiu spoke of Hsi-men Ch'ing's recent promotion and extended his congratulations, and Hsi-men Ch'ing thanked him for the loan of the officers and horses for his trip. Thereupon, the two of them sat down in the positions of guest and host, while Chou Hsiu asked him to describe his experience of the imperial audience in the capital. Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by telling him about it in some detail.

"Since Hsia Yen-ling is not coming back," said Chou Hsiu, "he surely must be planning to send someone to conduct his dependents to the capital."

"He is not going to send for them until sometime next month," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "In the interim, my colleague Ho Yung-shou is staying at the yamen. In response to my advocacy, Hsia Yen-ling has also agreed to sell his house to him."

"That sounds like an ideal solution," said Chou Hsiu.

Upon noticing the preparations for a party in the reception hall, he then went on to ask, "Who are you entertaining today?"

"I'm merely providing a libation to welcome His Honor Ho Yung-shou after the hardships of his journey," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Since we are now colleagues, it's the least I can do for him."

When the two of them had finished their tea, Chou Hsiu got up to go, saying, "Someday soon, the officers of the guard will get together to offer their congratulations to you two gentlemen."

"How could I presume to put you to such trouble?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I am grateful for your offer."

After bowing to his host, Chou Hsiu went out the gate, mounted his horse, and departed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then came back inside, divested himself of his formal attire, and rejoined his three visitors, after which, a meal was served for them in the studio.

It was already afternoon by the time Ho Yung-shou arrived. Wu K'ai and the others were all introduced to him, and, when they had finished with the customary amenities, they proceeded to chat about the weather. When the first serving of tea had been replaced, they all relaxed by loosening their clothing.

Ho Yung-shou perceived that Hsi-men Ch'ing's household was appropriately prosperous, and that the preparations for the party were lavishly complete. The four boy musicians, with their:

Silver psalteries, ivory clappers,
Jade mandolas, and balloon guitars, joined the company to serve the wine. Within the hall:

Animal-shaped briquettes burn in golden braziers;
Jade goblets are overflowing with Yang-kao wine.

The blinds are all suspended, so that:

The whole area is suffused with spring warmth;
The entire hall is filled with genial feeling.²⁴

Truly, it is a case of:

Golden goblets are brimming with vintage wine;
Jade candles are trimmed amid sounds of spring.

The party continued until the first watch, when Ho Yung-shou got up and returned to the yamen, while Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, and Licentiate Wen also took their leave and returned home. After Hsi-men Ch'ing had seen the boy actors off, he ordered the utensils to be cleared away and made his way to P'an Chin-lien's quarters in the front compound.

The woman, for her part, was waiting in her room, where she had proceeded to:

Apply generous coats of rouge and powder,

Deck herself out in a new set of apparel,
Light incense and wash her private parts,
in the hope that Hsi-men Ch'ing would visit her quarters.

Her face was wreathed in smiles,²⁵ as she went forward to help him off with his clothes and promptly ordered Ch'un-mei to pour out a serving of tea for him. After he had drunk the tea, the two of them went to bed for the night. Truly:

Under heated bedding and heated quilts,
Brocade curtains hold an air of spring,
And the fragrance of musk is luxuriant.
Beneath the quilt, their white bodies are in intimate contact;
Upon the pillow, their smooth breasts press against each other.
Above, they project their clove-shaped tongues;
Below, the pearl is imbedded inside the oyster.

As for the woman:

Throughout the game of clouds and rain,²⁶
Her hundred allurements are on display;²⁷

As for Hsi-men Ch'ing:

When through thrusting and retracting,
His "magic rhinoceros horn" is erect.²⁸

Unable to go to sleep, they spent some time discussing events during their period of separation. Even after intercourse, their lascivious feelings were still unsatisfied, and Hsi-men Ch'ing obliged her to get down and play his phoenix flute. As for the woman, her sole desire was to strengthen her hold upon Hsi-men Ch'ing's heart. Moreover, having been neglected for half a month:

Her innermost feelings were starved,²⁹
Her libidinous desires were on fire.

Now that his body was again at her disposal, her only regret was that she couldn't:

Bore her way into his belly, and she was prepared to toy with his organ all night without its ever leaving her mouth.

Hsi-men Ch'ing needed to get out of bed in order to urinate, but the woman wouldn't let him go, saying, "My darling, no matter how much urine you may have, go ahead and piss it into my mouth, and I'll swallow it for you. It's ice-cold, and it would be better not to have to expose your warm body to the frigid temperature."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard these words, he was more gratified than ever and exclaimed, "My precious child, no one else cares for me as much as you do."

Thereupon, he actually pissed into the woman's mouth, while she allowed the urine to collect there, and then slowly swallowed it in one mouthful.

"How do you like the taste?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked.

"It has a somewhat salty flavor," responded Chin-lien. "If you have any breath-sweetening lozenges handy, give me some of them to suppress the odor."

"The breath-sweetening lozenges are in my white satin jacket," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You can help yourself to them."

The woman put an end to the episode by tugging at the sleeve of his jacket, which was lying over the headboard, groping out a few lozenges, and popping them into her mouth. Truly:

The minister in waiting is not as thirsty as the diabetic Ssu-ma Hsiang-ju;³⁰
But is willing to accept the gift of a cup of dew from atop a brazen pillar.³¹

Gentle reader take note: It is all too often the way of wives or concubines to set out deliberately to bewitch their husbands:

There is no length to which they will not go,
Humbling themselves to the most shameful acts,
Without showing even a trace of embarrassment.

Legitimate wives, on the other hand, are:

Straightforward and honorable,³²
and could never bring themselves to resort to such practices.

That night, Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman continued to dally with each other without restraint.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing reported to the yamen early in order to participate, together with Ho Yung-shou, in the ceremony marking their formal assumption of office, and to attend the public banquet arranged to celebrate the occasion. Musicians from the two

Music Offices were enlisted to provide for their entertainment. It was already afternoon by the time he returned home, and orderlies from the yamen also delivered to his residence what remained from his table setting at the banquet.

Wang the Third also sent someone to extend an invitation to him. Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by sending Tai-an to the silk goods store to pick up an outfit of clothing as a gift, and arrange to have it wrapped up in a felt bag.

Just as he was completing his preparations for departure, an attendant came in and announced that His Honor An Ch'en had come to pay him a visit, which threw Hsi-men Ch'ing into such consternation that he hardly had time to straighten his clothing before going out to welcome him.

An Ch'en, who was benefiting from his newly enhanced rank as secretary of the Bureau of Irrigation and Transportation in the Ministry of Works, was wearing a girdle with a decorative plaque encased with gold, and a mandarin square emblazoned with a silver pheasant, and was followed by a retinue of lesser officials.

His face was wreathed in smiles, as he was conducted into the reception hall, where they exchanged the customary amenities and congratulated each other on their recent promotions.

When they had seated themselves in the positions of guest and host, Secretary An Ch'en said, "Your pupil has sent people to ask after you several times, but they were told that you had not yet returned."

"That was the case," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I had to remain in the capital until I could attend the great audience at the time of the winter solstice, and submit my congratulatory memorial, before I was able to set out for home."

In a little while, after they had consumed a serving of tea, An Ch'en said, "Your pupil has respectfully come to ask a favor that it is probably inappropriate to trouble you with. At present, the prefect of Chiu-chiang, Ts'ai Hsiu, who is the ninth son of the venerable Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching,³³ is en route to the capital for his triennial audience with the Emperor. The other day, I received a letter from him, stating that he would be arriving here very soon. Your pupil, along with Sung Ch'iao-nien, Ch'ien Lung-yeh, and Huang Pao-kuang, the four of us in all, intend to play host to him and would like to borrow the use of your mansion for the purpose, and invite him to a feast. But we don't know whether you will consent to this or not."

"If that is your esteemed behest, venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing:

"I could hardly presume to disobey it."³⁴

Just let me know when it will be needed."

"It will be on the twenty-seventh," responded An Ch'en. "Your pupil will send over our joint contributions toward the cost of the event tomorrow. If your exemplary staff is able to manage it for us, it would be an ample demonstration of your consideration."

Having finished speaking, and having consumed another serving of tea, he took his leave, mounted his horse, and went his way, accompanied by outriders shouting to clear the way.

Immediately thereafter, Hsi-men Ch'ing proceeded to go out the gate and make his way to the mansion of Imperial Commissioner Wang I-hsüan in order to attend the party to which he had been invited. Upon arriving at the gate, he sent in his calling card, and when Wang the Third heard that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived, he hastened out to welcome him and escorted him into the reception hall, where they exchanged the customary amenities.

It so happens that this hall was a spacious thirty-foot-wide structure, with a rounded goalpost-shaped main door; topped with a double-eaved, five-ridged, gable and hip roof, decorated with animal figures; and enhanced with doors and windows of caltrop-patterned latticework. Over the lintel a plaque was suspended that had been presented by the Emperor and was inscribed in the imperial hand with three gold characters that read "Hall of Ancestral Loyalty." To either side of the door were suspended tablets inscribed with the parallel statements:

Mansion of a pillar of the state;

Home of a protector of the realm.³⁵

In the place of honor in the middle of the hall was positioned a formal chair, upholstered in tiger skin, with a closely clipped woolen rug on the floor in front of it.

After Wang the Third had greeted Hsi-men Ch'ing with the appropriate amenities, he ushered him to the seat of honor, while he drew up a chair for himself and sat down to one side. Before long, a serving of tea was brought out on a red lacquer tray. When they had politely offered cups to each other and consumed the tea, the attendants took the utensils away, and they fell into casual conversation. It was only after this that the drinking vessels were laid out and the wine poured. It so happens that Wang the Third had engaged the services of two boy actors to entertain them by singing and playing their musical instruments.

Hsi-men Ch'ing interrupted the proceedings by saying, "Why don't you invite the venerable lady of the house to come out so that I can pay her my respects?"

This elicited such consternation on the part of Wang the Third that he promptly told an attendant to go back to the interior of the residence and convey the request.

In a little while, the attendant came out again and said, "Her Ladyship invites His Honor to come visit her inside."

Wang the Third, accordingly, prepared to usher him inside, and Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "My worthy acquaintance, pray precede me."

Thereupon, they went straight back to the main room in the interior of the residence.

Lady Lin was already fully decked out for the occasion.

Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets,³⁶ her torso was garbed in a scarlet full-sleeved robe; her waist was encircled with a girdle featuring a plaque of green jade inlaid with gold, beneath which she wore a flower-sprigged skirt of jet brocade; her face was so heavily daubed with makeup that she resembled a silver figurine; her hair was done up in a raised coiffure; her lips were red with rouge; her earlobes were adorned with a pair of pearl earrings; and from the upper border of her skirt were suspended two strings of:

Jade pendants that tinkled when she moved.³⁷

Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Bent his body to perform an obeisance,
saying, "Will Your Ladyship please assume the position of honor."

"Your Honor is our guest," responded Lady Lin. "Will you please assume the position of honor?"

After dickering for what seemed like half a day, the two of them ended up kowtowing to each other.

"I fear," said Lady Lin, "that my young son, who is as yet:

Unconscious of right and wrong, imposed upon Your Honor the other day but was fortunate enough to receive your forgiveness. And you also undertook to settle matters with that bunch of characters on his behalf, for which:

My gratitude knows no bounds.

Today I have prepared a meager cup of watery wine and invited you here, with the intention of kowtowing to you in order to express my gratitude. How is it that, instead, I have been the recipient of Your Honor's gifts, putting me in a position in which it would be:

Discourteous to refuse, and Embarrassing to accept?"

"How could I be so presumptuous?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It was only because your pupil had to go to the Eastern Capital on business and was therefore unable to proffer my congratulations on the occasion of Your Ladyship's birthday that I have offered this:

Insignificant lot of paltry gifts,³⁸ to Your Ladyship to give away to someone if you like."

Upon noticing that Auntie Wen was also present, Hsi-men Ch'ing turned to her, saying, "Auntie Wen, would you fetch me a set of goblets on raised stands so I can proffer a drink of birthday wine to Her Ladyship."

He also hastily called for Tai-an to come forward. It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing had prepared an outfit of fashionable brocaded clothing as a birthday present for Lady Lin, which Tai-an was carrying in his felt bag. It consisted of a lilac-colored, wide-sleeved, satin jacket, and a kingfisher-blue, long trailing skirt, and was presented to her upon a tray. When Lady Lin saw it, with its:

Golden tints that caught the eye, she was more than a little delighted.

Auntie Wen forthwith presented a set of:

Golden goblets on silver stands,³⁹ and Wang the Third also ordered the two boy actors to bring their musical instruments and come in to help celebrate the occasion.

But Lady Lin protested, saying, "See here, what's the point of calling them in here? Let them wait outside for now."

Accordingly, they were sent outside again.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then toasted her with a goblet of wine, and Lady Lin expressed her gratitude by returning the compliment.

After this, Wang the Third proffered Hsi-men Ch'ing a goblet of wine, and Hsi-men Ch'ing was about to kowtow to him in return, but Lady Lin intervened, saying, "Your Honor, please get up, and permit him to kowtow to you."

"How could I do that?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Whoever heard of such a thing?"

"My good sir," said Lady Lin, "how can you talk that way? Do you mean to suggest that someone with such a high-ranking office as yours is not fit to be his adopted father? My son has been undereducated since his childhood and has not had the opportunity to associate with the right sort of people. If Your Honor will only deign to demonstrate your good will by teaching him how to become a better person in all respects, I will have him, today, in my presence, kowtow to Your Honor as his adopted father. If you should detect any faults in his conduct, Your Honor should feel free to admonish him. I will certainly not endeavor to defend his shortcomings."

"Although there is something to what Your Ladyship suggests," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "your noble son, my worthy acquaintance, is naturally endowed with intelligence. At present, he is young and is still feeling his way with regard to the rules of proper conduct. In the future:

When the scope of his perceptions has become broader,

He will correct his faults and change for the better.⁴⁰
Your Ladyship need not be concerned about it."

Thereupon, Lady Lin had Hsi-men Ch'ing assume the position of honor, while Wang the Third poured out three goblets of wine and performed the ceremony of kowtowing to him four times. When these acts of homage had been performed, Hsi-men Ch'ing moved to a lesser position and bowed to Lady Lin to express his gratification, in response to which, she smiled broadly and made him a deep obeisance in return. From this time on, whenever Wang the Third encountered Hsi-men Ch'ing, he addressed him as Father. Can such things be? As for Hsi-men Ch'ing, truly:

He was ever prepared to enjoy the pleasure of "abusing the innocent and good";

As a makeshift substitute for the delight of "addiction to clouds and rain."

The poet, on observing this conduct, must have felt a sense of outrage, which inspired him to compose a poem lamenting it.

Since men and women are forbidden to exchange drinks with each other;
Flaunting one's beauty and inviting seduction⁴¹ are really shameful acts.
But Wang the Third, who was in the dark about the significance of it all;
Not only contributed to his mother's adultery
but kowtowed to her lover.

There is also another poem inspired by this event:

The women's quarters of great households should be strictly guarded;
For the hen to announce the break of dawn⁴² is extremely inauspicious.
Not only does it forebode the destruction of the family's reputation;
But it desecrates the name of the Hall of Integrity and Righteousness.

After they had consumed the wine, Lady Lin directed Wang the Third to invite Hsi-men Ch'ing back to the reception hall in the front of the residence, where the two of them sat down and loosened their clothing. Tai-an brought out Hsi-men Ch'ing's "loyal and tranquil hat," and he changed into it.

It was not long before the table settings were arranged and they sat down in their places, while the boy actors struck up their musical instruments and prepared to sing for their entertainment. The chef came out and carved the entrée, while Tai-an stood by to offer him an appropriate gratuity. Standing in front of the company, the boy actors then proceeded to sing the song suite that begins with the tune "Fresh Water Song":

Wang Ts'ai Kowtows to Hsi-men Ch'ing as an Adopted Father

Kingfisher blinds closely enclose the small chamber;
The jade hook of the moon dangles
low in the heavens.
Within the suspended felt drapery,
And tortoiseshell brocade screens,
An amorous atmosphere is suffused.
Branches of plum blossoms exude a subtle fragrance.

TO THE TUNE "A TRICKY PLAY"

Their slender shadows cross the window lattices;⁴³
Green parakeets are hanging on them upside down.
Snow, like a cloud of pear blossoms, re-creates the dream on Mount Lo-fu.⁴⁴
It is deep at night and the dripping of the cold clepsydra seems endless.

TO THE TUNE "SWEET WATER SONG"

The alabaster trees have borne blossoms;
The jade dragons have lost their scales;
Bits of hail cascade from the Milky Way;
Auspicious snow dances in the swirling wind.
The azure empyrean is immaculate;

Pale moonlight browses the eaves;
Dark clouds invade the ridgepole;
The iridescent gates and pearly palaces⁴⁵ present a blinding whiteness.

TO THE TUNE “PLUCKING THE CASSIA”

The brocade setting enhances his delight in the creative work of spring,
The pubescent maidservants,
And teenaged singing boys.

He plays “Hiding the Tally” under the flowers,⁴⁶
Gaming at forfeits during a drinking bout,
Or throwing the dice at the banquet table.
Alluringly, she contends in beauty and competes for favor;
Jubilantly, he hugs the turquoise and cuddles the red.

She serves cups and offers goblets;⁴⁷

Alters the pitch or switches modes;⁴⁸

Dances seductively and sings songs;⁴⁹

Gently strums or lightly melodizes.⁵⁰

TO THE TUNE “THE WATER NYMPHS”

The fragrant fumes of musk-scented charcoal form ornate lotus blossoms;

The wavery light of phoenix-painted candles⁵¹
engenders aureate rainbows;

Ivory bedsteads provide a springtime warmth in the lanes of the quarter.

The rouge and powder exude fragrance where pearls and trinkets cluster;

Like strata of colored clouds, the layers of silken fabrics are thick.

The scent of ambergris in jeweled censers is diaphanous;

Animal-shaped briquettes in gold braziers glow fire-red;

A warm aura creates the genial atmosphere of the spring breeze.

TO THE BINARY TUNES “WILD GEESE ALIGHT” AND “VICTORY SONG”

On the silver psaltery the bridges are ranged like wild geese;

The sound of the jade flute is like the warble of a baby oriole;

The flowers are as brightly colored as a kingfisher's wings;

A plenitude of wine fills to the brim
the vitreous decanter.

Variegated sleeves proffer golden goblets;

Slender fingers handle silk handkerchiefs;

The frosty rinds of fresh oranges are peeled;

Melted snow is used to boil the fragrant tea.

Pleasure abounds,

Inebriated feelings are profoundly stimulated;

The feast is over,

The night is late but desire is not yet sated.

TO THE TUNE “PROCURING GOOD WINE”

By means of only a single glance and a smile,
Their mutual feelings are fully communicated.

Under the lamplight, he scrutinizes
the object of his desire;

She is like Ch'ang-o emerging from her palace in the moon;

Or the Goddess of Witches' Mountain descending from her peak.

TO THE TUNE “SONG OF GREAT PEACE”

From the sloping hair at her temples the flying phoenix hairpin has fallen;

The kingfisher-hued motif of a coiled dragon on her dancing skirt is loose;

Her powdered sweat moistens the white cosmetics on her bewitching features;

Sticking out its tip, she tentatively lets her clove-shaped tongue protrude.

Her arm is encircled with a bracelet, and the red mark of a chastity charm.⁵²

Truly, they make a pair of fledgling male and captivating female phoenixes.⁵³

TO THE TUNE “RIVER-BOBBED OARS”

It is a happy reunion,
A reunion with the object of his desire.
Her willows are fatigued, her blossoms languid;⁵⁴
Her jadelike body is warm, her breast melting;
As they savor to the full the romance of their rendezvous.
Quivering, her chignon becomes disheveled;
Lazily, the autumn ripples of her eyes stir;
Archly, the mascara of her eyebrows gathers.

TO THE TUNE "SEVEN BROTHERS"

Intoxication ignites,
Her jade countenance,
Into a delicate red glow.
Addicted to flowers and lusting for jade, they indulge their desires.
He actually believes he is participating,
while in a somnolent trance,
In a dream visit to the goddess who lives in the Floriate Pearl Palace.⁵⁵

TO THE TUNE "PLUM BLOSSOM WINE"

As they reach the climax of their game of clouds and rain,
They are in a dither, though the event is ordinary enough.⁵⁶
The watch drums sound incessantly,
The chimes under the eaves tinkle;
The neighboring cock crows,
The trumpet plays reveille;
The jade clepsydra drips,
Resounding reiteratively;
The silver lamp burns out,
Casting its golden sparks;
Beyond the silken windows,
The light of dawn impends;
At the azure Heaven's rim,
The sun begins to radiate.

TO THE TUNE "CONQUERING THE SOUTHLAND"

Ah! What does he hear but the sound of the well-pulley beyond the whitewashed wall;⁵⁷
And the early cawing of the ravens in the phoenix trees beside the gilded wellhead?
Spring beauty still fills his eyes, but he is not yet fully awake.
Alas, this vision of surreptitious joy and secret infatuation,⁵⁸
Has been idly interrupted for no good reason, which is a pity.⁵⁹

Before long, after:

Five main courses had been served, and

Two suites of songs had been performed, the candles were lit, and Hsi-men Ch'ing got up to change his clothes and take his leave. Wang the Third, however, insisted upon retaining him a little longer and invited him into his private studio, which was located at the side of the courtyard. It was a small, freestanding structure, only eighteen feet wide, but inside:

Flowers and trees cast intersecting shadows, and

The cultural artifacts were elegantly displayed.

A plaque emblazoned with four powdered-gold characters read "San-ch'üan's Poetic Skiff." On the four walls there hung antique paintings depicting the following subjects:

The Yellow Emperor Asks about the Way,⁶⁰

Fu Sheng Conceals the Forbidden Books,⁶¹

Ping Chi Makes Inquiries about the Ox,⁶²

Sung Ching Examines the History Books.⁶³

Upon seeing the plaque, Hsi-men Ch'ing asked, "Who might San-ch'üan, or Three Springs, be?"

Wang the Third endeavored to avoid the question and did not wish to reply, but finally, after what seemed like half a day, he said, "It is your son's insignificant courtesy name."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, upon hearing this, did not have another word to say on the subject.

At this point, a tall narrow-necked vessel was brought in, and they proceeded to play pitch-pot and drink wine together, while the two boy actors stood to one side, struck up their instruments, and sang for their entertainment. Meanwhile, Lady Lin, in the rear of the residence, supervised her maidservants and waiting women in replenishing their refreshments, and supplying them with saucers of seasonal delicacies. They continued drinking until the second watch, when Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was already half inebriated, took his leave and got up to go. He gave each of the boy actors a tip of three mace of silver, and Wang the Third escorted him to the front gate and saw him into his sedan chair. The two orderlies who had accompanied him lit their lanterns, while Hsi-men Ch'ing put on his earmuffs, donned his sable cloak, said goodbye to his host, and set out for home.

When he arrived there, he remembered something Chin-lien had said to him earlier in the day and made his way straight into her quarters. It so happens that the woman had not yet gone to bed but had just taken off her headdress and was engaged in doing up her cloud-shaped chignon. Still:

Delicately made up and heavily powdered,⁶⁴

she was in her room, leaning on the base of her makeup stand, with her feet propped on the rim of the brazier, cracking melon seeds in her mouth as she waited for him. Beside the brazier:

A kettle of hydrangea-flavored tea was brewing;⁶⁵ upon the table:

Incense curled from a golden lion-shaped censer.⁶⁶

As soon as she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing come in, she:

Lightly moved her lotus feet,

Gently lifted her beige skirt, and hastened forward to take his outer garments and put them away. Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down on her bed, while Ch'un-mei brought out a clean cup for him, and the woman, after brushing away a few drops of water from the rim of the cup with her slender fingers, poured out a cupful of dense and full-bodied tender-leaved Sparrow Tongue Liu-an tea,⁶⁷ steeped with sesame seeds, marinated bamboo shoots, shredded chestnuts, melon seeds, a blend of walnut kernels and potherb mustard greens called "The Sea Eagle Attacks the Swan," osmanthus, and attar of roses. Upon swallowing no more than a mouthful and savoring its delectable fragrance and sweetness, Hsi-men Ch'ing was utterly delighted. He then had Ch'un-mei:

Take off his boots, unfasten his girdle,⁶⁸

and help him into bed. Meanwhile the woman, under the lamplight, removed her head ornaments and changed into her sleeping shoes, after which the two of them lay down:

Head to head and thigh over thigh, while

The coverlet was disturbed by crimson waves,

And they reposed upon their phoenix pillows.

Ch'un-mei extinguished the silver lamp on the table, closed the two leaves of the door, and went into the adjacent room.

Hsi-men Ch'ing proceeded to pillow the woman's head on his arm and embrace her naked body, which was just like:

Soft jade and warm incense.

The two of them fell to it, with their:

Creamy breasts squeezed together,

Their jadelike legs intertwined;

Their two faces nuzzling each other,⁶⁹

Audibly sucking each other's tongues.

The woman picked up a handful of melon seed kernels that were in a saucer beside her pillow, popped them into her mouth, and transmitted them into Hsi-men Ch'ing's mouth with the tip of her tongue. It was not long before:

Her sweet spittle transfused his heart, and

His magic rhinoceros horn was awakened.

The woman reached down and manipulated his organ persistently with one hand, while she opened the bag of sexual implements with the other and proceeded to fasten the silver clasp in place.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked, "My child, while I was away from home, did you think of me, or not?"

"During the half-month or so that you were away," the woman said, "I couldn't get you out of my mind for so much as a quarter of an hour. When evening came, the nights were long, and, all by myself, I was unable to sleep. No matter what lengths I went to in order to:

Warm the bed and warm the bedding,

I continued to feel cold. When I extended my legs and encountered a cold spot, I had to retract them, and my hands became so cracked that they hurt. I would count the days till your return, but you failed to appear. There is no telling how many tears I shed upon my pillow. After a while, that little piece Ch'un-mei noticed the extent to which I was giving vent to:

Long sighs as well as short,
